took no heavier burdens on himself than serving in the Boards of the Church and of Princeton Seminary; and also as Trustee of Nassau Hall. In the discharge of these duties he was unsurpassed for assiduity and punctuality. His death occurred, June 27th, 1858, in the eighty-fourth year of his age.

As a preacher, Dr. Janeway was didactic and methodical, avoiding the flowery paths of rhetoric. On all public occasions, he acquitted himself creditably. His figure was portly and his countenance benevolent. He was singularly self-poised and unimpassioned. When the tornado of 1837 blew his chimneys down and twisted his old elms, he merely said to the assembled crowd, in his usual imperturbable manner, "This has been a considerable blow."

Dr. Janeway published letters on the "Atonement," "Communicants' Manual," etc.

Janeway, Thomas Leiper, D. D., was born in Philadelphia, February 27th, 1805; graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1823; was Tutor in Allegheny Seminary in 1828, and ordained, by the Presbytery of Elizabethtown, November 3d, 1829. He was pastor of the First Church of Rahway, N. J., 1829-40; pastor of the North Church, Philadelphia, 1840-54; pastor at Kingston, N. J., 1855-61, and Corresponding Secretary of the Board of Domestic Missions, 1861-68. He now resides in Philadelphia. Dr. Janeway is a gentleman of genial spirit and pleasing address. Whilst in active ministerial work, he was popular as a preacher, faithful as a pastor and presbyter, and his labors were crowned with success. In his connection with the Board of Domestic Missions he rendered valuable service. He now preaches for his brethren, as there is opportunity.

Janvier, Rev. Levi, was born at Pittsgrove, N. J. April 25th, 1816. He graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1835. After being engaged in teaching for a time, he was ordained by the Presbytery of West Jersey, December 31st, 1840. He was a missionary in India, at Futtehghur, Lodiana, Ambala and Sabathu, 1841-64. He died at Anandpoer, March 25th, 1864, passing from his chosen scene of labor and self-denial to the reward of a "good and faithful servant."

Jeffers, Rev. W. H., D. D., LL. D., was born near Cadiz, Ohio, May 11th, 1838. At the age of thirteen he entered Geneva College, an Institution of the Reformed Presbyterian Church, in Northwood, Ohio, and graduated, with distinction, in 1855. In theology he was trained in the Seminary of the United Presbyterian Church, at Xenia, Ohio. He was licensed in 1859, by the U. P. Presbytery of Sidney, and devoted the two following years to home missionary work in the State of Iowa. Better fitted for his chosen life-work by this experience, he accepted a call to the pastorate of the united churches of Bellefontaine and Northwood, and was duly ordained and installed over that charge, in 1862, by the Presbytery of Sidney. Almost immediately the Assembly of the United Presbyterian Church recognized his exceptional merit by appointing him on its committee for preparing a new version of the Psalms, and continuing him in that important position until the work was done. In 1866 he accepted the Professorship of Latin and Hebrew in Westminster College, in New Wilmington, Pennsylvania, where he remained until 1869, when, in order to acquire the advantages which may be gained by travel and study abroad, he resigned, and spent the year following mostly in Egypt, Syria and Greece. While thus absent in the far East, he was elected to the Chair of Greek Literature in the University of Wooster, Ohio, which he most ably filled until 1875, when, to the great regret of all the friends of the University, he thought proper to accept the pastorate of the Euclid Avenue Presbyterian special adaptations are to the duties of the high office he holds as the teacher of candidates for the ministry, in those essential things which pertain to the true understanding of the Word of God, and which may make them also able and successful interpreters of that same peerless Word.

Jelly, Alexander M., D.D., was born in the "Four Mile Square," Beaver county, Pa. He pursued his academical studies in the Beaver Academy, whence he went to Washington College, Pa., where he remained two years, and from which, after its union with Jefferson College, he received the Degree of A. M. After teaching one year in the Wheeling Classical Academy, he entered the Western Theological Seminary, from which he graduated in 1861. After being licensed by the Presbytery of Ohio, April, 1861, he was installed pastor of Belmont Church, Philadelphia, September 14th of the same year. He was also pastor of the Richmond Church, Philadelphia, 1862-70; of the Church at Washington, N. J., 1870-74, and of the Twelfth Church, Baltimore, 1874-9. Marked success attended his ministry in all these fields of labor.

Dr. Jelly, as a preacher, is evangelical, earnest, eloquent. As a pastor, he is most faithful and efficient. He is no less successful as an educator. At Candor, Pa., in Philadelphia, in Washington, N. J., he organized and carried on successfully parochial schools, in which many of the young people were trained, under his skillful hand, for usefulness. Of great financial and executive ability, he is eminently fitted for such work. During his pastorate in Baltimore, the New Windsor College, Md., having failed, for want of proper management, and being desirous of reclaiming it for the education of youth, especially of Presbyterians, he purchased this valuable and finely situated property. Now, with the Board of Trustees as counsellors, a full corps of competent professors, and aided by his accomplished wife, he has seen this college, under his wise management, rise to an encouraging and gratifying degree of prosperity. Although thus engaged, he is still pursuing his favorite work of preaching the gospel, as stated supply of the churches of New Windsor and Granite, preaching twice every Sabbath, and on many special occasions.

Jenkins, Herman Dutilh, D.D., was born in Columbus, O., January 14th, 1842; graduated at Hamilton College, in 1864; studied theology at Auburn Seminary, 1864-5, and at Union Seminary, New York, 1865-7. He was licensed by the Presbytery of New York, in December, 1866. From December, 1866, to August, 1867, he spent in travel. On his return he accepted work in a mission chapel, at Columbus, O., for the Fall and Winter. In April, 1868, he was called to supply the Central Presbyterian Church, of Joliet, Ill., and in June accepted an offer of the pastorate, and was ordained in September, 1868, by the Presbytery of Chicago, and installed

W. H. JEFFERS, D. D., LL. D.

Church in Cleveland, Ohio. Here he remained until elected, in 1877, to the Professorship of Old Testament Literature and Exegesis in the Western Theological Seminary, at Allegheny, Pa.

Into all the positions which Dr. Jeffers has occupied, he has carried gifts and attainments so various and excellent that his services have been conspicuously effective and valuable. As a preacher, he has few if any superiors in those things which constitute true gospel preaching. Clear in thought, terse in expression, logical in method and eminently Scriptural in matter, his hearers are not only interested in the intellectual form and movement of his discourse, but they are also conscious of receiving sterling instruction on themes of the highest moment. Admirable, however, as he is in the pulpit, his most during the same month. In 1873 he took charge of the First Presbyterian Church, Freeport, Ill., where he has labored nearly ten years. Dr. Jenkins is a forcible and faithful preacher. In reporting himself in the record of his theological class, he says: "I have learned much of the joys of Christian labor. * * * God has given to the churches I have served an increase sufficient for encouragement, but not sufficient for boasting."

Jennings, Rev. Jacob, was born in Somerset county, N. J., in 1711. He studied medicine, and practiced it near Elizabethtown, N. J., and subsequently in Readington township, Huntingdon county, with considerable reputation. When about forty years of age he turned his attention to theology, and was licensed to preach the gospel. For several years after his licensure he resided in Virginia. He was admitted to membership in the Presbytery of Redstone, April 17th, 1792, and accepted a call from the congregation of Dunlap's Creek, in Fayette county, of which he continued to be pastor until June, 1811, when, on account of his increased infirmities, he asked and obtained a dissolution of the pastoral relation. He died, February 17th, 1813.

Jennings, Obadiah, D.D., was the fourth son of the Rev. Jacob Jennings, noticed above, and was born near Basking Ridge, N. J., December 13th, 1778. He was educated at the Academy at Canonsburg, Pa., studied law, was admitted to the Bar in 1800, and practiced that profession at Steubenville, O., and Washington, Pa. Having determined to retire from the Bar, he commenced a course of theological reading in the Fall of 1816, was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Ohio, and shortly after received a unanimous call from the Church in Steubenville to become their pastor, which he accepted, and was installed in the Spring of 1817. Here he continued laboring, with great fidelity and a good measure of success, for six years. In the Spring of 1823 he was installed pastor of the Church in Washington, Pa. Here he remained, an earnest and efficient laborer in the vineyard of the Lord, five years.

He then received a call from the Church in Nashville, Tenn., removing to that place in April, 1828. Here he exerted himself to the utmost of his ability, and, though the accessions to his church were not very numerous, his good influence was felt, not only by his immediate congregation, but throughout the region in which he lived. In the year 1830 he was unexpectedly drawn into a public controversy with Alexander Campbell, on various points of Christian doctrine, in which he discovered great intellectual acumen and logical power. Dr. Jennings died January 12th, 1832. He published several occasional sermons, also various articles in the religious periodicals of the day. His discourses were marked by good sense, evangelical doctrine, and an excellent spirit. His piety was earnest, but unostentatious. He was a man of very humble spirit, and his whole department was that of a sincere follower of the meek and lowly Jesus.

Jennings, Samuel Carnahan, D. D., was born in Washington county, Pa., February 19th, 1803; graduated in Jefferson College in 1823, and was ordained by the Presbytery of Ohio, June 24th, 1829. He was pastor at Sharon, Pa., 1829-79; editor of Christian Herald (now Presbyterian Banner) 1829-32; editor of the Presbyterian Preacher, 1832-37; principal of Female Seminary, 1837-40; stated supply at Mt. Pisgah, 1831-48; stated supply at Temperanceville, 1842-48; pastor at Long Island, 1848-57; at Valley Church, 1857-68, and stated supply at Riverdale, 1880—. Dr. Jennings' long life has been one of marked consecration to the Master's work. He is a devout and faithful Christian, and by his pen, as well as in the pulpit, has rendered valuable service to the cause of truth and righteousness. He is known as a champion of the cause of Temperance. His influence in every direction has been salutary, and he justly enjoys the esteem of his brethren.

Jessup, Henry Harris, D. D., son of the Hon. William Jessup, noticed below, was born at Montrose, HENRY HARRIS JESSUP, D. D.

Pa., April 19th, 1832. He graduated at Yale College, in 1851, and at Union Theological Seminary, New York city, in 1855. Ordained November 1st, 1855; he was missionary at Tripoli, Syria, 1856-60, and since 1860 has been missionary at Beirut, Syria. He received the title of D. D. in 1865, from the University of New York, and from the College of New Jersey. He was Moderator of the General Assembly which met at Saratoga, N. Y., in 1879, and discharged the duties of the position with great ability and acceptableness. Dr. Jessup is a fine scholar, a devoted Christian and an instructive and edifying preacher. In his fields of foreign labor he has, with pen and voice, rendered invaluable service in the promotion of the Redeemer's Kingdom. His untiring energy, great tact and eminent consecration to his grand work have given him large success in winning souls to Christ, and won for him the admiration and affection of all who love the cause to which his life has been so ardently devoted. During several brief visits to his native country he has spent the time in kindling or fanning the flame of missionary zeal in the congregations of the Church which he has so long and faithfully represented in its work of missions. Dr. Jessup is the author of "Mohammedan Missionary Problem," a volume of much interest, from the press of our Board of Publication.

Jessup, Rev. Samuel, A. B., was the seventh child and third son of Hon. William and Amanda (Harris) Jessup, and was born in Montrose, Susquehanna county, Pa., December 21st, 1833. He united with the church, on profession, in 1848, when at school in Homer, N. Y. In 1853 he was in mercantile business and about to become a partner in the firm, when, in view of the expected departure of his older brother, Henry, to Syria, he decided to give up business and give himself to the foreign missionary work.

Entering Yale College in 1856, as a member of the class of 1860, he remained two years, but, with the advice of President Woolsey, he left college and entered Union Theological Seminary, N. Y., September, 1858, and graduated May, 1861. On the graduation of his class (of 1860), in Yale, the degree of A. B. was conferred upon him, with the class.

Under a commission of the A. B. C. F. M., he sailed for Syria, December, 1862. He was stationed first at Tripoli, Syria, then at Sidon, and then in 1869 returned to Tripoli. In October, 1883, he removed to Beirut, which is now his home. He was ordained in 1862, by the Presbytery of Montrose. He is a good Arabic scholar, an earnest preacher, has remarkable tact in dealing with men, and is universally beloved. His early business training has fitted him admirably for the work to which he has just been called, in the management of the Mission Printing Establishment and Publishing House in Beirut.

Jessup, William, LL. D., was born at Southampton, Long Island, in 1797. He was of honored parentage. He was graduated from Yale College, in 1815. After leaving college he settled at Montrose, Susquehanna county, Pa. He was admitted to the Bar in 1820. He held several minor offices under the appointment of the Governor of the State in early life, when he learned that eminent practicability which distinguished him, when coupled in the higher courts of the State with profound learning, and at the Bar with convincing eloquence.

He was commissioned President Judge of the Eleventh Judicial District of Pennsylvania, by Governor Ritner, and held that office, in different districts, for thirteen years. In 1851 he was nominated for Judge of the Supreme Court of the State, by the Whig party, and shared with his distinguished competitors the defeat of his party by a small majority. He then returned to the practice of his favorite profession. One of his political opponents wrote of him, that "the style of his oratory at the Bar is perspicuous, pleasing, and strongly impressive. One of his most brilliant forensic triumphs may be reckoned his defence of the Rev. Albert Barnes, of Philadelphia, upon the charge of heresy, before the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church. In his character or position as a Judge he was remarkable for a clearness and readiness upon any subject within the range of the profession, and for a prompt and proper dispatch of business. Judge Jessup commanded, from a distinguished and intelligent Bar, not only their respect for his learning and impartiality, as exhibited on the bench, but also their affection and esteem, in the highest degree, as a man and a Christian."

Hamilton College conferred on Judge Jessup, justly, the degree of Doctor of Laws. He cultivated literary and scientific tastes, and was deeply interested in the material, moral, and educational growth of his county and State. He was a firm adherent of Temperance principles. He was practically and theoretically interested in farming pursuits, and did much to elevate the reputation of his county in that direction. He made a public profession of religion in 1825, and in 1829 was elected elder in the Presbyterian Church, which office he ever afterwards held. His religion, while founded on a strong basis of doctrine, was an enthusiasm with him, and often enabled him to convince and electrify an audience.

Judge Jessup was permitted to see all the members of his large family united with the Presbyterian Church. He left as a legacy to the Church in its work, the missionaries, Rev. Henry H. Jessup, D. D., and Rev. Samuel Jessup, who have spent so much of their lives in the Syrian Mission. He died, September 11th, 1868. Paralysis affected his memory in the last years of his life, so that he would lose his way to his own home, but never to the house of God; he found this with unerring precision. In his life, he was liberal, charitable, social and upright. His memory is still retained in the part of the State where he lived, with great respect and affection.

Jewell, Rev. Joel, was born in Durham, Green county, N. Y., February 11th, 1803. At an early age we find him among the pioneers in Sunday-school and Temperance work. From the beginning of his religious experience, in 1826, he has ever been active in revival work, assisting Dr. William Wisner, of Ithaca, in the gracious revival in the Winter of 1827-28, when some five hundred were hopefully converted and added to the Church, and also assisting Rev. Titus Coan, at Medina, N. Y., in a precious revival season in the early Spring of 1829. During the following Summer he superintended sixteen Sabbath schools, visiting three or four each Sabbath, in order, leaving the assistant superintendent in charge for the other Sabbaths. The next year he had the charge of seventeen schools. In the Spring of 1837 he removed from Hector, N. Y., to Farmington, Tioga county, Pa., where he continued similar Sabbath-school and evangelistic work until 1843, when he entered the ministry. For five years he supplied the Presbyterian churches of Farmington and Beecher's Island.

In 1847 Mr. Jewell was called to the Congregational Church of West Newark, Tioga county, N. Y., where he remained five years and a half, when he removed to Wells, Pa., in the year 1852. Since that, for thirty years, he has labored with the churches of Wells and Columbia Cross Roads and Sylvania, with the exception of two years of the time, when he was recalled to his old pastorate at West Newark, N. Y. He is still supplying the Church of Sylvania, beloved and honored in his work. Through Mr. Jewell originated the word "teetotal." At a public temperance meeting in Hector, in 1828, he introduced into the pledge the letters "O. P." for "old pledge," which pledged against only distilled liquors, and "T." for "total," including both distilled and fermented liquors. When names were being taken, a young man in the gallery said, "Add my name and a 'T.' for I am a T-totaler." And thus originated the name teetotaler, more than four years before Dick Turner claimed to coin it in England. In August 23d, 1829, Mr. Jewell organized a young people's society, consisting of 252 members, male and female—the beginning of woman's work in temperance.

Johnes, Rev. Timothy, of Welsh descent, was born at Southampton, Long Island, May 24th, 1717, and graduated at Yale in 1737. He was ordained at Morristown, N. J., February 9th, 1743. The congregation at this place "was, under Christ, collected, settled, and watered" by Mr. Johnes. During the latter part of his ministry there, especially, his zealous labors were greatly blessed.

The American army passed the Winter of 1777 encamped near Morristown. It was a disastrous stage of our public affairs; sickness swept away the soldiers, and the gloom was made horrible by the abounding profanity and the ceaseless gaming. Washington, as the communion drew nigh, asked Mr. Johnes if membership with the Presbyterian Church was required by him as a term of admission to the ordinance. He replied, "All who love the Lord Jesus are welcome." "That is right," was Washington's answer, and he sought, in the fellowship of God's people and in the remembrance of redeeming love, on the Sabbath, relief from the scenes that appalled him and from the forebodings that oppressed his soul. The services were held in the open air, even in Winter, in a sheltered spot. The church was at that time occupied as a hospital, and often, in the morning, the dead were found lying in the pews.

Mr. Johnes died September 19th, 1794. He was distinguished for his fidelity; his discourses were clear, plain, practical, persuasive. By an affectionate appeal to the heart, he aimed to win men to the practice of holiness. Few congregations were so thoroughly instructed as his, in all that pertains to the practical duties of religion, and in the great doctrines of grace. A lover of peace, his own people and the neighboring congregations unhesitatingly reposed with confidence in his judgment and tried friendship.

Johnson, Herrick, D. D., LL. D., possesses such elements of power and magnetism as to make him one of the pulpit and platform orators now most prominent in America. He was born near Fonda, N. Y., September 21st, 1832, and graduated from Hamilton College, N. Y., in 1857, being laureled for his Clark Prize Oration on "The Assimilation of Character to Objects of Thought." Graduating from Auburn Seminary in 1860, he was ordained colleague pastor of the First Presbyterian Church in Troy, during the pastorate of the celebrated Dr. Beman. In the Fall of 1862 he accepted a call to the pastorate of the Third Presbyterian Church in Pittsburg Pa., which he resigned in the Fall of 1867.

During the Winter of 1867-8, Dr. Johnson supplied the Presbyterian pulpit in Marquette, Mich., and in May, 1868, he accepted the pastorate of the First Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia, Pa., as the successor of Rev. Albert Barnes. In January, 1874, he entered upon a new field of labor, as Professor of Sacred Rhetoric and Pastoral Theology in Auburn Theological Seminary. In the Spring of 1880 he accepted a call to the Fourth Presbyterian Church in Chicago, and also to a Lectureship of Sacred Rhetoric in the Theological Seminary of the Northwest. He was a member of the Second General Council of the Presbyterian Alliance, which convened at Philadelphia, and read before that body an admirable paper on "The Proper Care, Support and Training of Candidates for the Ministry."

The volume entitled "Christianity's Challenge," was prepared by Dr. Johnson, for the press, in the Winter of 1880-81. In the Winter of 1881-82, the memorable theatre controversy was carried on in Chicago, resulting in the publication, by him, of "Plain Talks About the Theatre," which has passed through several editions. In May, 1882, he was elected Moderator of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, at Springfield, Ill., and filled the position with great acceptance. The same year he received the George Wood Medal for "The Premium Tract on the Glory of Christ." This honor was awarded by the proper committee of the American Tract Society to the volume, named "Christianity's Challenge," as entitled, above all competitors, to special commendation.

Dr. Johnson is a genial and cultivated gentleman, an eminently devoted Christian, an author of great clearness and force, a preacher of superior ability, an excellent lecturer, and ready for every good work. In every sphere he has occupied he has been a success, and he is held in high esteem by the Church which he so ardently loves and so faithfully serves.

In July, 1883, Dr. Johnson resigned his pastoral charge in Chicago, and accepted the Professorship of Sacred Rhetoric and Pastoral Theology in the Northwestern Theological Seminary.

Johnson, Rev. Obadiah Meeker, son of Nathanael and Rhoda (Mecker) Johnson, was born at Newark, N. J., September 15th, 1806; graduated at Amherst College, in 1832; taught for one year in Newark, and studied theology at Princeton. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Newark, October 9th, 1834, and was ordained an evangelist by the same Presbytery, October 20th, 1835, to go to Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, as seamen's chaplain. He arrived at that place, January 20th, 1836, but after remaining there some months was recalled by the Managers of the Seamen's Friend Society, on account of the financial troubles of 1837. He then supplied the Church of Whippany, N. J., ten months, in 1838-39; also the church at Boonton, N. J., four months, in 1839. Having accepted a call from the Church of Denton, Orange county, N. Y., he was installed, October 29th, 1839, and labored there with industry, fidelity and success, until the relation was dissolved, October 22d, 1873. After May, 1875, he resided at Monsey, Rockland county, N. Y., where he died, January 7th, 1881. Mr. Johnson was a devoted minister of the gospel, whose Christian character and purpose were always transparent, commanding the regard of all who knew him. He was as conscientious in all the minute affairs of life as in those of greatest importance. He was Stated Clerk, first of the Synod of New York and New Jersey, and after the reunion, of the Synod of New York, about thirty years, and was Permanent Clerk of the Presbytery of Hudson about twenty-four years, offices for which he was peculiarly qualified by his accurate and methodical habits and his intimate acquaintance with the polity of the Church.

Johnson, Patterson, was a ruling elder of the Mahoning Presbyterian Church, Danville, Pa. He died June 21st, 1883. He was a man of fidelity and worth, and held by his associates in the eldership in high esteem. For seventeen years he was an active member of Session, for a long time its efficient clerk, and for twenty-five years a consistent disciple of the Divine Master. In the Church, the Sabbath school, the prayer meeting, and in every department of Christian work, he was active and faithful. He exerted a strong influence in the community in which he lived, by the clear and unwavering testimony borne in his life to the truth as it is in Jesus, and died in the blessed hope of everlasting rest in heaven.

Johnson, Hon. Samuel Porter, was born in Venango county, Pa., January 31st, 1809. He graduated at Jefferson College in 1830. The next three years he spent in teaching in Danville, Pa., and in studying law under the tuition of the Hon. Robert C. Grier. Upon his admission to the Bar, at Sunbury, Pa., in 1833, he returned to the western part of the State, and located in Franklin, Venango county, removing, after less than a year, to Warren county. Here he entered upon that long and successful career of practice, extending over Warren, Venango, McKean, Potter, and Elk counties, and in the Supreme Court, that culminated in his election as President Judge of the Sixth Judicial District of Pennsylvania, in the Fall of 1860. He labored through his term of ten years with general acceptance and approval, but declined to be a candidate for re-election. After his retiring from the Bench, he resumed and continued a general practice of the law for thirteen years.

Judge Johnson's characteristic business habits were energy, industry and persistence. His mind was analytical and logical, and his oratory in the argument of cases was fervid, methodical, and sometimes severely denunciatory. Wholly devoted to his profession, he never sought, but frequently declined, nominations for political office. His Judgeship fell upon him without any effort or expense on his part. Outside of his profession he was best known as a uniform Temperance man, having commenced delivering lectures on that subject early in life, and kept it up, as opportunities offered, for more than fifty years. Several of these lectures have been published, at different periods, as also some on other subjects.

Judge Johnson always retained his predilection for the Church of his fathers. Having procured a charter of incorporation for the First Presbyterian Church of Warren, as early as 1842, he was for many years one of its Trustees (and is now President of its Board), was always one of its chief supporters, and in 1861 became one of its communion members. For the last fifteen years he has had the sole charge of an adult Bible class of church members. He claims to be of the tribe of Levi, because his father (Rev. Robert L., one of the pioneer Presbyterian ministers of Northwestern Pennsylvania), two uncles, his oldest brother, his brother-in-law (Rev. Loyal Young, D. D.), two cousins, and one nephew (Rev. S. Hall Young, of Alaska), are, or have been, Presbyterian preachers.

Johnson, William Melancthon, D.D., the youngest child of Deacon Thias and Sarah (McDougall) Johnson, was born in Cambridge, Washington county, N. Y., May 1st, 1831. He graduated at Union College, in 1858, and from Princeton Theological Seminary, in April, 1861. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Troy (Old School), in January, 1860, and spent his seminary vacation in the same year preaching at Orange, Vermont. He was ordained by the Troy Presbytery, and installed in the Presbyterian Church at Stillwater, N. Y., May 1st, 1861. He continued his pastorate there six years and five months, when he was unanimously called to the pastorate of the First Presbyterian Church of Cohoes,

N. Y. While he labored in Stillwater, the Church enjoyed several precious seasons of revival, and had frequent additions. During his ministry here he frequently preached at an out-station, the result of which was the organization of the Second Church of Stillwater. His labors in Cohoes commenced October 1st, 1867, and are still continued there, with much acceptableness and success. He was Stated Clerk of the Troy Presbytery, from October, 1864, to June, 1868, and Stated Clerk of the Albany Synod, from June, 1870, to 1882. His published sermons are: "Our Martyred President, Abraham Lincoln," "Anniversary Sermon," "Presbyterianism in Cohoes," "Ingersoll Reviewed," "A Memorial Discourse on the deaths of Prof. Joseph Henry, William Cullen Bryant and Dr. Charles Hodge," and "Providential Contrasts in our National Life."

Johnston, Cyrus, D.D., was born in Mecklenburg county, N. C., December 23d, 1797. His parents, John and Mary (Crawford) Johnston, were of the Scotch-Irish stock, and in accordance with a pious custom of the age, set apart Cyrus, the oldest of seven sons, to the ministry. He was prepared for college by Dr. John Makemie Wilson, was graduated with first honor at Hampden-Sidney College, in 1821, and studied theology under Rev. John Robinson, D.D. He was licensed by Concord Presbytery in 1823 and ordained by the same in 1824. For fifteen years he ministered to Bethesda, Cedar Shoals, and Mount Pleasant churches, in South Carolina; returned to Concord Presbytery in 1839, and preached at Providence and Sharon churches until 1845, when he took charge of a female academy in Charlotte, N. C. He became pastor of the Charlotte First Church, May 23d, 1846, and spent the remainder of his days in serving that church.

Dr. Johnston was engaged in conducting classical schools during the most of his ministerial life. During his last years he gave up teaching, and devoted his whole time to his sacred calling. His last days were his best days. He grew in knowledge, piety and power, as his consecration to his work became complete. Revivals under his preaching, in his own and in neighboring churches, were frequent. He was a fine classical and mathematical scholar, a sound theologian, a skillful casuist, and an earnest, bold and powerful preacher. A member of his congregation once took offence at his fearless denunciation of certain prevalent vices, and declared that he would never hear him preach again. Upon being told of this, Dr. Johnston said that if he would return next Sabbath he would hear much severer things. Curiosity, on a better mind, induced him to return, and he was so impressed with the truth of the preacher's discourse that he became a firmer friend of Dr. Johnston than he was before.

Dr. Johnston died suddenly, of apoplexy, January 25th, 1855. Under his ministry the feeble village Church of Charlotte began a growth that has culminated in the strong and wealthy Charlotte First Church of to-day, with its roll of three hundred and sixty-seven members, and its annual contributions of over $5000 to religious purposes.

Johnston, Rev. Frontis Howe, D. D., was born in Constantinople, Turkey, August 8th, 1834. His father was Rev. Thomas I. Johnston, of Rowan county, North Carolina, and his mother Mariana Howe, of Granville, Ohio, and these, in 1833, soon after their marriage, went to Turkey as missionaries, under the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, and there resided for twenty years, as members of the Mission to the Armenians. The subject of this sketch, who was the oldest child, came to the United States in 1851, and entered Davidson College, where he graduated, in 1855, with the highest honors. The same year he went to Union Theological Seminary, Virginia, and at the end of his course there was licensed to preach by Orange Presbytery, in May, 1858, and took charge of the churches of Philadelphia and Bethlehem, in Mecklenburg county. While in this work he received a call to become the pastor of Lexington Church, North Carolina, and in July, 1859, was ordained and installed over this charge by the Presbytery of Orange. As this church did not occupy the whole of his time, he supplied, for five years, the Church of High Point, and also labored at Winston, Forsythe county, where, in 1862, a church was organized through his efforts. This last he continued to serve till 1876, when he was called and installed to be its pastor for all his time.

In 1865 the Synod of North Carolina appointed him a member of the Board of Directors of Union Theological Seminary, in which he has been continued, and since 1878 he has been the Stated Clerk of Orange Presbytery. Dr. Johnston belongs to a family eminent for the number of men it has contributed to the gospel ministry. From his birth breathing an ecclesiastical atmosphere, and ever a diligent student, he is one of the best informed men of his Synod on the subjects of church polity and government, and from his ordination has held a high rank as a preacher. His style is clear, logical and strong, his voice flexible and rich, and his sermons, carefully prepared, are always instructive, and at times deeply impressive. As a pastor he has been uniformly watchful, prudent and gentle, and in all his work there are evidences of careful and prayerful consideration. He writes with ease, point and force, and in all the movements of his Presbytery and Synod he has been an active worker and among the foremost. With his heart in the gospel, and loving the pastoral calling, he has been content to give himself to the duties before him, seeking only to do well, as he has done, that which is put to his hand, while his abilities, culture, sound judgment and public spirit, his industry and his high and amiable character, fit him for the discharge of any position in the Church.

Johnston, Rev. James Harvey, was born at Sidney Plains, Delaware county, N. Y., October 14th, 1798. He graduated at Hamilton College in 1820, with the first honor of his class; at Princeton Theological Seminary in 1824, and was licensed by the Presbytery of Columbia, October 14th, 1823. He was pastor of the First Church, Madison, Indiana, then of the Second Church in that place until April 6th, 1843, when he became stated supply to Centre Church, Crawfordsville, Ind., until 1851, at which date he became Principal of the Female Seminary in that town, occupying this position until 1854. Here he died, March 8th, 1876, in the seventy-eighth year of his age. Mr. Johnston was a man of singular purity and piety, a zealous and faithful minister, a most successful pastor and preacher, and both at Madison and Crawfordsville the Lord crowned his labors with abundant fruits.

Johnston, Rev. Robert, was born in Sherman's Valley, Cumberland (now Perry) county, Pa., August 7th, 1774. In the year 1792 his father crossed the mountains, and, with his family, settled on a place near Canonsburg, Pa. In May, 1796, the son entered the Canonsburg Academy, and in the Autumn of 1801, having completed his studies there, commenced the study of theology with Dr. McMillan. On the 23d of April, 1802, he was licensed to preach the gospel, by the Presbytery of Ohio.

After traveling one year as a licentiate (chiefly in Ohio and Kentucky), Mr. Johnston was ordained by the Presbytery of Erie, October 19th, 1803, and installed pastor of the united congregations of Scrubgrass and Bear Creek. During this pastorate there was a powerful revival of religion, which resulted in the hopeful conversion of more than a hundred souls within the bounds of the congregation of Scrubgrass. In February, 1811, he became pastor of the congregation at Meadville, and two others, Sugar Creek and Conneaut Lake, devoting half of his time to Meadville, and the balance to the other two. In the Spring of 1817 he took charge of the congregations of Rehoboth and Round Hill, on the forks of the Youghiogheny River, under the care of the Presbytery of Redstone. Here he remained until December, 1822. Subsequently he spent some time as Agent for the Board of Domestic Missions, for the Western Foreign Missionary Society, and for the Western Theological Seminary. In the Spring of 1831, he became pastor of Bethel congregation, Indiana county, Pa., and continued in this relation until October, 1841, when the infirmities of age led to the relinquishment of the charge. After this time he preached frequently, as opportunity offered, assisting his brethren on Communion occasions, supplying their pulpits when they were necessarily absent, and occasionally supplying a vacant congregation. After a cheerful old age, in which he enjoyed an abiding assurance of his being accepted with God, and of his final happiness, he was called to his reward, May 20th, 1861, in the eighty-seventh year of his age.

The ministry of Mr. Johnston was eminently successful. During the revivals with which his ministry was blessed, many young men were brought into the Church, who afterwards became ministers of the gospel. He was the special friend of all the benevolent operations of the Church. Missionary, Educational, Bible and Temperance societies always had his most hearty co-operation and encouragement. He was an able, instructive and impressive preacher. His manner in the pulpit was grave, solemn, and often impassioned, attesting the profoundest sincerity and ardor, and at times, his appeals to the conscience were thrilling and powerful. "Often," says his son-in-law, Rev. Loyal Young, D.D., "was he so deeply moved by the importance of his themes that utterance almost failed. This was more especially the case in prayer. The unction and pathos of his prayers are well known by those who have often bowed with him at the family altar. The circle gathered there have often found the place a Bochim, while he led in penitential supplication."

Jones, Rev. George Edward, was born in Franklin county, Pa., February 7th, 1812. He graduated at Lafayette College, with honor, in 1839. He won "The Fowler Prize" for proficiency in the study of the English language, and also delivered the Latin Salutatory at Commencement. He studied theology at Princeton, graduating in April, 1873. On the 19th of June, following, he was ordained and installed pastor of the Lower Brandywine Church, Del. In this charge he continued until July 1st, 1877, and was quite successful in his labors. On retiring from the Lower Brandywine Church, he became pastor of the Broadway Church, Baltimore, Md. There his labors have been signally blessed. As a preacher, Mr. Jones is plain and practical. He presents the truths of the gospel with great simplicity and earnestness, his aim being to enable all to understand what they hear, and to induce them to become, in heart and life, followers of Christ. He is diligent in training his congregation in the various departments of Church work, and fails not to keep them informed on the leading doctrinal and philosophical topics of the day, questions which he discusses with ability and success.

Jones, Hon. Isaac Dashiell, LL.D., was born in the county of Somerset, Md., November 1st, 1806. At an early age he entered Washington Academy, an Institution of high standing in his native county. Here he spent several years, pursuing a course of study fully as extensive as those embraced in the curriculums of the most eminent colleges. In this Institution he took a high stand as a youth of good talents, thorough scholarship and of rare promise, and both before and after graduation was employed as Tutor and teacher. At the academy he divided his time, out of recitation hours, between an advanced course of literature and the study of law. About this time he made a public profession of his faith in Christ.

In October, 1832, Mr. Jones was chosen to represent his native county in the General Assembly of the State, and he was returned to this position in the years 1835, 1840 and 1866. In each of these sessions of the Legislature he maintained a conspicuous part. At a special election in May, 1844, he was chosen as the representative of the First Congressional District of Maryland, in the Congress of the United States; in 1864 he was elected a member of the Constitutional Convention which was called for revising the fundamental law of the State, and in 1867, he was called to serve in a similar convention. In November of the same year he was elected to the office of Attorney

HON. ISAAC DASHIELL JONES, LL. D.

General of the State, which office necessitated his removal to the city of Baltimore, where he has since resided. In 1878 he was elected, by the Board of Trade of that city, Judge of the Court of Arbitration.

In 1883 Mr. Jones was ordained a ruling elder in the Manokin Presbyterian Church, and from that period to the present has very frequently been a member of our Church courts, in all of which he has been eminently useful, by his judicious counsel and efficient action. His personal and social qualities are of a high order. He has been characterized by generous kindness to his friends and relatives. For many years he kept a private school in his own family, where, not only many who now adorn private and social life, but some who are in the learned professions, obtained either part or the whole of their education gratuitously. Mr. Jones was one of the delegates of the Southern General Assembly to the Pan-Presbyterian Council, which convened in Philadelphia. He is polished in manner, popular in address, and an exemplary, earnest Christian.

Jones, Hon. Joel, was born in Coventry, Conn., in 1795. He was graduated at Yale College, in 1817, and soon after settled in Philadelphia, in the practice of law. He was a man of large legal knowledge. When appointed, with Mr. Rawle and Mr. Wharton, to revise the civil code of the State, those gentlemen expressed to their friends surprise that a man of so little prominence should have made such acquisitions in the law—little knowing how many wearisome years he had spent in his small office, in the northwestern corner of the public square, in studying the principles of jurisprudence. He did good service to the State as one of the revisers of its code, and some of the reports of the commissioners which make the most important suggestions were written by him. Some parts of the new system were remodelled and rewritten exclusively by him; as, for example, the disposition of the estates of intestates, and having been passed by the Legislature without the change of a word, they have scarcely been touched down to the present day. He was subsequently appointed an Associate Judge, and then President Judge of the District Court of Philadelphia, and his memory is yet cherished by the Bar of that city and the community, who remember the firm, impartial and dignified, but kindly manner in which the law was administered by him as a judicial magistrate.

Girard College never did a better thing than when it made Judge Jones its first President, and the career of usefulness on which that institution entered is largely due to the wise manner in which he interpreted the will of Mr. Girard and the legal provisions enacted concerning it. In a few years he seemed to have found the office of President irksome, and returned to his favorite pursuit of studying and practicing the law. Immediately thereupon he was nominated as a candidate for Mayor of the city of Philadelphia, and was elected by a large popular vote. On retiring from this office he returned again to the law, and the force of his speech and his pen was frequently felt in the courts. He also wrote for the magazines of the day, on literary, philosophic and religious subjects. The volume published after his death, which he had modestly entitled "Notes on Scripture," will long attest the thought which he gave to the profoundest themes with which the human mind can become conversant. Judge Jones was a most exemplary Christian, and an active and useful member of the Presbyterian Church. He died, February 3d, 1860, at the age of sixty-five.

Jones, John Sparhawk, D.D., is a son of the Hon. Joel Jones, of Philadelphia, noticed above. He was born in that city, June 5th, 1842, and graduated at the University of Pennsylvania, in 1862. After graduating he spent some time in teaching.

He studied theology at Princeton. He was assistant pastor of the First Church, Baltimore, Md., 1867-70, and ordained by the Presbytery of Baltimore, January 10th, 1870. In 1870 he became pastor of the Brown Memorial Church, Baltimore, where his ministry has been largely blessed and where he still remains, notwithstanding calls to other important fields of labor. Dr. Jones has a vigorous and highly cultivated intellect. His preaching is marked by originality, freshness and force, and he is much esteemed by those who know him.

Jones, Joseph Huntington, D. D., brother of Judge Joel Jones, was born in Coventry, Conn., August 24th, 1797. He graduated at Harvard University, in 1817. For a time he was employed as Tutor in Bowdoin College, Maine. He completed his theological studies at the Princeton Theological Seminary; was licensed as a probationer, September 19th, 1822, by the Presbytery of Susquehanna, and was, by the same Presbytery, ordained as an evangelist, April 29th, 1824. On June 1st, 1824, he began his labors in the Presbyterian Church at Woodbury, N. J., and was shortly installed as pastor. Here he labored with very great success. At the same time he supplied the feeble Church at Blackwoodtown, which shared the blessing enjoyed by that of Woodbury. In 1825 he was installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church at New Brunswick, N. J. Here he remained thirteen years, proving himself to be "a workman that needeth not to be ashamed." His ministry was honored of God by at least three seasons of religious awakening. In 1838 he became pastor of the Sixth Church, Philadelphia, and continued so for twenty-three years, his efforts being crowned with a manifest blessing. From 1861 to 1868 he was Secretary of the Relief Fund for Disabled Ministers, in which capacity he did a noble work, for which he deserves the lasting gratitude of the Church. He died December 22d, 1868.

Dr. Jones was an exemplary Christian, an instructive preacher, a faithful pastor, an interesting writer, and a gentleman of great urbanity of manner and suavity of disposition. Of his principal work, "The Effects of Physical Causes on Christian Experience," Dr. J. W. Alexander wrote, "It is a valuable and entertaining book." He also published a memoir of the Rev. Ashbel Green, D. D., a history of the revival at New Brunswick, in 1837, and several sermons.

Jones, Rev. Malachi, was ordained in Wales, and admitted as a member of Presbytery, September 9th, 1714. He came to Abingdon, near Philadelphia, where a church was organized, in 1714, on the Congregational plan. It soon adopted the Presbyterian method. Mr. Andrews, in writing to a friend, March 7th, 1729, adds: "P. S.—Ten days ago, died Mr. Malachi Jones, an old Welsh minister. He was a good man, and did good." Mr. Jones left three sons and four daughters. In his will, he provided for his widow two rooms and the little cellar, and charged his son Malachi to give her comfortable maintenance, and to have her firewood cut and brought to her door, with five hog-heads of cider, whenever the plantation shall make so much. To each grandchild he gave a ewe and a lamb.

Jones, Matthew Hale, Esq., was born in Coventry, Conn., of Puritan ancestry. His parents, during his early youth, removed to Wilkesbarre, Pa., where he fitted himself for Rutgers College, from which Institution he was graduated in 1830. In 1833 he was admitted to the practice of the law in Easton, Pa., where he died, June 1st, 1883. In his profession he was conspicuous for his comprehensive and exact knowledge, sound judgment and keen and sensitive conception of honor. He magnified his calling by assiduous attention, constant vigilance and a thorough intellectual honesty, which never allowed the moral sentiment to be obscured or perverted.

In social life Mr. Jones' culture rendered him one of the most entertaining, attractive and improving of acquaintances. His wonderfully retentive memory held and yielded, at will, a prodigious supply of information, which, through his notable love of literature, he had acquired from familiar acquaintance with the various authors of ancient and modern times. In leisure hours he was always ready thus to entertain those with whom he was found, and his agreeable conversation, enlivened by anecdote and native wit, instructed and amused the listeners, and tended to kindle or revive an interest in classical literature. "Charity that vaunteth not itself" was one of the dominant elements of his nature. The poor, needy or afflicted he relieved invariably, but quietly and without ostentation, and his love for animals and tender care for them was a marked characteristic of the man.

His religious life was likewise distinct and well-defined—a student of the Bible, a theologian and an investigator. He read much on religious subjects, and his logical mind enjoyed these themes, and he was, as in secular matters, equally able to give a reason for the hope that was in him. Not ashamed of the gospel of Christ, he was especially faithful to fundamental truths as opposed to new theories and measures. For many years an acting member of the Session of the First Presbyterian Church of Easton, he had with fidelity and punctuality given the longest term of service to the congregation, fully meriting the apostolic commendation, "Let the elders that rule well be counted worthy of double honor."

Jones, Samuel Beach, D. D., was born in Charleston, S. C., November 23d, 1811. He was educated at Princeton, and was ordained by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, October 4th, 1837. He was Assistant Secretary of the Board of Missions, 1836-37; Professor of Theology in Oakland College, Miss., 1838. He became pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, of Bridgeton, N. J., in 1839, and resigned the charge in 1863. He was an influential member of the Presbytery. From 1870 to 1875, he was stated supply of the Fairfield Church. Dr. Jones was a man of good scholarship and well read, especially in all theological learning. He was prevented by physical infirmities from preaching during the last few years of his life. His attachments to the Presbyterian Church were strong, and his proclamations of the gospel were faithful testimonies to its power and value in the salvation of the souls of men. His own faith rested securely upon the person and work of Christ. In that faith he lived, and in that faith he died, March 19th, 1883, at his residence in Bridgeton.

Jones, William Evan, D. D., the son of William and Mary (Pritchard) Jones, was born in the city of Manchester, England. He was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia, July, 1850, and at the Theological Seminary of Princeton, N. J., May, 1853. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, April, 1852. After spending one year as stated supply of the Church at Gloucester City, N. J., he was ordained and installed pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Green Island, N. Y., on the 22d of June, 1854. In 1857 he became pastor of the First Church of Caledonia, N. Y., whence he was unexpectedly called, in 1859, to the pastorate of the First Church of Bath, in the same State. He was next invited to the pastorate of the First Presbyterian Church of Cedarville, N. J.; then to that of the Church of Tuscarora and Union Corners, and in September, 1873, became pastor of the Neshaminy Church (of Warwick), Hartsville, Pa., founded by the celebrated William Tennent.

In these several pastorates his labors have been specially owned of God, in a number of revivals of religion, and the edification and comfort of believers. He is a devoted pastor, an earnest and instructive preacher, and a faithful Presbyter. June 14th, 1876, Centre College, Kentucky, conferred upon him the degree of Doctor of Divinity. For several years he has been a useful member of the Presbyterian Board of Publication, Philadelphia.

Joyes, Patrick, Esq., was born in the city of Louisville, June 18th, 1826, the son of Thomas Joyes and Judith M. (née Venable). His ancestry on the paternal side were Irish and Catholics; on the maternal side they were Virginians and Presbyterians. He united with the First Presbyterian Church, in which he was brought up, in 1843; graduated at Centre College, Danville, Ky., under the administration of the Rev. J. C. Young, D. D., in 1846, and graduated in law at the University of Louisville, in 1849, having studied a portion of the time at the Harvard Law School.

After having spent a year in Europe, he began the practice of his profession in Louisville. He was ordained to the eldership in the First Church in 1867, and was sent as a delegate, by the then Independent Synod of Kentucky, to the Synod of Missouri, in 1868, to induce the latter Synod to go with them into connection with the Southern Assembly. He was a commissioner from the Presbytery of Louisville to the Southern Assembly in Louisville, in 1870, when he urged the acceptance of the tender of fraternal relations by the Northern Assembly, and was one of the minority who entered a protest against the action of the Southern Assembly.

He was also a commissioner to the Assembly at Savannah, in 1876, and was afterwards a delegate from the Southern Church to the Presbyterian Council in Philadelphia, in 1880. He was one of the three delegates sent by the Southern Church to bear their fraternal greetings to the Northern Assembly, at Saratoga, in 1883, and was appointed during that year as one of the committee of seven, by the Southern Assembly, to confer and arrange with a similar committee from the Northern Assembly, as to matters in which both churches might have a common interest. Mr. Joyes is an able lawyer, a genial gentleman, a faithful elder, and has a high standing in the community in which he lives, and the Church judicatories, of which he is frequently a member.

Judgment, the Day of. God is called "the Judge of all the earth" (Gen. xviii, 25); and it is reasonable to suppose, from the very notion we are taught to form of Him, that He will righteously administer His dominions. In the world, however, the ungodly are often seen to prosper, and the righteous to be oppressed. And this has sometimes grievously perplexed God's servants, who have not known how to reconcile the fact with His holy justice (Ps. lxxiii). Scripture, therefore, points onward to a time when all these apparent anomalies will be explained, when a great assize will sit, and a just recompense of reward will be meted out to men (Eccles. xi, 9; xii, 14; Acts xxiv, 25). This judgment, we are told, shall be exercised by Christ (x, 42; xvii, 31; Rom. xiv, 10). Men might be judged either individually, each on his departure from the world, or collectively. Scripture gives us reason to believe that the latter will be the course of God's procedure (Matt. xxv, 31-46; Rev. xx, 12-13). And a day is spoken of, sometimes called the "last day" (John xi, 24), sometimes the "great day" (Jude vi), when this shall be. The space of time to be so occupied it is impossible for us to calculate; about the nearness or distance of that day it is useless to speculate (Matt. xxiv, 36); it will be a strict and searching judgment (xii, 36); so that the practical lesson we have to learn is to be prepared, to judge ourselves, that we be not judged and condemned of the Lord (1 John ii, 28; iv, 17).

Junkin, David X., D. D., was born at Mercer, Pa., January 8th, 1808; graduated at Jefferson College, in 1831, and after spending a short time in teaching, entered Princeton Seminary, in which he was a student for two years and six months.

Mr. Junkin was licensed, by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, October 17th, 1833, and installed pastor of the Church at Greenwich, N. J., March 25th, 1835.

Here he labored sixteen years, during a part of which time (1837-42) he was also Professor of Belles Lettres in Lafayette College, at Easton, Pa. His ministry at Greenwich was intelligent, enterprising, earnest, laborious and fruitful. He was greatly beloved and honored, and his name is still held in veneration. As pastor of the F Street Church, in Washington, D. C., from May 11th, 1851, until October 25th, 1853, his labors were blessed, and a new impulse was given, by his presence and his work, to the interests of his Denomination in that city. November 21st, 1853, he became pastor of the Church at Hollidaysburg, Pa., and labored there, assiduously and successfully, about seven years, until released, November 25th, 1860. Afterward he accepted a commission to act as Chaplain in the United States Navy, and was stationed successively, between May, 1860, and November, 1864, at Philadelphia, Annapolis, Md., Newport, R. I., New York city, Portsmouth, N. H., and then went with his ship to the Gulf of Mexico. October 17th, 1864, he was installed pastor of the North Church, Chicago, Illinois. Here his ministry was vigorous, and made, on the minds of many, lasting impressions on the side of truth; but the climate proving unfavorable to his health, he was released from the charge, May 15th, 1866. Dr. Junkin then accepted a call from the Church of New Castle, Pa., and was installed as its pastor September 13th, 1866. This was his last pastoral charge, and here he labored nearly thirteen years, much of the time enduring acute pain, yet toiling with industry, fervor and success. Many were added to his church, his congregation was enlarged and believers were edified. At last he felt compelled to yield to disease and age, and was released, July 1st, 1879. His death occurred April 22d, 1880, in the seventy-third year of his age. His end was entirely peaceful.

Dr. Junkin was a man of clear and strong convictions, and never hesitated to utter them strongly, on what he believed to be fitting occasions. Though positive in manner, he had a warm, affectionate, tender heart. He was a conservative, faithful, brave defender of the faith; as a preacher, instructive, scriptural, impressive; as a pastor, tender, sympathizing and judicious. He was the author of several valuable volumes, and for many years was a prolific and interesting writer for the weekly religious press.

Junkin, George, D. D., LL. D., was born November 1st, 1790, near Carlisle, Pa. After graduating at Jefferson College, September, 1813, he studied theology with Dr. Mason, in New York. He filled missionary appointments for some time. October 17th, 1819, he was settled over the Associate Reformed Church in Milton, Pa. In 1822 he entered the Presbyterian connection, along with Dr. Mason and the great body of the Associate Reformed. In 1830 he took charge of a manual-labor institution in Germantown. This brought him into the Presbytery of Philadelphia. In 1831 he was chosen Moderator of the Synod of Philadelphia. In 1832 he accepted the presidency of Lafayette College. In August, 1841, he was made President of Miami University, Ohio. In 1844 he was elected Moderator of the Old School General Assembly, and in the same year left Miami and resumed the presidency of Lafayette. In October, 1848, he accepted the presidency of Washington College, Va., whither twenty-six of his students followed him, and where he remained for twelve years. He died in Philadelphia, May 20th, 1868, aged 78 years.

Dr. Junkin possessed a sturdy intellect, and took a very vigorous grasp of every subject he handled. Whilst firm in his convictions, and decided in his advocacy of truth, he was genial in spirit, and affable and agreeable in all his social relations. He despised all affectation and dissimulation. In his preaching, which was without notes, he was exegetical, logical, and earnest, and always commanded the attention of his hearers. But his exertions were not confined to the pulpit. He took an active part in promoting education, particularly the school system of Pennsylvania, and was an ardent advocate of the cause of temperance.

Dr. Junkin was an able and voluminous author. His published writings were, "Baptism," "The Prophecies," "Justification," "Sanctification," "Sabbatismos," "The Tabernacle," "The Vindication," "Political Fallacies," besides Baccalaureate Addresses, Literary Addresses, Occasional Discourses, and a manuscript commentary on Hebrews, in seven hundred and fifty quarto pages, which was written after his seventy-fifth year. He was a great and good man, diligent and intrepid in discharging duty, and has deeply impressed his name upon the age in which he lived and labored.

Junkin, George, Esq., was born at Milton, Pa., March 18th, 1827. His father was the Rev. George Junkin, D. D., LL. D., and his mother, Mrs. Julia Rush Miller Junkin, was a Philadelphian. He graduated at Lafayette College, during his father's presidency of that Institution, in 1842, at the early age of fifteen years, standing fifth in a class of thirty, of which he was the youngest member. He studied law under the direction of the Hon. James Madison Porter, of Easton, and Samuel H. Perkins, Esq., of Philadelphia, and was admitted to the Bar March 18th, 1848. From the very outset he displayed marked ability, and soon a busy practice began, which has grown in importance every year. From the beginning of his professional career he has declined criminal business, but in all the civil courts his name and voice and face have become very familiar, and no man is more heartily welcomed by the judges, for they recognize in him a lawyer who feels his duty to the court, and does it, while he is full of zeal for his client. In 1882 he was the Independent Republican nominee for Judge of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania.

Mr. Junkin has been all his life long an active member of the Presbyterian Church, and prominent in all its important events, having frequently represented the Philadelphia Presbytery in the General Assembly. He was the Chairman of the Business Committee of the Presbyterian Council that met in Philadelphia in 1880, and earned the praise of contributing largely to the success of that great Council, in which representatives from all parts of the world participated. He has been an elder of the West Spruce Street Church for upwards of twenty years. In the record of all public efforts to raise the standard of morals, to help the poor, to elevate the best interests of the people, to advance the real prosperity of Philadelphia and its great industries, Mr. Junkin's name is prominent.

Junkin, William Finney, D. D., was born in Philadelphia, Pa., May 1st, 1831. He graduated at Washington College, Va., in 1851, and was ordained by the Presbytery of Lexington, in June, 1855. He was pastor of Falling Spring Church, Va., 1855-67; pastor of the First Church, Danville, Ky., 1868-76; and since 1876 has been pastor of the Glebe Street Church, Charleston, S. C. Dr. Junkin is an excellent preacher, a faithful pastor, and successful in his work.

Justification. A forensic term used to imply the declaring or accounting of a person just or righteous before God. If any one were free from sin, if he perfectly obeyed God's commandments, he would naturally be pronounced, for he would really be, just, not exposed to the penalty of transgression (Rom. ii, 13). But mankind, as sinful, are not just in this sense, and cannot be so treated (Ps. cxliii, 2; Rom.

iii, 19, 20, 23; 1 John i, 8). If, then, they are to be freed from the condemnation of sin, if they are to be dealt with as those not amenable to God's law, it must be, not by the establishment of their innocence, but by the remission of their guilt. And it was for this that the Lord Jesus Christ came into the world, and offered Himself a sacrifice for sin, that men might be delivered from the condemnation into which their sins had cast them (Rom. iii, 21, 25; 2 Cor. v, 21; 1 John i, 7; ii, 2). The Scripture therefore teaches that we are justified by faith in Christ (Rom. iii, 28; Gal. ii, 16). This doctrine is thus expressed in the eleventh Article of the Anglican Church: "We are accounted righteous before God only for the merit of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, by faith, and not for our own works or deservings. Wherefore that we are justified by faith only is a most wholesome doctrine, and very full of comfort." The originating cause of justification is God's free grace and loving pity for a fallen world (John iii, 16; Rom. v, 8; Eph. ii, 4-8). The meritorious cause is the sinless life and sacrificial death of Christ (Rom. iv, 25), for the virtue of which God could, without moral fault, or detriment to justice, remit sin. The instrumental cause is faith, whereby we receive the atonement, accepting God's mercy on the terms on which He offers it (iii, 30; v, 11). Those who are so justified are at peace with God, and have all the advantages of such a state of reconciliation (1, 2). Justified men desire and endeavor to walk in holiness of life (viii, 1). Gratitude for the mercy received will incline them to do that which is well-pleasing in God's sight. They feel that they have been purchased to be His, and must glorify Him in their body and their spirit (2 Cor. vi, 20). This will be their mark, the token, the proof that they are no longer enemies, but friends, not sentenced culprits, but beloved children. Should any not so walk and act, they cannot be God's children. And if they profess to have faith in Christ, it is a mere pretence. Such a faith as theirs, a faith which worketh not by love, is empty and useless (James ii, 17, 26). Abraham's obedience was the proof that he possessed that faith which was counted to him for righteousness (21-23.)

Of justification, then, it may be briefly said that (1) its source is the grace of God, (2) its ground the mediatorial work of Christ, (3) faith the way by which we receive it, and (4) the holy life of a believer the evidence of its possession; or, yet more briefly, it is originally by grace, meritoriously by Christ, instrumentally by faith, essentially by good works.

K

Kalb, George Lewis, D. D., son of George W. and Margaret (Claybaugh) Kalb, was born in Franklin county, Ohio, September 12th, 1829. He united with the Truro Presbyterian Church in March, 1843; entered Preparatory Department of Miami University in April, 1844, and graduated at Centre College, Danville, Ky., June 30th, 1848. After teaching one year in Chillicothe, Ohio, he studied Theology one term, in the Associate Reformed Presbyterian Seminary, Oxford, Ohio, and two terms in the Seminary at Cincinnati. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Columbus, in April, 1851, and ordained by the same body, May 31st, 1858. Dr. Kalb took charge of the Central Church, Circleville, Ohio, in October, 1852. Resigning that pastorate, he took charge of the First Presbyterian Church, Bellefontaine, Ohio, September, 1863, which he still retains.

Kearsley, Jonathan, was born in Pennsylvania; entered the U. S. Army as first lieutenant, in 1812; served with distinction at Fort Erie, where he lost a leg in 1814, for which he was promoted and retired from the Army, with the rank of Major, in 1815. In 1820 he removed to Detroit, Mich., having been appointed Receiver of the Land Office there, by President Monroe, which position he held until 1847. He was four times appointed one of the Regents of the Michigan University. On the 7th of July, 1838, he was appointed an elder in the First Presbyterian Church of Detroit, and continued to fill that office faithfully and honorably until his death, in 1855, at Detroit. He was a man of stern and rigid views in religion, and left an honorable record, both in Church and State.

Keigwin, Rev. Albert Newton, was born in Kentucky. He graduated at Louisville College, Ky., 1861, and studied theology at Princeton, N. J. He was ordained by the Presbytery of Rock River, in 1867; stated supply at Lyons, Ia., 1868-9; pastor elect of the Second Church, Cedar Rapids, 1870-71; pastor of the First Church, Southwark, Philadelphia, Pa., 1872-8; and since 1879 has had charge of the West Church, Wilmington, Del., where he continues to labor, blessed in his labors and beloved by his congregation.

Keith, Isaac Stockton, D. D., a native of Pennsylvania, after graduating at Princeton College in 1775, was engaged for a short time in teaching at Elizabethtown, N. J. In 1778 he was licensed by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, and in 1780 became pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Alexandria, Va. In 1788 he removed to Charleston, S. C., and was installed pastor of an Independent church in that city. For twenty-five years he labored here, revered and beloved by all. Dr. Keith held a high rank as a preacher. He died December 13th, 1813.

Keith, Rev. Robert, a native of Pennsylvania, studied theology after his graduation at Princeton; was licensed by the First Presbytery of Philadelphia, about 1775, and for some time acted as a missionary in Pennsylvania and Virginia. In 1779 he was ordained, and received the appointment of Chaplain in the army, serving during the whole war. He died in 1781.

Kellar, Rev. Isaac, was born near Hagerstown, Md., February 6th, 1779. He graduated at Washington College, Pa.; at Princeton Seminary, in 1818, and was licensed by Carlisle Presbytery the same year. Immediately after his licensure, he was engaged by Winchester Presbytery to preach during the Summer within their bounds. He was installed pastor of the Church in McConnellsburg, Pa., in the Spring of 1819. During one-third of his time he preached in Loudon county, Va. In 1821 he became associate pastor of a German Reformed Church in Hagerstown. In 1826 he removed to Williamsport, Md., where he organized a Presbyterian Church, and remained until 1835. Feeble health inducing him to migrate to Illinois, he preached at different points, until his labors were concentrated upon the establishment of a church in the village of Peoria, Ill. There he organized what is now known as the First Presbyterian Church at that place, and was its pastor for about twelve years. After the termination of this pastorate he preached occasionally at Princeville, at Prospect Presbyterian Church, and elsewhere. He died July 25th, 1867.

Mr. Kellar was one of the pioneer Presbyterian ministers of the Western country. He was a man of ability. His preaching was chiefly doctrinal and wholly extempore. His familiarity with all the teachings of God's Word qualified him to hold vigorous and successful argument with the opposers of truth wherever he encountered them. He was not only decided in his views, but inflexible. No considerations of personal ease or emolument had influence to divert him from what seemed to him to be the path of duty. He preached often, and during many years, at different points, with but little, if any, remuneration, counting it all joy to testify his love both for his Master and the souls of men.

Kellogg, Alfred Hosea, D. D., was born in Philadelphia, September 10th, 1837; graduated at New Jersey College, 1859, and was ordained by the Second Presbytery of Philadelphia, October 22d, 1862. He was pastor of Brainerd Church, Easton, Pa., 1862-5; of the University Place Church, New York City, 1865-70; of the Central Church, Philadelphia, Pa., 1873-4, and stated supply of Howard Street Church, San Francisco, Cal., 1874-5. His last charge was Jefferson Avenue Church, Detroit, Mich., which he has recently resigned. Dr. Kellogg is a fine scholar, and possesses much pulpit attractiveness. His sermons are always prepared with great care, and seldom fail to interest an audience. His rather close reading of his discourses has a compensation in the variety and richness of the thoughts he presents.

Kellogg, Samuel Henry, D. D., son of the Rev. Samuel Kellogg and Mary P. Henry, was born September 6th, 1839, near Westhampton, Suffolk county, Long Island. He graduated at Princeton College, in 1861, passing at once into the Theological Seminary at Princeton, but retaining his connection with the college as Tutor in Mathematics. Before commencing his theological studies he had decided to become a missionary. Having received his appointment from the Board of Foreign Missions, he was ordained as an evangelist, by the Presbytery of SAMUEL HENRY KELLOGG, D. D.

Hudson, April 20th, 1864. He was married, May 3d, 1864, to Antoinette Whiting Hartwell. They sailed for India, by way of the Cape of Good Hope, on December 20th, 1864. On the third day out the captain fell overboard and was lost, and, owing to the incapacity of the officer next in command, it devolved upon Mr. Kellogg to navigate the ship during the remainder of the voyage.

They landed in Calcutta, June 5th, 1865, and were appointed to the mission station of Barkpere, just outside the walls of the city of Farrakhabad, one of the most interesting and important centres of our missionary work. From the outset, Mr. Kellogg's chief attention was given to vernacular preaching, which he pursued unweariedly in the city and its vicinity, making long tours in the cold season, among the towns and villages of the outlying district. He was also at special pains to establish friendly social relations with both Hindoos and Mohammedans, visiting them in their own homes, and welcoming them to his.

In 1872, after a year in the United States, occupied in constant labors in behalf of the missionary cause, Mr. and Mrs. Kellogg returned to India, and removed their residence to Allahabad, the capital of the Northwest Provinces, in order to take up the work assigned to him by the Synod of India in the Theological Training School. He had by this time achieved a reputation for scholarship, and was recognized as an authority in the vernacular languages of North India. In addition to his instructions given in the Theological School, he furnished the native Church with an admirable translation of the Larger Catechism, and rendered valuable service to the North India Bible Society in the revision of the Scriptures. In 1875 he put the results of his studies into the form of a grammar of the Hindi language, which has received the encomiums of the first scholars in Europe. This useful and honored missionary career was abruptly closed by the death of Mrs. Kellogg in March, 1876, necessitating the return of her bereaved husband with his children, and his ultimate relinquishment of the missionary work.

After resigning his connection with the Board of Foreign Missions, Mr. Kellogg was called to the Third Presbyterian Church, Pittsburg, Pa., in March, 1877. In the following year he was elected Professor of Didactic and Polemic Theology and Lecturer on Comparative Religions, in the Western Theological Seminary. Dr. Kellogg is much admired as a preacher and lecturer. He is gifted by nature with a clear and facile intellect; the resources of his varied learning are at the disposal of a ready memory, and are marshaled by a seemingly intuitive logic. His theology is characteristically Scriptural; the Sacred Scriptures are appealed to by him, not so much in confirmation of every statement, as the source from which all true doctrine can be seen to issue. He has become widely known to the churches, apart from his successful discharge of his duties as Professor of Theology, by his earnest advocacy of pre-Millennial views, and by his frequent contributions to the Reviews and other publications of the Presbyterian Church. He is the author of a treatise, entitled "The Jews, or Prediction and Fulfillment—an Argument for the Times."

Kelly, Rev. Joseph T., son of Moses and Mary (Walker) Kelly, of Washington, D. C., was born in that city, September 7th, 1848. He graduated at Princeton College in 1870, and at Princeton Theological Seminary in 1871. He was licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of Washington City, in 1873, and on the fifth of May, 1874, was ordained and installed associate pastor of the Fourth Presbyterian Church of Washington City, in connection with the Rev. John C. Smith, D. D., the senior pastor, at whose decease, in January, 1878, he became sole pastor. On February 8th, 1878, Mr. Kelly preached an admirable "discourse, commemorative of the life, character and work" of the faithful and useful man of God with whom he had been associated in the pastorate of the church, and which was published by the Session, as having been "listened to with great satisfaction, not only by the brethren of the Session, but by the entire membership of the church, as a just tribute to the memory of their beloved and venerated pastor." Mr. Kelly is an able preacher, a diligent pastor, and the divine blessing has steadily accompanied his earnest labors in his important charge.

Kelso, Rev. Alexander Peebles, was born near Oakville, Pa., October 4th, 1840; graduated at Washington and Jefferson College, 1865; and after the study of medicine, pursued his theological studies at the Western Seminary, Allegheny, Pa. He was ordained an evangelist by the Presbytery of Carlisle, in August, 1869, and since 1870 has been a missionary in India. Mr. Kelso returned to his native country a few years since, and spent a short time, during which he sought to kindle fresh missionary zeal in the churches, and then returned to his foreign and chosen field of labor.

Kemper, Professor F. T., went from Virginia to Missouri, more than thirty years ago, and made teaching his life-work. By undivided attention to his calling, he gained unparalleled reputation and success as an educator in that State. Men skilled in all the departments of beneficent labor have gone forth from his classes. Not a few of those who occupy important positions in Church and State were schooled under his eye, and to his efficient and godly training much of their success is due. Professor Kemper's character was built upon a moral base of great depth and breadth. He was obviously a man of substantial make and worth. The love of truth was grounded in his inmost soul, and his entire course was shaped by the most conscientious regard to duty and right. To unflinching courage he joined the utmost meekness and tenderness. To guileless speech he added the charm of cheerfulness and humor. Especially was he a man of faith and prayer. None could fail to recognize in him the devout Christian, and the resolute actor in all that is praiseworthy. The city and Church of Boonville were the chief seats of his labors. For several years he filled the Chair of Greek in Westminster College. Subsequently he opened his "School for Boys," at Boonville, which he continued to conduct, with increasing public favor, until his death, in 1881.

Kempshall, Everard, D.D., was born in Rochester, N. Y., August 9th, 1830. He graduated at Williams College in 1851, and was ordained by the Presbytery of Buffalo, January 15th, 1856. He was pastor of Delaware Street Church, Buffalo, N. Y.,

1856-7; stated supply at St. Peter's Church, Rochester, 1857-8; stated supply at Batavia, 1858-61, and since 1861 has been pastor of the First Church, Elizabeth, N. J. In 1870 he received the honorary title of D. D., both from Williams College, and the College of New Jersey. Since 1879 he has been a Director of the Princeton Theological Seminary. Dr. Kempshall is a gentleman of scholarly attainments, and an able preacher, and his ministry has been blessed with success. He is a valuable member of the Church courts, in which he exerts a strong influence.

Kendall, Henry, D. D., the fifth son of the late John Kendall, was born in Volney, N. Y., August 21th, 1815; united with the Church in Volney in 1832; graduated from Hamilton College in 1840, and was in Auburn Theological Seminary 1840-41 and 1842-44. Hamilton College bestowed on him the title of D. D. in 1858. He was ordained and installed at Verona, N. Y., by the Presbytery of Utica, in 1846; pastor of the church at that place from 1844-48; was pastor in East Bloomfield, N. Y., 1848-58, and at Pittsburg, Pa., Third Presbyterian Church, from 1858 to 1861.

In 1861 Dr. Kendall was elected Secretary of the General Assembly's Committee on Home Missions, and one of the Secretaries of the Board of Home Missions at the "Reunion," in 1870. From 1855 to 1858 he was a member of the Board of Trustees of Auburn Theological Seminary. In 1871 he was made a member of the Board of Trustees of Hamilton College, and holds the position at the present time. He was elected, by the General Assembly of 1882, one of the delegates to represent the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America in the Third Council of the General Alliance of the Reformed churches, to convene at Belfast, Ireland, in 1884. Dr. Kendall is a preacher of decided ability. He was eminently successful in all the pastoral relations which he has sustained. To the Home Missionary interest of the Church he has rendered invaluable service. The cause is dear to his heart, and he presents its claims with great zeal, judiciousness and ability, sparing no effort to give it the strong hold upon the people, and the growing prosperity which, under his labors, in connection with those of his colleagues, it has, under the Divine blessing secured. He has recently been called to pass through a very heavy affliction, in the death of his son, Rev. Frederick Gridley Kendall, who died at sea, in August, 1881.

Kendall, John Francis, D. D., the youngest son of the twelve children of the late John Kendall, was born in Volney, N. Y., March 4th, 1832. United with the Church in East Bloomfield, N. Y., in May, 1850, when he prepared for college; he graduated from Hamilton College in 1855. He was ordained and installed at Baldwinsville, N. Y., by the Presbytery of Onondaga, August 31st, 1859, where he remained till 1868. He was pastor of the Second Church at Columbus, Ohio, 1868-71, and was installed pastor of the Church at LaPorte, Ind., June, 1872. Wabash College bestowed on him the title of D. D., 1873. He published "Chart of Scripture Offerings," in 1871, and the "Unseen World," in 1879. He was elected Trustee of Wabash College the same year.

Kennedy, Rev. James Buyers, is of good Presbyterian stock. He was born at the Gap, Lancaster county, Pa., September 8th, 1839, in the church of which place his father long and faithfully filled the office of ruling elder. He was ordained by the Second Presbytery of Philadelphia, October 15th, 1863. He had charge of the Huntington Valley Church, Pa., 1863-6, and since 1866, has been pastor of the Second Church, Trenton, N. J., where his faithful labors among an appreciative people are crowned with gratifying success.

Kennedy, James F., D.D., son of Stewart Kennedy, M.D., and Ann F. Kennedy, was born at "The Straw" in Greenwich township, Warren county, N. J., September 27th, 1824. He graduated at Lafayette College, in 1839, after which he studied medicine; but having been brought into the Church, during a revival of religion in the Falling Spring Church of Chambersburg, Pa. (of which his father was an honored and useful elder), he determined to study for the ministry. Graduating at Princeton Seminary, in 1845, he received licensure from the Presbytery of Carlisle; then spent a fourth year at Princeton, as a "Fellow" of the Institution, during which time he translated a Biblical Geography, from the German, for the Sunday-school Union. He was ordained by the Presbytery of Luzerne, December 12th, 1848; pastor of Church at Berwick, Pa., 1848-50; Principal of the Chambersburg Academy, 1851-5; and pastor of the Church at Dickinson, Cumberland county, Pa., 1855-9. During the Summer of 1856 he lost the sight of his right eye, and the next year the left eye also failed, and he became entirely blind. From 1859 to 1867 he was teacher of Languages in the Academy at Chambersburg, then teacher of a private school; finally becoming Professor of Ancient Languages in Wilson College, from 1870 to 1876, for three years of which time he was Vice President of the College. During most of his residence in Chambersburg, he was stated supply, on alternate Sabbaths, of the neighboring Church of Fayetteville.

Dr. Kennedy is an eminent Oriental scholar and a profound theologian. He has a wonderful faculty for acquiring language. When his sight failed him, he was busy with his Arabic and Syriac studies. Only a few years ago he learned the Anglo-Saxon. As a preacher, Dr. Kennedy is eminently Scriptural. He excels in exegesis. He is clear and earnest, is an animated speaker, and has a pleasing and forcible manner. He is held in highest possible esteem in the community, and is a confessed power for good. Notwithstanding his total blindness, he is constantly employed in preaching and in daily works of mercy.

Kennedy, Rev. John H., was born November 11th, 1801, at "Herron's Branch," Franklin county, Pa. In November, 1818, he became a student of Jefferson College, Canonsburg, Pa. During his whole collegiate course he sustained a high standard as to talents and scholarship, and graduated with honor, May, 1820. In October, of that year, he entered the Theological Seminary of Princeton, where he studied the regular term of three years. He was licensed to preach in October, 1822. On leaving the Seminary in 1823, he itinerated in different directions about eighteen months. In November, 1825, he was installed pastor of the Sixth Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, and sustained this relation until December, 1829. In May, 1830, he accepted the Professorship of Mathematics in Jefferson College, and a call from the congregation of Centre, about five miles distant from Canonsburg. Subsequently he devoted himself more exclusively, in his Professorship, to the departments of Natural Philosophy and Chemistry. He died, December 15th, 1840.

As an instructor, Professor Kennedy was thorough, discriminating, accurate and lucid in his illustrations. As a preacher, he was instructive, solemn, searching, and forcible. As a pastor he was laborious and faithful. As a writer he was characteristically lucid, simple, and concise. His talents were various, and in some respects of a high order. He had more of the intellectual than the aesthetic, more of argumentation than poetry in his composition, more of the instructive than the pathetic. He was a man of great benevolence and liberality, and his soul-searching experience, his conscientiousness and stern integrity, his self-denial, his steadfast reliance on the righteousness of Christ, his abhorrence of sin, his desires and endeavors after holiness, and his habitual aim to glorify God, gave lucid proof of sincere piety while he lived, which was confirmed in his death.

Kennedy, Rev. Robert, was born in Lancaster county, Pa., July 4th, 1778. He graduated at Dickinson College, Carlisle, September 20th, 1797, the best scholar in his class; studied theology with the Rev. Nathanael Sample, then pastor of the congregations of Lancaster and Middle Octorara, and was licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of New Castle, August 20th, 1799. He supplied the Church of Upper Octorara half of the time, for six months. On the 13th of August, 1803, he was installed, by the Presbytery of Carlisle, pastor of the united congregations of East and Lower West Conococheague, known as Greencastle and Welsh Run, and continued to labor in them until April 9th, 1816, when, at his request, the pastoral relation between him and them was dissolved. In May, 1816, he removed to Cumberland, Md., where he preached to a small church and took the charge of the academy at that place. In 1820 his church and the town were visited with a precious revival of religion, during which a goodly number became subjects of Divine grace. In the Spring of 1825 he concluded to return to his former residence. The Church at Welsh Run being vacant—Greencastle having secured the whole of the labors of a pastor—Mr. Kennedy preached to them as a stated supply, giving part of his time to the congregation at McCornelstown. He continued in charge of these two churches until 1833, when his labors were divided between the Welsh Run Church and some of the small towns in the neighborhood. As none of these congregations could afford to give him much of a salary, he supported his family by his own exertions and farm. He died October 31st, 1843.

Mr. Kennedy was industrious, plain and unostentatious in all his habits. He was a man of vigorous intellect, and a fine scholar, especially in classical literature. He was one of the first advocates of Temperance in Franklin county, and would never sell any of his grain to distillers. As a preacher, he stood high in a Presbytery in which he had, as competitors, some of the ablest men in the Presbyterian Church. "His sermons," says Dr. Elliott, "were full of solid evangelical matter, well arranged and forcibly expressed; were written in full, committed to memory and delivered without notes. His style was earnest and persuasive, and he rarely failed to secure the fixed and sustained attention of his audience." His end was peace. He was a faithful servant of the Lord, the light of whose example was not extinguished by his descent to the tomb.

Kennedy, Rev. Marion S., was born November 17th, 1854, in Green county, Tenn.; entered William and Mary College, Va., October, 1875; graduated (A. B.) July 4th, 1875; entered Union Theological Seminary, Va., August, 1878, graduating May, 1881; licensed to preach the gospel by Columbia Presbytery, August 27th, 1881; installed pastor of Lewisburg Church, April 2d, 1882.

Mr. Kennedy is of a quiet, unostentatious disposition. Possessing a well-trained and well-balanced mind, being a close and accurate thinker, and a conscientious expounder of God's Word, he has already taken a high rank among the young ministers of the South.

Kennedy, Rev. Samuel, was born in Scotland; graduated at Nassau Hall in 1749; was licensed by New Brunswick Presbytery, May 18th, 1750, and was installed pastor of Baskingridge, N. J., June 25th, 1751. He exercised the office of a physician and a teacher. His labors in his appropriate work were blessed to the upbuilding of the church and the increase of believers in numbers, in sound knowledge and godliness. He died August 31st, 1787.

Ker, Rev. Jacob, was a grandson of the well-known Walter Ker, of Freehold, N. J., who was banished from Scotland in 1685, "for his faithful adherence to God and His truth, as professed by the Church of Scotland." The subject of this sketch, after graduating at Princeton, acted as a Tutor from 1760 to 1762. In 1763, he was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, and was ordained by the same Presbytery in 1764. On the 29th of August, in the same year, he was installed pastor of the churches of Monokin and Wicomico, Md., where he remained until his death, July 29th, 1795. Mr. Ker was a man of fervent piety, and a good preacher.

Ker, Rev. Jacob Walter Eliezer, was born at Princess Anne, Md., December 23d, 1813; prosecuted his early studies at Washington Academy, in that place, and studied theology at Princeton Seminary, 1835-38. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Lewes, September 29th, 1837; then returned to Princess Anne, and was Principal of Washington Academy from 1838 until 1842. He was ordained by West Jersey Presbytery, August 16th, 1842, and on the same day was installed as pastor of Deerfield Church, in the bounds of that Presbytery. Here he labored with great diligence and fidelity for thirteen years, when he was released from his pastoral charge, May 1st, 1855. After this he preached as stated supply to the Church at Frederick City, Md., from 1856 to 1858. He next became pastor of the Church at Lewisburg, Pa., where he was installed by the Presbytery of Northumberland, November 15th, 1858, and from which charge he was released October 19th, 1860. This was his last regular field of labor. On account of feeble health he did not accept another charge. He died August 12th, 1879. When in health, Mr. Ker had always been an acceptable and successful preacher. He was a kind and sympathetic pastor, a courteous gentleman, a warm-hearted and genial friend.

Ker, Rev. Nathan, went to Princeton College, from the congregation of William Tennent, of Freehold, N. J. He was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, in 1762, and ordained August 17th, 1763, and in 1766 was settled as pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Goshen, N. Y., where he remained until his death, December 14th, 1801. Mr. Kerr served for some time as a volunteer chaplain in the army. He was a man of well-balanced and cultivated mind, enlarged and liberal views, earnest piety, and extensive influence.

Kerr, George, LL. D., the son of Robert and Mary (Buchanan) Kerr, was born in county Antrim, Ireland, December 1st, 1814. His parents emigrated to the United States in 1823. He graduated at Williams College, Mass., with the first honor, in 1839; studied theology in Union Seminary, New York city, and was licensed and ordained by Columbia Presbytery in 1844. He began his labors as pastor of the Reformed (Protestant Dutch) Church, at Conesville, N. Y., where he remained until April 1846, and then took charge of the academy at Franklin, N. Y. This he soon raised from a depressed to a highly prosperous condition. Here was most of his very useful labor as an instructor expended. For many years he preached nearly as much as if he had been a pastor, his services being greatly sought and highly appreciated by neighboring churches. For nearly sixteen years he made Franklin the centre of his wide-reaching influence. Then he spent a year and a half as Professor in the State Agricultural College at Ovid, N. Y.; then three years as Principal at Watertown Academy, N. Y.; and then took charge of the Seminary at Cooperstown, N. Y., where he died, March 27th, 1867.

Dr. Kerr was a man of remarkably vigorous and active intellect, of indomitable persistence, and of unceasing industry. He was a large-hearted man, impulsive, frank, sympathetic, tender and ardent in feeling. He was a Christian of strong faith, glowing zeal, and prompt sensibility to all that concerned the cause of the beloved Master. He followed the leadings of Providence in becoming a teacher, when his heart was very much set upon becoming a pastor. As he became eminent in the first vocation, so he had qualities adapted to make him eminent, useful, and of wide influence in the latter.

Kerr, Rev. James, was a native of Scotland, and was born in 1805. He graduated at the University of Glasgow in 1832; emigrated to the United States in his twenty-fifth year; studied theology at the Western Theological Seminary; was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Baltimore, April 27th, 1836, and was ordained an evangelist by the Presbytery of Winchester, April 22d, 1837. He labored as a missionary in Hampshire county, Va., for two years, and was successful in his ministry, planting the standard of the Cross in many portions of that hitherto forsaken country. He was installed pastor of the Church of Cadiz, O., June, 1839, and continued in this relation until removed by death, April 19th, 1855. Mr. Kerr was a clear, logical, plain and interesting preacher. He was a good presbyter, and made an excellent presiding officer of an ecclesiastical court. He was remarkably conscientious in every sphere of life. He was the author of a book entitled "Mode of Baptism," and a small work on Psalmody, both of which productions were favorably received and appreciated by their friends, and much tortured by their enemies.

Kerr, Hon. John, was born in the vicinity of Huntingdon, Pa., April 1st, 1796. He lived and died upon the farm on which he was born. His name appears on the records of Presbytery as the elder representing the congregation of Huntingdon, early in the year 1823, when he was only twenty-seven years of age, and almost continuously from that time his name appears on the minutes of Presbytery as the elder representing the congregation. In all matters pertaining to the Church, whether its religious or secular interests, he always took a leading part. He gave his time and money without stint to the church. As an elder he was an example to all the members of the church, in his punctual and un-failing attendance on all the means of grace, public, social, and private. Mr. Kerr was appointed one of the Associate Judges of the county of Huntingdon, as is believed, by a Governor who was not of the same party in politics with himself. It was a deserved compliment to Mr. Kerr's integrity and intelligence.

Kerr, Rev. William, was born in Bart Township, Lancaster county, Pa., in 1777; was educated at the Institution which afterwards became Jefferson College, studied theology, partly under the Rev. Dr. Sample, and partly at Princeton, was settled in the ministry at Donegal, Lancaster county, Pa., about 1809, and died in 1823, in his forty-seventh year. Dr. Martin said of him: "Few, if any, stood higher in the estimation of his brethren."

Keys of the Kingdom of Heaven. A key, in Scripture, is a symbol of authority. The Romanists say that the Pope has the power of the keys, and can open and shut paradise as he pleases, grounding their opinion on that expression of Jesus Christ to Peter, "I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven, and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven, and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven" (Matt. xvi, 19). But every one must see that this is an absolute perversion of Scripture. By "the keys of the kingdom of heaven," we are to understand the power and authority of exercising government and discipline in the Church, in virtue of which, those entrusted with these keys have power to "bind and loose," by inflicting and removing censures, and their proceedings, when conducted agreeably to Scripture, are ratified in heaven. Presbyterians maintain that these keys were given to Peter, as an apostle and elder, and, therefore, the gift extends to all the apostles, and after them to all ordinary elders, to the end of time. To understand our Lord's words, now under view, as meaning that the right of admitting souls to heaven was to be placed in Peter's hands, is preposterous. This office is the special prerogative of Christ Himself (Rev. 1, 18). The passage has to do with admission to and rejection from the membership of the Church. All the authority it conveyed was soon expressly extended to all the apostles (See Matt. xviii, 18), where the plural number 'ye' is used (John xx, 23; 1 Cor. v, 3, 5; Eph. ii, 20; Rev. xxi, 14).

The same thing that is expressed in the above passage by binding and loosing, is elsewhere expressed by remitting and retaining sins. But Christ addressed these words to all the apostles: "Peace be unto you; as the Father hath sent me, so I send you. Whosoever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them, and whosoever sins ye retain, they are retained (John xx, 21, 23). It is true that this power is ascribed to the Church: "Tell it unto the Church," etc. (Matt. 18, 17); but by the Church, in this passage, is to be understood the rulers or elders of the Church, and it should be observed, their decision of the case was to be final. The idea, that by the words "whatsoever thou shalt bind, etc.," Peter was to have any power of forgiving sins, is derogatory to Christ's special office as our Great High Priest. It is certain that in any literal and authoritative sense, such power was never exercised by one of the Apostles, and plainly was never understood by themselves as possessed by them or conveyed to them. The power to intrude upon the relation between men and God cannot have been given by Christ to His ministers in any but a ministerial or declarative sense—as the authorized interpreters of His Word, while in the actings of His ministers, the real nature of the power committed to them is seen in the exercise of church discipline. As for the special inspiration the Apostles received to lay down rules and regulations for the guidance of the Church on disputed questions, binding or forbidding some things, and loosing or allowing other things, as, for example, the decision of the Council at Jerusalem, that the Gentiles needed not to be circumcised, (Acts xvi, 19); this was a commission specially confined to themselves. In discharging it they had no successor. With them it began and with them it expired.

The power of discipline, according to our Confession, is (Chap. xxx, Sec. iv) committed solely to the office-bearers of the Church. The Church and the State may take up the same cases, but under a different consideration; it is only when viewed as crimes against the State that they come under the cognizance of civil rulers, and are to be punished with civil pains; viewed as scandals against religious society, they come under the cognizance of the rulers of the Church, and can only be removed by ecclesiastical censures.

Kieffer, Rev. William T. Linn, was born in Millinburg, Pa., September 8th, 1850. He was a student at Dickinson College until the end of his Sophomore year, when he entered Franklin and Marshall College, where he graduated, as Valedictorian, July 3d, 1871. After teaching school for a year he entered Princeton Theological Seminary, and graduated, regularly, April 27th, 1875. In the Spring of 1870 he had united with the Reformed Church of Lancaster, but in May, 1873, he transferred his connection to the Second Presbyterian Church of Carlisle, Pa. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Carlisle, April 14th, 1875. Almost immediately he received a call from the Presbyterian Church at Churchville, Harford county, Md., where he was ordained and installed by the Presbytery of Baltimore, November 11th, 1875. Here he continued in a happy and prosperous pastorate for eight years. Having received and accepted a unanimous call to the Presbyterian Church of Mercersburg, Pa., he was installed its pastor, October 30th, 1883, with every promise of great usefulness in that important charge. He is a good preacher, faithful in pastoral work, and earnestly devoted to the Master's service.

Kimball, Charles Cotton, D.D., was born in Newport, N. H., 1834; graduated, with highest honors, from Beloit College, Wis., 1859, and from Union Theological Seminary, New York City, 1862; received the degree of D. D. from his Alma Mater, in 1878. Before accepting a call to any church, Dr. Kimball spent six years in study, evangelical work, and travel in Europe. In 1868 he was installed over the First Presbyterian Church of Erie, Pa. In 1871 he accepted a unanimous call to the Central Presbyterian Church of Erie, Pa. This church, which had just been organized, had a steady, swift, remarkable growth, and became one of the most influential churches in the State. In 1878 Dr. Kimball accepted a unanimous call to the Second Presbyterian Church of Kansas City, Mo., which in less than three years nearly doubled its membership, and built a new and elegant house of worship. Finding the climate injurious to the health of his family, he removed to Boston, Mass., and is at present engaged in literary and evangelical labors.

As a preacher, Dr. Kimball is earnest, scholarly, graphic and edifying. As a pastor, he is social, genial and inspiring. He has unusual gifts for promoting the growth of churches, which, even when in his hands for only a short time, invariably spring rapidly into prosperity.

King, Rev. Andrew, was born in North Carolina, was probably licensed by the Presbytery of New York in 1775, and on the 11th of June, 1777, was ordained and installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Wallkill, N. Y., in which relation he continued until his death, November 16th, 1815. Mr. King was neither learned nor eloquent, but was greatly prospered during his ministry. He was known as a "peacemaker," and in various instances was called on by the Presbytery to settle differences in congregations.

King, Barnabas, D.D., was born in New Marlborough, Mass., June 2d, 1789; graduated at Williams College in 1801, and was licensed October 15th, 1805, by Berkshire Congregational Association, Mass. On Sabbath, January 25th, 1806, he preached his first sermon in Rockaway, N. J. All of that year and part of the next he spent at Sparta and Berkshire, N. J., and in October, 1807, he began to preach half his time at Rockaway, the other half at Sparta. He was installed pastor at Rockaway, December 27th, 1808, and during that Winter his labors were blessed with a revival. His congregation was also favored with precious revivals in 1817, and in 1831-2. He died April 10th, 1862. Dr. King's style of preaching was very simple, but Scriptural, and usually very earnest. He was a model pastor, to whom his flock was perfectly devoted. The Rev. Albert Barnes said, that "he knew no minister whose walk and labor and success had been so admirable as those of Mr. King, of Rockaway."

King, Rev. Charles Barrington, son of Barrington and Catherine Margarite (Nephew) King, was born at Baisden's Bluff, McIntosh county, Ga., July 4th, 1823. He was graduated from Franklin College (afterwards called the University of Georgia), at Athens, Ga., A. D., 1845, and immediately afterwards entered Princeton Seminary, where he was regularly graduated in 1848. He was licensed by Cherokee Presbytery, May 9th, 1847, and supplied, among other churches, that of Marietta, Ga., in the Summer of 1848, and Sparta, Ga., in 1849. He was ordained an evangelist, by Hopewell Presbytery, at Madison, Ga., May 29th, 1850. From January 1st, 1850, to 1854, he served, as stated supply, the Church at Columbus, Ga.; then supplied, during the Summer of 1854, the First Church of Augusta and the Green Street Mission Church of the same city, whilst the yellow fever was prevailing there, until himself prostrated by that disease. He was afterwards called to the pastorate of the First Presbyterian Church of Savannah, and supplied it for the year 1855, but declined its call, and accepted one to become pastor of the White Bluff Congregational Church, over which he was installed early in 1856, and of which he continued to be pastor until his death. From 1855 until the Institution was closed, during the civil war, he was Principal of the Female Department of Chatham Academy High School, in the city of Savannah; at the same time he was performing the duties of pastor of White Bluff Church. He died November 24th, 1880. Mr. King was a faithful and zealous preacher of the gospel, fond of the children and especially beloved by them; gentle in manner, a loving son, a devoted husband, a scholar of excellent attainments, a true Christian gentleman under all circumstances.

King, George Ives, D. D., was born at Adams, N. Y., in 1815. He graduated from Union College in 1837, and from Auburn Theological Seminary in 1841. After teaching some years in his native State, and preaching there and at Hanover, N. J., he removed to Quincy, Ill., where he became pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of that city, in which relation he continued for twelve years. He had charge of the First Presbyterian Church, Jerseyville, Ill., 1868-73, where his labors were greatly blessed. He was one of the trustees of Blackburn University, looked zealously after its interests, and was devising for it liberal things. He loved his own church, was watchful of her interests and jealous for her honor. With the hope of improving his declining health he visited New Orleans, but the hope was not realized, and he died in that city, March 12th, 1873. A little before the end, his wife commenced reading to him the sentence: "Yea, though I walk through the valley of"—and then waited to see if he understood.

After a moment's effort, for recollection and strength, the dying man took it up—"the shadow of"—and here his tongue failed, to be loosened only in heaven.

Dr. King was a man of mark. The Presbytery of Alton, in a minute adopted April 3d, 1873, said, "During many years' acquaintance we had learned to place him in the first rank in the ministry. He was a man of brilliant endowments, strong in his convictions and tenacious in his purposes. As a scholar, his attainments were wide and varied; as a preacher, he was earnest and eloquent, as a pastor he was watchful and judicious, and as a guardian of vested rights he was wise and liberal. In our deliberative bodies he was acute and sound. In times of public trial he was fearless and patriotic. Both in public and domestic life he was an inspiring and admirable model, and as a believer in Christ we esteemed him humble, sincere and devout. His memory is to us exceedingly precious."

For a minister Dr. King was wealthy. He purchased land at an early day, near Peoria, which became valuable. But his wealth was well bestowed. While he lived, and since his death, in the hands of his widow and daughters, it is a fountain sending forth streams to make glad the city of God.

King, John, Esq., was for many years a ruling elder in the Presbyterian Church, Chambersburg, Pa., and as a member of Session his counsel and discretion indicated the soundness of his judgment. He was also a firm and uniform advocate and supporter of the order and principles of that church. Mr. King, by his industry and economy, first as an iron master, and afterwards as a merchant, acquired a large estate. All who knew him were ready to testify to his unbending integrity. His time, services, and means were always ready to minister to the sick, comfort the afflicted, relieve the needy, advance the cause of religion and morals, and aid every work or enterprise that was esteemed of public usefulness. He was connected with nearly all the religious, literary, charitable, and business institutions in Chambersburg, where much of his life was spent. For many years he was President of the Chambersburg Bank, the affairs of which he administered with marked ability and success. He died, July 8th, 1835.

King, Rev. Junius B., was a native of North Carolina. He was lineally descended from some of the noblest worthies and patriots of the American Revolution, and brightest ornaments of the Christian Church of that day. Having early won the honors of the University of his native State, and having enjoyed the advantages of a thorough course of theological learning, at the Union Theological Seminary, Virginia, he went to Alabama, as a licentiate, in the year 1836, and was soon after ordained to the full work of the gospel ministry, and installed (October 21st, 1838) pastor of the Valley Creek Church. Here he lived, beloved by all, and here, at the close of his fourteenth pastoral year, he died (November 22d, 1850), lamented by all. Possessed of a clear head, a sound judgment, and of undeviating integrity, and conscientious to a proverb, he enjoyed the respect and confidence of all who knew him. Greatly endeared to the people of his charge, he was welcomed to the hearts of Christians wherever he went, and his spotless reputation, his good sense, his discreet zeal, and his pastoral fidelity combined to render him one of the most efficient and useful ministers in the Synod.

King, Rev. Richard Hall, was a native of North Carolina, and prosecuted his early studies under the Rev. Dr. James Hall. As he was very zealous and more than commonly gifted, he commenced preaching at once, without any preparatory course of study. He was first in the Methodist Communion, but was afterwards received into the Presbyterian Church and ministry. In April, 1817, he was prevailed on to take charge of the churches of which the Rev. S. G. Ramsey, then near the close of life, had been pastor. He was received into the Presbytery of Union, from the Presbytery of Concord, September 22d, 1817, and continued to minister to the Grassy Valley churches until he was disabled by bodily infirmity. He died, May 27th, 1825. Dr. Foote, in his Sketches of North Carolina, says that Mr. King was "esteemed a man of the finest powers ever trained in Western Carolina."

King, Walter, Esq., was born at Norwich, Conn., January 6th, 1786. He graduated at Yale College in 1805. Having studied law he practiced his profession in Utica, N. Y., until the failure of his health, in 1832, compelled him to retire, and he sought rest and recovery on a small farm in Marcy, across the Mohawk, on which he remained for twenty years. He died July 26th, 1852. He was a ruling elder in the First Church, Utica, for many years, and when he moved to Marcy he found himself in the midst of a community without a religious organization and without a place for preaching and worship. Mainly through his instrumentality an association was formed, consisting of Christians of several evangelical denominations, and a chapel was erected and services stately held in it.

The Bible class was chosen by Mr. King as his particular field of labor, and, not satisfied with the stores of knowledge that he brought into it, he diligently searched the Scriptures; and not satisfied with studying these in King James' Version, or with the help of popular commentators, he took them up in their original languages, and supplied himself with as large a critical apparatus as many Professors of biblical interpretation possess. He also prepared and published "The Gospel Harmony," based substantially on Newcomb's arrangement. It is divided into lessons, each of which is accompanied by questions. The book had quite an extensive circulation, and passed through several editions.

King, Rev. William Montgomery, was born in Elbert county, Ga., October 6th, 1796, and died at the residence of his son, the Rev. Dr. S. A. King, Waco, Texas, June 1st, 1882. His father, Hugh King, removed to Maury county, Tenn., about the year 1806. He was educated at the academy of the Rev. Dr. Gideon Blackburn, at Franklin, Tenn., and was licensed by the Presbytery that included that portion of Tennessee with a part of north Alabama. Having become somewhat enfeebled in health by his course of study, he traveled, when a licentiate, in Tennessee and Mississippi, doing missionary work. He settled at Middleton, twelve miles east of Louisville, teaching school and supplying two churches for some years.

Mr. King organized the Macedonia Church, in Woodford county, and supplied it for a number of years. He subsequently removed to Illinois, but returned after a few years to the Macedonia Church, remaining there till his removal to Texas, in January, 1851. Here he performed many years of active service in preaching and teaching. During his long ministry he preached to churches which he had organized himself—never building on another man's foundation.

For a number of years his health had been feeble, but he continued to work in Sabbath schools and to preach at times, until he was nearly eighty years of age. He retained the use of all his faculties to a remarkable degree—except the sense of hearing—and he was past fourscore before that began to fail.

He was a man fond of his church and of his friends, and devoted to reading and study—was fond of natural objects, and took great interest in anything rare, curious and useful. He was especially indifferent to worldly possessions and worldly clat for himself, though he took great interest in others' welfare, temporal as well as spiritual. He was probably as much induced to over-estimate the good points in others as he underrated his own worth, and beyond all question was pious, earnest and sincere.

Kingdom of God. This phrase in Scripture is of frequent occurrence, and variously applied to the providential, moral and evangelical government of Jehovah. Thus we read of the Kingdom of God (Ps. ciii, 19; Dan. iv, 3), or of his universal empire and dominion over all creatures, in reference to which it is said, "Jehovah is a great God, and a great King above all gods" (Ps. xcv, 3). "His throne is established in the heavens, and His kingdom ruleth over all."

Again, we frequently read in the evangelists of the Kingdom of Heaven, a phrase in which there is a manifest allusion to the predictions in which the dispensation of the Messiah was revealed by the prophets in the Old Testament, particularly by Daniel, who mentions it as "a kingdom which the God of heaven would set up, and which should never be destroyed." (Dan. ii, 44.) The same prophet also speaks of it as a kingdom to be given, with glory and dominion over all people, nations and languages, to one like unto the Son of Man. (Dan. vii, 13, 14. See also Micah. iv, 6, 7.) The Jews, accustomed to this way of speaking, expected the kingdom of the Messiah to resemble that of a temporal king, exercising power on his enemies, restoring the Hebrew monarchy and the throne of David to all its splendor, subduing the nations, and rewarding his friends and faithful servants, in proportion to their fidelity and services. Hence the early contests among the apostles about precedence in His kingdom, and hence the sons of Zebedee desired the two chief places in it.

According to the prophecy of Daniel, this kingdom was to take place during the existence of the Roman Empire, the last of the four great monarchies that had succeeded each other (Dan. ii, 44); and as it was set up by the God of heaven, it is in the New Testament termed "the kingdom of God," or "the kingdom of heaven." It was typified by the Jewish theocracy, and declared to be at hand by John the Baptist, and by Christ and His apostles also, in the days of His flesh; but it did not come with power till Jesus rose from the dead, and sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high (Acts ii, 32-37). Then was He most solemnly inaugurated and proclaimed King of the universe, and especially of the New Testament Church, amidst adoring myriads of attendant angels, and "the spirits of just men made perfect." Then were fulfilled the words of Jehovah by David, "I have set my King upon my holy hill of Zion" (Ps. ii, 6). This is that spiritual, evangelical and eternal empire to which He Himself referred, when interrogated before Pontius Pilate, and in reference to which He said: "My Kingdom is not of this world" (John xviii, 36-37). His empire, indeed, extends to every creature, for "all authority is committed into his hands, both in heaven and on earth," and He is "head over all things to the Church;" but His kingdom primarily imports the gospel Church, which is the subject of His laws, the seat of His government, and the object of His care, and being surrounded with powerful opposers, He is represented as ruling in the midst of His enemies.

This kingdom is not of a worldly origin, or nature, nor has it this world for its end or object (Rom. xiv, 17; 1 Cor. i, 20). It can neither be promoted nor defended by worldly power, influence, or carnal weapons, but by bearing witness unto the truth, or by the preaching of the gospel with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven (2 Cor. x, 4-5). Its establishment among men is progressive, but it is destined at last to fill the whole earth (Dan. ii; Rev. xi, 15). Its real subjects are only those who are of the truth, and hear Christ's voice, for none can enter it but such as are born from above (John iii, 3-5; Matt. xviii, 3; xix, 14; Mark x, 15), nor can any be visible subjects of it, but such as appear to be regenerated, by a credible profession of faith and obedience (Luke xvi, 16; Matt. xx, 28-44). Its privileges and immunities are not of this world, but such as are spiritual and heavenly; they are all spiritual blessings, in heavenly things, in Christ Jesus (Eph. i, 3). Over this glorious kingdom death has no power; it extends as well to the future as the present world, and though entered here by renewing grace (Col. i, 13), it is inherited in its perfection in the world of glory (Matt. xxv, 34; 1 Cor. xv, 50; 2 Peter i, 11). Hypocrites and false brethren may indeed insinuate themselves into it here, but they will have no possible place in it hereafter (Matt. xiii, 41, 47-50; xxii, 11-14; Luke xiii, 28-29; 1 Cor. vi, 9-10; Gal. v, 21; Rev. xxi, 27).

Kinkaid, Rev. Samuel Porterfield, the eldest child of John and Jane (Porterfield) Kinkaid, was born May 24th, 1827, in Donegal, Butler county, Pa. He graduated at Washington College, Pennsylvania, in 1857, with honor, and at the Western Theological Seminary, in the Spring of 1860. During his last year at the seminary he preached to the congregations of Academia and Rockland, in Clarion Presbytery, where his early labors were attended with the outpouring of God's Spirit upon that people. He was ordained by Clarion Presbytery, November 13th, 1860, and at the same time installed over the united churches of Academia, Rockland and Richland. Here his pastoral labors were abundant and greatly blessed. In addition to his labors as pastor of the three congregations, he taught, unassisted, the academy at Freedom, Venango county, Pa. With this people he remained for several years, going in and out before them as a preacher, teacher, man and citizen, eminent for his diligence in his Master's work, and for his exalted Christian character in every relation of life. His pastoral relation to this people was dissolved in the Summer of 1863, and immediately thereafter (September 15th) he was installed over the churches of Callensburg and Concord, where he labored earnestly and faithfully until his Master called him to a better, higher and holier service. His death was very sudden. At the close of the day and of the week (March 24th, 1866), having made thorough preparation for the Sabbath, and in the enjoyment of his usual health, he went out to the stable to attend to his horse, and continuing absent for some hours, his family became alarmed. After searching for him, he was found in the feeding-room, cold in death. From a careful examination of his body by a board of physicians, and from all the circumstances attending this sad event, it was satisfactorily ascertained that he came to his death by the crush or kick of a horse. Thus, unattended by loving companions, and with no kind ministrations of earthly friends, but secure in the arms of the Beloved, he stepped down to the Jordan of death.

Kirk, Edward Norris, D.D., was born in New York, August 14th, 1802, and died in Boston, March 27th, 1874. He was graduated at the College of New Jersey, 1820, and, after a brief study of law, at Princeton Theological Seminary, 1825. From 1829 to 1837 he was pastor of the Fourth Presbyterian Church in Albany, N. Y. The years from 1837 to 1842 were spent in Europe, and in traveling in the United States, in the interest of the Foreign Evangelical Society, of which he was Secretary. From 1842 to 1871 he was pastor of the Mount Vernon Church (Congregational), Boston, Mass. During his last years he was almost entirely blind. Dr. Kirk was an eloquent and earnest preacher. He was one of the first members of the Evangelical Alliance, and a vigorous advocate of the evangelization of the Roman Catholic countries of Europe. He published Memorial of Rev. John Chester, D. D. (Albany, 1829); Lectures on Christ's Parables (New York, 1856); two volumes of sermons (New York, 1840, and Boston, 1860); translations of Gausson's Theopneusty (New York, 1842); Canon of the Holy Scriptures (abridged, Boston, 1862), and J. F. Astie's Louis Fourteenth, and the Writers of his Age (Boston, 1855). His Lectures on Revivals, edited by Rev. D. O. Mears, appeared in Boston, 1874.

Kirkland, Rev. Samuel, was a student of Princeton College, and was esteemed a young man of marked ability. After leaving college (1765) he went on a missionary expedition to the Seneca tribe of Indians, where his adventures were a scene of constant hardship, of unremitting labor, and often of imminent danger. After being absent a year he returned to his home in Norwich, Conn., bringing one of the Seneca chiefs with him. He was now ordained, and returned to his mission, where he spent more than forty years. In a letter of Washington to Congress, in 1775, he recognized the favorable influence which this mission had upon the interest of the country during the Revolution. "I cannot but intimate," said he, "my sense of the importance of Mr. Kirkland's station, and the great advantages which have and may result to the United Colonies from his situation being made respectable. All accounts agree that much of the favorable disposition shown by the Indians may be ascribed to his labor and influence." The founding of Hamilton College is due to the far-seeing generosity of Mr. Kirkland. It was through his influence that Hamilton Oneida Academy was founded and incorporated, in 1793. In the same year he conveyed to its Trustees several hundred acres of land. In 1812 this academy became Hamilton College, under a new charter.

Kirkpatrick, Jacob, D. D., was born on Long Hill, near Baskingridge, N. J., August 7th, 1785. He was educated in New Jersey College; studied theology under John Woodhull, D. D., of Freehold, N. J.; was licensed, by New Brunswick Presbytery, June 20th, 1809, and was installed by it pastor of the United First Church of Amwell, Ringoes, N. J., June 20th, 1810. This was his only charge. He died May 2d, 1866. Dr. Kirkpatrick was a kind, affectionate, exemplary Christian. Unassuming gentleness and retiring modesty were the constant ornaments of his character. None doubted that his ruling aim was the salvation of souls, for this was evident from the tenor of his life, the tenderness and pathos of his preaching, and the earnestness with which he besought all under his ministry to hear the Saviour's call.

Kirkpatrick, Rev. John, was a native of Mecklenburg county, N. C., and was born in the year 1787. He entered Hampden-Sidney College, in 1811, and graduated with the highest honors of the Institution. He commenced the study of law, but after his conversion, determined to become a minister of the gospel, and commenced a course of theology, under the direction of Dr. Moses Hoge, then President of the college at which he graduated. Whilst engaged in his theological studies, in 1811, he was drafted as a recruit for the army, which he joined at Norfolk, serving six months as Secretary to General Porter, during which time he frequently discharged the duties of chaplain. At the expiration of his term of service he resumed his theological course, under Dr. Hoge. He was licensed to preach by the Hanover Presbytery, in 1814; in the early part of 1815 engaged temporarily as a missionary in Hanover county, and was afterwards settled in Manchester, Chesterfield county, where he continued about four years, uniting, during a part of the time, with his pastoral work the teaching of a classical school, and subsequently conducting, with great skill and success, a school of deaf mutes. By this time he had acquired no small reputation as an earnest, eloquent and gifted preacher. In 1819 he was installed pastor of the Cumberland Church, Cumberland county. Here he continued to labor during the remainder of his life, which terminated February 17th, 1842. Mr. Kirkpatrick was universally acknowledged to possess great strength and energy of character. He was remarkable for his independence and integrity. As a preacher he had an uncommon degree of power over the passions and imaginations of his hearers. His boldness in the pulpit and out of it, the warmth of his feelings and the generous openness of his character made him many friends and admirers, and such was the mutual attachment between him and his people that, though often solicited to do so, he never would consent to leave them. His death produced general regret in all classes of the community.

Kirkpatrick, Rev. William, received license from the Presbytery of New Brunswick, August 15th, 1758, and passed several months in missionary work in New Jersey. He was ordained and appointed a supply to the Presbyterian Church in Trenton, N. J., July 4th, 1759, where he preached until 1766, but was never settled as their pastor. During this time he had many calls, but declined them all. In 1766 he accepted a call to the church in Amwell, N. J. In 1767 he was elected a trustee of Princeton College, at which he had graduated in 1757. He died September 8th, 1769.

Kirkwood, Samuel J., Ph. D., LL. D., was born in Monroe county, O., January 29th, 1840; graduated from Indiana State University, in 1861; Superintendent of public schools, Cambridge, O., 1861-64; Bucyrus, O., 1864-65; Tiffin, O., 1865-70; Professor of Mathematics and Astronomy in the University of Wooster, 1870. He became a communing member of the Church in 1864, and a ruling elder in 1868; member of the General Assemblies of 1870, 1876 and 1883; received the honorary degrees of Ph. D. from Lafayette College, and LL. D. from Columbian University, in 1876. Professor Kirkwood is an active friend of the public school system of Ohio, and, as a Christian scientist and skillful instructor, occupies a position of honor and influence among the educators of the West.

Kirkwood, Thomas Carter, D.D., is the son of the late William and Mrs. Margaret N. Kirkwood (now Mrs. Bunyan), and was born in Galway, Saratoga county, N. Y., November 14th, 1837. His mother belongs to the Carter family, so well represented in ecclesiastical and business life by her brothers, Messrs. Robert Carter & Bros. Coming West in early manhood, he took his preparatory course at Beloit (Wis.) College, and graduated at Monmouth (Ill.) College in 1861, and at the Theological Seminary of the Northwest, Chicago, in 1867. Licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Monmouth, he, for some months after graduation, assisted Rev. Willis Lord, D.D., in the pastorate of the Fullerton Avenue Presbyterian Church, Chicago. He has filled successful pastorates of the churches of Woodstock, Ill., Janesville and Fond du Lac, Wis., and when driven by ill health to the mountain air of Colorado, became pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Colorado Springs, where, with health regained, under the shadow of the mountain, he is doing a noble work as pastor of a vigorous and growing church, as the friend of the stranger in search of health, and as a presbyter on a most important mission field.

Dr. Kirkwood is an instructive and interesting preacher, a sympathizing pastor, and a courteous and vivacious gentleman. To his attainments as a college student, he has added extensive stores of knowledge, and a large and valuable experience with men and affairs. Churches have grown healthfully under his ministry, and interesting revivals, bearing precious fruits, have attended his labors.

Kittredge, Abbott Eliot, D.D., born at Roxbury, Mass., July 20th, 1834; graduated at Williams College, 1851, and at Andover, Mass., Theological Seminary, 1859; ordained pastor Winthrop Congregational Church, Charlestown, Mass., 1859; resigned 1863; during six months visit at San Francisco, Cal., in 1861, occupied Howard Street Presbyterian Church; January, 1865, was installed pastor of the Eleventh Presbyterian (now Memorial) Church, New York city, where he remained until June, 1870, when he accepted a call to the Third Presbyterian Church, Chicago, and was installed as its pastor, October, 1870, where he still labors. His success and usefulness as a pastor are attested by the unexampled unity, growth and prosperity of the churches over which he has been pastor. Since his installation over the Third Church in Chicago it has received 3130 members, 1124 of which have been upon confession of faith in Christ, and the Church now numbers about 2100 communicants; average attendance at the Wednesday evening prayer meeting is over 500. His great administrative ability, untiring energy, and great capacity for labor, combined with a sympathetic and genial nature, enables him to bring every feature of his church work under his personal supervision, and to bring himself into personal relations with each member of his congregation, every one of whom holds him in the highest esteem. Gracious and pleasing in the pulpit, possessing a peculiarly magnetic voice and presence, Dr. Kittredge affects no style of oratory, except to present the gospel in its simplicity and power, with an earnestness born only of his love for souls, and with a freshness which makes it always new. He not only preaches to the immense congregations which constantly fill his own house to overflowing, but, through the weekly printed sermons, to multitudes all over the world. Foremost and aggressive in every healthy evangelistic and moral movement, he is held in high esteem in the community where he resides.

Kittredge, Rev. Josiah Edwards, the youngest of four children of Josiah Kittredge, M. D., and Sarah (French) his wife, was born in Boston, Mass., October 12th, 1836. He prepared for college at Kimball Union Academy, Meriden, N. H., and Phillips Academy, Andover, Mass.; honorably graduated at Yale in 1860; taught one year, and studied theology four; the first in Union Seminary, the others in Andover; the last as resident graduate; was licensed to preach by Essex South (Mass.) Association, in 1863. Loss of health kept him out of the pulpit nearly three years. In 1866-7 he traveled in Europe, Egypt and Palestine, and in 1867-8 he studied at Heidelberg and Paris. Was ordained and installed in Glastonbury, Conn., March 9th, 1869. With his family he traveled and resided in Europe in 1873-6, the last two years as pastor of the American Church in Florence, Italy. April 18th, 1877, he was installed pastor in Geneseo, N. Y. Two years afterward he became a member of the London Biblical Archaeological Society, and has been Secretary of the Chautauqua Archaeological Society since its organization. He has published several addresses of more than ordinary literary merit, and which exhibit superior scholarship. His pastoral charge is the largest of our churches in central and western New York outside of the cities, and is of corresponding intelligence and influence.

Knight, Rev. Hervey B., son of George and Keziah J. Knight, was born in New Castle, Ohio, July 20th, 1841. He graduated at Washington College, Pa., in 1862, and at the Western Theological Seminary, Allegheny, Pa., in 1867. He taught one term at Elder's Ridge Academy, in 1866, where he was licensed by the Presbytery of Saltsburg, and supplied, for a portion of the vacation, the nearest churches. After leaving the seminary, he became a Home Missionary in the churches of West Point and Pilot Grove, in Iowa Presbytery, and labored with commendable zeal. At the end of the first year he was ordained, sine titulo. At the end of the second year he accepted a unanimous call to the Presbyterian Church of Ottumur, where he removed in May, 1869. Mr. Knight was chosen Stated Clerk of the Presbytery of Fairfield, May, 1869, and at the reunion and reorganization of Presbyteries, was elected Stated Clerk of the Presbytery of Iowa, and chairman of the Committee on Home Missions, which position he still holds. In January, 1881, he resigned the pastorate of the Ottumur Church, in order to represent Parsons College, in the Synod of Iowa, an Institution with which he had been actively connected since its organization in 1875. This position he still fills. He is an earnest worker, active in doing good, a good preacher, esteemed by his brethren, and has discharged the duties of the offices with which he has been honored with fidelity and success.

Knighton, Frederick, D.D., was born in Derby, England, November 15th, 1812. He graduated at the College of New Jersey, in 1837, after which he was a student of law and engaged in teaching. He was ordained by the Presbytery of West Jersey, November 1st, 1851. He has been pastor at Gloucester, N. J., 1851-2; teacher at Camden, 1852-4; principal at Belvidere, 1854-5; pastor-elect Oxford, 1855-73; principal at Cranbury, 1873-4; teacher at Milford, Pa., 1875-6, and teacher and evangelist at Stroudsburg, 1877. Dr. Knighton is a good scholar, preaches faithfully and forcibly, and his life work has been one of quiet but real usefulness.

Knowles, Rev. James F., of Ogden, Utah, was born at Riverhead, N. Y., August 31st, 1837; parents, Rev. Charles J. and Vina Sherrill Knowles. He was graduated at Union College, Schenectady, N. Y., in 1868, and at Union Theological Seminary, New York City, in 1870. He was enabled to enter the seminary a year in advance, on account of having studied Hebrew while at college, under the instruction of the eminent linguist, Taylor Lewis, LL. D. He was licensed, in 1870, by the Presbytery of Catskill, N. Y.; was ordained, in 1871, by the Presbytery of Lansing. He has been located as follows: one year at Presbyterian Church, Grand Ledge, Michigan; two years at First Presbyterian Church, South Bend, Indiana; four years at Presbyterian Church, East Nassau, N. Y.; two years at First Presbyterian Church, Boise City, Idaho. In the Spring of 1880 he took charge of the First Presbyterian Church at Ogden, Utah, and there remains for the present, faithful and useful in his work.

Knox, Charles Eugene, D.D., was born in Knoxboro', N. Y., December 27th, 1833; graduated from Hamilton College in 1856, and pursued his theological studies at Auburn and Union Seminaries. He was ordained and installed at Bloomfield, N. J., by the Presbytery of Newark, June 8th, 1864; was pastor at Newark, 1854-73, and from 1873 has been President of the German Theological School at Newark, in which capacity he has rendered very valuable service to the Church. He received the degree of D. D. from Princeton College, in 1874. Dr. Knox is a writer of ability, and in addition to the discharge of other duties, has written several volumes. He has published "Year with St. Paul," course of graded Sunday-school Text Books, five in number, "Love to the End," "David, the King." Reports for German Theological School, Sermons, etc.

JOHN KNOX

John Knox

JOHN KNOX.

Knox, John, the great champion of the Scottish Reformation (a sketch of whom belongs to such a volume as this), was born in 1505, at Gifford, in East Lothian, and was educated at Haddington and St. Andrew's. After he was created Master of Arts, he taught philosophy, most probably as a regent in one of the colleges of the University. His class became celebrated, and he was considered as equalling, if not excelling, his master, in the subtleties of the dialectic art. About the same time (1530), although he had no interest but what was procured by his own merit, he was advanced to clerical orders, and ordained a priest before he reached the age fixed by the canons of the Church. At this time, the fathers of the Christian Church, Jerome and Augustine, attracted his particular attention. By the writings of the former, he was led to the Scriptures as the only pure fountain of divine truth, and instructed in the utility of studying them in the original languages. In the works of the latter he found religious sentiments very opposite to those taught in the Romish Church, who, while she retained his name as a saint in her calendar, had banished his doctrine, as heretical, from her pulpits. From this time he renounced the study of scholastic theology, and his mind was fitted for improving the means which Providence had given for leading him to a fuller and more comprehensive view of the system of evangelical religion.

Knox first betrayed his change of sentiment in certain lectures in the University at St. Andrew's, where his youthful and noble countryman, Patrick Hamilton, for his advocacy of the doctrines of redemption, had perished in the fire. His defection aroused the clergy to denounce him as a traitor, and deprive him of his priesthood. He escaped death only by timely flight from the vengeance of Cardinal Beaton, who had engaged his emissaries to lay hold of him. He found protection under Douglas, of Langniddrie, and employment as a Tutor. Knox next appears in the company of George Wishart, the Scottish schoolmaster, who, having received the doctrines of the Reformation, began to preach them, probably, about 1536. The sword which was carried before the preacher after the attempt to assassinate him in Dundee was borne by Knox. On the night when the noble martyr was arrested, at the Cardinal's command, he ordered that the sword be taken from his zealous attendant. Knox begged for leave to follow him, but Wishart answered: "Nay, return to your bairnes" (meaning his pupils), "and God bliss you; ane is sufficient for a sacrifice."

The cruel martyrdom of him whom Knox revered as his spiritual father, and whom, for his endearing qualities, he cherished as a brother, made a powerful impression on the ardent soul of the Reformer. Knox himself was in constant peril from the bloody fac-

We find him, after the murder of the Romanist Beaton, seeking a refuge in St. Andrew's Castle, which the Cardinal's slayers held as a safe resort from the persecution of the Papists. There an event befell him which had the most serious bearing upon all his future. Until now, Knox's utterances in favor of Reformed doctrines had been private, consisting in Bible expositions to his pupils and his neighbors. He had never undertaken the place of a public preacher, nor did he consider his office as priest enough to justify him in doing so, without a call from a Christian congregation. He received this call in the most unlooked-for manner. Among the Protestants taking refuge in St. Andrew's Castle were Sir David Lindsay, of the Mount, the poet, and the scourger of the priesthood, Henry Balnaves, one of those stout barons who lent aid, by pen and sword, to the Scotch Reformation. These men quickly recognized in Knox's ability and skill in giving instruction to his pupils the germs of an energy and popular eloquence that were destined to earn him renown. They urged him to undertake the preacher's work. Knox, distrusting his own ability, and entertaining a lofty idea of the importance of the office, steadfastly declined. At length, a call to preach having been given him, in such a solemn and unexpected way as to assure him that it came from God, though he feared and trembled, he accepted the office laid upon him. On the day appointed he appeared in the pulpit, and took his text from Daniel vii. 25: "And he shall speak great words against the Most High, and shall wear out the saints of the Most High, and think to change times and laws;" a choice which reveals directly his view of the Papacy, and the confidence with which he anticipated its overthrow. It was a memorable day in Scottish history when Knox first preached in the parish church at St. Andrew's. Brave men held their breath as they listened to his bold and sweeping utterances. Such preaching had not been heard in Scotland for ages. "Others hewed the branches of the Papistry, but he struck at the root." Some rejoiced and took courage, some doubted, some hoped, some feared, many were furious, but all felt that there was a new power in the world; while a few chosen spirits recognized John Knox as the ordained champion and leader of the revolution then beginning in Scotland.

Notwithstanding the opposition Knox met with from the clergy, he every day grew bolder in the cause, until the castle of St. Andrew's surrendered to the French, in July, 1547, when he was carried with the garrison into France, and remained a prisoner on board the galleys, until the latter end of 1549. Being then set at liberty, he passed over to England, and arriving in London, was licensed and appointed preacher, first at Berwick, and afterwards at Newcastle. In 1552 he was appointed Chaplain to Edward VI, and preached before the king at Westminster, who recommended Cranmer to give him the living of All-hallows, in London, which Knox declined, not choosing to conform to the English liturgy. On the accession of Queen Mary he went to Geneva, and next to Frankfort, where he took part with the English exiles, who opposed the use of the liturgy, but the other side prevailing, Knox returned to Geneva, and soon after went to Scotland. While engaged in the ministry, he received an invitation to return to Geneva, with which he complied, and in his absence the bishops passed sentence of death upon him, for heresy, against which he drew up an energetic appeal. In 1558 he published his treatise, entitled "The First Blast of the Trumpet against the Monstrous Regiment of Women," chiefly aimed at the cruel government of Queen Mary, of England, and at the attempt of the Queen Regent of Scotland to rule without a parliament. In April, 1559, he would have visited England, but was prevented by the resentment felt by Elizabeth at his late treatise. He therefore proceeded directly to Scotland, where he found a persecution of the Protestants just ready to commence, at Stirling.

"His appearance at Edinburgh," says Prof. S. J. Wilson, "as sudden and unexpected as the appearance of Elijah at Samaria, created among his enemies as great a panic as though it had been the invasion of a hostile army. Although under sentence of outlawry, and liable at any hour to be arrested and executed, Knox resolved to stand with his brethren at Stirling, and share their dangers and their fate; "by life, by death, or else by both, to glorify God." But from this threatened danger the Lord preserved both him and them. Amidst the throes of incipient civil war, and in verification of his own prediction while a galley slave, he returned to St. Andrew's. The archbishop peremptorily forbade his preaching in the cathedral, and threatened that in case he should dare to do so he would be shot down in the pulpit, by the soldiers. In defiance of the archbishop's threat, and in spite of the remonstrances of his friends, he yet preached.

The effects and results of Knox's preaching at this time were marvelous. In the three days at St. Andrew's—the primal See of Scotland—Popery was utterly overthrown, the Reformed worship was set up, images and pictures were torn from the churches and monasteries were demolished. Knox's doctrine was as fatal to Popish superstition as the fire which ran along the ground, in the plague of the hail, was fatal to the vegetable gods of Egypt. Wheresoever that doctrine went, and it ran very swiftly, Popish power and Popish idolatry, with all the paraphernalia thereof, melted before it. In less than a month after his triumphal appearance at St. Andrew's, Knox's voice was ringing among the rafters of St. Giles and of the Abbey Church, at Edinburgh. Chosen at once as pastor of St. Giles, he entered upon his labors in that church, which his name has made historic throughout the world, and where so often "his voice, in an hour, put more life into men than six hundred trumpets could."

By the arrival of Queen Mary Stuart at Edinburgh (August, 1561), our Reformer was engaged in a new conflict. The young and beautiful Queen was received by her subjects with hurrahs. But she brought from France a spirit steeped in the prejudices of the Romish Church, and a resolution, formed in concert with the House of Lorraine, to restore the old religion in her dominions. Knox was summoned to an interview with the Queen. She charged him, says Dr. MacCrie, "with stirring up her subjects against her, and among other things, upbraided him with sedition, by reason of his book on women's government." He vindicated himself from the charge of disloyalty. The conversation then turned on the nice point of popular resistance to civil power. Knox maintained that a ruler might be resisted, illustrating by the case of a father who, through madness, tried to slay his children. "Now, Madame, if the children arise, join together, apprehend the father, take the sword from him, bind his hands, and keep him in prison till the frenzy be over, think you, Madame, that the children do any wrong? Even so, Madame, is it with princes that would murder the children of God that are subject unto them." Dazed by the boldness of this answer, the Queen sat some time in silent stupor, and then said, "Well, then, I perceive that my subjects shall obey you, and not me, and will do what they please, and not what I command." "God forbid," replied the Reformer, "that ever I take upon me to command any to obey me, or to set subjects at liberty to do whatever pleases them. But my travail is that both princes and subjects may obey God. Queens should be nursing mothers to the Church." "But you are not the Church that I will nourish," said the Queen. "I will defend the Church of Rome, for it is, I think, the true Church of God." "Your will, Madame, is no reason, neither doth your thought make the Roman harlot to be the true and immaculate spouse of Jesus Christ." "My conscience is not so," said the Queen. "Conscience, Madame, requires knowledge, and I fear that right knowledge you have none."

"But I have both heard and read." "So, Madame, did the Jews who crucified Christ. Have you heard any teach but such as the Pope and the Cardinals have allowed? You may be assured that such will speak nothing to offend their own estate." "You interpret the Scriptures in one way," said the Queen, evasively, "and they in another; whom shall I believe, and who shall be judge?" "You shall believe God," replied Knox, "who plainly speaketh in his Word, above your Majesty and the most learned Papists of all Europe." He offered to show that Papal doctrine had no foundation in God's Word. "Well," said she, "you may perchance have opportunity therefor sooner than you think." "Assuredly," said Knox,

"if ever I get that in my life, I shall get it sooner than I believe, for the ignorant Papist cannot patiently reason, and the learned and crafty Papist will never come in your audience, Madame, to have the ground of his religion searched out." During this interview with the Queen and her attendant lords, on being questioned concerning his contumacy, Knox answered that he preached nothing but truth, and he dared not preach less. "But," answered one of the lords, "our commands must be obeyed, on pain of death; silence, or the gallows is the alternative." The spirit of Knox was roused by the dastardly insinuation that any human punishment could make him desert the banner of his Saviour, and with that fearless, indescribable courage which disdains the pomp of language or of action, he firmly replied, "My lords, you are mistaken if you think you can intimidate me to do by threats what conscience and God tell me I never shall do, for be it known unto you that it is a matter of no importance to me, when I have finished my work, whether my bones shall bleach in the winds of heaven or rot in the bosom of the earth." Knox having retired, one of the lords said to the Queen, "We may let him alone, for we cannot punish that man."

Knox was twice married. His first wife, who died in her twenty-seventh or twenty-eighth year, was Marjory Bowes, the daughter of Richard Bowes, a Captain of Norman Castle, and a scion of a family of distinction in Northumberland. His second marriage (1563), was to a lady considerably younger than himself, Margaret Stewart, daughter of Andrew Lord Stewart of Ochiltree.

During his ministry at Edinburgh our Reformer lived not only a very laborious life, being much engrossed with the public affairs of the nascent Church, and at the same time devoted to his work as a parish minister, to say nothing of his continual, and perhaps, in his position, unavoidable controversies, more or less personal, with the ecclesiastical and political factions of the day, whom he regarded as his own and his country's enemies; but a life not without its social and family enjoyments. He had a fair stipend of four hundred merks Scots, equal to about forty-four pounds of English money of that day, and the value of which may be computed, when it is stated that the amount was considerably higher than that of the salaries of the Judges of the Court of Session in Scotland, and not much lower than those of the English Judges of the same times. Then he had a good house, which was provided and kept in repair by the municipality; a house previously occupied by the Abbot of Dunfermline. The house is still preserved, with little change, and forms a memorial, hitherto the only memorial of the great Reformer in the scene of so many of his labors. Nor was he, with all his severity of temper, a man indisposed, in those days, to exchange friendly and kindly relations with his neighbors, many of whom, in every rank, were among his intimate friends, or to give way, when the occasion fitted (perhaps even sometimes when it did not fit), to mirth and humor, of which, as of other traits of his character, his writings furnish abundant evidence.

An interesting description of Knox's appearance, and especially of his style as a preacher, in his later years, is furnished in the Diary of James Melville. Melville was at the time a student in St. Andrew's, and the period he refers to is the year 1571, when Knox, for his personal security, had, not for the first time in his life, taken refuge in that city. "Of all the benefits I had that year" (writes Melville), "was the coming of that most notable prophet and apostle of our nation, Mr. John Knox, to St. Andrew's, who, by the faction of the Queen occupying the castle and town of Edinburgh, was compelled to remove therefrom, with a number of the best, and chose to come to St. Andrew's. . . . Mr. Knox would sometimes come in and repose him in our college-yards, and call his scholars unto him, and bless us, and exhort us to know God and his work in our country, and stand by the good cause; to use our time well and learn the good instructions and follow the good example of our masters. . . . He was very weak. I saw him every day of his doctrine go hulle and fear, with a furring of martriks about his neck, a staff in the one hand, and good, godly Richard Balantyne, his servant, holding up the other oxtar, from the abbey to the parish church, and by the said Richard and another servant lifted up to the pulpit, where he behoved to lean at his first entry, but as he had done with his sermon, he was so active and vigorous that he was like to ding that pulpit in blads and fly out of it."

John Knox died November 24th, 1572. In his last illness, his speech beginning to fail, he desired his wife to read him the fifteenth chapter of the first epistle to the Corinthians. "Is not that a comfortable chapter?" said he. "Oh, what sweet and solutary consolation the Lord has afforded me from that chapter. Now, for the last time, I commend my soul, spirit and body (touching three of his fingers as he spoke the words) into Thy hand, O Lord." Then he said to his wife, "Read where I cast my first anchor." She read the seventeenth chapter of John's Gospel. He lay quiet for some hours. At ten o'clock they read the evening prayer, from the "Directory of Worship." When they asked him whether he heard the prayers, he replied, "Would to God that you and all men had heard them as I have heard them. I praise God for that heavenly sound." About eleven o'clock he gave a deep sigh and said, "Now it is come." His faithful servant, Richard, saw that he was speechless, and wished him to give them a sign that he died in peace. Knox raised his hand, and signing twice, expired without a struggle. He was buried in St. Giles Churchyard, Edinburgh, several lords attending the funeral services. By reason of changes which have since occurred, in the middle of a paved street in that city, the passer-by now reads, upon a square stone, this inscription:—

Beneath that spot over which now trundles the commerce of a great city, were once laid the remains of him who "never feared the face of man."

the emphatic eulogium which the Earl of Morton pronounced when he saw the body of the illustrious dead committed to the grave.

Knox left many writings behind, some of them polemic, others practical, the majority suggested by occurrences in his life. His principal work was "History of the Reformation of Religion within the Realm of Scotland," etc., to the fourth edition of which are appended all his other works.

The character of this great man was such as must ever command the respect and admiration of all who love the truth, and can appreciate moral heroism. Though austere, he was not fierce or revengeful; though decided in his purposes, and bold, strong and unflinching in action, he yet overflowed with the milk of human kindness. He has been called the intrepid Reformer, and that character he unquestionably deserves. In personal intrepidity and popular eloquence he resembled Luther. His doctrinal sentiments were those of Calvin, and like Zuinglius, he felt an attachment to the principles of religious liberty. His influence in the great work of the Reformation was "mighty, through God." He was known and beloved by the principal persons among the Reformed in France, Switzerland and Germany, and the affectionate veneration in which his memory was held in Scotland, after his death, evinced that the influence he possessed among his countrymen, during his life, was not constrained, but founded on the high opinion which they entertained. Banatyne thus delineates the character of Knox: "In this manner departed this man of God, the light of Scotland, the comfort of the Church within the same, the mirror of godliness, and pattern and example to all true ministers, in purity of life, soundness of doctrine, and boldness in reproving wickedness; one that cared not for the favor of men, how great soever they were."

Knox, Henry M., fourth son of John J. and Sarah A. Knox, was born in Augusta, Oneida county, N. Y. Graduated at Hamilton College, Clinton, New York, with class of 1851. Commenced banking business in Bank of Vernon, New York, and afterward with the Merchants' Bank, Wall street, New York city. Removed, in 1857, to St. Paul, Minn., and, with the present Comptroller of the Currency, engaged in the banking business. Was afterward Cashier of the First National Bank of St. Paul. On the establishment of the State office of "Public Examiner," he was appointed by the Governor, April 29d, 1878, as first incumbent of the new office, which he still holds, by reappointment. This office combines with the usual duties of Bank Examiner the supervision, also, of the State and eighty county treasuries, and of the financial operations of the several public educational, charitable, penal and reformatory institutions of the State of Minnesota. Was chosen ruling elder of the House of Hope Presbyterian Church, St. Paul, in 1858, and is active in many religious and charitable societies of the city and State. Was delegate to the Pan-Presbyterian Council at Edinboro, in 1877, and has been several times Chairman of the Mileage Committee of the General Assembly.

Knox, Rev. John, son of Joseph and Janet Knox, was born July 6th, 1799, at Leesburg, Va. He was prepared for college in his native town; studied theology at Princeton, and was licensed by the Presbytery of Winchester, October 18th, 1823. For several years after leaving Princeton he preached in the Valley of Virginia, and in some of the lower counties. For eight months, in 1826, he was stated supply to the Church at Washington, N. C., then for eighteen months teacher of a select school at Warrenton, N. C. From April, 1829, to April, 1831, he served the churches of Yellow Chapel and Greenwich, in Winchester Presbytery, and taught a select school near Warrenton, Va. Removing to Ohio, in 1834, he supplied Freeport Church from 1836 to 1838, the Church at Amsterdam from 1838 to 1840, and that of Deersville from 1840 to 1843. He was mainly instrumental in gathering a church at Harlem, and supplied it from 1843 until 1851. Subsequently he supplied other churches occasionally, for short terms. Mr. Knox died July 26th, 1880. He was an earnest and faithful laborer in the work of building up the Kingdom of Christ.

Knox, General John Jay, was born at Canajoharie, N. Y., March 18th, 1791, and brought up there. In 1811 he removed to Augusta, Oneida county, where he engaged in extensive and prosperous business. The thrift he showed imparted itself to his neighbors, and still more, his honesty and honor. Every good cause found him a supporter, in the community, particularly the Temperance reform, and he was brought into prominence in this latter in its operations throughout the State. A pillar in the church at his home, he gave constantly, as the Lord prospered him, to the schemes of the Church at large, and never, until death removed him (January 31st, 1876), was he absent from the chair of the Oneida County Bible Society, over which he was chosen to preside, by annual elections, for forty years. Buoyant and energetic, and shrewd, he was simple as a child, and as innocent and pure, attracting universal respect and confidence and regard by his spotless character and unblemished life, and by his cordiality of manner and kindness of heart. His religion pervaded him, and while kept, by it, unspotted from the world, it took him always to his place, and prepared him for his part at social exercises, made him a devout priest at his family altar, and a Christian head of his household, bringing up his children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord, all of whom it was his privilege and joy to welcome to a membership of the Church. General Knox was a Trustee of Hamilton College from 1828 to 1876, for thirty years chairman of the Board; and missed but two of its ninety-eight meetings during that space.

Knox, William E., D. D., was born in 1820. His birthplace was Knoxboro, N. Y., where his family has been well known and influential. He was a graduate of Hamilton College, and pursued his theological studies at Auburn Theological Seminary. His first pastorate was at Watertown, N. Y., where he remained four years, and which he left to become pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Rome, N. Y. Here he remained for twenty-two years, and was a very efficient and useful pastor. In the year 1869 he accepted a call to the First Presbyterian Church in Elmira, and there his ministry was a most active and fruitful one. He was a man of mark in any community in which he dwelt, a man of positive convictions, which he uttered fearlessly, and for which he was always ready to stand, with a resoluteness not easily shaken by popular changes. His influence was widely extended and was always exerted for good. He wrought well for God and humanity. As a pastor, he was equal to all demands; he could sympathize, comfort, instruct and encourage. As a friend, he was genial and cheerful, his speech often sparkling with wit. As a preacher or writer, he was always found a keen, able and uncompromising advocate of the right on all the moral and religious issues of the day. He never failed to make himself understood and felt. Amidst the discouragements incident to declining health, Dr. Knox held on to his work bravely, and preached his last sermon to his people on the last Sunday of June, 1883. A day or two after he went to Blue Mountain Lake, in the Adirondacks, where he died, on Monday afternoon, September 17th. His body was borne to his native place for burial.

Kollock, Rev. Henry, a son of Shepard Kollock, of Elizabethtown, N. J., spent three years after his graduation at Princeton College (1794), at his father's house, reviewing his college studies. He was appointed Tutor in the college in 1797, and in 1800 was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of New York, still holding his position as Tutor, and preaching to the congregation at Princeton, where his eloquence made a profound impression. After leaving the college, he became pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Elizabethtown, where he remained for three years. His fame was not confined to his own State. He received calls from many important churches. In 1803 the trustees of the college appointed him Professor of Theology, and the congregation of Princeton invited him to be their pastor. Accordingly, in the Autumn of that year he returned to Princeton in the double character of professor and pastor. But he was not permitted to remain here long. After repeated solicitations, he was prevailed on to accept a call from the Independent Presbyterian Church in Savannah, Ga., and in 1806 he removed to his new field of labor. In 1810 he declined a call to the presidency of the University of Georgia. While in Savannah his labors were abundant, especially among those ill with the yellow fever. He died December 29th, 1819. Dr. James W. Alexander says of Mr. Kollock, that he was "one of the most ornate yet vehement orators whom our country has produced."

Kollock, Shepard Kosciusko, D. D., was born at Elizabeth, N. J., June 25th, 1795. His father was an officer in the Revolutionary Army, and greatly admiring the personal and military character of the Polish leader Kosciusko, gave his name, together with his own, to his youngest son. He graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1812, with high honors. After studying theology with his brother-in-law, the Rev. John McDowell, and his brother, Dr. Henry Kollock, he was licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of South Carolina, in June, 1814. After preaching three years in South Carolina and Georgia, he received a call to the Church in Oxford, North Carolina, and was ordained by the Presbytery of Orange, May 2d, 1818, but he soon after accepted the appointment of Professor of Rhetoric and Logic in the University of North Carolina, and resigned the charge. In 1825 he became pastor of the Church in Norfolk, Va., and continued in it about ten years; he then returned to New Jersey, and for three years acted as agent for the Board of Domestic Missions. He then became pastor of the Church in Burlington till 1848, when he took charge of the Church in Greenwich, till, worn out with age and infirmity, he resigned and took up his abode in Philadelphia, in 1860.

Dr. Kollock was a successful minister of the gospel in all his charges, and a gentleman of culture of no common order. His "Hints on Preaching without Reading," and "Pastoral Reminiscences," were translated into French and published in Paris. He also contributed several valuable articles to the Princeton Review.

Krebs, John Michael, D. D., was born in Hagerstown, Md., May 6th, 1801; graduated at Dickinson College in September, 1827, and studied theology under the direction of the Rev. George Duffield, D. D., at Carlisle, Pa. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Carlisle, in October, 1829, and was installed pastor of the Rutgers Street Church, N. Y., November 12th, 1830. This was his only charge.

In 1837 Dr. Krebs was appointed Permanent Clerk of the General Assembly, and retained the office till 1845. In 1845 he was Moderator of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church. He was elected Clerk of the Presbytery and Synod of New York, in 1841, and Director of the Theological Seminary at Princeton, N. J., in 1842, and was appointed President of the Board in 1866. He was a member of the Board of Foreign Missions from its organization till his death. His published works consist of about a dozen occasional sermons, which are marked by great energy, perspicuity and precision.

Dr. Krebs was a man of rare gifts and of still more rare and varied acquirements, being learned not only in theology, but in the whole range of sciences, and his learning was all made to bear upon the work to which he had devoted his life, that of the gospel ministry. He was eminent as a preacher of the gospel, and still more eminent in the councils of the Church, being distinguished for his knowledge of ecclesiastical law, and his acquaintance with the ecclesiastical history of the Denomination to which he belonged. He was regarded as one of the highest living authorities in regard to Presbyterian usages. He died September 30th, 1867.

Laborie, James, a French Reformed or Huguenot minister. A native of Cardaillac, in the province of Guienne, France; he was graduated at the Academy of Geneva, 12th March, 1688, and was ordained to the gospel ministry in Zurich, Switzerland, 30th October, 1688. After officiating in several of the French churches in London, he came to America in 1699, and labored among the Indians, preaching also to the few families of French refugees settled at New Oxford, Worcester county, Mass. He was called, 10th September, 1704, to be the minister of the French Church in New York, but left in 1706. Afterwards he engaged in the practice of medicine and surgery, in Fairfield county, Connecticut, where he died, in Stratford, about the year 1731. Elias Nean speaks of him as "the unfortunate Laborie." His usefulness seems to have been much hindered by imprudence and wilfulness, if not by graver faults. As a physician, he seems to have been of some high repute.

Lacy, Rev. Drury, was born in Chesterfield county, Va., October 5th, 1758. For several years he taught a school, and also was Tutor in private families. At the age of about twenty-three he accepted the office of Tutor in Hampden-Sidney College, of which Rev. John Blair Smith was then President, but still pursued his own studies privately. He pursued his theological studies under President Smith, and was licensed by Hanover Presbytery in September, 1787, and ordained by the same Presbytery, in October, 1788.

In July, 1788, Mr. Smith, finding the united duties of president and pastor quite too laborious, asked to be excused from the former, and the trustees of the college, whilst desiring him still to continue his relation to the Institution, appointed Mr. Lacy Vice-President, devolving upon him a large part of the labor and responsibility. The next year Mr. Smith resigned the presidency altogether, and then the whole supervision of the Institution came upon Mr. Lacy. His connection with the college continued till the year 1796, when he tendered his resignation, and retired to a farm which he had purchased in the immediate neighborhood. Here he opened a small classical school, which he continued during the rest of his life. Among his pupils were many who became eminent men. He was Moderator of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, in the year 1809, and also served as Clerk of the Hanover Presbytery during a large part of his ministerial life. He died, in the exercise of the most serene trust in the mercy of God through Jesus Christ, on the 6th of December, 1815.

Mr. Lacy's preaching was simple and natural, and sometimes very eloquent. His prayers, especially in his latter years, were peculiarly fervent, and he seemed, like Abraham, the friend of God, most reverently and devoutly speaking, as if face to face to his Heavenly Father. He was uncommonly successful as a preacher to the colored people, and his addresses to them at the Lord's table were most simple and impressive, and often highly pathetic. In his private intercourse he was cheerful and sociable, but never lost sight of what was due from him, and due to him, as a Christian minister. He excelled in the art of conversing on the subject of experimental religion. A good old lady remarked that he exceeded any one she ever saw at a sacrament and at a wedding. When inquired of if he thought it was sinful to dance, he would say, "Be warmly engaged in religion, and then you may dance as much as you please." The recollection of him by friends, both in the pulpit and out of it, is most grateful and affectionate.

Ladd, Rev. Francis Dudley, was born at Hallowell, Maine; graduated with honor at Bowdoin College in 1841; studied theology at Bangor Seminary; was ordained as an evangelist by a Congregational Association, May 27th, 1846, and in the Autumn of the same year was installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Silver Lake, Pa. In 1851 he was installed pastor of the Penn Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, Pa., where he labored faithfully, earnestly, and steadfastly. He died July 7th, 1862. As a minister of Christ, Mr. Ladd was thoroughly imbued with the spirit of his office, and ardently devoted to his work. His refinement of feeling, gentlemanly bearing and fidelity in duty drew from every one that knew him respect as well as affection. His end was peace. Knowing that his hour was come, he was content and happy, sinking to rest in the fullness of perfect faith and love.

Lafayette College, at Easton, Pa., under the control of the Synod of Philadelphia, was chartered in 1826, and fully organized in 1832, with the usual classical course of study preparatory to the learned professions. The Pardee Scientific Department was added in 1866, through the munificence of Mr. Ario Pardee, of Hazleton, whose gifts for this purpose amount to nearly $500,000.

The college has seven dormitories, four of them, known as students' homes, having also families residing in them, and providing board and a home for such as desire it. It has five buildings of instruction and manipulation. Pardee Hall, built and fitted up for the Scientific Department, at a cost of $250,000, was dedicated in 1873. It was burned on the evening of June 4th, 1879, but was rebuilt on the same site, of the same dimensions and external appearance. The arrangement of the interior has been much improved, as experience with the former building suggested. In determining what rooms were needed, and the best arrangement of them, similar buildings in Europe, as well as in this country, were carefully studied, and liberal provision has been made, in all the departments of instruction, for every aid which has been devised for the most thorough and attractive teaching, and also for the prosecution of original researches.

The reopening was celebrated with appropriate ceremonies, by a great concourse, on the 30th of November, 1880. An assembly so distinguished has rarely gathered in honor of any educational foundation in this country. His Excellency, Rutherford B. Hayes, President of the United States, with members of his cials, the reference books most frequently needed in each study are kept for constant use. The classes in the first two years are kept in small divisions; and short lessons are thoroughly learned, and accompanied by many exercises of practice and elementary explanation, often repeated. In the last two years there is more attempt to stimulate general investigation, and to communicate advanced thought and methods, by lectures, and by requiring the preparation of essays of research. It now offers six courses, of four years each: namely, classical, scientific, engineering, mining and metallurgy, and chemistry, leading to the degrees of Bachelor of Arts, Bachelor of Science, Bachelor of Philosophy, Civil Engineer, and Mining Engineer.

Partial courses may also be taken, and opportunities are afforded for post-graduate study. A three years' post-graduate course leads to the Degree of

LAFAYETTE COLLEGE (SOUTH), EASTON, PA.

Cabinet, the General of the Army, and the Commissioner of Education, his Excellency, Henry M. Hoyt, Governor of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, the State Superintendent of Education, the Moderator of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, and the Moderator of the Synod of Philadelphia, with many others eminent in Church and State, took part in the addresses of thanks, and congratulation to the founder of the hall and the friends of the college. The chemical laboratories and those of mining and metallurgy, mechanics and physics are of the best. The department of natural history contains the most complete collection of the plants of Pennsylvania in existence.

The college has libraries of over twenty thousand volumes, and is especially rich in the department of Anglo-Saxon and early English. It maintains a reading-room, in which, besides papers and periodicals, the reference books most frequently needed in each study are kept for constant use. The cost of tuition is from $45 to $75 per year. In 1882-3 there were 24 instructors and 289 students in the academic departments. The college has been honorably associated with the progress of meteorological science, through the labors of Prof. J. H. Coffin, LL.D., by whom the Government observations and the collections of the Smithsonian Institution have been here reduced and prepared for publication; also, since the election of Prof. F. A. March, LL.D., 1855, with the study of Anglo-Saxon and English, in connection with comparative philology and history, in which it has been a leader. Since 1865 it has also become a centre of scientific and technical study for the coal and iron districts of Pennsylvania and New Jersey. The presidents of the college have been as follows: the Rev. George Junkin, D.D., LL.D., 1832-41, and again in 1841-8; the Rev. J. W. Yeomans, D.D., 1841-4; the Rev. C. W. Nassau, D.D., 1819; the Rev. D. V. McLean, D.D., 1850-7; the Rev. G. W. McPhail, D.D., 1857-63; the Rev. William C. Cattell, D.D., LL. D., appointed October 15th, 1863, and the present incumbent, Rev. J. H. Mason Knox, D.D., appointed in 1883.

PARDEE HALL, LAFAYETTE COLLEGE, EASSTON, PA.

Laird, Francis, D.D., graduated at Dickinson College during the presidency of Dr. Nisbet. He became the pastor of the churches of Plum Creek and Pike Run, in the Presbytery of Redstone, Pa., in 1800, where he continued until 1831, when he resigned this charge and accepted a call for the whole of his time, to the Church of Murryville, Pa. Here he continued closely and lovingly devoted to the pastoral duties of his charge, till 1850, when he resigned, on account of the infirmities of old age. He died April 6th, 1851. Dr. Laird was a man of studious habits through life, well learned, especially inclined to biblical criticism, and well qualified for it. Even to the last days of his life, his supreme delight was the study of the sacred Scriptures in the original tongues. When his eyes had become dimmed, so that he could no longer read with the subdued light of his room, he would stand out of doors in the sun, its light blazing full on the page of the Hebrew Bible spread before him, while with quivering finger he essayed to follow the words of the Holy Book.

Lamar, Rev. Thomas J., was born in Jefferson county, East Tennessee, November 21st, 1826. His father, William Lamar, was a farmer. He graduated at Maryville College, Blount county, East Tennessee, in 1818; then studied theology nearly two years under the Rev. Dr. Anderson; entered Union Theological Seminary, in New York city, in 1850, and completed there the theological course in 1852. In May of the same year he was licensed by the Presbytery of Brooklyn, and went as a Home Missionary to Platte county, Mo., where, and in Andrew county, he spent five years preaching and teaching, having been ordained by the Presbytery of Lexington, Mo., in May, 1854. In 1856 he was chosen, by the Synod of Tennessee, to the Professorship of Sacred Literature in the Theological Department of Maryville College, and entered upon its duties in 1857. This position he filled acceptably till the suspension of the work of the college by the civil war, in April, 1861, during the progress of which he preached stately to the Clover Hill and Forest Hill churches, in that county, and, more or less, to other vacant churches, with ability and fidelity. At the close of the war he was the only Professor remaining on the ground, and, by order of the Synod of Tennessee, he reopened the college for instruction, in September, 1866. From that day to the present, Professor Lamar, with very commendable zeal and gratifying success, has given his time, strength and life to the advancement of the interests of this venerable and much-needed Institution of Christian learning.

Landis, Robert Wharton, D.D., son of Samuel Calvin Landis, a descendant of the old Huguenot family of Calvin, was born in Philadelphia, January 8th, 1809. His maternal grandfather was a German. He made a profession of religion and joined the Church of his parents (Baptist), at the age of seventeen; joined the Presbyterian Church at twenty; was licensed December, 1831, and ordained 1832. Beginning his studies for the ministry at the age of seventeen, he found himself able so to outstrip his fellow-students that the prescribed courses and times of educational institutions were a hindrance rather than a help. Fifteen months in an academy and three months with a private teacher composed his education proper. All his great attainments as a scholar were by private study, while also engaged in preaching, lecturing and writing for the press. His labors as a pastor or supply extended from 1831 to 1861, and from 1865 to 1868. For one year, 1868-69, he held a professorship in Danville Theological Seminary. His pastorates were, 1835, at Providence and Norristown, Pa.; 1839, Allentown, Pa.; 1842, Bethlehem, N. J.; 1849, Hillsdale, N. Y.; 1852, Greenville, N. Y.; 1853, Paterson, N. J.; 1856, Ionia, Mich.; 1860, Somerset, Ky.; 1867, Wilmington, Del. At each of these places, and at others where he labored for short periods, his preaching was attended with the conversion of large numbers. He was distinguished as an author, teacher and preacher, and his name will stand among those of great men in the Church. Dr. Landis died at his residence in Danville, Ky., January 24th, 1883.

Lane, Rev. Cornelius Rutser, Ph. D., was born at Pluckamin, N. J., June 27th, 1820, and graduated at Lafayette College in 1843, after which he engaged for a time in teaching. He studied theology at Princeton Seminary, and was ordained an evangelist by the Presbytery of Luzerne, November 30th, 1848. He was stated supply at Tunkhannock, Pa., 1848-51; principal of the academy at Wyoming, 1851-2; agent for Lafayette College, 1852; stated supply at Warren, 1852-3; pastor at Tunkhannock, 1853-71; superintendent of common schools in Wyoming county, 1854-56, 1870-71. Since 1871 he has been Professor in Wilson College, Chambersburg, Pa. In all his fields of labor he has been diligent and useful, and enjoyed the respect of the community.

Lane, Hon. George William, was born in Putnam county, N. Y., in 1818, and died in New York city, January 1st, 1884. At the age of fourteen he was put in the employ of Bettner & Wright, provision merchants, New York. Subsequently he was actively engaged in business life. His business push and enterprise won him friends, and in 1840 he became a partner of David Hustace, under the firm name of Hustace & Lane. Mr. Hustace died in 1811, and Mr. Lane became a member of the firm of Craig & Lane. In 1863 Mr. Lane gave his whole attention to the tea trade, forming the present firm of George W. Lane & Co. During Mayor Havemeyer's term of office Mr. Lane was appointed City Chamberlain, a position he did not resign until after Mr. Havemeyer's death. In the Spring of 1883 he was made one of the Aqueduct Commission, his name being incorporated in the bill establishing it. In May, 1883, he was made President of the Chamber of Commerce. In addition to minor public responsibilities and duties, he was at the time of his death President of the Board of Trustees of the Presbyterian Hospital, and a Director in the Society for the Promotion of the Gospel among Seamen. Mr. Lane was a member of the Madison Square Presbyterian congregation.

Lane Theological Seminary. In 1828 Mr. Ebenezer Lane and his brother, members of a Baptist church in New Orleans, offered funds to aid their brethren at Cincinnati in founding a theological school. The way was not clear for the Baptists to undertake the work. The offer was made to the Presbyterians, who accepted it, and in October, 1828, formed an association for "establishing a seminary of learning, the primary object of which shall be to educate pious young men for the gospel ministry." The name of Mr. Lane was given to it, and when he protested, the reply was that the Institution was so named in the charter (1829), and a change could not readily be made.

In January, 1829, sixty acres of land, and subsequently part of forty more, on Walnut Hills (now in Cincinnati), were donated to the Seminary by "Mr. Elnathan Kemper, and other members of that family who bear the honored name of the pioneer Presbyterian preacher, who was ordained and installed as pastor of the first Presbyterian Church at Cincinnati, in 1792, and was sent over from Kentucky under an armed escort, to protect him from the tomahawk of the savages." On this land there was already "a well-finished academy, with a good frame dwelling-house by it." This classical school was maintained until 1831 as a preparatory department of the Seminary. Scholarships and endowments were not abundant in the year 1829, when the Trustees "Resolved that the students in the Lane Seminary be required to labor three hours daily until further directed." But, then, they were impartial in their requirements, for October 1st, 1832, it was "resolved, that every teacher in the Lane Seminary be required to labor as regularly as possible, and, when practicable, daily." Such rules are simply reminders of a past age, when the attempt was made to maintain colleges on "the manual labor plan."

In 1832 the Theological Department was organized, with Dr. Lyman Beecher, of Boston, in the Chair of Theology; Rev. Thomas J. Biggs, of Frankford, Pa., in that of Church History, and Rev. Calvin E. Stowe, who resigned a Professorship of Languages, in Dartmouth College, to take that of Biblical Literature, in this Seminary. Dr. Beecher expressed the spirit of these founders when he said: "To plant Christianity in the West is as grand an undertaking as it was to plant it in the Roman Empire, with unspeakably greater permanence and power."

The names of the Professors, deceased and living, are: Of Theology, Lyman Beecher, 1832-50; D. Howe Allen, 1851-67; Henry A. Nelson, 1867-74; Edward D. Morris, 1874. Of Church History, Thomas J. Biggs, 1832-38; Llewellyn J. Evans, 1863-67; Edward D. Morris, 1867-74; Zephaniah M. Humphrey, 1875-81; John DeWitt, 1882. Of Biblical Literature and Exegesis, Calvin E. Stowe, 1832-50; George E. Day, 1851-66; Elisha Ballantine, 1866-67; Llewellyn J. Evans, 1867; Thomas E. Thomas, 1871-75; Henry P. Smith, 1876. Of Sacred Rhetoric, Baxter Dickinson 1835-39; D. Howe Allen, 1840-51; Jonathan B. Condit, 1851-54; Henry Smith, 1855-79, and James Eells, 1879. Since January, 1882, Dr. Robert W. Patterson, of Chicago, has been Permanent Lecturer on Apologetics and Christian Evidences. (For sketches of several of these Professors see their names in this work.)

"The Board of Trustees of this Institution numbered twenty-three at the first—twenty-five is now the limit—a majority of whom is necessary to constitute a quorum. It is what is called a close corporation, and fills its own vacancies. It also elects the Professors, as do all the other theological seminaries of our reunited Church, and can remove them, for cause, subject, in both cases, to a veto from the General Assembly."

The first buildings have given way to those which are thus described: "The new Seminary Hall, erected in the centre of the campus, by the liberality of a few friends of the Seminary, was dedicated December 18th, 1879. It contains a chapel, three class-rooms, a Faculty room and a gymnasium. It is heated by steam and properly ventilated. No building of its class is better adapted to the purposes for which it was erected. Smith Library Hall was erected in 1863. The remaining buildings of the Seminary are the boarding hall and five dwellings, occupied by Professors."

The present endowment is estimated at $465,000. It is made up of the general fund, represented by buildings and grounds, partly devoted to seminary use, and partly rented for income; by leases yielding ground-rent, and by bonds and mortgages yielding interest. The special funds are: library funds, $9,600; scholarships, $15,000, and others, $10,620.

Since 1833 Lane has had 760 students, of whom 412 received diplomas, as graduates. Seventy per cent. of them were graduates of colleges. Of them 46 have been, or are, foreign missionaries. It seems also that more than half of the graduates of Lane have been, at some time, Home Missionaries.

The term of study commences on the second Thursday in September, and continues thirty-four weeks, closing the second Thursday in May. Tuition and rooms are free. The Faculty state that "while the several courses of study are so arranged that each Professor gives instruction, during some portion of each term, to each of the three classes; the first year is devoted especially to linguistic and Biblical studies, including Scripture geography and history; the second, to systematic theology, ecclesiastical history and homiletics; and the third to pastoral theology, methods in mission work, and church polity. The exegetical study of the Scriptures is continued throughout the course."

At the semi-centennial celebration, in 1879, these were the words of a former student and now eminent educator, "God bless Lane Seminary—be it ever her mission to help men to know Christ, to live Christ, to preach Christ, and to die in Christ; for that is the world's need."

Lansing, Dirk Cornelius, D. D., was born in Lansingburg, N. Y., March 3d, 1785. He graduated from Yale College in 1804. For more than fifty years he preached the gospel with inimitable grace of person and speech and magnetic power, performing revival pastorates at Onondaga, Auburn, and Utica, N. Y., in the Houston Street Church, New York city, and the Clinton Street Church, Brooklyn, incessantly answering the summons for special sermons and protracted meetings elsewhere. A child in his naturalness and affectionateness, he was born to command, and led sacramental hosts.

"Dr. Lansing," said Lewis Gaylord Clark, "was the first really live preacher I ever heard, and the most electrically eloquent preacher I ever heard, Bascom alone excepted. Everything spoke. His long, slender figure, the graceful sweep of his arm, the flash of his black eye, the winning tones of his voice, all combined to rivet attention and compel admiration. In gesture he was excelled only by Henry Clay. He read a hymn with more effect than any minister I ever heard. Sometimes, in giving one out, he would pause, lay the book on the pulpit cushion, and comment on what he had read. Well I remember his pausing in this way at the verse,

"When I survey the wondrous cross
On which the Prince of glory died,"

His remarks upon it, though brief, were a sermon, and replete with tenderness and deep feeling."

Dr. Lansing was a Trustee of Auburn Seminary, 1820-30 and 1835-57; Vice-President of the Board of Trustees, 1820-24; Professor of Sacred Rhetoric and Pastoral Theology, 1821-26; he served without salary, and, as financial agent, raised large sums for the seminary. He published "Sermons on Important Subjects," 1825. His death occurred at Walnut Hills, O., March 19th, 1857.

Lapsley, James Woods, Esq., was born at Nashville, Tenn., December, 1835, and is the son of Rev. R. A. Lapsley, D. D., and of his wife, Catharine Rutherford Walker, the latter a descendant of Samuel Rutherford, one of the Scotch members of the Westminster Assembly. He united with the Church in 1852, was made deacon in 1855 and ruling elder in 1866. He was admitted to the Bar in 1857, but retired from the practice in 1879, and settled at Vine Hill, Ala., where he has been chiefly instrumental in organizing a church, and where he labors zealously in Sabbath-school instruction and conducting religious services, having been designated to such work by his Presbytery. Much of his time is given to the religious instruction of the colored people. He is an earnest, able and useful laborer in the vineyard of the Master.

His eminent qualifications for usefulness are called into requisition both by Church and State. He is a director of Columbia Seminary and also a member of the executive committee of the Tuscaloosa Institute for training colored ministers. He has recently been appointed to inspect the books and accounts of all the public officers of the State of Alabama.

Larned, Benjamin F., was born in Massachusetts, and entered the army as ensign in 1813; rose at once to the rank of first lieutenant; served with honor at the battle of Fort Erie, and for his gallant conduct was made a captain. Afterwards he was made Paymaster General, and served the country in that capacity for many years, with rare fidelity. He was elected and ordained an elder in August, 1833, in the First Presbyterian Church of Detroit, Mich., where a large part of his official life was spent, and carried with him the love and esteem of the entire community on his removal to Washington City, where he died, September 6th, 1862, lamented by a large circle of friends, civil and military.

Larned, Sylvester, Rev., whose career was scarcely less splendid or less brief than that of a meteor, was born in Pittsfield, Mass., August 31st, 1796. The earliest developments of his mind conveyed no equivocal evidence of both brilliancy and power. In 1810 he entered Williams College, and the next year was transferred to Middlebury College, where he graduated in 1813, and on the occasion delivered an oration on "The Fall of Poland," which marked the highest order of intellect, and elicited the most intense admiration. He was engaged for some time as a teacher in Pittsfield, with great popularity and success. In November, 1814, he entered the Theological Seminary at Princeton, where he was quickly marked as a young man of great power and promise, and was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of New York, April 17th, 1817. His first appearance in the pulpit astonished all who had not previously witnessed the exhibition of his wonderful powers.

On January 23d, 1818, he reached New Orleans, whither he consented to go as a coadjutor to his friend, the Rev. Elias Cornelius, who had undertaken a mission to the South, partly to enlist public attention to our Indian tribes, and partly and especially to ascertain the moral condition of the city just named. Immediately after his arrival there, Mr. Larned commenced his public labors, and it seemed as if the first sound of his voice thrilled, not only through the length and breadth, but to the innermost heart of the city. Provision was made at once for erecting a new and splendid church, and the individuals engaged in the enterprise presented him a call to become their pastor, which he accepted. In April he started for the North, principally to complete the arrangements, already partially made, for the building of his church, and returned to New Orleans the following December. The finished building was dedicated, July 4th, 1819. He remained at his post during the sickly season in the Summer, under the conviction that it was his duty to do so, was seized with the fever, and died, August 31st, the day which completed his twenty-fourth year.

Mr. Larned, in his whole character, bore the unequivocal stamp of greatness. He was eminently qualified, by both his intellectual and moral constitution, for great enterprises. It was in the pulpit, however, that he earned his highest laurels. It was as a preacher of the gospel, that he towered to such a surprising height. His voice was unrivaled, in both melody and flexibility, and accommodated itself with perfect accuracy to the sentiment which he uttered. There was a solemnity, an earnestness, and sometimes an all-subduing pathos; there was the soul kindling in the eye and beaming through the countenance; there was a grace and appropriateness of gesticulation, and an incomparable majesty pervading the whole manner, all of which combined constituted him, no doubt, one of the first pulpit orators of the age.

Latta, Rev. James, was born at Chestnut Level, Lancaster county, Pa., June 10th, 1787. He pursued his studies, both classical and theological, under his brother, John, at New Castle, Del., although he spent a short time at the College of New Jersey. He was licensed by the Presbytery of New Castle in 1809, and ordained by the same, April 3d, 1811. His first charge was the Upper Octorara congregation, Chester county, Pa., where he remained until October 1st, 1850. Soon after, he built up a new church at Penningtonville, in the same county, where he was installed, November 11th, 1852, and which he continued to serve until June 1st, 1861. He died, May 30th, 1862.

Mr. Latta was a man of great activity and energy, impulsive, given to hospitality, very friendly, social, genial, witty and conversable. As a preacher, his sermons were off-hand and familiar, but had many striking thoughts, were sound and solid, and dealt plainly with sinners. As a pastor, he was faithful, attentive to the young, the sick and afflicted, and very earnest in hunting up wanderers, and persuading people to attend upon the means of grace. He was ready in argument, shrewd in silencing errorists, stood up for the Sabbath, and enforced its observance, and contended earnestly with Romanism and infidelity. He was a warm-hearted minister. He loved his brethren, his Presbytery, his Church, his country, and above all, he loved his Saviour.

Latta, James, D. D., was born in Ireland, in the Winter of 1732. His parents migrated to this country when he was about six or seven years of age. He graduated at the College of Philadelphia (now the University of Pennsylvania), at the first Commencement of this Institution, and as a proof of his high standing there, had assigned to him, on that occasion, the salutatory oration in Latin. He was Tutor in the college for a few years, during which he studied theology under the Provost, Rev. Dr. Francis Alison, and was licensed to preach the gospel, February 15th, 1758, by the Presbytery of Philadelphia. He was ordained by the same Presbytery in October, 1759, and, by direction of Synod, spent some time in a mission to the then destitute settlements of Virginia and Carolina.

Mr. Latta was installed pastor of the congregation of Deep Run, in Bucks county, Pa., in 1761, the charge of which he resigned in 1770. On the second Tuesday of November, 1771, he became pastor of the church of Chestnut Level, in Lancaster county, Pa. In connection with this pastorate, and to aid in his support, he established a school, which was acquiring celebrity when its progress was arrested by the breaking out of the Revolutionary war. Subsequently, the Principal of a school in the bounds of the congregation having been suddenly killed by a stroke of lightning, Mr. Latta was constrained to take charge of the school for a few years, and in it several distinguished men were educated. So deep was his interest in the cause of American liberty, that once, in the course of the war, when an unusual number of his people were drafted to serve in the militia, with a view to encourage them, he took his blanket and knapsack, like a soldier, and actually accompanied them on their campaign. At another time he served for a while in the army, as a Chaplain.

Dr. Latta labored on in the ministry until very near the close of life. He died January 29th, 1801. As a teacher, he was remarkably well qualified. Without severity, he had the faculty of governing well, making his students both fear and love him. As a scholar, too, he had few equals; his erudition was general and profound. As a man, he was truly amiable and upright. Possessing a very affectionate heart, he was a steady, sincere and faithful friend. His conversation was instructive and entertaining. As a Christian and minister, he was exemplary to a remarkable degree. He was an ornament to religion, and his uniform deportment was such as to recommend it to all who knew him. As a preacher, he maintained a high rank. His naturally strong and penetrating mind was well furnished by reading and study; his style of writing was accurate and vigorous, and his manner in the pulpit was grave and impressive. For upwards of forty years he labored faithfully in the vineyard of the Lord.

Latta, Rev. John Ewing, was the third son of the Rev. Dr. James Latta, of Chestnut Level, Lancaster county, Pa. He received ordination on the 13th of August, 1800, and was the pastor during the whole of his ministerial life, or over twenty-four years, of the united churches of New Castle and Christiana, in the State of Delaware. For a number of years he had charge of an academy at New Castle, and several distinguished men were educated by him. He was intelligent, exemplary and conscientious, attentive to the afflicted and the anxious, a man of enlarged views and liberal feelings, and a faithful, clear and instructive expounder of the Word of God. He served the General Assembly, for several years, as their Permanent Clerk, and was honored with other important offices in the Church. He died September, 26th, 1824. Mr. Latta published "A Serious and Affectionate Address to the Citizens of the United States, by a Society lately Established for the Suppression of Vice and Immorality," also, "An Affectionate and Earnest Address of a Minister to the People under his Care, on the Important Subject of Practical Religion, with Short and Easy Catechisms for Children," together with a number of occasional sermons.

Latta, William, D.D., was the second son of the Rev. James Latta, D. D., of Chestnut Level, Lancaster county, Pa. He was born in Bucks county, Pa., in May, 1769. In early life his attention was turned to agricultural pursuits, but afterwards he resolved to obtain a collegiate education. He graduated at the University of Pennsylvania, and taught for some time in that Institution. He studied theology with his father, in connection with two of his brothers. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, and in 1798 he was ordained and installed, by the same Presbytery, over the Great Valley Presbyterian Church, Chester county, Pa. In this church he continued till his death, which occurred in February, 1847, thus ministering to the same people for well nigh half a century.

Dr. Latta was an exemplary Christian, an able preacher, and a faithful pastor. He was a close student, and seldom entered his pulpit without thorough preparation. On all occasions he zealously and fearlessly declared the whole counsel of God. He was one of the founders of the Theological Seminary at Princeton, and acted for many years, with great fidelity, as a Director of that Institution. He was justly held in high esteem by his brethren in the ministry, and during the troublous times in the Church which resulted in its separation, he was selected by his Presbytery, for several consecutive years, as one of its Commissioners to the General Assembly. Dr. Latta's death was one of peculiar privilege. Like that of the devoted Payson, it was eminently triumphant. It was literally a translation from 'glory to glory.' A Memorial Sermon of him was preached by the Rev. John McDowell, D. D., and subsequently published.

Latta, Rev. William Wilson, a son of the Rev. Dr. William Latta, was born in Chester Valley, Pa., July 1st, 1810. He graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1831; studied theology at Princeton Seminary, and was ordained by the Presbytery of New Castle, in June, 1837. After being stated supply of the Presbyterian Church at Waynesburg, Chester county, Pa., for a few months, he was chosen its pastor in 1837, and continued so until 1858, when impaired health required the resignation of the charge. In this congregation he was greatly beloved, and his labors were signally blessed. During his pastorate, in addition to the steady growth of the church, it received large accessions to its membership as the fruit of several precious revivals, and the edifice in which the congregation now worships was erected.

After his resignation at Waynesburg, Mr. Latta, from regard to health, resided two Winters in the South, and supplied vacant pulpits, one of the Winters being spent in Goldsboro, N. C., where his labors were highly appreciated. For some ten years, from 1867, he was Principal of a flourishing Female Seminary, which he established in Walnut street, Philadelphia, and which continues to prosper. He died September 5th, 1883. He was a brother universally beloved for his affable, courteous, and benevolent spirit, an earnest and devoted Christian, an attractive and impressive preacher, and by his pulpit, his seminary and his example of fidelity in all duty, he wielded a large influence for the grand end to which his time and talents were consecrated.

Laughlin, James, Esq., was born in Belfast, Ireland, in 1806, and died in the city of Pittsburg, December 18th, 1882, where for many years he was an honored, exemplary and useful elder of the Presbyterian Church. Mr. Laughlin came to this country, and to that city, early in life, possessed of very limited means. He began his business life with the intention and purpose of making it a success. He planted himself on the sure foundations of integrity, honesty and frugality. He was satisfied with moderate gains, and was never tempted to indulge in visionary speculations. For fifty years or more he remained steadfast in his vocation, and never lost his allegiance to or residence in the city of his adoption, and during that period, by the accumulations and accretions of small gains at first, he advanced steadily forward until he had secured a great competency; but in all this time he never lost sight of the Saviour's admonition and teaching, "What is a man profited if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul?"

Mr. Laughlin, in this respect, built for himself a monument more enduring than granite. Its foundation-stones were laid in honor, religion and benevolence. As wealth increased his heart opened wider and wider to the claims which the gospel presses upon true believers. He was not niggardly in the bestowment of his gifts; his charities were unstinted and widespread, and given without grudging. For many years his affections were conspicuously welded to the interests of the Western Theological Seminary. For it he labored, prayed, and gave of his substance, and in the days of its perplexity and financial embarrassment his faith never failed him. His contributions to the funds of this Institution amount to about fifty thousand dollars, given at various times, and in the most unostentatious manner. He was also President of the Board of Trustees of the Pennsylvania Female College, from its foundation, in 1869, and one of its most liberal patrons.

JAMES LAUGHLIN, ESQ.

The experience of Mr. Laughlin's long and successful business life furnishes a notable example to young men, of what may be accomplished by an admixture of religion, an untarnished name and persevering industry, in the development of a true and noble character.

Laurie, James, D. D., the son of James and Marion Laurie, was born in Edinburgh, Scotland, February 11th, 1778. He received his entire education, literary, scientific and theological, at the University of Edinburgh, and was licensed to preach the gospel in 1800, it is believed, by the Associate Presbytery of Edinburgh. After preaching for about two years as a probationer in his native country, he consented, at the urgent request of the Rev. Dr. John M. Mason, who was then in Scotland, to migrate to the United States and enter the service of the Associate Reformed Church. A new congregation of this Denomination having been formed in Washington, D. C., he was installed its pastor in June, 1803.

For several years he preached in the old Treasury building, which was burned by the British in 1811. After much persevering labor, in connection with that of his little flock, he had the pleasure, early in 1807, to see a substantial, and for that day elegant, brick edifice opened for divine service. It was the second place of Protestant worship erected in the metropolis. In that building he continued to preach the unsearchable riches of Christ during a period of forty-six years. He and his congregation united with the General Assembly, at the time when a portion of the Associate Reformed Church formed a union with that Body.

In advanced life Dr. Laurie had three co-pastors—Rev. Ninian Bannatyne, 1815-18; Rev. Levi Christian, from March 11th, 1850, until the November following; and Rev. David X. Junkin (afterwards D. D.), who was installed June 17th, 1851, and continued his connection with the church till Dr. Laurie's death, which occurred April 18th, 1853. As a preacher, Dr. Laurie was quite above the ordinary standard. His discourses might generally be termed massive—compactly arranged, rich in thought, copious in argument and illustration, and almost invariably exhausting his theme. In his pastoral duties he was constant, faithful and affectionate, and his visitations to the sick and distressed were attended with deep sympathy and extraordinary gentleness and tenderness.

Laverty, Rev. William Willard, was born in Clearfield, Pa., June 15th, 1828. He graduated, with high honor, at Washington College, Pa., in 1849. He was ordained by the Presbytery of Steubenville, October 5th, 1853; was pastor at New Cumberland, Ohio, 1853-56; pastor at Big Spring, 1854-56; stated supply at Wellsville and East Liverpool, 1857-61; Principal at Morgantown, W. Va., 1861-65, where he died, October 28th, 1865. His labors at Wellsville and East Liverpool were greatly blessed of God. During his ministry here, which lasted seven years, both these churches enjoyed precious revivals. Through his untiring energy a heavy debt was lifted off the church at Wellsville, and thereafter he had the satisfaction of seeing it start forward in a new career of prosperity. Mr. Laverty was emphatically an earnest man. He devoted himself with untiring assiduity to whatever he undertook, and left a memory fragrant with the odor of piety, and blessed with many acts of self-denial and labor in the service of Christ.

Law, a definite commandment imposed on intelligent beings by competent authority. But the term is also extended to inanimate things, and then it implies a property or particular mode of sequence. Thus, the motions of the heavenly bodies are said to be in obedience to certain laws, often called laws of nature. No law can enforce itself. Compliance with it, and penalties in case of its infraction, depend upon the power of the lawgiver. We must therefore be careful not to regard a law as something apart from him who originally established it. The laws of nature are but the result of the Creator's will, the forms of His government, which could not hold a single moment, except through the continuing influence of His authority.

According to our notion of law, it is visible everywhere, for the sustentation and well-being of the whole framework of creation. It is thus that from causes flow corresponding effects. If we could imagine it otherwise, if, the causes being the same, the effects were different, from machinery so disorganized destruction must ensue. Hence, we may appreciate the fault of disobedience to moral laws; it disappoints the whole purpose of the creature's being, and must be followed by rectification or punishment. It is not without ample ground, then, that Hooker has said: "Of law there can be no less acknowledged than that her seat is the bosom of God, her voice the harmony of the world; all things in heaven and earth do her homage, the very least as feeling her care, and the greatest as not exempted from her power; but angels and men, and creatures of what condition soever, though each in different sort and manner, yet all with uniform consent, admiring her as the mother of their peace and joy."

Of physical laws, our knowledge is gathered from observation of their effects; results are laid together; and from the comparison the operation of the regulating law which governs them is deduced. From some natural effects, too, certain higher conclusions may be sometimes drawn; as when St. Paul shows that "by the things that are made" "the eternal power and Godhead" of the Deity might be seen (Rom. i, 20). But generally moral laws must be known from God Himself, either by some principle which He implants in the mind, as the natural conscience, or by the actual revelations which He makes. The word "law" is occasionally used in Scripture in a large sense, but more frequently, with the article prefixed, or other limitation, to express God's revealed will, especially that which was made known in the earlier dispensation, or that written in the Pentateuch. Hence "the law" occurs sometimes in a kind of opposition to that fuller display of the divine purpose manifested in Christ; e. g., "The law was given by Moses; but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ" (John i, 17; compare Gal. iii, 2, 5, 18).

By the deeds of the law it is repeatedly said no one is justified in God's sight (Rom. iii, 20, 28), because they are imperfect, and do not reach that exact conformity with the Divine will which is necessarily required; in men's sight, however, they do justify, as evidencing the principle which is working in the heart, without which evidence we cannot suppose that the principle exists (James ii, 14-26).

The law, as noted above, sometimes comprehensively signifies the whole of the Old Testament revelation, as where, in John x, 34, a Psalm (lxxxii, 6) is referred to under the name. But the code delivered by Moses is that more properly so termed, and it will be now examined. It is usual to distribute its provisions into moral, ceremonial, and political. This distinction, indeed, is not perfectly accurate; a ceremonial observance, for example, might have also a moral and political aspect. But similar objections would lie to every other mode of classification; it will therefore be adhered to here.

The moral law includes those precepts which regulate a man's conduct towards his Creator, and towards his fellow-creatures. It is embodied in the Ten Commandments, or words (so they are called in the original) delivered on Sinai (Exod. xx, 1-17), and repeated with no substantial difference by Moses (Deut. v, 6-21); and it has been condensed by our Lord into two emphatic sentences, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind;" "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself," (Matt. xxii, 37-40.) These are perfect laws; if really fulfilled, they would constitute a sufficient righteousness before God; their end and object is complete holiness of heart and life.

The ceremonial law prescribed the mode of Hebrew worship, and was, besides, constructed with an elaborate reference to the great gospel doctrines which should be at last fully revealed to mankind. In the performance of its rites intelligent devotion would be called forth, and men's minds prepared for future development. Suited for a present purpose, these rites were also shadows, with a definite relation to the substance which was to supersede them. They were types and figures of better things to come (Gal. iv, 3-5). They were connected with the moral law because, while that demanded undivided reverence to God, they showed how that reverence might be paid; and when the moral law was broken they held out the hope of reparation for the fault. They were connected with the political law; for they separated Israel from other nations, and with their sanctions were, so to speak, the framework of the theocracy.

The political law regulated the relations of man to man in society, exhibiting God in His theocratical aspect as the legislator and monarch of Israel, and constituted the statutes of His kingdom. These statutes were excellent, but in the nature of things they were not perfect. Their excellence consisted in their adaptation to the people to whom they were given. Human legislators are perfectly aware that it is necessary to educate men up to a good system. That political constitution which is the pride and blessing of those who know how to use and enjoy it, might inflict the most fatal evils on a nation which did not understand and was not prepared for it. Laws, therefore, are made suited to the growth of those for whom they are intended. They should be a little in advance of the age, to lead men gradually forward; were they more than that little, they would be as useless as a musical instrument in the hands of one who had never learned to touch it, and whose rude handling would produce not harmony but discord; they would be as dangerous as a sword in the grasp of a savage, which he would use for mischief, not for legitimate defence. God's wisdom, then, is seen in fitting the system of law He promulgated to the more rude and untutored state of the Hebrew people. It mitigated many evils, it contributed to refine and ameliorate their habits; and it is no impeachment of its merit to say that there might and would come a state of society which had outgrown it. Our Lord distinctly announced this principle when He said that Moses, for the hardness of their hearts, suffered the Israelites to put away their wives (Matt. xix, 8). The concession was made to bar greater enormities. So slavery was regulated, not prohibited. It is for want of perceiving this that some have fallen into serious error, and have dared to charge God foolishly. They have forgotten that it was a corrupt world for which the legislation was to be.

There is no ground for attributing inhumanity to the Mosaic code. A few of its provisions may be noted. It embodies, first of all, the principle that crime must be regarded not merely as a breach of human law, but as sin against God. No other code has taught this high doctrine. Hence the stringency of its enactments, because disobedience was a fault against the heavenly King. Besides, stringency is no defect. It is for the welfare of the governed. In barbarous countries laws are not stringent, except when some special interest is involved. They are often evaded; they may be tampered with. And the uncertainty of their application encourages crime. It has been said that the penalties of the Mosaic code were severe. They were less so than in many civilized countries in modern times. The punishment of death was inflicted for but four or five classes of crimes, murder, treason (which in the theocracy included witchcraft, idolatry, etc.), man-stealing, foul sensuality, and perverse filial disobedience. Less severe penalties would have altogether failed in checking the peculiar tendencies of Israel to crime. And the actual punishment was not cruel; there was neither torture nor prolonged suffering inflicted. But look at the positive side of Hebrew legislation. Observe its care for human life (Deut. xxi, 1-9; xxii, 8), its consideration for the poor (Lev. xix, 9, 10), its inculcation of charity (Deut. xv, 11), its injunction that no servant should go forth from his master empty (12-14), its provisions for general release (Lev. xxv), its regulation of pledges (Deut. xxiv, 6, 10-12), its enactment that wages should be punctually paid (15), its protection of an escaped slave (xxiii, 15, 16), its setting apart seasons of rejoicing in which all were to share (xvi, 11), its exemptions from military service (xx, 5-7, xxiv, 5), its humane care of animals (Exod. xxiii, 10, 11; Deut. xxii, 1-7, xxv, 4)—surely, in these and many other particulars which might be named, the Mosaic code gives unmistakable proof that it was no barbarous head that devised, no rash hand that penned it.

The law of Moses had its peculiar and most suitable position, in that it was preparatory to a better covenant. In no sense did it contradict the coming dispensation; it was the seed of the future tree; it was the elementary introduction to a more developed system. And thus our Lord declared that He came not to destroy but to fulfill it (Matt. v, 17); to reveal that which it pre-signified; to give all its types their perfect realization; to establish that spiritual kingdom which carried to its highest glory the theocratic principle of the earlier polity; to inspire the only effectual motive which could ensure obedience to its moral precepts, and thus to be "the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth" (Rom. x, 4). The law was imperfect only when it was stretched beyond its measure. It was "weak through the flesh" (viii, 3); and the fault of the Jews was that they did not recognize its true character as introductory, as leading to and completed by Christ. It was when it was thus perverted from its real signification that the apostles had to correct the error, denouncing, not the law itself, but the miserable use that was made of the law. Even under the Mosaic dispensation, righteousness was not obtained by legal observance. Hence the necessity of a constant repetition of the sacrifices prescribed (Heb. x, 1-4). So that from the elder testament St. Paul argues for the righteousness of faith (Rom. iv). But it is not to be concluded that the law is in no respect now binding upon believers in Christ. So far as it was political, indeed, it came to an end when the Jews were no longer a state, and settled people. So far as it was ceremonial, its shadows disappeared before the substantive things which they betokened. But, in so far as its precepts exhibit the pure character of God the lawgiver, they are a moral obligation upon His servants. His holy commandments become their delight. So that for any to profess to belong to Him, and yet to disregard His revealed will, would be a monstrous contradiction.

Law, Rev. John Gordon, was the only son of Dr. John S. and Sarah (Gordon) Law, and was born in Columbia, Tenn., September 14th, 1839. He was a student at Jackson College, Tenn., and subsequently was under the tuition of Mr. Whitehall, of Memphis, Tenn. He graduated at Columbia Theological Seminary, in 1870, and was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Memphis, June 10th, 1869. After graduating he went abroad, and pursued his studies for some time, at Edinboro and Belfast. Returning to America, in 1872, he was ordained and installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church, Wallhalla, S. C., in November, 1873, where he labored, with much success, until 1876. Absent again from the country, for two years, on his return, in 1878, he was elected evangelist of South Carolina Presbytery, in which field his labors were much blessed, until January 1st, 1879, when he was invited to take charge of the Circular (Congregational) Church of Charleston. He accepted a call from the Darlington Presbyterian Church, in April, 1879, and was installed as its pastor November 5th of that year. This is his present field of labor. Mr. Law is a man of deep piety, and wholly devoted to the advancement of Christ's kingdom. He is an earnest and effective preacher. His mind is methodical in its working, so that it is easy to follow his line of argument. As an evangelist his labors were greatly blessed. As a pastor he is diligent and faithful, and he has strengthened and built up the churches of which he has had charge.

Lawrence, Rev. Samuel, was born in Philadelphia, December 28th, 1795; spent some time in Princeton College, which conferred upon him the degree of A. M., in 1823; entered Princeton Seminary in 1820, remaining there two years, and was licensed by the Presbytery of Philadelphia in 1823. Stated supply at Bridgeton and Greenwich, N. J., 1823-24; ordained by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, Nov. 10th, 1821; pastor at Greenwich, 1821-47; missionary in New Jersey, 1847-50; pastor at Milroy, Pa., 1850-57; stated supply and missionary in Pennsylvania, 1857-75. He died at Lewistown, Pa., August 30th, 1875, in the eightieth year of his age. He was gentle, sympathetic and wise, and gifted with eminent piety. His characteristics as a preacher, were unpretending simplicity, love of souls, faithfulness, soundness in the faith and instructiveness. His end was, like his life, peaceful.

Lawson, Orr, D. D., was born in Reimersburg, Clarion county, Pa., October 17th, 1831. Graduating at Jefferson College in 1856, he entered the Seminary at Allegheny, and after finishing his course, was ordained by the Presbytery of Clarion, April, 1859, and entered on the work of the ministry at Buchanan and French Creek, Va., and remained there until the Presbytery of Lexington seceded from the General Assembly, in 1861. He then returned to Pennsylvania, and soon after took charge of the churches of Sinking Valley and Logan's Valley, starting a flourishing academy and remaining with these churches about six years, leaving them strong enough to support a pastor in each. He then accepted a call to Sinking Valley for all his time. Here he remained one year, the congregation, in the meantime, building a beautiful parsonage. In 1869 he took charge of the Church of Sunbury, Pa., and remained a year and three months. In the Spring of 1870 he accepted a call to the First Presbyterian Church of Oxford, Pa., where for thirteen years he had a successful ministry. He has been much blessed in his labors, is instructive and earnest as a preacher, and diligent and faithful in pastoral duty. In the Fall of 1883 he accepted the pastorate of the Second Presbyterian Church, Pottsville, Pa.

Lay Representation. The right of the laity to a voice in the government of the Church was recognized in apostolic times, for lay elders and deacons were chosen in and by each congregation, subject to the approval of the apostles. In the Apostolic Council of Jerusalem, the entire Church participated. But with the rise of sacerdotalism the laity declined in power, until they were entirely ignored in the Church councils; indeed, the Council of Trent anathematizes the Scripture idea of the priesthood of all believers. Luther broke the string which tied the tongue of the laity, and introduced the novelty of lay representation. In the Presbyterian churches throughout the world the laity have representation in (1), the Session, composed of the pastor and the elders, both elected by the congregation; (2), in Presbytery, composed of the ministers, and one elder from each congregation in a certain district; (3), in Synod, composed of all the ministers and one elder from each congregation, in a larger district embracing several Presbyteries; (4), in General Assembly, composed of ministers and elders in equal numbers, elected by Presbytery.

Lea, Richard, D. D., was born in Coventry, England, in 1810. The triumphant death of his father made a deep impression upon him, and early in life he gave his heart to God. He graduated at the Western University, Pittsburg, Pa., in 1832, and at the Western, Theological Seminary in 1835. He was installed over the Lawrenceville Presbyterian Church, by the Presbytery of Ohio, in 1836, and was sole pastor for forty years; and seven years longer with Rev. John McConnell as colleague. His long pastorate was a happy and successful one. Perfectly frank with his people, their love for him was constant. Dr. Lea, in 1866, represented the Presbyterian Church, with Mr. Alexander Cameron, in the Church of Scotland. He has written a few small works, but many articles for various papers and periodicals. He still resides at Pittsburg, and is highly esteemed for fidelity and excellent Christian character.

Leake, Rev. Lemuel Fordham, the son of Amos and Nancy (Strong) Leake, was born at Chester, Morris county, N. J., in 1790. He graduated at New Jersey College, in 1814, and spent two years in teaching the Union Classical School at Baskingridge, and after studying theology, two sessions, at Princeton, and then under the direction of Rev. Dr. Joseph Campbell, he was licensed by Newton Presbytery, October 7th, 1818. He was pastor of the churches of Oxford and Harmony, N. J., from 1812 to 1825, and from that time until 1831 was engaged with several of the missions connected with the Church. From 1831 to 1850 he was pastor of the Old Chartiers Church, near Camonsburg, Pa., as successor to Dr. McMillan. He resigned his charge to become President of Franklin College, Ohio. Subsequently he labored for several years at Zelenople, Pa., and then took charge of an academy at Waveland, Ind., preaching occasionally, as the Lord opened the way for him. He died, December 1st, 1866. Mr. Leake's classical and theological attainments were of a high order, and he was a writer of considerable force. His remarkable scholarship eminently qualified him for the work which the Lord had put upon him.

Leavenworth, Rev. Abner Johnson, was born July 2d, 1803, at Waterbury, New Haven county, Conn. He graduated at Amherst College, in the class of 1825; studied theology at Andover; was licensed to preach April 22d, 1828; supplied the Congregational Church in Orange, Conn., for one year; was ordained pastor of Congregational Church in Bristol, Conn., by a council convened for the purpose, December 16th, 1829, and continued pastor till 1831, when he resigned, and removed to Charlotte, N. C., to become Principal of the Young Ladies' Seminary at that place. In 1838 he removed to Warrenton, Va., where he was engaged in the cares of a school, when called, in the year 1840, to the High Street Presbyterian Church, in Petersburg, where he remained the pastor about four years. During this period a very memorable awakening occurred under his ministry, which extended to other churches, and was blessed in many wonderful and genuine conversions to God.

Resigning in 1844, he was drawn again toward that employment which seemed to be the great Providential allotment for him, and to which he was most enthusiastically devoted. He became, by far, a most conspicuous educator, in his particular field. He erected important buildings, and founded a college which bore his name, and gathered patronage and credit from many different regions. He was distinguished for the thoroughness of his teaching, and loved his work, not chiefly for its emoluments, which were very large, but from strong sentiments of interest for the thorough advancement of those who became his pupils.

Mr. Leavenworth was an active founder of the Educational Association of Virginia. He died, February 12th, 1869. He bequeathed nearly $4500, to be employed (in its interests) in the education of a foreign missionary, or for other calls connected with the Church. He was an eminently sound and able preacher of the Word, singularly gifted in prayer, industrious, even in later years, in sermon writing, and in study for the pulpit, and exemplified, in many ways, strong tenacity of purpose and steady adherence to his work.

Leech, Richard Treat, so named in honor of Richard Treat, his step-grandfather, one of the early Professors of Princeton College, N. J., was born at Cheltenham (the home of his ancestors), Montgomery county, Pa., October 3d, 1775. His early years were spent in that county. Though his opportunities for education were only such as were furnished by the schools of his neighborhood, he was subsequently known as a man of extensive general knowledge, and as a writer and speaker of more than ordinary power. In the years 1809 and 1810 he was elected to the Legislature of the State, then sitting at Lancaster. Returning to his farm (a portion of the old family estate), he remained there, busied in building and improving, until called to Harrisburg, by Governor Snyder, in 1813, to fill the office of Surveyor General of the State. He was re-appointed to the same office, by Governor Snyder, in 1815, at his third election to the office of Chief Magistrate of the Commonwealth. During the war of 1812-14, with Great Britain, Mr. Leech, with every clerk in his office except one, joined the army. The regiment to which they were attached lay at York for some weeks, but was never called into action. Leaving Harrisburg shortly after the expiration of his term of office, he removed, in 1818, to Pittsburg, and engaged in mercantile pursuits, but not meeting the success which he anticipated, he returned to the Capital in 1821. Four years later, in 1825, he was chosen an elder in the Church at Harrisburg, and continued to serve the church till 1837, when he removed again to Pittsburg, where he died, August 26th, 1850.

Mr. Leech was a man of fine abilities, of very firm, decided and honorable character. For the many years in which he occupied public position at the Capital of the State, he sustained an untainted reputation. In all his official relations he was greatly esteemed. He was an ardent lover of his country, a thorough Christian patriot. In social life he was an example of urbane manners, of warm and genial friendship, of generous hospitality, and he was everywhere welcomed as a man of courteous and kind disposition. He loved the Kingdom of Christ, and for its welfare he gave toils and prayers and cares. Humble, kind, sympathizing and faithful, he was loved as a Christian friend, and trusted as a counsellor.

Lefevre, Rev. Jacob Amos, was born in Pennsylvania. He graduated at Pennsylvania College, in 1851. He was ordained by the Presbytery of Baltimore, October 26th, 1856, and has been pastor of the Fourth Church (Franklin Square), Baltimore, Md., 1856. Mr. Lefevre is an able, earnest and effective preacher, a good pastor, and has been blessed in his ministry.

Leftwich, James Turner, D. D., was born January 3d, 1835, at Liberty, Bedford county, Va. His father, Thomas L. Leftwich, Esq., was for many years a ruling elder in the Presbyterian Church. His mother was the youngest daughter of Rev. James Turner, of Virginia, one of the most celebrated pulpit orators of his day.

Dr. Leftwich was educated partly at Yale and partly at the College of New Jersey, where he was graduated in the year 1856. His studies preparatory to the work of the ministry were prosecuted at the Union Theological Seminary, New York city. From the Seminary he proceeded at once to Alexandria, Va., where for ten years he was pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church. In 1869 he removed to Atlanta, Ga., and took charge of the Central Presbyterian Church. In 1879 he came to his present field, the First Presbyterian Church of Baltimore, Md.

In his college days he had already developed qualities that promised large usefulness. His oratorical gifts were of a rare order. With a polished bearing, a graceful action, a warm imagination, a vigorous logic, an effective voice, a felicitous command of language, he attracted wide attention in the debating societies, or wherever he spoke.

His purpose had been to enter the Bar, where he must have reached a conspicuous and honored place; but, becoming a Christian, at Princeton, he resolved to give himself to the gospel ministry, and commenced a course of severe study, that, with his natural gifts have fitted him for such important service as a pastor, a scholar, a theologian and a preacher of the Word.

Le Mercier, Andrew, pastor of the French Reformed or Huguenot Church, in Boston, 1715 to 1748. He was a native of Caen, in Normandy, France, and entered the Academy of Geneva, in 1712. He came to Boston immediately after graduation, having been called to succeed the excellent Dailli. He died in Boston, 31st March, 1764. He was the author of two works, "The Church History of Geneva, in five books, with a Political and Geographical Account of that Republic," published in Boston, in 1732, and "A Treatise Against Detraction," in ten sections, Boston, 1733.

Lenox, James, Esq, an honored elder of the Presbyterian Church, was born in New York city, August 19th, 1800. After graduating from Columbia College, and completing the study of law, he entered his father's counting-house, where he was matured by the experiences of business life. Upon the death of his father he retired from business, and devoted his life to special studies, and to works of Christian benevolence and philanthropy. He died February 17th, 1880. No man ever lived in New York who was more universally esteemed, or whose death was more sincerely regretted. He was a man of singular purity of life, and of such high character and unblemished reputation as to secure the confidence of the whole community. With a large fortune at command, he was the supporter of every good work.

Though liberal in the support of all enterprises having in view the intellectual, moral and spiritual improvement of men, Mr. Lenox' name is most prominently identified with the Presbyterian Hospital in the City of New York, of the Board of Managers of which he was the venerable and beloved President. The idea of this Hospital was purely his own conception; he matured the whole plan and arrangement before he communicated the thought to others; he selected the gentlemen whom he wished to be associated with him in this enterprise, and, addressing a note to each, he asked if they would consent to become directors of such an Institution, and to signify their assent by meeting him at a given time and place, to effect the organization. When they assembled he unfolded his plan in all its details, and then proposed, in order to start the enterprise, to give the site on Seventieth street, valued at two hundred thousand dollars, and to add to this the sum of one hundred thousand dollars in money. This liberal proposal was most cheerfully accepted, and the work was immediately commenced. In its prosecution Mr. Lenox added more than three hundred thousand dollars to the original donation. Thus, this Hospital is a monument to one whose generous benevolence was proverbial, and the record of whose modest worth is in the hearts of the poor and suffering.

Mr. Lenox adorned every relation in life which he sustained. His Christian character was of the highest type. He lived to glorify God, and was an ornament to society, a blessing to the world, and a burning and shining light in the Church.

"A shadow fell upon us when he died,
And heart to heart instinctively confessed
That God had taken from us of His best."

L'Escot, Paul, a French Reformed, or Huguenot minister, pastor of the French Protestant Church in Charleston, S. C., 1700 to 1711. He was a native of Nevers, in France, and pursued his studies for the gospel ministry at the Academy of Geneva, which he entered in 1673. The elders and heads of families of the Church in Charleston having authorized the Consistory of the French Church in London to send them a minister, that body made choice of M. L'Escot. He proved to be a judicious and faithful minister, attached to the discipline and order of the Reformed Church, and by his firmness seems to have been instrumental in defeating the effort made to draw the Charleston congregation into the Anglican ranks.

Lewis, Rev. James, was born at Hamden, Delaware county, N. Y., May 28th, 1836. After a year and a half of preparatory study at Delhi and a half year of teaching, he entered Amherst College, in 1857, and was graduated in 1861. He completed his theological studies at the Union Theological Seminary, New York city, in 1868. At his graduation at the Seminary he was the organizer and leader of the memorable band of nine, from that one class, who went to take possession of adjacent portions of Western Missouri and Eastern Kansas, in the Fall of 1868, visiting the large cities on the way, and holding meetings in the large churches, and kindling everywhere a fresh interest in Home Missions. The entire band, together with one man who was educated on the field, making ten in all, was ordained by the Presbytery of Kansas City, Mo., in October, 1868, probably the largest number of men ever ordained by any Presbytery at one time.

Soon after his ordination, Mr. Lewis was installed over a church with five members, at Humboldt, Kan. So vigorous and comprehensive was his grasp of the Home Missionary work that he was appointed, by the General Assembly of 1873, to represent the Home Missionary side of our Church at the meeting of the General Assembly of the Established Church of Scotland. Regard for the health of his family compelled him to leave Kansas, and in 1875 he accepted a call to the Church at Howell, Mich., where his talent for leadership and organization made him eminently useful, and while there he was appointed by President Hayes, in 1878, as one of the Board of Visitors to the Military Academy at West Point, and gave the address to the graduating class there. In 1882 he was called to the Central Church of Joliet, Ill., where he is now (1884) in the midst of an active and useful pastorate.

Lewis, Rev. John Nevin, was born February 23d, 1809, at Northumberland, Saratoga county, N. Y.; graduated at Union College, in 1832; studied theology at Princeton, and was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, April 5th, 1835. In the following September he began to serve the Church at Fairfield, Herkimer county, N. Y., as stated supply, and continued to do so four years. He was ordained, February 9th, 1837, at Vernon, N. Y., by the Presbytery of Oneida. In May, 1839, he removed to Truxton, Cortland county, N. Y., and served the church at that place, as stated supply, until May, 1843. In May, 1843, he removed to Whitney's Point, Broome county, N. Y. Having accepted a call from the Church at Lisle, in the same county, he was installed pastor of that church by the Presbytery of Cortland, August 30th, 1843. After a pastorate of eight years he was released from that charge, August 12th, 1851. In the same year he removed to Lodi, Wis., where he spent the remainder of his days. He soon commenced preaching at Lodi and vicinity; organized the Presbyterian Church at Lodi, in 1852, and in 1853 the Church at Lowville. Both of these he supplied regularly for five years, when his infirmities so increased that he ceased from regular work. During the years 1851-8 he was a member of the Presbyterian and Congregational Convention, after which he was a member of the Presbytery of Columbus (N. S.). Six years later he supplied the Lodi Church gratuitously for one year, 1863-4, as an aid towards the completion of the church edifice. He died, April 7th, 1879. Mr. Lewis was a man of excellent natural gifts and attainments. He was an eager student, and in regard to all moral and doctrinal subjects had strong and clear convictions. He was a truly devoted, earnest and faithful minister of the gospel.

Leyburn, Rev. George Lacon, son of Mrs. Elizabeth Winston and George William Leyburn, was born May 21st, 1839, in Areopolis, in Southern Greece. From his birthplace, in ancient Laconia, he derived his name, Lacon. His parents returned to America during his childhood, and here resided until he went to college, in Bedford county, Va. From his home there he entered college in 1856, at Lexington, Va., then Washington College, now known as Washington and Lee University. During the winter of that year he professed conversion, and in December, 1856, united with the church nearest his home, at Liberty, Bedford county, Va.

In June, 1859, he graduated at college, with first honors, getting the first medal at Washington College.

He then taught school in Sweet Water, Middle Tennessee, the Winter of 1859-60, and the following year, 1860-61, entered upon his theological course at Union Seminary, New York.

The Fall of 1865 he entered Union Theological Seminary, Hampden-Sidney, Va., and graduated there in 1867. He had been licensed, during the war, by Piedmont Presbytery, January 7th, 1864, and in June, 1867, he took charge of the Loudon Street Church, in Winchester, Va. He was ordained by Winchester Presbytery, in November of that year, and installed as pastor of the Loudon Street Church at the same time.

Mr. Leyburn remained in Winchester, a devoted pastor to a devoted people, until March, 1875, when he was called, through the Executive Committee of Foreign Missions of his Church, and, as he believed, by Providence, to accompany his parents to the land of his early adoption, Greece. With them he sailed, in March, 1875, from Norfolk, Va., to go as missionaries to the classic land of Greece. Here they found a home for but a brief period.

The father of Rev. George W. Leyburn died within a few months after his return to Greece, and Rev. G. L. Leyburn remained only two years longer. A long spell of illness following his father's death, and some subsequent discouragements in acquiring the language with sufficient fluency to preach the gospel there, made him conscientiously determine to return to America. This he did on January 7th, 1878, and that the Church might not lose by this determination, he paid his own expenses home, and refunded to the Committee, under their protest, his outfit money and expenses out. This enabled them to put another missionary on the ground, in his place, and that same year Rev. T. R. Sampson, of Virginia, was sent out, and is now a faithful missionary among the Greeks.

Just after Mr. Leyburn's return to this country he was called to Lexington, Mo., to take charge of the Presbyterian Church there, in connection with the Southern Presbyterian Church. With that people he still labors, as the shepherd of the flock.

Leyburn, Rev. George William, was born at Lexington, Va., January 2d, 1809. His collegiate course was partly taken at Washington College, Virginia (now Washington and Lee University), in his native town, and the remainder at Princeton College, where he graduated in 1829. He commenced his theological studies in Princeton Seminary, at the same time filling the post of Tutor in the college, and completed them in Union Theological Seminary, Virginia. His licensure was received from Lexington Presbytery, in 1835. He was accepted by the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, as a missionary, and sailed for the Turkish island of Scio in the Autumn of 1836. His friend, the Rev. Samuel R. Houston, had been laboring there, but by the time Mr. Leyburn reached the East, that mission had been transferred to Areopolis, the capital of Laconia, the Spartan province of the Peloponnesus. Here Mr. Leyburn labored, amid many discouragements and difficulties, until, his health failing and insuperable obstacles having been thrown in the way by the government of Greece, he was compelled, reluctantly, to abandon a field in which he had become most deeply interested. After returning to this country, as far as his impaired health admitted, he was always at work in some department of the Master's service.

In April, 1875, Mr. Leyburn joyfully accompanied his son, the Rev. G. L. Leyburn, who was sent by the Foreign Missionary Committee of the Southern Presbyterian Church as missionary to Greece. He immediately entered on his work at Athens, and after a few weeks set off on a tour in the Turkish Empire. At Salonica (the ancient Thessalonica) he was so much encouraged by the prospects of usefulness, as to determine to settle there. But what he had chosen as his field of labor was destined to furnish him a grave. He was taken ill in returning from a trip to Cassandra, and, after a short illness, entered into the heavenly rest, August 14th, 1875, at the age of sixty-six years.

Liberty of Conscience. Our Confession (Chap. xx, Sec. 2), says on this subject.—

"God alone is Lord of the conscience,¹ and hath left it free from the doctrines and commandments of men which are in anything contrary to his Word, or beside it in matters of faith or worship;² so that to believe such doctrines, or to obey such commandments out of conscience, is to betray true liberty of conscience;³ and the requiring of implicit faith, and an absolute and blind obedience, is to destroy liberty of conscience and reason also."⁴

Here the doctrine of liberty of conscience is laid down in most explicit terms. The conscience, in all matters of faith and duty, is subject to the authority of God alone, and entirely free from all subjection to the traditions and commandments of men. To believe any doctrine, or obey any commandment, contrary to or beside the word of God, out of submission to human authority, is to betray true liberty of conscience. And be the power and authority whose it will; be it that of a magistrate or a minister, of a husband, a master, or a parent, that would require an implicit faith and an absolute blind obedience, it would destroy liberty of conscience.

The rights of conscience have been frequently invaded by rulers, both civil and ecclesiastical. By the Church of Rome the statements of our Confession are directly contradicted, both in doctrine and in practice. They teach that the Pope, and the bishops in their own dioceses, may, by their own authority, enact laws which bind the conscience, and which cannot be transgressed without incurring the same penalties which are annexed to every breach of the divine law. And they have actually imposed many articles of faith, and enjoined numberless rites and ceremonies, as necessary in the worship of God, which have no foundation in Scripture; and they require implicit faith in all their decrees, and a blind obedience to all their commands. Against the tyrannical usurpations and encroachments of that Church the section of our Confession referred to above is principally leveled.

No person on earth can have authority to dictate to conscience; for this would be to assume a prerogative which belongs to none but the Supreme Lord and Legislator. "There is one Lawgiver, who is able to save and to destroy" (James iv, 12). Such a power was prohibited by Jesus Christ among his followers: "The kings of the Gentiles exercise lordship over them, but ye shall not be so" (Luke xxii, 25). It was disclaimed by the inspired apostles: "Not that we have dominion over your faith," said the apostle of the Gentiles, "but are helpers of your joy" (2 Cor. i, 24).

From the principles laid down in this section, it manifestly follows, that a right of private judgment about matters of religion belongs to every man, and ought to be exercised by every Christian. Christians are expressly required to examine and prove every doctrine by the unerring rule of the Word of God (Isa. viii, 20; 1 John iv, 1). They ought to be ready to render a reason of the hope which is in them (1 Pet. iii, 15); and this none can do who receive the doctrines and commandments of men with implicit faith and blind obedience. Whatsoever is not done in faith, nor accompanied with a personal persuasion of the obligation or lawfulness of it in the sight of God, is pronounced to be sin (Rom. xiv, 23).

It follows no less clearly, from the principles here laid down, that when lawful superiors command what is contrary to the Word of God, or beside it, in matters of faith and worship, their commands do not bind the conscience. The obedience which the Scriptures command us to render to lawful superiors, whether parents, or husbands, or magistrates, is not unlimited; there are cases in which disobedience becomes a duty. No one doubts that the precept, "Children, obey your parents in all things," is a command to obey them only in the exercise of their rightful parental authority, and imposes no obligation to implicit and passive obedience. The case is equally plain with regard to the command, "Wives, submit to your own husbands." And it cannot be questioned that the obedience due to magistrates is also limited. The precept "Let every soul be subject to the higher powers," must be understood as a command to obey magistrates only in the exercise of their rightful authority, and in all things lawful. The same inspired teachers who enjoined in such general terms obedience to rulers, themselves uniformly and openly disobeyed them whenever their commands were inconsistent with other and higher obligations. "We ought to obey God rather than men" (Acts v, 29), was the principle which they avowed, and on which they acted. When the Apostles were charged by the Jewish Council to speak no more in the name of Jesus, their unhesitating answer was, "Whether it be right in the sight of God to hearken unto you more than unto God, judge ye. For we cannot but speak the things which we have seen and heard" (Acts iv, 19, 20). No command to do anything morally wrong can be binding on the conscience.

Liddell, Rev. Andrew R., was born in Gwinette county, Ga., April 4th, 1829. He graduated at Oglethorpe University, 1855, and at the Theological Seminary, Columbia, S. C., in May, 1858. In the Autumn of 1858 he was installed pastor of the churches of Outhbert and Fort Gaines, Ga., and continued in this relation until his death, which occurred November 26th, 1860. Under Mr. Liddell's brief ministrations, a large number were added to the church. He was truly a "burning and shining light." His ministry was characterized by piety, self-denying toil, clearness and force in the preservation of the doctrines of grace, and directness in the searching application which he made to the conscience of his hearers. His end was peace.

Lincoln University. This well known benevolent enterprise, for the classical and theological education of Negroes, had its origin in the large heart and broad, far-seeing intelligence of a Presbyterian minister, John Miller Diekey, D.D., at that time pastor of the Church in Oxford, Chester county, Pa. In the year 1854 application was made by the New Castle Presbytery, to the Legislature, for a charter. This action was taken at the suggestion of Dr. Diekey, and was carried through by his urgent advocacy. The charter was granted. Under its provision, "Ashmun Institute" was incorporated in a body of nine trustees, whose successors were to be appointed by the Presbytery. Two years were then spent in appeals to the churches and benevolent friends of the Negro for the funds needed. At that time friends were few, and the churches generally indifferent or antagonistic. Much of this labor was done by Dr. Diekey, who was President of the Board, and Chairman of the Executive Committee. Land for the purpose was purchased in Chester county, four miles northeast of the borough of Oxford, and about forty miles southwest of Philadelphia. A hall was built, which contained dormitories for the students, refectory and class rooms; also a residence for the Principal.

This building was dedicated, and the Institute opened, and solemnly consecrated, on January 1st, 1857. The Rev. Cortland Van Rensselaer, D.D., then Secretary of the Board of Education of our Church, delivered the address. It is a model of classic eloquence, and expresses a spirit of broad Christian philanthropy.

For four years following, under the Presidency of Rev. J. P. Carter, Baltimore, Md., the Institution was prosperous. There was healthy growth and good fruit. Three of the students of this period were ordained by the Presbytery of New York, and with a Commission from the Board of Foreign Missions, went as missionaries to Liberia, Africa. Shortly after this came the civil war. It was a period of prolonged and severe trial; for the Institute had no endowment and the flow of funds for its support was cut off. How could its father and founder see it succumb? In this emergency, means were provided by a mortgage on his own home, and the work was saved. Negro emancipation followed, and with it a call in trumpet tones, which waked up many to a conviction of their responsibility to God for the care of the Negro, and that enlarged provision must be made for the Christian education of the liberated millions.

The Hon. William E. Dodge, Rev. Albert Barnes, and other men of similar spirit, came forward and took place among the leaders in the new campaign. A supplementary charter, authorizing heavier financial responsibilities, and operations on a wider scale, was secured. By this action of the Legislature, in 1866, Ashmun Institute became "Lincoln University."

The Board of Trustees was increased from nine to twenty-one, with a provision that (in the ecclesiastical changes which followed), made it self-perpetuating. The oversight of the Theological Department was subsequently transferred to the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, which has power to veto the appointment of Professors, and responsible control of the instruction.

To superintend these movements and to organize Lincoln University on the basis of the new charter, Rev. I. N. Rendall, D. D., was, in 1865, called to the presidency, which he still holds. There have been associated with him in the Faculty, at different times, Doctors Lorenzo Westcott, E. R. Bower, E. E. Adams, T. W. Cattell, G. T. Woodhull, C. R. Gregory and E. T. Jeffers; Revs. J. B. Rendall, C. C. Dickey and B. T. Jones. Drs. Westcott, Adams, Bower and Gregory died, and Rev. Clement C. Dickey resigned. Rev. John Miller Dickey, D. D., to whom the Institution owes its existence, and much of its prosperity, after unwearying labors in its behalf, and holding through more than twenty years the presidency of the Board, was, in the year 1878, called to his reward.

In the year 1865, twelve months before the new charter was obtained, work was begun on a second dormitory, called Lincoln Hall. It is constructed of brick, and accommodates eighty students. In 1870, another structure, one hundred feet by thirty-six, was built for students, and now, after twelve years, still another. There is also a stone building, which contains, besides the chapel, six class rooms; and an edifice called Livingstone Hall, which accommodates the large Commencement assemblies. Convenient houses have also been provided for each of the six Professors. This property, with a campus of over seventy acres, has cost at least one hundred and fifty thousand dollars. Endowments for the support of Professors, amounting to about $120,000, and scholarships to about $40,000, have been provided by the liberality of friends. These funds, are all held and securely invested by the Trustees.

The cost of education is thus reduced to about $130 a year for the board and other college expenses of a student. This may be provided for permanently by a scholarship of $2500. An endowment of $25,000 provides for the moderate salary of a Professor. The usefulness and prosperity of the work would be greatly increased by many more endowments of the former class and by at least three of the latter.

The scope and spirit as well as the style and extent of the culture and training given in Lincoln University were early determined. On that plan, and on the principles then adopted, which are still firmly held, this work has been developed. Its scope is to provide the Negroes of this land and of Africa with thoroughly trained educators of their own race. With Christian leaders, teachers, and gospel ministers, its spirit is that of the great commission given by Christ to His Church, "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature," which is the overflowing of divine love through human hearts, and by human lips. The style of the training to be given was determined on the principle, that whatever is good for a white man is good also for a black man in the same circumstances. The rule is, to adapt the treatment, the discipline, the mental and moral culture of the Negro to his need; to provide for whatever special deficiencies are found in his habits, in his heart and mind. Supreme importance is, therefore, given to the cultivation of moral principle, to the education of conscience, utilizing his strong emotional nature in his religious training. The Negro is treated as a man; in this way he is taught to respect himself and to recognize his direct responsibility to God for the right use and improvement of all his powers. Lincoln University proposes, by these means, to set the Negro on his own feet.

The extent of the course is determined only by the facilities for preparation accessible to the students, and by the means at the disposal of the University. As these enlarge the curriculum will be extended. The preparatory course in the Institution which at first was three years, is now limited to one. Many academies and colleges in the Southern States, taught by graduates of the University, are now preparing students for this class, as well as for the college course. Four years are given to academical study in the four college classes. In the year 1869 a full three years' theological course was inaugurated, from which the first class graduated in 1872. Teaching in the preparatory class is done by tutors selected from the graduates. Instruction in Rhetoric and Elocution is supplemented by two literary societies. Lectures on Polemic and Pastoral Theology, Natural Science, etc.,—one or more courses annually—are delivered by distinguished ministers and laymen. Prominent among these have been Rev. Albert Barnes, Drs. Robert Du Bois, William R. Bingham, James Roberts, and others. Dr. William S. Plumer, of the Presbyterian Church South, would have delivered a course of lectures on Polemic Theology, but death prevented.

More than five hundred young men have taken a partial course in English studies only, many of whom are now employed as teachers in the Southern States. One hundred and sixty students have graduated from the full college course, of whom over a hundred are engaged in professional and educational labor. One hundred have received license or ordination as ministers of the gospel. Eight have gone as missionaries to Africa, six of whom have laid down their lives in that work. The number of students is now (1883) two hundred and fifteen. In the Preparatory Class, sixty-nine; in the four College Classes, one hundred and twenty-eight; in the Theological Department, sixteen.

The spirit and style of the training in Lincoln University may now, after twenty-six years of trial, be judged by its results, by the quality of its ripened fruit, by the spirit and work of the men it has sent into the field. There is satisfactory testimony that they are, as a rule, successful laborers; that they are wisely adapting their teaching and methods of labor to the lowly condition of their people; that usually, with much skill, good common sense, and consecration to the cause, they bring their superior culture to aid in improving the social, moral and religious condition of their people, who find them to be sympathizing friends, and confide in them as competent and trustworthy guides. In a large number of Northern pulpits and public halls the stirring sermons and eloquent addresses of Lincoln graduates have been heard with pleasure and high approval, and they have frequently awakened enthusiastic applause on the floor of our General Assembly.

The extent and thoroughness of the course of instruction given to Negro students in Lincoln University has been amply justified, by the use they have made of it, in the establishment of Allen University, Columbia, S. C., with its two hundred and fifty students; of Zion Wesley Institute, Salisbury, N. C., with its one hundred and fifty students, and of the excellent State Normal School, Holly Springs, Miss., and of other similar Institutions of high grade, also projected and presided over by her own sons.

The present officers of instruction and government in Lincoln University are: Rev. Isaac N. Rendall, D. D., President, etc.; Rev. E. T. Jeffers, D. D., John C. Baldwin Professor of Theology; Rev. Gilbert T. Woodhull, D. D., Charles Avery Professor of Classical and Hellenistic Greek, etc.; Rev. John B. Rendall, A. M., I. H. Cassidy Professor of Latin, etc.; Rev. Thomas W. Cattell, PH. D., Reuben J. Flick Professor of Mathematics, etc.; Rev. B. T. Jones, William E. Dodge Professor of Sacred Rhetoric, etc. The Financial Secretary of the Institution is Rev. Edward Webb, Oxford, Pa.

Lindsay, Thomas, elder in the church at St. Charles, Mo., was born in Perthshire, Scotland, A. D., 1771. To read, to write, and to recite the Shorter Catechism was the extent of his education, when he betook himself to the trade of a weaver. At the age of eighteen years he came to Charleston, S. C., obtained employment as a merchant's clerk, and soon, by his diligence and Scotch thrift, he was able to set up business for himself at Columbia, in the same State. Having been cautioned that he could not succeed unless he sold liquor and opened his store on the Lord's day, he did neither, but pursued his business in the fear of God, and was very greatly prospered.

In 1816 Mr. Lindsay removed to Missouri, and bought a large tract of land in the near vicinity of St. Charles, on which he passed the remainder of his days. The cultivation of his farm he left to his servants, while he gave himself to reading, to the study of God's Word, and to noting the movements of the Church of Christ. He was especially interested in the prophecies, which he studied with marvellous painstaking research, as is evidenced by a large manuscript volume on the Revelation, another on the Old Testament prophecies, particularly those relating to the Jews, and several volumes of astronomical and chronological calculations. The St. Charles Church was organized in 1819. Mr. Lindsley was its first elder, and its chief supporter as long as he lived. Emphatically, he loved the kingdom of Christ, and the House of the Lord, and the truth as it is in Jesus, and the children and servants of God. He was a social man, of proverbial hospitality, a liberal giver, a faithful steward, an uncompromising advocate and defender of sound doctrine. Illustrative of his Scotch grit and his intense earnestness in behalf of truth, when sixty-seven years old, he made the long and wearisome journey, by stage coach, to Philadelphia, in 1838, that he might lift his voice in the General Assembly in defence of Old School orthodoxy. Mr. Lindsley died in 1843, leaving all his lands, except the homestead, to the American Bible Society, and, by will, manumitting his slaves and providing for their transportation to Liberia. He lived not in vain. He died in the Lord.

Lindsley, Aaron L., D. D., a native of Troy, N. Y.; prosecuted his studies at Marion College, and at the Troy Polytechnic Institute, and received the honorary degrees. He left his profession of Civil Engineer, in 1842, to prepare for the ministry. He spent two years in Union Theological Seminary, and a third at Princeton, to which another year of theological studies was added. In 1846, having been ordained by the Presbytery of New York, he was sent out by the General Assembly to join in organizing the Presbytery of Wisconsin. While pastor at Waukesha, he made missionary journeys to every part of the Territory and Northern Illinois. In six years the Presbytery was divided into three, and erected into the Synod of Wisconsin. To missionary labors were added efforts to found a college at Waukesha, which is still on its career of usefulness, known as Carroll College. The summary of six years' labor in connection with associated brethren presented a record of expansion unexampled in the history of the Presbyterian Church. Excessive labors exacted a change, and in 1852 Dr. Lindsley found a Bethesda at South Salem, near the city of New York. The church grew, under his ministry, in numbers, usefulness and influence. There were several well-defined revivals, in one of which more than eighty persons were gathered into the fold. Having declined many overtures to important charges, he accepted a repeated call to Portland, Oregon, in 1868. His missionary zeal found on the Pacific coast a broader field for its exercise. By journeys, by correspondence, and by newspaper articles, many missionaries were introduced and numerous churches founded in this vast region. Dr. Lindsley introduced schools and missions into Alaska; formed the first church and built the first Protestant house of worship in that Territory. Indian tribes in Idaho and Washington Territory have, during a course of years, felt the benefit of his labors on their behalf, in the most efficient manner. He lends the whole force of his influence in behalf of educational and reformatory measures, and in support of catholic societies and missions at home and abroad.

Dr. Lindsley's church has been distinguished for its expansive spirit. It has been called "The Banner Church" of the Pacific coast. It has already sent off three colonies, and preparations are being made for two more.

As a pastor, Dr. Lindsley is indefatigable and greatly beloved. His constant hearers characterize his discourses as earnest, eloquent, spiritual, forcible and original, keeping his congregation abreast of the thought of the day, and making Christ and His salvation ever prominent. He is placed by the best judges in the front rank of living preachers.

Lindsley, Philip, D. D., was born December 21st, 1786, near Morristown, N. J., and graduated at the College of New Jersey in September, 1804. After his graduation he was engaged as a teacher at Morristown and Baskingridge, until the Spring of 1807, at which time he was received as a candidate for the ministry by the Presbytery of New Brunswick. The same year he became a Tutor in the College of New Jersey, where he remained two years, teaching Latin and Greek, and at the same time studying theology in connection with the classics, the French language, etc. The Winter of 1809-10 he spent at the college, devoting himself exclusively to theology, under the direction of the President, Dr. Samuel Stanhope Smith, and on the 24th of April, 1810, was licensed, by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, to preach the gospel. After several years spent in travel, and in the continued study of theology, he became Senior Tutor in the College at Princeton. In 1813 he was transferred from the Tutorship to the Professorship of Languages, and at the same time was chosen Secretary of the Board of Trustees. He also held the offices of librarian and inspector of the college during his connection with the Institution.

In June, 1817, Mr. Lindsley was ordained, sine titulo, by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, and in September following was elected vice-President of the College of New Jersey. After the resignation of Dr. Green, as President of the college, in 1822, he was, for one year, acting President. He was chosen President of Cumberland College, Tennessee, and was inaugurated January 12th, 1825. His address, delivered on the occasion, was published and very widely circulated. It was a noble effort, and was regarded as auspicious of an eminently useful and brilliant career. The corporate name of the college was changed, the next year, to "The University of Nashville."

In May, 1834, Dr. Lindsley was unanimously elected Moderator of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church of the United States. He was elected a member of the "Royal Society of Northern Antiquaries," at Copenhagen, in 1837. In May, 1850, he was elected Professor of Ecclesiastical Polity and Biblical Archaeology in the New Albany Theological Seminary, and entered on the duties of the Professorship at the beginning of the next year. Here he continued, usefully and acceptably employed, until April, 1853, when he resigned the office, contrary to the unanimous wish of the Board. The remaining two years of his life were spent chiefly in study, devotion and intercourse with his friends. He died May 23d, 1855.

As a man of learning, Dr. Lindsley was distinguished for the accuracy and thoroughness of his classical attainments. His qualifications as a teacher were very superior. In conversation and debate he was ready and fluent. As a preacher, he possessed many admirable qualities. His friendship was marked by sincerity and warmth. The influence which, for a quarter of a century, he exerted as an educator, over the State of Tennessee and the whole Southwest, has been wide and enduring.

Linn, James, D. D., was born in Sherman's Valley, now Perry county, Pa., September 4th, 1783. He was graduated at Dickinson College in 1805; licensed by the Presbytery of Carlisle in 1808, and ordained in Bellefonte, Pa., April, 1810, by the Presbytery of Huntingdon. His pastoral charge embraced the churches of Bellefonte and Lick Run. In 1839 he was released from Lick Run and retained Bellefonte, where he sustained the relation of pastor until his decease, February 23d, 1868.

In social life, Dr. Linn, though rather retiring and silent, was, when drawn out, both vivacious and instructive. As a Presbyter, he was one of the most faithful, and his brethren, in Presbytery, as elsewhere, found him a wise and reliable counsellor. As a pastor, he was kind and sympathizing. As a preacher, he was plain and instructive, inclining more to the doctrinal and practical than to the experimental and hortatory. No sermon was ever repeated in the same pulpit. He was eminently a modest man, disliking to put himself forward in any way, "seeking not his own," hiding self in the Saviour for whom he lived and labored. His influence is attested by the intelligence, taste, refinement, moral excellence, and elevated Christian character and liberal spirit of the people of Bellefonte, among whom he labored for nearly sixty years. The estimation in which he was held by his own congregation was largely shared by the whole community in which he lived. He was generous in his dealings with the church. When there was a heavy weight of indebtedness upon it, he voluntarily remitted every year a portion of his salary as his contribution towards the payment of the debt. When under the infirmities of age, he tendered his resignation, and an assistant was provided. His salary would have been continued as before, had he not absolutely declined, under the altered circumstances, to receive more than $200 per annum, which was forced upon his acceptance. The tablet, which fitly commemorates his long connection with the Bellefonte Church, bears this inscription:—

"Faithful, wise, meek, patient, pure, devout."

Linn, Rev. John, was born in Adams county, Pa., in 1749; was fitted for college by the Rev. Robert Smith, of Pequea, Lancaster county, Pa.; graduated at Nassau Hall, in 1773; studied theology under the Rev. Dr. Robert Cooper; was licensed by the Presbytery of Donegal, in December, 1776, and soon after was ordained and installed pastor of the congregations in Sherman's Valley, in Cumberland (now Perry) county, Pa., where he remained, laboring, faithfully and efficiently, to the close of his ministry and his life, in 1820. Mr. Linn was distinguished for sobriety of mind rather than versatility; was reflective rather than imaginative. He was a solemn and impressive preacher, uncommonly devoted to the interests of his flock; and in his family, and, indeed, all his relations, he was a fine example of Christian dignity, tenderness and fidelity.

Linn, Dr. John Blair, was born in Shippensburg, Pa., March 14th, 1777, and was a precocious boy. He graduated at Columbia College at eighteen, before which time he had already published in the periodical press essays in prose and verse and written a play, which was acted. He commenced the study of the law with General Hamilton, but abandoned it in disgust. He then studied theology with Dr. Romeyn, a Dutch divine of Schenectady. After entering the ministry his great popularity secured him many invitations, but his choice led him to become the associate of Dr. Ewing, in the First Church, Philadelphia.

June, 1799. In 1802 he suffered from a sunstroke, from the effects of which he never entirely recovered. His spirits became depressed, and he died of hemorrhage, August 30th, 1804, at the early age of twenty-seven.

Besides his early poems, his published works were a "Poem on the Death of Washington," a "Poem on the Powers of Genius," a posthumous poem called "Valerian," a "Sermon on the Death of Dr. Ewing," and a "Reply to Dr. Priestley's Comparison between Socrates and Christ." The merit of this reply gained him the Degree of D. D. from the University of Pennsylvania. Dr. Linn's tastes were refined and poetic, and his sensibilities exquisite. This led him, though warm and generous in his nature, to a moody and melancholy state of mind, and a morbid dread of death, which was only held in check by a deep sense of religion.

Linn, Rev. William, D. D., was born in Shippenburg, Pa., in 1752, and graduated at Princeton College, in 1772. Soon after being licensed he entered the American army as a chaplain. In 1784 he was rector of an academy in Somerset county, Md., where he acquired a high reputation as a teacher and scholar. In 1786 he became pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Elizabethtown, N. J., but remained there only a few months, as, in the November after his settlement, he accepted a call to the Reformed Dutch Church of the city of New York. He died, in Albany, in January, 1808. Dr. Linn enjoyed a high reputation as a pulpit orator. He was in great demand on charitable and public occasions. A number of his sermons, indicative of his ability, were published.

Lippincott, Rev. Thomas, was born in Salem, N. J., February 6th, 1791. After spending a short time in Philadelphia, he removed to Lumberland, N. Y., in 1814. Here he married, August 15th, 1816, and late in the Fall of 1817 he started for the West, with his wife and infant daughter. On December 1st they embarked at Pittsburg, with another family, on a Monongahela flat-boat, which they had chartered to convey them down the Ohio. On the 30th of the same month they landed at Shawneetown. He found his way to St. Louis, then but a village, and engaged as clerk, but soon entered into business for himself. He took a stock of goods to Milton, Ill., where his wife established the first Sabbath-school in that State. His next place of residence was Edwardsville, where, certainly for one year, he was editor of the Edwardsville Spectator, and during the six years in which the paper was published at Edwardsville, he was a constant contributor to its columns. While in Edwardsville, besides his editorial duties, he was clerk in the Land Office and Justice of the Peace.

Mr. Lippincott was an elder in the Presbyterian Church at Edwardsville. He was licensed to preach October 8th, 1828, and ordained October 19th, 1829. His stated labors were exclusively with the churches in the bounds of the Synod of Illinois. He also acted for several months as Agent of the American Sunday-school Union. His last field was Daccoign, in Perry county. His ministerial labors were abundant, acceptable and successful. No man in the Synod was more universally respected and beloved. He was the first Moderator of the Presbytery of Alton. He died in April, 1869. "It is difficult," says Dr. A. T. Norton, "to characterize such a man, because of the very completeness of his character and the absence of great salient points. It was something like the prairies of his adopted State, everywhere rich and fertile, but destitute of towering mountains, snow-crowned and conspicuous, indeed, but cold and barren; and destitute, also, of those swamp-lands which lie too low for drainage and cultivation. His mental efforts were always respectable, never sinking below mediocrity, seldom soaring far above it. He was not a meteor, or a comet, but rather the north star, steadily shining, clear and fixed. His moral character, also, was complete. He loved his neighbor as himself. He was liberal with his means, almost to a fault. His Christian character, also, was complete. Christ's atonement was his only hope, Christ's example his only pattern, Christ's precepts his only rule."

Little, Rev. George Obadiah, the third son of Rev. Dr. Henry and Susan Norton (Smith) Little, was born in Madison, Ind., May 2d, 1839. He graduated at Amherst College, in 1860; at Lane Theological Seminary, in 1863; was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of New Albany, in 1862, and supplied the Church at Veray, Ind., during his Senior year at the Seminary. After preaching a year at Birmingham, Pa., he was called to the Second Church, Fort Wayne, Ind., where he labored till 1871, when he accepted a call to the Church in Connersville. In June, 1873, before his installation, he accepted a call to the Assembly's Presbyterian Church, Washington, D. C., and was installed pastor, November 9th, 1873. He is one of four brothers, all of whom are ministers of the Presbyterian Church. Mr. Little has the qualities which, under God, give success to the preacher and pastor. Originality and vigor characterize his pulpit ministrations. While retaining ever simplicity of style and purity of gospel truth, he not seldom interests and impresses by the unusual, striking and attractive form in which his thought is presented. The ten years of his ministry in Washington, just closed, have resulted in the steady enlargement of his sphere of influence, and the growth of the Church in number and efficiency. He has published various discourses, and contributed articles for religious periodicals.

Little, Henry, D. D., was born in Roseawen, N. H., March 30th, 1800, and died at Madison, Ind., February 25th, 1882. He graduated at Dartmouth, N. H., in 1826, in which year sixty of the students became Christians, a result to which he largely contributed by his personal visits and conversation. He graduated at the Theological Seminary in Andover, Mass., and was ordained September 24th, 1829, at Park Street Church, Boston, Mass., with fifteen others, all of whom were to be Home or Foreign missionaries. The hymn "Watchman, What of the Night," was composed and set to music for that occasion, and sung there for the first time.

For over a year after his ordination he was in the employment of the American Education Society, and was very successful in raising money and persuading young men to enter the ministry. In 1831 he was settled as pastor over the Presbyterian Church at Oxford, O., and during a pastorate of two years, two hundred and ninety-seven persons united with the church, many of whom were students in Miami University. He was pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church, Madison, Ind., from 1838 to 1840, during which time sixty were received into the church on profession of their faith. But the most important and continuous work of his life—nearly forty-nine years in all—was in connection with the general agency of Home Missions; from 1833 to 1861 in connection with the American Home Missionary Society; from that time until 1869 with the Presbyterian Committee of Home Missions, N. S.; and from that till his death with the Board of Home Missions.

In this, his life-work, Dr. Little was remarkably successful. First. In organizing churches, settling church difficulties and securing ministers for destitute fields. Secondly. In raising large sums of money. He was called the "Prince of Beggars," and raised $50,000 for Lane Theological Seminary, and $10,000 for the Western Female Seminary, Oxford, Ohio, in addition to the large amount collected for Home Missions. Thirdly. In saving souls, through evangelistic work. "He was a fluent and effective speaker, and as such seemed proof against fatigue. To preach three times a day, weeks together, hold inquiry meetings and converse with any he met, seemed to invigorate him. He was interested and active in all that pertained to the welfare of his State, and the Indiana School Report mentions his name as the originator of the first graded schools in that State. The title of Doctor of Divinity was conferred by Wabash College, in 1865.

His last sickness was attended with long and severe suffering, but he endured it all with marvellous patience and submission. His death was as remarkable as his life, for the spirit of piety which he exhibited and the testimony which he bore.

Little, Jacob, D. D., was born in New Hampshire, May 1st, 1795; was graduated at Dartmouth in 1822, and Andover in 1825; preached six months at Hoosick, N. Y., and about one year at Belpre, Ohio; June 1st, 1827, he became pastor of the Congregational Church in Granville, Ohio, and continued in that relation until December 1st, 1867; removed at once to Warsaw, Ind., and for a time was stated supply of the Presbyterian Church in that town; left Warsaw in July, 1871, to reside with his son, the Rev. Charles Little, pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Wabash, Ind.; passed to his rest on the morning of Sabbath, December 17th, aged eighty-one years. Dr. Little's chief work was in the Church at Granville, through his influence, one of the most remarkable churches of our order. Here his labors were signally blessed. In 1828 the church was favored with a great revival, and during his ministry many hundreds were added to it. His "New Year's Sermons" were characteristically full of facts, and were a Granville institution. Several of them were published. He published several other discourses, and many delightful and valuable articles in the religious newspapers. His most important work is "The History of Granville," published some years ago, in the Ohio Observer, at Hudson. Dr. Little so wrought himself into the practical work of a pastor and preacher in a grand field, and did and said so many wise things, that he will be affectionately remembered.

Lloyd, Amos H., ruling elder, was born in Marietta, O., lived in Cincinnati through his boyhood and youth; went South and settled in Selma, Ala., in 1835. Died August 12th, 1881. Mr. Lloyd was a scholar in the first Sunday-school organized in Cincinnati, O. Removing, in early life, to the small village of Selma, Ala., he organized the first Sunday-school in the place, and was an officer or teacher, to the day of his death. He was installed a ruling elder, January 4th, 1852, and while he had no children of his own, his house was the "Preacher's Home." Not one of the older ministers of the Synod ever came to Selma without finding a cordial welcome to his hospitable board and his "Prophet's chamber." Brisk and lively in manner, fervent in piety, and kind and courteous to all, he was universally beloved. Slow to express an opinion in difficult and delicate cases, he was firm as a rock in his principles, when once settled. He never missed a meeting of any kind, unless prevented by some providential hindrance. When dying, he was told of the old friends he would see in heaven. "Oh, yes!" he answered, "but above all, I will see Jesus."

Lloyd, Rev. Charles Hooker, was born in New Haven, Conn., February 21st, 1833. He entered New York University in 1856, where he remained a year and a half, but owing to ill health he did not graduate. He graduated at Princeton Theological Seminary in 1862; was licensed by New York Presbytery, and was ordained as an evangelist by the same Presbytery, April 29th, 1862. He married Miss Katie C. Parker, a daughter of Willard Parker, M. D., of New York city, and himself and wife were appointed by the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions to South Africa, and sailed from New York, June 21st, 1862. After a few months spent in travel in Europe, they reached Natal, South Africa, December 11th, 1862, and were cordially received by the missionaries. Their first residence was at Amanzintote, from whence, by a vote of the Mission, in June, 1863, they were removed to Umvoti as their permanent home. Hardly six months more had passed before Mr. Lloyd's health became so much impaired that, by the advice of his physicians, he made a journey of some months into the cooler hill country of the interior, in the hope of restoring his health and arresting the disease which threatened him. But he learned that whatever he had to do must be done quickly. He returned to Umvoti, and labored with renewed zeal, and threw himself into the work of missions with his whole heart, and carried others away with his enthusiasm.

Mr. Lloyd died, February 10th, 1865, of consumption. In all his Christian life he was personally faithful and wise to win souls, and many, both in America and Africa, and some who went before him to heaven, were led to the Saviour by his direct entreaty. A short time before his decease, he said to a fellow missionary, who was sitting alone with him at the fireside, "Since I shall not live long, I have a request to make of you. Do you remember there is a little tree standing about thirty feet from the door of your new chapel? When I am dead, I wish you would bury me near where that tree stands. Mrs. Lloyd will enclose the spot, and erect my tombstone there, where all your Sabbath worshipers can see it as they go up to worship. As they look at it, may be they will remember that the dead man came to preach to them. Thus I wish, hope and pray that my grave may preach the gospel when I am gone." The enclosure and the grave were made, according to the good man's wish, and on the tombstone are these words: "Weeping may endure for the night, but joy cometh in the morning."

Lloyd, Rev. John, deserves a prominent place among the devoted missionaries of the Church. He was born in Huntingdon county, Pa., October 1st, 1813, and graduated at Jefferson College, with distinction, in September, 1839. After teaching two years, he studied theology at Princeton Seminary. In the Autumn of 1843 he placed himself under the care of the Board of Foreign Missions, and the field of labor assigned to him was China. During his last session in the seminary he was licensed by the Presbytery of New York, but he transferred his relation to the Presbytery of Huntingdon, from which also he received ordination, a short time before departing on his mission.

Mr. Lloyd sailed from New York in company with three other missionaries, on the 22d of June, 1844, and arrived at Macao in October following. In November he proceeded to Amoy, where he became very happily associated with several missionaries, both from England and from the United States. He addressed himself now, with great diligence and success, to the study of the language, and soon acquired so much knowledge of it as to be able to enter advantageously upon his missionary work. He died, December 6th, 1848, just four years, to a day, from the time of his arrival at Amoy. Mr. Lloyd possessed a vigorous mind, an equable temperament, an amiable, generous spirit, and was earnestly devoted to the best interests of his fellow-men.

Locke, Nathanael C., D.D., was born in June, 1816, at Salem, N. J.; graduated at Middlebury College, Vermont, in 1838, and at Union Theological Seminary, New York, in 1844, and in the same year was licensed by New York Third Presbytery. Having received an invitation to visit the Eastern shore of Virginia, he labored with all the ardor of youth and the earnestness of a heart wholly given to Christ. His first church was Eastville, Northampton county, Va. He was ordained by East Hanover Presbytery, and was instrumental in gathering around him many influential and leading families in that region, and was greatly prospered. At the organization of the Central Church, Brooklyn, N. Y., in 1847, he became its pastor, and proved faithful and efficient, gaining the affections of his people and the confidence of his brethren. At the end of three years he took charge of the church at Hempstead, Long Island, where his labors were blessed with tokens of God's favor, until failing health compelled him to resign, in 1860. He died July 21st, 1862.

Dr. Locke was an earnest Christian. Eminently genial and social, possessed of a warm and generous heart, inspired with a manly and open disposition, that led him to the accomplishment of his purposes only by what was fair and honorable, with a mind well stored with a sincere love for all the great distinctive doctrines of the gospel, and a heart that meckly embraced them, and a faith that made them his own, he was at once the valued companion, the affectionate pastor and friend, the earnest and eloquent preacher, and the successful minister of Christ.

Lockridge, Rev. Andrew Y., was born March 4th, 1801, in Rockbridge county, Va. He graduated at Washington College, Virginia, in 1827; was licensed by the Presbytery of Lexington, in 1830; was ordained by the Presbytery of Concord, in April, 1831; was stated supply and pastor of Third Creek and Back Creek churches, North Carolina, 1830-45; was missionary of Presbytery among the Cherokees, Georgia, 1845-60, and was pastor of Chickamanga Church, Catoosa county, Ga., 1860-71. He died January 15th, 1876. He was a laborious, faithful and useful minister of the gospel.

Lockwood, Rev. Robinson Smiley, was born at Springfield, Vt., August 10th, 1806. He graduated at Middlebury College. By diligence and perseverance he became a fine classical and Belles Lettres scholar, adding to his collegiate course a knowledge of several of the modern languages. At different periods of his early life he completed courses of study in all three of the learned professions, divinity, law and medicine, and at different times practiced the same. His first pastoral charge was at Meadville, Pa. As an educator he was, at several times, Professor or Principal in different Institutions of learning. From 1851 to 1858 he resided in Mount Vernon, O. For a short time he was Mayor of that city. Mr. Lockwood died at Mount Vernon, August 20th, 1876. His last moments were soled by sincere and calm trust in the mercy of his Redeemer.

Logan, Rev. David Swift, the son of Joshua and Sabrina Logan, was born at Pittsburg, Pa., in 1831. He graduated, with honor, at Jefferson College, in 1854; studied theology at the Western Theological Seminary, and was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Allegheny City. For two years he preached in the churches of New Philadelphia and Ulrichville, Ohio, during which he performed much hard work. As pastor of the Church at Tiffin, Ohio, he labored with great zeal and earnestness and with much success. He died, September 15th, 1864. Mr. Logan was an earnest and affectionate preacher, and a faithful expounder of Divine truth. He was "a workman that needed not to be ashamed." He was also an edifying pastor. His piety was effusive, evenly, like a lamp abundantly replenished. He was, in the strictest sense, a Christian gentleman. His death was in perfect harmony with his life.

Logan, Rev. John Bovellet, the youngest son of James and Elizabeth (Vance) Logan, was born near Abingdon, Va., July 23d, 1818. He received his education mainly at the High School in Abingdon; was licensed to preach by the Quarterly Conference of Abingdon Station, Methodist Protestant Church, in 1842, and ordained deacon in 1844. After preaching eight years in that Denomination, he united with Holston Presbytery, Synod of Tennessee, of the then New School Presbyterian Church, and was ordained as an evangelist by this Presbytery, in April, 1851. His transfer to the Presbyterian body was but returning to his mother Church, as he had been brought up in the Presbyterian faith. His theological studies were not in connection with any seminary, but were directed by ministers of some note in both Denominations. His ministry has been partly in Southwest Virginia and East Tennessee, but largely in Central Indiana, where he has been for twenty-two years. He is, at present, stated supply of the Seventh Presbyterian Church of Indianapolis. Mr. Logan is earnest, emotional, and, at times, impassioned in preaching. He comes from the throne of grace to his pulpit, as one who delights in communion with God, and has great power in prayer, as in preaching the Word. His soul is full of music, and many attend his ministry who love to hear him sing, as well as preach and pray. He has been successful in gathering converts into the Church at Blountville, Tenn., Seymour, Kirklintown, Indianapolis, and wherever he has labored.

Logan, Samuel Crothers, D. D., was born December 21st, 1823, at Hanover, Ind.; was graduated from Hanover College (of which his father, George Logan, was a founder), August 31st, 1846; from Princeton Theological Seminary in May, 1850, and was licensed by the First Presbytery of New York in February, 1850. He was a missionary in Kentucky, Indiana and Michigan, in 1850; took charge of the mission field centering around Constantine, Mich., in December, 1850, and organized the Church of Constantine, with nine members, and a salary of eighty-four dollars for the first year. He was ordained by the Presbytery of Lake, April 14th, 1851. In 1851, by his efforts, the Church at Constantine was completed, and he was installed pastor of the congregation, with from eight to twelve preaching places, at which churches were afterwards organized. In May, 1857, he was pastor of the Fifth Church, Cincinnati, which in two years paid off its debt of eleven thousand dollars. In 1859 and 1860 he was stated supply of the Seventh Church in the same city. In 1860 he was called to Valparaiso, Ind., where he established the Collegiate Institute, and cared for both church and school.

Dr. Logan wrote the first paper in favor of the education of the Freedmen that passed the Assembly, in April, 1864, and secured its passage at Newark. By this action the Eastern and Western Committees on Freedmen were appointed at Philadelphia and Indianapolis. He was Secretary of the Western Committee, and sent the first missionaries to Tennessee, Alabama and Kansas, in 1864. May, 1865, he wrote the article consolidating the two committees into "The Assembly Committee on Freedmen," at Pittsburg. He held the office of Secretary from June 1, 1865 to July 1st, 1869, and organized about forty churches and eighty schools; established Wallingford Academy, Charleston; Biddle University at Charlotte, N. C., and Scotia Seminary at Concord, and with the help of the Government, raised and expended $71,000 in 1868. After supplying the First Presbyterian Church of Scranton, Pa., for some months, Dr. Logan became its pastor, in July, 1869, and continues in this relation to the present time. He is a staunch Presbyterian, thoroughly conversant with the doctrines and controversies of his Church. He is a gentleman of great charity, and an efficient, sympathizing pastor. He has a wonderful power of expressing clearly and correctly the doctrines of the Church, in ordinary language, free from the technicalities of the schools. His discourses are replete with passages of eloquence, and enlivened with fine descriptive powers. As a citizen he is of great influence where he resides, outside of his own congregation, and thoroughly interested in all public charities and measures of local importance. He is always found maintaining the "purity of the clergy," and deeply interested in measures for their temporal as well as spiritual welfare.

Logan, Rev. Thomas D., A. M. Parents, John T. and Henrietta B. Logan. Was born in the city of Allegheny, Pa., January 20th, 1851. Graduated at Lafayette College, Pa., 1869, and at Western Theological Seminary, 1874. Licensed by Presbytery of Allegheny, 1873. Ordained and installed pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church of Meadville, Pa., January 20th, A. D. 1875, over which he still presides. His sermons are delivered with clearness and force, showing marked ability, both in preparation and delivery. In all his ministry he has evinced such Christian manliness of character, ripe judgment and kindness of disposition, as to crown his labors, under the blessing of God, with gratifying success.

Log College. This was the first literary institution, above common schools, in the bounds of the Presbyterian Church in America. It was erected by the Rev. William Tennent, Sr., who, in 1726, became pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Neshaminy, in Bucks county, Pa., about twenty miles north of Philadelphia, and within a few steps of his own dwelling.

The spirit in which the institution was established augured well for its future. In Ireland and Scotland the signs of prevalent worldliness, foreshadowing a sad apostasy, were already apparent. In this country the primitive zeal of Makemie's compeers was already on the decline. "Revivals of religion were nowhere heard of, and an orthodox creed and a decent external conduct were the only points on which inquiry was made when persons were admitted to the communion of the Church." Vital piety had almost deserted the Church. The substance of preaching was a "dead orthodoxy," in which little emphasis was laid upon regeneration, a change of heart, or the terrors of the law against sin. With such a state of things Mr. Tennent had no sympathy. His warm evangelical spirit led him to strive, with all his energies, to effect a change. The young men who came under his influence in their course of education were inspirited to become his efficient allies.

The humble edifice which was to acquire such an enviable notoriety was made of logs, cut out of the woods, probably from the very spot where the house was erected. It has long since disappeared, so that although the site on which it stood is well known to many in the vicinity, there is not a vestige of it remaining on the ground, and no appearance which would indicate that a house ever stood there. Some owner of the property, never dreaming that there was anything sacred in the logs of this unpretending building, had them carried away and applied to some ignoble purpose on the farm, where they rotted away, like common timber. But that some small relic of this venerable edifice might be preserved, the Rev. Robert B. Belville, who was many years ago the Presbyterian minister of the place, rescued from the common ruin so much of one of these logs as enabled him, by paring off the decayed parts, to reduce it to something of the form of a walking staff, which, as a token of respect, and for safe keeping, he presented to the Rev. Samuel Miller, D. D., one of the oldest Professors of the Theological Seminary at Princeton, New Jersey.

The site of the Log College is about a mile from that part of Neshaminy Creek where the Presbyterian Church has long stood. The ground near and around it lies handsomely to the eye, and the more distant prospect is very beautiful; for, while there is a considerable extent of fertile, well cultivated land, nearly level, the view is bounded to the north and west by a range of hills, which have a very pleasing appearance.

There seems to be no written record of the existence of such an edifice as that we are describing, by any contemporary writer, except in the journal of the Rev. George Whitefield, the celebrated evangelist, who traversed this country several times, preaching everywhere, with a popularity and success which have never been equaled by any other. "The place," says Mr. Whitefield, "wherein the young men study now is, in contempt, called THE COLLEGE. It is a log house, about twenty feet long, and near as many broad, and, to me, it seemed to resemble the school of the old prophets, for their habitations were mean; and that they sought not great things for themselves is plain from those passages of Scripture wherein we are told that each of them took them a beam to build them a house; and that at the feast of the sons of the prophets, one of them put on the pot, whilst the others went to fetch some herbs out of the field. All that we can say of most of our universities is, they are glorious without. From this despised place seven or eight worthy ministers of Jesus have lately been sent forth, more are almost ready to be sent, and the foundation is now laying for the instruction of many others." The journal from which this extract is taken was printed in Philadelphia, by Benjamin Franklin, the same year (1739) in which Mr. Whitefield visited Mr. Tennent.

Notwithstanding the name College, as appears from this testimony, was given to the building out of contempt, by its enemies, in this, as in many other things, it is evident that what is lightly esteemed among men is precious in the sight of the Lord. Though as poor a house as perhaps was ever erected for the purpose of giving a liberal education, it was, in a noble sense, a College; a fountain from which proceeded streams of blessings to the Church. Dr. Archibald Alexander refers to the Institution as "of unspeakable importance to the Presbyterian Church in this country," and as "the germ from which proceeded the College of New Jersey." And the Rev. Matthew Brown, D.D., regarded it as not only the germ of New Jersey College, but several other colleges which have been useful to the Church and State, and have risen to high estimation in the country, such as Jefferson, Hampden-Sidney, and Washington College, in Virginia, all which were founded and taught originally by students from Princeton." Thus we see how much good may arise from a small beginning. "Let this fact," says Dr. Alexander, "encourage all who have it in their power, to institute good schools of useful and solid learning, and to be liberal in encouraging and endowing academies and colleges, and aiding poor scholars who possess talents to acquire a liberal education."

Long, Isaac Jasper, D.D., the fifth son and youngest child of Isaac and Lettie (Hamilton) Long, was born in Anderson District, South Carolina, February 23d, 1834. He graduated at Centre College, Danville, Ky., September 16th, 1858, with the second honor, in a class of twenty-seven. Immediately after his graduation he entered the Danville Theological Seminary. In 1859 he was selected as one of the joint Principals of the Preparatory Department of Centre College, which position he filled till June, 1860. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Transylvania, at Lebanon, Ky., April 12th, 1860. In October, 1860, he entered the Theological Seminary at Columbia, S. C., as a resident licentiate, and remained there a part of the following Winter and Spring. In April, 1861, he accepted an invitation to supply the Concord Church, in Sumter District, S. C., where he was ordained by the Presbytery of Harmony, and installed pastor, October 31st, 1861.

In July, 1866, at the suggestion of the General Assembly's Committee of Domestic Missions, Dr. Long visited Arkansas, for the purpose of collecting information and looking after the interests of the scattered and feeble churches then in the State. Resigning his pastoral charge, he removed to Batesville, in the early part of 1867, to be the only Presbyterian minister in fifteen large counties, without the promise of a dollar from any source, save the assurance of a few that they would do what they could.

Dr. Long founded an academy in Batesville, by securing teachers and boarding them, partly without compensation, besides giving a part of his own time to the work. This constituted the nucleus around which was formed Arkansas College, organized in 1872. Dr. Long was elected its first President, which place he still fills (1883). He has also filled the Professorship of Ancient Languages and Moral Science, under which is included Biblical and Ecclesiastical History. As a preacher, he is a thoughtful, deliberate speaker, a profound theologian and logician. He is a most thorough educator. His scholarship, integrity and piety are unquestioned. Besides his pastoral work in Batesville Church, during all those years, he has performed a vast amount of missionary labor in the regions around. Dr. Long is a most useful citizen. He takes an active and earnest interest in every movement that relates to the public good, and is held in high esteem by the community. His past record is one of energy, self-sacrifice, and eminent devotion to the Master's work, and has laid the foundation of enlarged usefulness in the years which may yet await him.

Long Island—Presbytery of.—

[The following well written historical sketch has been kindly furnished us by the Rev. Dr. Ephier Whitaker. We would have been pleased if it had been a little shorter, but as it relates to a most interesting portion of our Church's operations, and as Dr. Whitaker says he has "condensed it so as to put a year's history of the Presbytery into every forty-five words," we cheerfully comply with his request that it be "printed as it was written."]

In 1716 the ministers of the Presbytery in America determined to form several Presbyteries and a Synod. The Rev. George Macnish was pastor of the Church of Jamaica, L. I., whose Presbyterian organization is the oldest of all the Presbyterian churches of the country, though the present Presbyterian churches of Southold and Southampton were organized as town churches at an earlier date. The Rev. Samuel Pomeroy was the pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Newton, L. I. These two ministers were instructed to do their best to induce some other ministers on Long Island to unite with them in forming a Presbytery of Long Island. This was accomplished the next year, when the Rev. George Phillips, of Setauket joined them, and on the 17th of April, 1717, they met at Southampton, and ordained the Rev. Samuel Galston to be the pastor of the church in that town. The original Presbytery had approved the call to him by the Southampton Church, during the preceding year.

The churches of this Presbytery had been long in existence before they became united under the Presbytery. Southampton Church was organized in November, 1640, and the others within twenty years thereafter. They were all churches of English Puritans, and the ministers were called and their salaries paid by the respective towns. The towns of Brookhaven and Smithtown, and some in the Manor of St. George, called the Rev. George Phillips, April 30th, 1697. He was a graduate of Harvard College, and belonged to the great and beneficent Massachusetts family of this name, being a son of the Rev. George Phillips, who was the first pastor of Watertown, from 1630 to 1644. The Church of Southold, subsequently connected with the Presbytery, was organized as a town church, October 21st, 1640. It is the oldest church now in connection with the General Assembly. Easthampton, Bridgehampton, Huntington, Hempstead and Mattituck are also very old Puritan town churches. Some of them were Presbyterian from their origin. The first minister of Mattituck was Joseph Lamb, a graduate of Yale, who was ordained in 1717, by the Presbytery, and two years later the church united with it. These early Long Island churches were never Congregational churches of the modern type of Congregationalism. This original Presbytery of Long Island continued twenty-one years. It was, in 1738, united with other ministers and churches in New York and East Jersey to form the Presbytery of New York. Its records are lost. Its real successor, though not the legal inheritor of its records, was the Presbytery of Suffolk, which was self-organized at Southampton, April 8th, 1717. The ministers who organized it were Ebenezer White, Nathaniel Mather, Ebenezer Prime, Ebenezer Gould, Silvanus White, Samuel Buell. Members of the churches of Easthampton, Bridgehampton and Southampton, on the south side of the island, and of Mattituck and Cutchogue, on the north side, formally united, the next day, with the ministers, in their undertaking to bring the churches of Suffolk county, so far as practicable, into Presbyterian order. The three churches of the Hamptons forthwith acceded. This Presbytery determined at the same time that it would, in due season, send delegates to the Synod of New York, and the Rev. Messrs. Prime and Buell were chosen for the purpose.

The Presbytery of Suffolk grew and prospered, though it speedily lost two of its members; for within a year the Rev. Ebenezer Gould returned to his native New England and the Rev. Nathaniel Mather died. But it soon received under its care various churches in Suffolk county, and other parts of Long Island, and even beyond the island. Its activity is indicated by such proceedings as these: March 30th, 1748, it took under its care the Church of Huntington. June 15th, 1748, it ordained and installed the Rev. James Browne pastor of Bridgehampton, in place of the reverend and venerable Ebenezer White, resigned. Mr. Browne was a graduate of Yale. September 21st, 1748, it united with other ministers in the installation of the Rev. William Throop, of the First Church of Southold. October 19th, 1748, it voted to forego its desire to be represented in the Synod of New York by delegates, only until the Synod's purpose of becoming a delegated body should be accomplished. The next day it licensed Nehemiah Greenman, A. B., of Yale, and a beneficiary of the Rev. David Brainard, and directed him to preach at Moriches. December 20th, 1748, it licensed Thomas Paine, A. B., of Yale, and directed him to preach at Cutchogue. April 13th, 1749, it licensed John Darbe, A. B., of Yale, and directed him to preach at Mattituck and Aquebogue. August 9th, 1749, the Rev. Azariah Horton, of New York Presbytery, and the Rev. David Youngs, of New Brunswick Presbytery, became members of the Body, according to its request and the vote of the Synod. Both were graduates of Yale College. Horton was the missionary to the Long Island Indians. Youngs was the pastor of Brookhaven. Both were Southold men. The next day it licensed Naphtali Daggett, A. B., of Yale, and directed him to preach at Smithtown. December 11th, 1749, it ordered Mr. Greenman to leave Mastich and Fire Place, and on the fourth of the next April dismissed him to the New York Presbytery, to preach at South Hanover (Madison, N. J.), to the new society there. At this time, Mr. Jonathan Whitaker, in behalf of the people of Baskingridge, desired a candidate, but the Presbytery was not able to send one. May 22d, 1751, Rev. Samuel Sackett was admitted from the New Brunswick Presbytery. On the 18th of September, 1751, the Church of Smithtown was organized and the Rev. Naphtali Daggett ordained its pastor. He was afterwards President of Yale College. May 27th, 1752, it approved of the call which Mattituck and Aquebogue gave to the Rev. Joseph Park, of New England, and on the 10th of the next month organized the Church of Union Parish, Mattituck and Aquabogue, and installed the Rev. Joseph Park the pastor thereof. April 4th, 1753, it dismissed the Rev. Samuel Sackett from the pastoral care of Bedford, and approved Hanover's call to him. January 2d, 1754, it ordained Eliphalet Ball, A. M., of Yale, and installed him pastor of Bedford. June 6th, 1754, it exhorted those of its churches that had no ruling elders to elect them. October 23d, 1754, it ordained Benjamin Talmadge, A. M., of Yale, at large, and approved of the preaching of Abner Reeve, A. B., of Yale, a licentiate, at Moriches and Ketchabounuck. November 6th, 1755, the Presbytery incorporated the Church of Moriches, the act taking place in the Western Meeting-house, and ordained the Rev. Abner Reeves to be the pastor thereof. The Rev. Ebenezer White, of Bridgehampton, died between February and June, 1756, and about the same time the Rev. Azariah Horton became the minister of South Hanover, New Jersey. On the 10th of November, 1755, the Presbytery ordained the Rev. Jonathan Barber, M. D., and the Rev. John Darbe, M. D., both having received the degree of A. M. at Yale College. June 14th, 1758, it ordered its members, in succession, to supply the pulpit of Jamaica while its pastor, the Rev. Elihu Spencer, was absent as a chaplain in the army during the campaign then in progress against the French and the Indians. The next day it ordained the Rev. Abner Brush, A. B., of Nassau Hall, and among its candidates or licentiates, about this time, were Messrs. Benjamin Conkline, Ezra Horton, Moses Baldwin and Wheeler Case, all of them graduates of Nassau Hall. On the 16th of November, 1758, it ordained the Rev. Moses Baldwin; and on the 30th of August, 1759, the Rev. Sampson Occum, and ordered him to pursue his ministry at Montauk, and among the other Indians. The Rev. Elihu Spencer became, by order of the Synod, a member of the Presbytery, October 9th, 1759, and the next day the Presbytery ordained the Rev. Ezra Reeve, an alumnus of Yale College.

These are specimens of the acts of the Presbytery which made it efficient and thrifty and the churches fruitful.

The Synod, in 1763, transferred its Westchester county ministers and churches to the newly self-organized Presbytery of Dutchess; for Dutchess Presbytery, like Suffolk Presbytery, and others, sprung up spontaneously, without any action of Synod. They were due to the Anglo-Saxon organizing genius, and the Christian affection and desire for fraternal fellowship which ruled them. Many of the churches had the same local and spontaneous origin.

On the 16th of June, 1763, the Presbytery admitted the Rev. Thomas Paine, of Cutchogue, to membership, and received the Church of Christ in Cutchogue under its care. On the 25th of October, 1763, it determined that it would appoint the day for the annual fast in the Spring and the annual thanksgiving in the Autumn. Nothing is more characteristic of the Presbytery at this time than the frequency with which it appoints its pastors to supply its vacant churches. June 27th, 1761, the Rev. Benjamin Goldsmith, an alumnus of Yale College, was ordained at Aukabang. In this year the Rev. Messrs. Darbe and Brush were transferred to the Presbytery of New York, by order of the Synod; at the same time the Rev. Mr. Baldwin was transferred to the Presbytery of Boston, and the Rev. Abner Reeve to the Presbytery of New York.

The Presbytery sometimes found it impracticable to maintain order in here and there a church, and now and then a minister was unruly. The churches in need of pastors were often advised to apply to other Presbyteries or Associations, and no preference seems to have been entertained for the former. In 1765 a collection was ordered in all the churches, for the support of the Rev. Sampson Occum among the Indians; and on the 30th of October, in this year, the Presbytery made a record in these words: "Whereas a motion is made by certain of the Board of the Honorable Correspondents in Connection for Indian Affairs, to this Presbytery, desiring that the Rev. Sampson Occum may be recommended with a special view to his going to Europe, without judging or determining of the expedience of Mr. Occum's going as aforesaid, this Presbytery recommendeth him as one they ordained with special relation to the Indians, and certify that he is of good moral life and of good standing in this Presbytery, and are entirely willing that the Board, as aforesaid, improve him in their service for a time, as they may think proper."

December 4th, 1765, the Presbytery ordained the Rev. David Rose, a graduate of Yale, to be pastor of Moriches, Manor of St. George, south part of Brookhaven and Winthrop's Patent. June 11th, 1766, Elam Potter, A. B., of Yale, was ordained at Shelter Island. Though the Presbytery had not a full supply of ministerial service for its own wants, yet one of the best pastors was sent this year to preach in the "Southern Provinces;" and it was ordered that collections be made for the promoting of Christian knowledge among the Indians and the poor white people upon the frontiers. The church of Middletown and the church of Hempstead were taken under the care of the Presbytery, November 4th, 1767, the former being a new organization. At this time a licentiate was directed to supply Shelter Island, Ketchabounuck, Middletown and Hempstead. April 6th, 1768, notice was taken of an order of Synod, enjoining the Presbyteries to erect Societies for the Reformation of Manners, and the ministers of the Presbytery were ordered to erect such societies in their respective congregations as soon as possible. In these years the Presbytery habitually appointed three ministers to attend the meetings of the Synod; but in later years it appointed two only. In 1770, it sent one of its pastors to the "Southern Provinces."

and other pastors were ordered to supply his pulpit during his absence. The Presbytery often directed its churches to apply to the Rev. Dr. Bellamy, President Daggett, or other well known ministers in New England, for candidates to supply their respective pulpits.

The Presbytery was prevented from meeting, by "civil war," during a period extending from October 31st, 1775, to April 1th, 1784, when the Moderator, the Rev. Samuel Buell, opened his house for it, in Easthampton, and four of the nine ministers and one ruling elder were present. During the nine years of the "civil war" Rev. Messrs. Prime and White had died; the Rev. Benjamin Talmadge died between December, 1785, and April, 1786. April 13th, 1787, the Presbytery unanimously voted to present a petition to the Synod for a dismissal from that venerable body, because of numerous inconveniences resulting from its local situation, and because it was supposed its churches would not consent to the plan of government and discipline lately devised for the Presbyterian churches in America. On the same day the Rev. John Storrs and the church and congregation under his pastoral care, at Southold, mutually applied to this Presbytery, as an Ecclesiastical Council, requesting the dissolving of his pastoral relation to them, and the request was granted.

The Synod appointed a committee to confer with the Presbytery, and the conference took place at Huntington, September 6th, 1787. The result was that the Presbytery determined to reconsider its purpose to withdraw from the fellowship of the Presbyterian Church. On the 8th and 9th of April, 1788, this subject was reconsidered, and the Presbytery voted to revoke its petition for a dismissal from Synod. At this time the ministers present were Buell, Wetmore, Rose, Hart, Woodhull and Woolworth. The absentees were Brown, Goldsmith, Williams, Russell, Potter and Occum. The only delegates present from the churches were Nathan Woodhull and Nehemiah Smith.

Aaron Woolworth was ordained, by a Council, pastor of Bridgehampton, August 30th, 1787. He forthwith became a member of the Presbytery, and very prominent and efficient in its activities. It adopted, in April, 1789, for the first time, standing rules to direct its proceedings. At the same meeting, the Rev. Messrs. Joshua Hart and Joshua Williams were appointed the Commissioners to the first General Assembly. The last meeting of the Presbytery of Suffolk of which there is a record was held at Bridgehampton, June 23d, 1789, for the ordination of the Rev. David Hale.

Its name was subsequently changed by the Synod. It was named the Presbytery of Long Island, and all the churches on Long Island were put under its care. The first meeting of this Presbytery of Long Island was held in Jamaica, November 30th, 1790. The ministers present were Noah Wetmore, David Rose, Joshua Hart, George Faintout, Nathan Woodhull, and Aaron Woolworth. The ministers absent were Samuel Buell, Benjamin Goldsmith, Elam Potter, Joshua Williams, Thomas Russell, and Wait Cornwell. Four elders were present, namely, Jeffrey Smith, Smithtown; Benjamin Coe, Newtown; Uriah Beadle, Hempstead; and Daniel Sayre, Southampton.

The Presbytery, on the 19th of September, 1794, examined for the first time the records of some of the church Sessions; but the proceedings of the Presbytery in conference with the church of Southampton, November 5th and 6th, 1795, show, that even in this church there was no Session, and that the church acted without an eldership in dealing with offenders; and that church and minister maintained the half-way covenant. June 8th, 1795, it was ordered, that Sessional records be presented at the next stated meeting. October 16th, 1795, a roll of the Presbytery, for the use of Synod, was ordered for the first time. November 3d, 1795, "the concert of prayer, now existing and acted upon extensively in the country," was approved and commended. April 19th, 1796, the organization of a church at Brookfield was reported. April 19th, 1796, the Rev. Aaron Woolworth was elected Stated Clerk, to succeed Herman Daggett, who had succeeded David Rose. October 12th, 1796, the organization of a church at Fresh Pond was reported. October 13th, 1796, the order for the presentation of Sessional records was continued. April 12th, 1797, the Church of Islip and Huntington South was received under the care of the Presbytery. One Session, that of Huntington, presented its records for review. June 7th, 1797, the Rev. Joseph Hazard was ordained and installed pastor of the First Church of Southold, which was not then a Presbyterian Church, nor under the care of the Presbytery, but had asked this service from the Presbytery. September 26th, 1797, notice was given that a motion would be made at the next session of Synod to divide Long Island Presbytery. The next day the people of Patchogue applied for supplies, and several members of the Presbytery were ordered to supply them with preaching. The following day the same request was made by the congregation of Oyster Ponds (Orient), with the same result.

It is in these last years of the century that the proceedings and the records begin to present a modern form, with some considerable resemblance to the characteristics of the present time. Money, for instance, begins to be denoted in dollars and cents in 1798. The exact date of the day and month of the death of a member is first given, October 10th, 1798, when it was recorded that the Rev. Dr. Buell died, July 19th, 1798. October 11th, 1798, the printed Extracts from the Minutes of the General Assembly were examined for the first time. At this date the supplies for Patchogue were continued, according to the request of the people; and it was determined to urge the petition already before Synod for a division of the Presbytery. The Rev. David Rose died January 1st, 1799. Mr. Lyman Beecher was taken under the care of the Presbytery April 11th, 1799. It was voted, August 20th, 1799, that Synod be requested to defer the division of the Presbytery for the present. Committees for the examination of candidates were appointed for the first time August 22d, 1799. Mr. Beecher was ordained September 5th, 1799, and the next April chosen one of the Commissioners to the General Assembly of 1800, who were instructed to move, in that body, for the publication thereafter of more full and particular account of the labors and success of the missionaries to the frontiers. The several ministers were ordered, in April, 1802, to take the best measures to collect money for rebuilding the College of New Jersey. Mr. Nathanael S. Prime was taken under the care of the Presbytery April 24th, 1805. In these early years of the century missions and a supply of ministers became prominent in the proceeding of the Presbytery, and so did discipline for intemperance. Mr. Richard Salter Storrs, grandson of the Southold pastor, and the eminent son and father of eminent ministers of the same name, was taken under the care of the Presbytery April 13th, 1808. He preached from these words: "He that walketh with wise men shall be wise." On the 16th of June he was licensed; and the record thereof was made, for the first time in the history of the Presbytery, according to the requirement of the Form of Government.

In 1808 and 1809 the Presbytery was involved in a controversy with the convention of Long Island, a body of ministers that had admitted into its membership a minister of the Presbytery while he was on trial under charge of manifold and extreme immoralities, for which he was soon condemned as guilty, and deposed from the ministry. The continuance of this man in the Convention, as a member, impelled the Presbytery, on the 13th of April, 1809, to resolve, "that it is inconsistent for the members of this body to hold ministerial communion with the Convention so long as they retain their present course." The prominent members of the Presbytery manifested their spiritual earnestness and their intellectual vigor in this controversy; and not only the official documents, but also the private letters of the Rev. Messrs. George Faitoute, Aaron Woolworth, Lyman Beecher and Jonathan Huntingt, written on this subject to each other, attest the mental force, the sound judgment and the Christian zeal of these men. Their course was more than justified in the result. The Convention has long since passed out of existence; but, on the 18th of November, 1812, it condemned its own former course in this matter, and fellowship between it and the Presbytery was thus restored. At this time the Presbytery had more than one-third as many candidates under its care as there were ministers in it, and was energetically providing for others.

October 24th, 1809, the Rev. Nathanael S. Prime was ordained at Huntington.

Hitherto the Presbytery had afforded supplies from time to time, with great freedom and liberality, to many neighborhoods and vacant churches, with very little or no pecuniary compensation for traveling expenses and services. It now determined that henceforth regular and adequate compensation should be made for supplies; and that supplies having charges should pay all the compensation received, except traveling expenses, into the fund for the education of candidates for the ministry. In April, 1810, the Presbytery determined to print and circulate pamphlets and tracts; and the Rev. Dr. Aaron Woolworth and the Rev. David S. Bogart were appointed to conduct the business of selecting, editing, publishing and distributing pamphlets and tracts to promote the interests of religion. In the Autumn of 1809 the Synod transferred the churches of Jamaica, Hempstead and Newtown, with the ministers, George Faitoute, William P. Knuyers, Nathaniel Woodhull, Peter Fish, to the Presbytery of New York, and the bounds of the Presbytery of Long Island were reduced to the territory of Suffolk county. May 2d, 1810, the Presbytery installed the Rev. Lathrop Thompson pastor of the Congregational Church of Cutchogue. The Rev. Benjamin Goldsmith died, November 19th, 1810, in the seventy-fifth year of his age, forty-fifth of his ministry. April 9th, 1811, the church of Sag Harbor was received into connection with the Presbytery. It was a church of spontaneous origin. On the 15th of May, 1811, the Rev. Messrs. Thompson and Huntingt presented a report, which was adopted, as follows: "Each minister of this Presbytery who is not incapacitated by age shall annually perform thirteen days of missionary labor, in the month which the Presbytery, at their semi-annual meeting, shall appoint, in the vacant congregations in our connection and in those of other Denominations where he shall be regularly invited. It shall be the duty of each minister to commence his tour on the Monday preceding the third Sabbath in the month, to preach one or more lectures in each place of the aforesaid description; to use his utmost exertions to promote the order and discipline of the churches under our care; to visit schools and private families as far as practicable; to distribute Bibles and religious tracts, and on the Sabbath to administer the Lord's Supper, if convenient, and to catechise the children in the congregation where he shall preach. Each minister shall, in his tour, defray his own expenses, and faithfully appropriate all the moneys which he may receive to the Education Fund. He shall keep a journal, which shall be exhibited to the Presbytery at the next meeting." This system of missionary labor was continued for a considerable time; but was slightly modified a year later. November 5th, 1811, the Presbytery voted unanimously to admit delegates of Congregational churches having Presbyterian pastors to seats in the Presbytery, as ruling elders, in the spirit of the General Assembly's Plan of Union. Such delegates had previously been admitted to seats in this Presbytery, as corresponding members. November 6th, 1811, the Presbytery "Resolved, unanimously, that hereafter, ardent spirits and wine shall constitute no part of our entertainment in any of our public meetings; and also, that it be recommended to the churches not to treat Christian brethren or others with ardent spirits as a part of hospitality in friendly visits." "Dr Woolworth and Mr. Prime were appointed a committee to draft a letter to be addressed to the churches on the subject of the above resolution," and a forcible and eloquent letter was written, and adopted by the Presbytery. The next day it was voted to change the practice of the body in paying the expenses of its own commissioners to the General Assembly, and thereafter to pay the money for the purpose into the fund of the General Assembly for the purpose. April 9th, 1812, the Church of Shelter Island asked and obtained admission into connection with the Presbytery. April 15th, 1813, the Presbytery, for the first time, prepared a narrative of the state of religion in their churches. April 19th, 1815, the first record was made of the opposition of a school officer to catechetical instruction in the common schools. April 21st, 1819, "Mr. John Bellows informed the Presbytery that a Presbyterian Church had recently been formed in the vicinity of the Canoe Place; that he was appointed by that church, as an elder, to make this report, and request that it might be received into connection with this Presbytery. Resolved that the above request be granted, and that this church be received as a constituent member of this Body." The Rev. Dr. Aaron Woolworth died April 2d, 1821, in the fifty-eighth year of his age and thirty-fourth of his ministry. The Presbytery, April 19th, 1821, unanimously adopted every chapter, section and article of the Revised Form of Government, except the word "Latin," in Chapter xiv, Section iv, Article i, which was unanimously rejected, with the exception of one member. The Rev. Joshua Hart died October 2d, 1828, in the eighty-ninth year of his age and fifty-seventh of his ministry. The Rev. Messrs. Amzi Francis and Daniel Beers were appointed, April 21st, 1830, to draft a Confession of Faith and a form of Covenant for the use of our churches, agreeably to the Standards of the Presbyterian Church. This draft was reported, amended and adopted, September 1st, 1830, and the same committee was directed to have it printed for the use of the churches, and three thousand copies were printed. It has been used fifty years. The statistical report this year gives the total communicants as follows: Brookhaven, 52; Shelter Island, 50; Easthampton, 251; Sag Harbor, 131; Westhampton and Union Parish, 120; Middletown and South Haven, 119; Bridgehampton, 121; Smithtown, 13; Fresh Pond and Islip, 112. The whole number in the Presbytery, 1154. The number added during the year was, on examination, 4; certificates, 1; baptisms, 26 infants. Contributions for missions, $92.40; for General Assembly, etc., $26.90; for ministerial education, $10.00. Ministers 14, licentiates, 3.

June 15th, 1831, the Rev. Messrs. Jonathan Hunting and Ezra Youngs and Elder William Wells were appointed to organize the Franklinville Church, and on the 31st of August they reported that they had done it. It was voted to pay the expenses of their own commissioners, and to put the surplus of the collections into the treasury of the General Assembly. The Rev. Messrs. Ithamar Pillsbury and Ezra King and Messrs. Blydenburg and Laws, elders, were appointed a committee to organize a church at Moriches. This was done, November 14th, 1831. The Church at Southold requested, April 18th, 1832, to be taken under the care of the Presbytery, and the request was granted. The years 1831-1833 were marked by revivals in nearly all the churches, and in these two years six hundred and twenty-two communicants were added to them. The Rev. Messrs. Hunting, Robinson and Fuller, and Elders Haines and Case were appointed, August 29th, 1832, to organize a Church at Greenport. This was done, February 7th, 1833. At the same time the Presbytery voted to request the Synod to divide the Presbytery. This request was granted, and the churches and ministers in the four western towns of Suffolk county were constituted the Second Presbytery of Long Island, and those in the five eastern towns remained the Presbytery of Long Island. On the 17th of April, 1833, the latter body "recommended to its members entire abstinence from the use of tobacco in all its forms." August 28th, 1833, the first step was taken for the use of a docket of business. September 18th, 1833, the Rev. Messrs. Jesse Lockwood and John Stocker were ordained as missionaries to the heathen. April 16th, 1834, the Rev. Daniel M. Lord was ordained to be the minister of the Mariners' Church of Boston. His sermon was from the text, "The sea gave up the dead which were in it." In the Autumn, notice was made of the death of the Rev. Jesse Lockwood, within a year of his ordination, and the beginning of his labors among the Indians. The Presbytery's action with reference to the division of the Presbyterian Church by the General Assembly of 1837 was considerate and clear, both in April and August, 1838, and the vote of the Presbytery was two to one against the division. Two ministers and two elders protested against the Presbytery's action. In April, 1839, to preserve its integrity and to promote fraternal regards among its members, the Presbytery resolved to send no commissioners to the General Assembly. The next year, it sent the Rev. Jonathan Hunting and Elder Hezekiah Skidmore to the General Assembly, in the First Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia. In August, 1840, notice was taken that four ministers had withdrawn from the Presbytery, and their names were stricken from the roll. This minority was recognized the previous Autumn, by the Synod of New York, and continued as the Presbytery of Long Island." They were soon united with the Second Presbytery of Long Island, by the Synod of New York, "under the style of the Presbytery of Long Island." The majority retained its name, organization and records, and formed a part of the Synod of New York and New Jersey. These two Presbyteries of the same name remained side by side for thirty years. The one whose succession was unbroken was very active for many subsequent years in affording aid to the Union Theological Seminary. In April, 1816, it first made an assessment on its churches, in proportion to the number of their respective communicants, for the expenses of the General Assembly. The rate was five and a half cents for each communicant. June 28th, 1848, the Church of Catebogue, according to its unanimous request, was taken under the care of the Presbytery. May 1st, 1850, at the request of the Congregational Church of Orient, it installed one of its members, the Rev. Henry Clark, pastor of that church. April 18th, 1851, it "resolved, that we will double our diligence to spread before the people those facts and arguments which have rendered it our deliberate opinion that the traffic in intoxicating liquors, as a beverage, ought to be prohibited by law." In this year it was deemed necessary to begin a correspondence with the American Home Missionary Society, and also with the American Seamen's Friend Society, in respect to the principles of their expenditure, within its bounds, of funds to which its churches contributed. It was thenceforth active, with others, in causing the General Assembly to organize better agencies for missionary work—agencies of the General Assembly's own appointment and under its own control. August 25th, 1863, the Rev. Abraham Luce preached a sermon on what God had wrought during the half century of his ministry. April 18th, 1865, the Presbytery welcomed a committee of the other Presbytery of Long Island, with an overture on "a movement towards the union of the two great bodies of the Presbyterian Church, at some time not far distant." The chairman of this committee was invited to preach before the Presbytery, and the invitation was accepted. A committee was appointed "to attend the next meeting of the Long Island Presbytery of the other branch," and to present fraternal salutations. April 19th, 1865, the Presbytery being in session, it devoted one hour "to religious services appropriate to the funeral of Abraham Lincoln, late President of the United States."

Reunion was considered, April 17th, 1866, on a communication from the Long Island Presbytery of the other branch, and an overture in favor of it was ordered to be sent to the General Assembly. August, 1867, all the churches except one having manses, an effort was made to place a good library in each manse, to be maintained there perpetually, for the pastor's use. August, 1868, the General Assembly's overture for reunion was unanimously adopted. The next April, similar action was taken. August 31st, 1869, the Presbytery unanimously approved the Basis of Reunion adopted by the General Assemblies that met in New York in the previous May. April 19th, 1870, the Moderator of the Long Island Presbytery of the other branch preached the opening sermon. The Presbytery unanimously sent an overture to the General Assembly in favor of the formation of a Synod of Long Island.

Reunion.—The Presbytery met in Southold, August 16th, 1870, by order of the Synod of Long Island. The Rev. Wm. B. Reeve was elected Moderator, and the Rev. Epher Whitaker, who had been the Stated Clerk during the previous fourteen years, was re-elected. He continues in the same office now (1883). Various committees were appointed and energetic measures were adopted, to raise the Presbytery's full share of five millions of dollars as a thank-offering for the reunion. The Presbytery consisted of twenty-one ministers and twenty-four churches, and its field was the East end of Long Island, as far West as the East side of Huntington, Suffolk county.

November 9th, 1870, the Presbytery organized the Church of Port Jefferson. In April, 1871, it was reported that the churches were giving about ten dollars for each communicant towards the thank-offering of five millions of dollars. October 18th, 1871, the Church of Yaphaule was organized. April 15th, 1874, the Presbytery voted that a Sabbath-school Institute must be held for half a day, at least, every six months, at the stated meetings of the body. This rule has been observed for ten years, and is unrepealed. April 14th, 1875, the General Assembly's overture for the term of service of ruling elders was approved. On the same day it was voted, that any church member who sells intoxicating liquors, as a beverage, is subject to discipline. May 17th, 1875, the Church of Holbrook was organized. September 28th, 1875, the Church of Speonk was dissolved. September 25th, 1877, the Presbytery organized supplies, at its own expense, for religious services at the Suffolk County Almshouse. In later years the county has made an appropriation for this purpose. September 15th, 1880, the Presbytery elected the Rev. Epher Whitaker, Selah B. Strong, Esq., Judge Henry P. Hedges, William R. Post, Esq., and the Rev. William H. Littell, trustees, for the incorporation of the Presbytery, under the laws of the State of New York; directed them to arrange themselves in classes, so that one trustee should be elected each year, to serve five years thereafter; and also to elect officers and effect the incorporation. Accordingly Selah B. Strong, Esq., was chosen President; the Rev. William H. Littell, Secretary; and the Rev. Epher Whitaker, Treasurer; a corporate seal was procured, and the incorporation effected. April 12th, 1882, the Rev.

Dr. William B. Reeve resigned the office of Treasurer of the Presbytery, and the most grateful acknowledgments were made for the kindness, courtesy, faithfulness and efficiency of his fulfillment of the duties of the office for the long period of twenty-eight consecutive years. The Rev. William H. Littell was chosen to succeed him. September 13th, 1883, notice was taken of the formation of "The Woman's Home and Foreign Missionary Society of the Presbytery of Long Island," with the following officers, namely: President, Miss Amelia Smith, of Longwood, Yaphank P. O.; Vice Presidents, Mrs. P. R. Reilly, Bridgehampton; Mrs. Emma J. Huntington, Southampton; Miss Mary Hubbard Howell, Quogue; Corresponding Secretary, Mrs. H. M. Whitaker, Southold; Treasurer, Miss Sarah J. Adams, Greenport. This Society was commended to the churches.

Since the organization of the Presbytery, the growth of Presbyterianism on its field—the part of Long Island settled by English people—has more than kept pace with the increase of population; and throughout the present nineteenth century the advance of our Church has relatively far outstripped the progress of the whole population. At the beginning of this century there were fifteen ministers and fifteen churches, extending from Easthampton to Newtown. Most of the churches were severally small and feeble. Now there are on the same field forty-eight ministers and forty-five churches. The population has increased threefold; the churches fivefold in number, and even more in strength, efficiency and excellence.

Loomis, Harmon, D. D., was born at Georgia, Vt., October 26th, 1805, and graduated at the University of Vermont in 1832. He pursued his theological studies mainly in Andover and Princeton seminaries, and was licensed by the Northwestern Congregational Association of Vermont, October 10th, 1834. In 1836 he became stated supply of the Union Presbyterian Church in New York city, which he served for nearly a year. He was ordained by a Congregational Council at Vergennes, Vt., August 31st, 1836. As Chaplain for the American Seaman's Friend Society of New York, he began preaching, January 8th, 1837, to seamen in the city of New Orleans, in which work he continued four years. From the beginning of 1841 to March, 1845, he was stated supply to the Presbyterian Church at Mt. Joy, Pa. From March 1st, 1845, until October 1st, 1871, he was Corresponding Secretary of the American Seaman's Friend Society in New York, and labored with uncommon zeal and success. From the latter date he resided in Brooklyn, N. Y., leading a retired life, and occasionally supplying churches in various places, as opportunity was afforded him. He was also actively engaged in promoting the cause of Temperance, and in various literary labors, having published a number of volumes and pamphlets. He died January 19th, 1880.

Dr. Loomis was a man of sincere and earnest piety, of great zeal and activity of mind, of large reading and most industrious habits. His long and faithful labors on behalf of seamen entitle him to be placed in the front rank of their benefactors.

Lord, John Chase, D.D., was born at Washington, New Hampshire, August 9th, 1805. He graduated at Hamilton College, N. Y., in 1825, and immediately after went to Buffalo, where he studied law, and practiced successfully about two years. He studied theology at Auburn Seminary, 1831-3. He was ordained by Buffalo Presbytery, September 4th, 1833; was pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church, Geneseo, N. Y., 1833-5, and pastor of the Central Presbyterian Church, Buffalo, N. Y., from its organization, 1835-73. Here his labors were largely blessed, more than a thousand members having been received into the Church during his pastorate. Dr. Lord died at Buffalo, January 21st, 1877. He was Moderator of the General Assembly at Charleston, S. C., in 1852. He published "Lectures to Young Men," "Lectures on Civilization," etc., a volume of occasional poems, besides a great number of sermons, essays, and contributions to periodicals.

Lord, Willis, D.D., LL.D., was born at Bridgeport, Conn., on the 15th of September, 1809. His parents, Daniel and Anna (Choate) Lord, were originally of Norwich. Rev. Benjamin Lord, D.D., for many years a trustee of Yale College, was his father's grandfather. Having graduated at Williams College, in 1833, he at once entered the Seminary at Princeton, where he remained till the completion of his theological course. His first pastoral charge was at New Hartford, in his native State. In 1840 he became pastor of the Penn Square Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, where he remained till 1850, when he accepted a call to the Broadway Presbyterian Church, Cincinnati. This charge he resigned four years later, owing to impaired health. When sufficiently restored to resume work, he accepted the pastorate of the Second Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn, N. Y., left vacant by the death of the Rev. Dr. J. S. Spencer, and there remained until chosen, by the General Assembly, Professor of Biblical and Ecclesiastical History in the Seminary of the Northwest, at Chicago. Subsequently, in 1867, he was transferred to the Chair of Didactic and Polemic Theology in the same Institution.

At the time when the University of Wooster was organized, in 1870, he was called to the presidency, and remained at the head of this rapidly growing and prosperous Institution, until, in 1873, he was compelled, by declining health, to ask release. He subsequently accepted temporary charge of the Central Presbyterian Church of Denver; then, in 1877, of the First Presbyterian Church of Columbus, O., and is now residing at College Springs, Colorado.

Dr. Lord is a man of dignified, graceful and attractive manners, extensive reading and accurate scholarship. He has the faculty of interesting and strongly impressing those with whom he comes in contact in social life. His style in preaching is clear, concise and vigorous, logical in method, not lacking in ornament, often revealing the play of a rich and cultured imagination, yet keeping all subordinate to the great aim of exalting Christ and winning souls. His delivery is earnest and impressive; never boisterous in tone or violent in gesture; deliberate, yet singularly effective in attracting and holding the thoughtful attention of his hearers.

In 1874 Dr. Lord gave to the press his "Christian Theology for the People," a systematic and comprehensive exposition of Christian doctrine, which has been widely appreciated. His experience as a teacher of theology, his power of condensation, and his terse and lucid style, have specially qualified him for the preparation of this work. Three years later he published a smaller work, entitled "The Blessed Hope; or, The Glorious Coming of our Lord;" a discussion of questions relating to the second advent, which has also had a wide circulation. In addition to these, many addresses, lectures and sermons from his pen have, from time to time, been given to the public.

Lord's Prayer—The. This Prayer is twice given in the New Testament (Matt. vi, 9-13, Luke xi, 2-4), in slightly differing words. From its delivery to the present hour it has excited the admiration of the wise and good throughout the world; and down through all these centuries it has been the single golden link, running through the ages, that has bound together in one the whole vast company of the prayerful. Even the stupid infidel and the shallow scoffer have not failed to perceive its beauty, sublimity and comprehensiveness. It is little in words, but great in substance; so short that the weakest memory may retain it, and yet so full that it comprehends all things which relate to ourselves or others, to our bodies or souls, to time or eternity; proper for all exigencies and occasions; as well for the last ages of Christianity as the first, as well for the private devotions of the closet as the public service of the temple, including every part of religious worship, supplication and intercession, confession and deprecation, resignation and thanksgiving; adapted to all periods of life, to all kinds of character, to all countries and capacities, and suited to all conditions; equally proper for high and low, rich and poor. The child may lip its simple sentences as soon as it knows how to pray; it comes with no less fitness from the wrinkled lips of age. It may be taken up and used alike by the penitent in the first hour of his return to God, the struggler in the thick of the spiritual conflict, and the believer in the highest soarings of his faith and love. The youngest, the oldest, the simplest, the wisest, the most sin-stained, the most saintly, can find nothing here unsuitable, unreasonable. It gathers up into one what they all can and should unite in saying as they bend in supplication before God.

The existence of a progressive sequence in the prayer is seen, even on a casual view. At the outset, the suppliant appears lost in the contemplation of the Being to whom his spirit ascends; next, he turns his thoughts upon himself and his own wants. Further, it is not difficult to recognize a progression in the first three petitions, and in the three (or four) last. The recognition of the name of God is the basis on which alone the kingdom of God can be established; and again, this kingdom is the sphere in which the will of God is fulfilled. Further, the prayer for the maintenance of the life of man precedes the prayer for the forgiveness of his sins; and again, it is only when the guilt of the past is removed that the thought is directed to the temptations of the future. The thoughtful reader, who has derived from other sources the knowledge of the Trinity, will also find a reference to that truth in the scheme of this prayer. The petitions of the first and second parts refer to God as Creator and Preserver; the second petition of either part refers to God as Redeemer; whilst the third of either part relates to God the Holy Spirit, by whom the divine will comes to be fulfilled, and through whose power temptation is overcome.

Evidently it was not our Lord's meaning that we should use this prayer exclusively, for the second form of it, as already stated, in Luke, varies considerably from that in Matthew. It was intended as a model rather than a mold. Highly appropriate as it is, both in public and private devotion, it was never intended to confine within the limits of its few sentences the free spirit of prayer. It was given rather as a specimen, by the spirit and order and proportion of whose several parts we should guide our own spontaneous petitions, than as a rigid and imperishable enclosure in which all our pious acknowledgments and supplications should be compressed. It was intended, not so much as a sacred formulary, as for divine instruction as to what petitions are universally good, universally necessary, universally acceptable, as well as to inculcate simplicity and brevity in the expression. The example of our Lord, Himself, of the apostles, of the Church in all ages, has taught us how full and varied are the utterances of the human heart when it breathes itself out unrestrainedly to God in prayer. "Where the Spirit of God is, there is liberty."

The very commencement of the prayer, Our Father which art in heaven, assumes, in the suppliant, a spirit penetrated with reverence and love; against Atheism, which teaches that there is no God. Against Pantheism, which teaches that God is not a person, but identical with nature; against Epicurism, which teaches that God cares nothing for His creation; against Polytheism, which teaches that there are many Gods, and against Fatalism, which renders the hearing of prayer an impossibility; our Saviour teaches that our one God is a personal, living, freely-working God, who projects and executes His counsel, not without, but with reference to, the praying man, even a Father. We have here grouped together the three principles which settle man's just relations to this and to the next world. 1. The Filial. We see in the Most High a Father. This representation of God, as a Father of those who worship Him, teaches us that He stands in a relation toward them similar to that in which a father stands to his children, and that He regards them in a manner similar to that in which a father regards and acts towards his children, really loving them, and disposed to bestow on them everything that is necessary to their true happiness. 2. The Fraternal. We come not with our private needs and vows alone, but with those of our race and household. Our Father. The renewal of the parental re-knits the fraternal tie. Believers, in all their prayers, should think of others as well as themselves. Though we go alone into the closet, we are not accepted there if we go in selfishness and isolation. 3. The Celestial. Though we are now of the earth, and attached to it by these mortal and terrene bodies, we are not originally from it, nor were we made to be eternally upon it. We are of heaven, and for heaven, for there, and not here, our Father is, and where He is our true home is. God, though omnipresent, has heaven as His special residence.

From the first petition, Hallowed be thy name, we learn that our first concern is to be for what relates to God, before what respects ourselves. Man's needs are never to take precedence of God's rights. The first part of the Prayer begins with the riches of God:

Thy name be hallowed;

Thy kingdom come;

Thy will be done.

The second part, on the contrary, commences with the poverty of man:

Us give daily bread;

Us forgive our debts;

Us lead not into temptation, but deliver from evil.

By the name of God, we are to understand His revealed character and attributes, even all that is implied in the appellation by which he is known among men. (See Ex. xxxiv, 5-7.) The word hallowed is nearly synonymous with "sanctified," or "glorified." God's name may be hallowed by us in three ways: 1. In our hearts, by entertaining suitable conceptions of Him. 2. By our lips, when we acknowledge His divine perfections, and tell of all His wondrous works. 3. In our lives, when the consideration of these divine perfections engages us to suitable obedience. This petition forbids cursing and swearing, perjury and blasphemy. It forbids all lip-service, all hypocritical genuflections, all mummeries of worship, where the heart is not engaged. In it we desire that all atheism, infidelity, idolatry, impiety, superstition, ignorance and false religion may be banished from the world, and that the only living and true God may be worshiped and honored all over the earth, and by every intelligent creature. This, in fact, is the very petition which the Lord Jesus himself put up on another occasion (John xii, 28).

The second petition is, Thy kingdom come. The plainest and simplest sense of Thy kingdom is, the promised kingdom which God is one day to take to Himself over all the world, foretold by Daniel and the other prophets, when Satan shall cease to be "prince of this world," and the millennium shall begin. This petition implies an earnest desire that the kingdom of God may be set up in our own hearts, reducing all within us to entire subjection to Christ, our King; that it may be set up in the hearts of our children, relatives, servants, friends, neighbors; that the word of the kingdom may, in all nations, "be preached with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven;" that Christian churches may be established in every region of our earth, and that "the kingdoms of this world may become the kingdom of our Lord and of His Christ," that every opposing power may be put down, and God be all in all. The final setting up of this kingdom has been long predicted. (Gen. iii, 15; Rom. viii, 22; Rev. xi, 15, and xxii, 20.)

The third petition is, Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven. God's will may be considered either as preceptive or providential. To the former reference is here made, for God's providential will is done in earth equally as in heaven. Or, if the latter is also referred to, that submission, acquiescence and satisfaction in it which angels feel and express, may be intended. It ought to be the prayer and care, the study and endeavor of every Christian, that the commanding will of God may be done by himself, and by all men on earth, as it is by the saints and angels in heaven, with entireness, harmony, cheerfulness, diligence, constancy and ineffable delight. Nor should the knowledge of the fact that in this life, through the imperfection of our nature, we never shall do the will of God in the same absolutely perfect way as it is done in heaven, be regarded as a reason why we should lower the object of our desires, or the aim and earnestness of our endeavors. This petition is instinct with the very life of missionary enterprise, and the Church cannot offer this clause of the Divine prayer in the full spirit of its power without becoming a missionary church. There are some who see in it an intimation that our earth is to be one part, at least, of the final and glorious abode of the saints.

The fourth petition is, Give us this day our daily bread. The bread which is convenient or sufficient for our daily subsistence. Bread is one principal part of the things which are needful for the body, and here, as is often the case, it is put for the whole. By the use of this word, therefore, we are taught to ask only things that are necessary, without craving superfluities, and to refer it to our Heavenly Father to determine what things are necessary, according to our station in life, our families, and various other circumstances. We are taught to ask "daily" the supply of the needs of life. (1) That we should not have anxious care for the future, and (2) Because we are not warranted to ask, even of the necessaries of life, very large supplies, which may serve for weeks, months, or years to come, but are, as children, continually to exercise the spirit of entire dependence on, and complete confidence in, our Heavenly Father's care. The richer sort of persons, in offering this petition, do in effect say, "Let the bread which is ours come to us this day sanctified by Thy Almighty Hands!" The "our" points to necessary labor, the true way of asking and receiving, according to God's original appointment for man, in Gen. iii, 19, independently of which we eat not our own bread (2 Thes. iii, 12; 1 Thes. iv, 11, 12), but another's. It shows that our food and raiment must be of God's giving—that is, honestly and fairly earned, "for," as an old writer remarks, "to him God gives bread who earns it by righteous means, but to him who earns it by sin, the devil it is who giveth." It points also to the obligatory communication and fellowship, since as we in "our" and "us" pray with and for one another, so we may not hold anything that we receive exclusively and covetously for ourselves alone. "Break thy bread to the hungry," etc. (Isa. lviii, 7; Comp. 1 Sam. xxv, 11.) Our Lord does not bid us pray merely for the need and nourishment of the body, but speaks also of the bread which the Father giveth from heaven, just as in John vi, 27–33; iv, 34.

The fifth petition is, Forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors. This petition immediately follows the preceding one, to show us that though we have daily bread, yet all is nothing without forgiveness. In this prayer there is but one petition for the body (verse 11), but two petitions, this, and the following one, for the soul. Hence observe that we are to be more careful for our souls than for our bodies—more desirous to have our souls saved than our bodies fed. Sins are called debts; (1) Because as a debt arises upon non-payment of that which is one's due, so we, owing to God exact obedience, and not paying what is due, come to be in debt; (2) Because, as in case of non-payment the debtor goes to prison; so, by our sins, we become guilty and stand exposed to God's wrath forever. In this petition the following things are supposed: 1. That we are all sinners, and, as such, stand in need of forgiveness. 2. That we are obliged to pray every day for pardon, as we do for our daily bread, for our sins are many and daily. Nor is there anything in this view inconsistent with the perfection and perpetuity of justification. The moment a man believes on Christ, he is as much justified as Paul or John, and cannot be more justified if he lives to the age of Methuselah. But all this is no reason why he should not daily confess his sins, and daily seek fresh application of Christ's blood to his conscience. In fact, it is the life of faith to do so. The truth, "he that believeth in Christ shall never come into condemnation," instead of leading to the conclusion, "I need not pray for the forgiveness of my sins," suggests the strongest encouragement to present such a petition. 3. That since we are to pray for pardon of sin, it is impossible for us ever to satisfy the justice of God for sin.

Forgive us our debts. Remit the penalty of our offences, and hold us as if we had not sinned. As we forgive our debtors. In Luke xi, 4, it is, "for we also forgive," etc. The word As, meaning according as, like as, is not a note of equality, but similitude; not that we equal God in forgiving, but imitate Him. It also has in a measure the sense of inasmuch as. The willingness of the suppliant is by no means a ground upon which God can bestow on him forgiveness, but rather a subjective condition without which he has no boldness to entreat the forgiveness of his own sins. This condition, or qualification, requires, 1. That we forgive cordially (Jer. xxxi, 34; Matt. xviii, 35; Eph. iv, 2)—fully (Ps. ciii, 3)—often (Isa. lvii, 7; Matt. xviii, 21). He who does not forgive his neighbor's trespasses, when he uses this prayer, in effect asks God not to forgive him his trespasses, and, if he continues in his present temper there is no doubt that his prayer will be answered.

The sixth petition is, Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil. As the prayer for daily bread raises us above care for to-day, and the prayer for the forgiveness of sins is meant to quiet us concerning the past, so is the prayer against temptation a weapon for the uncertain future. It consists of two parts: 1. Deprecatory; 2. Petitionary. The Greek word rendered lead is only used seven times in the New Testament. Excepting in the Lord's Prayer, our translators have always rendered it "bring into." "Temptation" means "trial." God never puts evil into our hearts, or stirs it up there by any positive influence (James i, 13). In the former respect, our own lusts tempt us (James i, 14); in the latter, Satan, or wicked men (Matthew iv, 3). But Providence may permit us to be brought into such circumstances as have a tendency to give our corruptions, and the temptations of Satan and his agents, peculiar advantage against us. This the Lord sometimes does to prove the reality or power of our grace, the sincerity or hypocrisy of our profession, or the remaining prevalence of sin (Gen. xxii, 1; Job i, 11, vs. 20, 21). "A saint's whole life (says Austin) is a temptation." This petition asks that God would graciously prevent us from being brought into circumstances of strong temptation; that He would not leave us to struggle with it in our own strength; that He would instruct us to avoid, and enable us to overcome, our temptations. He who would honestly and acceptably present this petition must guard against going into temptation (Gal. vi, 1; Matt. xxvi, 41).

But deliver us from evil. Here we confess that evil is in us, and about us, and near us, and on every side, and that we have no power to deliver ourselves from it. We apply to the strong for strength. We cast ourselves on Him for protection. In this petition we pray not only to be kept from evil, but also that we may make progress in piety. The evil we seek to be delivered from is, 1. The evil of our own heart. 2. The evil of Satan. 3. The evil of the world. 4. The evil of God's wrath.

For thine is the kingdom, etc. Some refer this to David's doxology, 1 Chron. xxix, 11. It has reference, as a plea, to the first three petitions of the prayer—"Thy kingdom come," for Thine is the kingdom. Thou hast the government of the world, and the protection of the saints, Thy willing subjects in it. "Thy will be done," for Thine is the power to maintain that kingdom, and to make good all Thy engagements to Thy people. "Hallowed be Thy name," for Thine is the glory, as the end of all that which is done for the saints, in answer to their prayers, for their praise waiteth for Thee (Psalm lxx, 1). It is our duty to plead with God in prayer, to fill our mouth with arguments (Job xxiii, 4), not to move God, but to affect ourselves, to encourage our faith, excite our fervency, and evidence both. The best pleas in prayer are taken from God Himself. Praising Him is the way to obtain further mercy, as it qualifies us to receive it. Some see, in this threefold doxology, an ascription of praise to each of the persons of the Trinity. It has been very beautifully said that "when the whole number of the sons of God shall have reached their goal, a pure doxology will arise in heaven. Hallowed be the name of God. His kingdom is come. His will is done. He has forgiven our sins. He has brought temptation to an end. He has delivered us from the evil one. His is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory forever. AMEN."

Lord's Supper. The institution of this ordinance by our Saviour is recorded by the first three evangelists (Matt. xxvi, 26-28; Mark xiv, 22-24; Luke xxii, 19-20), and by the apostle Paul, who declares that he "had received of the Lord that which he delivered" to the Church (1 Cor. xi, 23-26).

This sacrament is to be observed in the Church to the end of the world. This is plainly implied in the words of the apostle Paul: "For as often as ye eat this bread and drink this cup, ye do show the Lord's death till he come" (1 Cor. xi, 26).

The ends and uses of this sacrament are various. 1. It was instituted to be a memorial of the death of Christ. That it is a commemorative ordinance appears from the Saviour's words, "This do in remembrance of me;" and that it is especially a memorial of His death, is evident from His words in distributing the elements. While He gave the bread to His disciples, he said: "This is my body, which is broken for you;" and of the cup, he said, "This cup is the New Testament, in my blood."

The ordinance is eminently fitted to bring to our remembrance the reality and the painful nature of the death of Christ; to remind us of the vicarious nature of His death, of its acceptableness to God as a satisfaction for our sins, and of its present and perpetual efficacy. And we should remember His death with a lively and appropriating faith; with ardent love to Him who first loved us; with deep contrition for our sins, the procuring cause of His death; with holy joy in God; and with the warmest gratitude to Christ, who gave Himself for us, an offering and a sacrifice to God for a sweet-smelling savour. 2. This sacrament seals the benefits of Christ's death unto true believers. It seals not the truth of Christ's death, nor the truth of their faith; but it seals the right and interest of faith, as the seal affixed to a deed seals the right and interest of the person in the property conveyed by that deed. 3. It promotes the spiritual nourishment and growth of believers. A devout participation of this ordinance is fitted to confirm and invigorate their faith, to inflame their love, to deepen their godly sorrow, to enliven their joy, and to enlarge and strengthen their hopes of the Saviour's second coming, and of the glory then to be revealed. 4. It is a sign and pledge of the believer's communion with Christ. This is evident from the words of Paul (1 Cor. x, 16), "The cup of blessing which we bless, is it not the communion of the blood of Christ? The bread which we break, is it not the communion of the body of Christ?" These words certainly import that, in the Holy Supper, believers have communion with Christ in the fruits of His sufferings and death. 5. It is an emblem of the saints' communion with each other. All true saints are members of one body, and in the Holy Supper they have communion, not merely with those who sit along with them at the same table, but "with all that in every place call on the name of Jesus Christ," their common Lord. "We, being many," says Paul, "are one bread and one body; for we are all partakers of that one bread" (1 Cor. x, 17). This ordinance is very expressive of the communion of saints, and has a powerful tendency to cherish it. They meet together at the same table, as brethren and children of the same family, to partake of the same spiritual feast. 6. In this ordinance believers engage themselves to all the duties which they owe to Christ. They acknowledge Him as their Master, and engage to do whatsoever He has commanded them. Persons may come under engagements by performing certain significant actions, as well as by express words. Submission to the ordinance of circumcision, under the former dispensation, made a man "debtor to the whole law." Baptism, in like manner, under the Christian dispensation, involves an engagement to be the Lord's; and Christians, in partaking of the Lord's Supper, renew this engagement. They acknowledge that they are not their own, but are bought with a price, and bind themselves to glorify God with their bodies and spirits, which are His.

In connection with what has been said, the following article from the pen of Peter Bayne, A. M., on "The Sealing of Christ's Testimony by his Death," will be read with interest and profit:—

"The bearing of Christ's death upon His testimony to the Divine origin of His religion can be briefly stated. His crucifixion was an infinitely solemn ratification of all He had asserted. This will become evident when we consider two points in connection with it.

"In the first place, His death was manifestly contemplated by Him as a part of His ministry and priesthood, and, as such, distinctly foreseen. Consistently with the pervading spirituality of His views of His mission, He regarded His death as completing its lessons, filling out its moral significance, and crowning its mighty purpose of wisdom and of love. Of this there is indubitable proof in the fact that three evangelists narrate His prediction of His decease. It is not necessary, for our argument, to suppose that, in uttering this prediction, He put in exercise a supernatural power of foreseeing events. To an intellectual eye like Christ's, all-embracing in its range, all-penetrating in its clearness, it is difficult to know how much of the page of the future would necessarily lie bare. The thing to be observed is, that while proclaiming doctrines of celestial purity and self-evidencing truth, and while distinctly affirming His supernatural power, He calmly informed His disciples that His own death was embraced in the purpose for which He came into the world. It was as if He had said: 'The words I speak, taken in conjunction with the life I lead, are proof that I come from God; the works I do are a further attestation by God the Creator that I am from Him; and in testimony that I put my own trust in this witness, in testimony that I believe the words I speak to be God's words, and the works I do to be God's works, I shall lay down my life.' Imagination can conceive no stronger proof of sincerity.

"In the second place, the manner in which Christ went to death was conspicuously in accordance with this view of His decease as confirming all testimony previously given by Him to the Divine origin of His religion. Our information as to His death is peculiarly ample. All the evangelists dwell upon it. 'The fulfillment,' says Ellicott, 'of type and shadow, of the hopes of patriarchs, of the expectations of prophets, yea, and of the dim longings of a whole lost and sinful world, must be declared by the whole evangelistic company; the four streams that go forth to water the earth must here meet in a common channel; the four winds of the Spirit of Life must here be united and one.' And in each of the narratives of Christ's trial and crucifixion there is one broad and well-marked characteristic. They all represent Jesus as preserving a mental state of perfect calmness, a demeanor of absolute self-possession. He cannot but have known, from the moment of His arrest, that the implacable malignity of the rulers and Pharisees, and the blind fury of the mob they hounded on, would compass His death. Men say that, in the immediate prospect of decease, the whole events of a past life flit in distinct colors and vivid outlines before the mind; and whether this is generally the case or not, it is impossible to read the narrative of the Saviour's trial, and to observe the calmness and clearness of His answers, without feeling that every occurrence of His ministry must have then lain under the perspicuous glance of His recollection. At that moment, He must have been distinctly conscious that He had professed to raise the dead, to still the tempest, to create food for multitudes, to open the eyes of those born blind. In the glare of confronting death, how completely would He have felt every plausible sophistry of pious fraud, every fond delusion of imagined power, to be shriveled up. But He never faltered. He was what He had declared Himself to be, from the beginning. When He was weak as a lamb in the hands of its destroyer, when the arm of His Father was restrained, when no angel hand was present to wipe His blood-stained brow, His faith that He had bid the winds be still, and the dead start up alive, was as firm as when the multitudes cast their garments in His way, and hailed Him as the King of Israel coming in the name of the Lord. That is a fact—a plain, historical fact. Four witnesses attest this attitude of Christ before His accusers, and the wildest credulity of skepticism must shrink from the idea that four men have existed in this world who could have drawn four such pictures as that of Christ in His trial and crucifixion, if there had been no original for the portrait, no actuality for the occurrence. And if Christ died as the evangelists represent Him as dying, can words be found strong enough to express the confirmation thus afforded to all He had previously declared?"

Lounsbury, Thomas, D. D., was born in Florida, N. Y., October 4th, 1789; graduated at Union College, N. Y., with the highest honors of his class, in 1817; at Princeton Seminary in 1821; was soon after licensed by Hudson Presbytery, and entered upon his Master's service as a domestic missionary in Sullivan county, N. Y. Subsequently he preached at Painted Post, now Corning, N. Y., and the regions round about. He was installed pastor of the Church at Ovid, N. Y., September 4th, 1823. This was the field of his life-work. The church grew under his ministry, many being added thereto. At the end of twenty-six years he resigned, was appointed agent for the American Bible Society, and was very efficient in this toilsome work. Subsequently he preached as a supply for the churches of Homer, Hector and Romulus, and also for two years in his old pulpit in Ovid. He died October 29th, 1867.

Dr. Lounsbury was an earnest Christian, a faithful minister, a true and noble and thoroughly reliable man. He was a man of strong will and great industry, seldom undertaking anything which he did not carry through with a strong hand. He united fearless courage with genuine humility. Though outspoken, all who knew him loved him none the less, and no one doubted his sincerity and heartfelt diety. For many year she was the Stated Clerk of his Presbytery—an office for which his thorough knowledge of the proper methods of ecclesiastical business, as well as his own rigid regard for order, eminently fitted him.

Love, Brotherly, is that peculiar attachment among Christians, arising from their common faith, interest, object and hope. Its foundation is their common love of Christ, and truth, and virtue, or Christian holiness. Love to good men must be particularly cultivated, for it is the command of Christ (John xiii, 3); they belong to the same Father and family (Gal. v, 10); we hereby give proof of our discipleship (John xiii, 35); the example of Christ should allure us to it (John iii, 16); it is productive of a variety of pleasing sensations, and prevents a thousand evils. This love should show itself by praying for our brethren (Eph. vi, 18); bearing one another's burdens, by assisting and relieving each other (Gal. vi, 2); by forbearing with one another (Col. iii, 13); by reproving and admonishing in the spirit of meekness (Prov. xxvii, 5, 6); by establishing each other in the truth; by conversation, exhortation, and stirring up one another to the several duties of religion, both public and private (Jude 20, 21; Heb. x, 24, 25).

Lower and Upper Ten-Mile Churches, Washington County, Pa. At the centennial celebration of these two congregations, August 28th, 1879, the Rev. Dr. J. T. Brownson, who presided on the occasion, in his introductory address, thus graphically sketched the trials and perils incident to their organization and early history. "These churches, as is well known, were founded by the Rev. Thaddeus Dodd, one of the four honored fathers of Western Presbyterianism, who, under the old Synod of New York and Philadelphia, organized the Presbytery of Redstone, and the spirit of heroism and self-sacrifice in which they came into existence has a lesson which should not be lost. Of some twenty families which came from his own, Morris, county, New Jersey, in 1773, as we learn from the honored son and successor of Mr. Dodd, four founded homes on the South fork of the Ten-Mile, near the present town of Jefferson. The remainder divided themselves along the North fork, into two settlements, under their respective leaders, Jacob Cook and Demas Lindley, the latter of whom, at least, was a descendant of one of the distinguished company who, in 1620, landed upon the coast of New England, having previously bound themselves together in a covenant, the first words of which were, 'In the name of God, Amen!' These two settlements had their centres, respectively, where now the flourishing congregations of Lower and Upper Ten-Mile worship peacefully, each Lord's day, in tasteful and commodious sanctuaries, near the town of Amity and Prosperity. Doubtless the first visit of Thaddeus Dodd, in March, 1777, and his final settlement, in September, 1779, were prompted by earnest appeals from his old New Jersey friends, which owed much of their efficacy to his sympathy with them in their destitution of religious ordinances. It was, at least, against other inducements elsewhere, of greater worldly attraction, that he heard the voice of the Lord in their call, and obeyed it jointly for their and the gospel's sake. They were poor and surrounded with perils, but in God's name he cast in his lot among them with an unhesitating devotion.

"No account of the situation a century ago can be true to history without giving prominence to the terrors of savage warfare to which the first settlers were exposed. Nor could a place be found in our borders of more thrilling adventure than just here. Indian hostilities had been stimulated by the French in their great contest with Great Britain and her colonies for the Ohio and its tributaries. And they continued to carry butchery and alarm into the homes among and beyond the Alleghenies, until Col. Bouquet's masterly second expedition, in 1763, pushed the bloody foes back to the Maskingum, and secured a treaty of peace, which gave ten years of comparative repose. Those years witnessed large streams of emigration westward, as well as the laying of foundations upon which great States have been erected. But the war of 1774, the year following the occupation of this soil by the New Jersey settlers, best known by the name of Governor Dunmore, of Virginia, who conducted it, and precipitated as it was by the rash cruelties of white men, filled the country once more with fear and sorrow. The inhabitants of this whole region were driven, for safety, into forts east of the Monongahela. Happily the victory of General Lewis, at Point Pleasant, on the Ohio, brought that bloody strife to a close in the Autumn of the same year, without the aid of the arrogant and blustering Lord Governor, so safely encamped at a convenient distance. But then, only two years later, came the terrific strife of the Revolution, when throughout its whole continuance the resources of the united colonies were taxed to their utmost along the seaboard, thus leaving the defenceless inhabitants of the interior to buffet as they could with their savage foes, urged on by British gold and promises.

But it was in the Spring of 1777, the very time of Mr. Dodd's first visit, that these Indian hostilities were organized along the whole river frontier, from Fort Pitt to the Kanawha. In their light, the difficulty of removing a family, and consequent delay of the pastoral settlement, are fully explained. It was one of the terrible features of that organized warfare, that the famous Simon Girty, with his associates, McKee and Elliott, all escaped Tories from Fort Pitt, signalized their zeal against the cause of liberty by rushing into a relentless leadership of the treacherous and bloodthirsty forest warriors. Occasional feeble expeditions were sent forth by the Government, but mainly the terrified inhabitants had to build forts and defend themselves. A line of such forts, from Redstone, near Brownsville, along Ten Mile, Wheeling, and Grave Creek, to the Ohio, looked out southward upon an unbroken wilderness, and so made the inhabitants of these very hills a vanguard of defence for their more favored brethren in the thicker settlements behind them. A like line of defences guarded the settlements on the west, along the Ohio, from the mouth of Grave Creek to Fort Pitt. Of course, the savages were cunning enough to cross the river below these lines of defence, and to make their most frequent and formidable incursions from the wilderness through this exposed southern frontier line. And thus they continued to come, long after the homes and churches, only a few miles northward, had come into organized security. It was along this very line of continual peril that Dodd and his devoted people, through the whole period of the Revolutionary struggle, spent their Summers in Fort Lindley, only coming out at intervals, under guard, to till the soil for bread. But whether in Summer confinement or in the comparative freedom of Winter, they failed not to study God's word and teach it to their children, as well as to maintain public and private worship, though the trusty rifle was as sure an accompaniment of their religious assemblies as the Bible and the hymn book. And the seal of Providence was put upon their fidelity, in the signal fact that whilst

“Here in my hand is the original record, in the handwriting of Mr. Dodd himself, which recites the formal organization of the church, at the house of Mr. Cook, August 15th, 1781, including the reception of members—twenty-five in all—and the election of Demas Lindley, Jacob Cook, Joseph Coe and Daniel Axtell, as ruling elders. The reason for this delay of organization for two years after the settlement of Mr. Dodd, is to be found in the same turbulence of the times of which we are speaking. Appended to this very record is an explanatory note subsequently written by the same hand. It is as follows, viz.: ‘After this we set several times when we should have the Lord's Supper administered, but could not compass our design, on account of the incursions of the savages.’ Nor need we wonder at this caution, when we read the opening entry upon the records of the Mother Presbytery, holding its first meeting one month after this church organization, as follows, viz.: ‘The Presbytery met, according to the appointment of the Revd. Synod of New York and Philadelphia, at Pigeon Creek, as the circumstances of some of the members, by reason of the incursions of the savages, rendered it impracticable for them to attend at Laurel Hill.’ The trouble was not at Laurel Hill, but on this side of the Monongahela, making it inconvenient, if not hazardous to the members to go so far from home. Mr. Dodd was present at that first meeting of the Presbytery, and preached the opening sermon, from Job xlii, 5, 6. Mr. Smith was the only one of the four ministers absent. But as these occasions of hindrance through peril passed away with the dying echoes of the war for Independence, the longed for communion season came at length, on the third Sabbath of May, 1783, about a year and a half after the church organization. On that happy day of May the sacred Supper was served in Daniel Axtell's barn, when, besides the original company, forty-five newborn disciples took upon themselves the vows of Christ, and bore witness of his death. This large addition to the membership was the fruit of a powerful work of grace in the confinement of the fort. Great, beyond our conception, had been the deprivations of those long years of discipline, and severe as flaming fires were the trials of the infant church; but now, out of the hot furnace, God chose it for the mission of blessings, whereof we both speak and sing to-day, giving to it his joint tokens of the great sealing ordinance, and the seal of the Spirit in the hearts of men.

“It only remains now to bring this imperfect sketch to a conclusion, by a reference to those forms of trial which beset the fathers and mothers at the beginning of the century, in the more private experiences of life. If these stand out less boldly upon the pages of history, they were in longer continuance, scarcely less a burden, which only faith could bear. Amidst our multiplied facilities and comforts, it is difficult to realize them from mere testimony. Let us remember that those pioneers were separated from friends, in the depths of a country only beginning to emerge from its primeval forests. Lofty mountain ranges were behind them, over which only military roads had been cut. Wild beasts and savage men were masters of the situation. Dwellings were the rudest cabins, scarcely affording chimneys or windows of any sort. Furniture and dress hardly rose above the lowest conditions of our present life, save in the tidiness of thrifty hands. Food was almost wholly wrought from the soil, or caught from the forests and streams. Physicians were few and remedies were simple. Their houses of worship, when they came to this luxury, were as rude as their homes, and withal knew not the comforts of fire, even in the depths of winter. That luxury of a church building was not enjoyed here until 1785, when one was erected where the Amity Church now stands, followed with another at Prosperity in 1792. Their ordinary schools were restricted in appliances and could only furnish the most elementary instruction, though even then classical education, with special reference to the ministry, was not neglected, of which Mr. Dodd's academy, opened on his own farm, in 1782, the first of its kind in the West, is a sufficient illustration. The delay to secure a house of worship for six years after the settlement of the pastor, and for three years after the erection of the academy, doubtless had its chief reason in the perils already detailed, which drove the people into forts during the Summer. Few also were their books, beyond the Bible, the Catechism and the volume of psalms and hymns, whilst an occasional stray newspaper was hailed as a messenger from a far country. Yet who shall say, in the light of history, that their contentment as well as improvement of the advantages they had, will not compare favorably with ours? The progress of change in habits and opinions, as well as circumstances, may fitly appear in the language of the venerable Dr. Samuel Ralston, in 1840, near the close of a long pastorate begun at Mingo in 1796, even though he speaks of former and later times somewhat after the manner of an aged man. But even his 'former times' are a great advance upon Dodd's. 'Our wives and daughters,' says he, 'were industrious, and made much homespun, and we wore it. And the old people say that the preaching and praying were better in homespun than in English broadcloth. I did not buy a coat for thirty or thirty-five years. We had no want, but all the necessaries of life in abundance; and if we had money to buy a little tea and coffee for the good wife and for passing visitants, and a little finery for the females, we thought ourselves well off.'

"Surely, in the light of a century we can interpret the providential discipline through which that first generation was led. Who can say, wisely, under a less severe development of manly virtue and religious principle the foundations of western society would have been as firmly laid? How different, too, would the church of Western Pennsylvania, long denominated 'the backbone,' have been, without such an ordeal in her history! The discipline and the generation called to meet it simply answered to each other, in the purpose of God. We cannot be too grateful for the more than heroic fidelity of those witnesses for the truth. Nor can we raise too high our memorial to-day, amidst the same grand old forests which drank in their testimonies, prayers and songs. Shame to the generation of the future, which, fattening upon the fruits of their toils and sufferings, shall prove recreant to the sacred traditions and numberless blessings that God himself has transmitted to us from their hands. Over the graves of Dodd and his associates in struggle and victory, let us take anew our vow of allegiance to Christ and His cause.

" 'The past is past! In faith and patience taking Its lessons, let us lay them on our hearts;
The chain's attenuated links are breaking!
Be earnest! Use the present ere it parts! "

Lowrey, John G., Esq., was born of Presbyterian stock, in Donegal, Lancaster county, Pa., about the year 1780, from whence he removed to Bellefonte, Pa., probably not later than 1793 or 1794, where he resided for more than half a century. As a member of the community in which he resided, he was greatly influential in giving tone to public sentiment, and repeatedly held many, if not all the offices of honor and trust in the town and county of his adoption, but being naturally a modest and unassuming man withal, never aspired to higher positions.

The records of the Bellefonte Presbyterian Church, with which he connected himself early in its organization, show him to have been one of its first ruling elders. He continued to act in this capacity for many years, and likewise performed the duties of collector, treasurer, and secretary of the church, as well as superintendent of the Sabbath school from its organization until his removal to the West. He was equalled by few and excelled by none of his contemporaries, in an earnest and faithful devotion of his time and means to the welfare of the church. For many years he was prominent in conducting the services of the social prayer meeting, in which exercise he was highly gifted, and by his regular and uniform attendance, impressed upon others his attachment to this duty. He was a conscientious and liberal contributor to the support and spread of the gospel in his day. He was frequently in attendance on the courts of the Church as a member, and was universally regarded as well qualified for the performance of his official duties. He died in St. Louis.

Lowrie, John Cameron, D. D., is the eldest son of the Hon. Walter Lowrie, the first Corresponding Secretary of the Board of Foreign Missions, whose memory is so fragrant in the Presbyterian Church. He was born in Butler, Pa., December 16th, 1808; was graduated at Jefferson College in 1829; took the usual three years' course at the Western Theological Seminary; and was licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of Ohio, June 21st, 1832. He afterwards studied one term at the Princeton Seminary; was ordained as a missionary by the Presbytery of New Castle, May 23d, 1833; and was sent out by the Western Foreign Missionary Society to Northern India, but, his health failing, he returned to America in 1836.

In 1838 Dr. Lowrie was made Assistant Secretary of the Board of Foreign Missions, the Western Foreign Missionary Society having, in 1837, been merged in this Board. From 1845 he was also minister of the Forty-Second Street Presbyterian Church in New York city, till 1850, when he was elected one of the Corresponding Secretaries of the Board of Foreign Missions, which office he has continued to fill, with great ability, diligence and acceptableness, to the present time. He was honored by his brethren in being elected Moderator of the General Assembly in 1865. He is the author of "Two Years in Upper India," and a "History of the Foreign Missions," works of much interest and value, besides a great many reports and sermons, and a number of articles in the Princeton Review.

Dr. Lowrie's heart is in the great work to which his life has been consecrated. He pursues it with an ardor, devotion, and singleness and sacredness of purpose which commend his labors to all who love the Redeemer's Kingdom and long for its triumph. It is not easy to estimate the influence for good which he has, by his steady, judicious and sanctified energy, exerted in this direction. He is greatly beloved by the Church which he represents in one of her grandest positions, for his sterling character and earnest and exemplary Christian zeal. His name must go down with honor to posterity, tenderly and indissolubly blended with the cause of Foreign Missions.

Lowrie, John Marshall, D. D., the son of Matthew B. Lowrie, was born in Pittsburg, Pa., July 16th, 1817; graduated, with distinction, at Lafayette College, in 1840; at Princeton Seminary, in 1842, and was licensed by Newton Presbytery, April 27th, 1842. October 18th, 1843, he was installed pastor of the churches of Blairstown and Knowlton, N. J., and labored successfully until ill-health compelled him to resign, April 1st, 1845. From April 27th, 1846, until April, 1850, he was pastor of the Church in Wells-ville, Ohio. He then removed to Lancaster, Ohio, where he labored successfully until 1856, when he removed to Fort Wayne, Ind., being installed in November of that year, and in this field of usefulness he continued with great fidelity, and earnest devotion to his work, until within a few weeks of the close of his life, September 26th, 1867. His death was one of triumph.

Dr. Lowrie was a man of more than ordinary natural gifts, a clear, vigorous intellect, a sound judgment, and a retentive memory. Though by no means deficient in imagination, the logical predominated in his mind. He was a persistent and systematic worker. Always working, always calm, always hopeful, he applied himself to the Master's work with untiring labor, knowing that the increase must be from God. His labors were too abundant; he worked beyond his physical ability. His devotion to the spread of the gospel and the building of the Church was the guiding star of every action and every thought. Christ and His Cross were all his theme. In addition to valuable contributions to the periodical press, Dr. Lowrie was the author of some popular and useful volumes, among which are: "Adam and his Times," "Esther and her Times," "Hebrew Lawgiver," "Week with Jesus," "Translated Prophet," and "Prophet Elijah."

Lowrie, Rev. M. B., oldest son of Rev. John M. Lowrie, D. D., and Hetty D. Lowrie, was born in Warren county, New Jersey, April 10th, 1841. He graduated with honor from the College of New Jersey, at Princeton, in the class of 1863. Taught one year in Valparaiso Indiana Collegiate Institute. In 1865 entered Princeton Theological Seminary, and graduated in 1868. Called, July, 1868, to be pastor of the South, now Woodside, Presbyterian Church, Troy, N. Y.; having been licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Fort Wayne, May 1st, 1867, was ordained by the Troy Presbytery, October, 1868. Was pastor at Orange, Ill., March, 1871, and since Septem-her, 1872, has been pastor at Galesburg, Ill. Mr. Lowrie is an enthusiastic Hebrew scholar, and has been a successful instructor in the Morgan Park Summer School, and of private classes. In 1883 he was chosen a Trustee of Knox College. He is a scriptural preacher, a logical reasoner, conservative as a theologian, liberal as a neighbor and friend. He has been pastor of one of the strongest churches in central Illinois for eleven years, and is now in the prime of bodily vigor and mental energy.

Lowrie, Hon. Walter, was born in Scotland, in the city of Edinburgh, December 10th, 1774. At the age of eight years he came, with his parents, to America. The family located first in Huntingdon county, Pa., but shortly after removed to Butler county, where they made their permanent residence.

HON. WALTER LOWRIE.

Walter grew up on his father's farm, enjoying nothing more in the way of education than the home instruction of Winter nights, with the addition, perhaps, of an occasional quarter's schooling, under the direction of the itinerant teachers of those early times. His early instruction in the principles and practice of religion was of the most thorough and accurate character. His parents were both pious, and Presbyterians, of that genuine intelligent school who believe in the Westminster Confession and Catechism as the best expositions of the truths of the Bible, and in the covenant obligations which rest upon parents to train their children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord.

His conversion to God occurred in his eighteenth year. With the view of becoming a minister of the gospel, he commenced a course of study under the direction of the Rev. John McPherrin, the first Presbyterian minister in Butler county. Providential circumstances hindering the fulfillment of his purpose to enter the ministry, with the same determination to devote his life to the glory of God, he entered upon other pursuits. His secular life was such as to win the confidence and esteem of the whole community in which he lived. Accordingly, in 1811, at the age of twenty-seven, he was elected as the representative of that District in the Senate of Pennsylvania. This honorable station he held for seven years, during which time he rose to such a position in the confidence of the people of the whole State that, in 1818, he was elected as the representative of Pennsylvania in the Senate of the United States. In this high position he continued for six years, enjoying honorable prominence among his fellow-members of that distinguished body. His great integrity won their confidence, whilst his peculiar sagacity and practical judgment led them to seek his advice and rely upon his opinions. He was regarded as an authority upon all questions of political history and Constitutional law. His influence in the Senate was not only that of a statesman, but also of a Christian. He had been ordained a ruling elder in the Presbyterian Church in Butler, and when he went to the Capital, he carried with him the savor of vital godliness. With other pious Senators and Representatives, he founded the Congressional Prayer-meeting. He was also one of the founders of the Congressional Temperance Society, and was, for a long time, a member of the Executive Committee of the American Colonization Society. At the expiration of his term of service as Senator, he was elected Secretary of the Senate of the United States, in which office he continued for a period of twelve years, and might, if he had chosen, have retained it for life.

In 1836 he was elected Corresponding Secretary of the Western Foreign Missionary Society. This office he accepted, passing under the care of the General Assembly when the Board of Foreign Missions was constituted, in 1837. He continued in the faithful discharge of its various duties until, disabled by the infirmities of old age, he laid it down, in 1868. He had not drawn his salary for several years before that date, and would not retain even the office, after he felt himself no longer able to discharge its duties. He had wise and able counsellors in the Board and in the Executive Committee, but during the whole thirty years of his incumbency, he was himself the efficient head of the missionary work, and the controlling power of its administration.

Mr. Lowrie entered into his rest, December 14th, 1868. Long shall his vast influence for good endure, and his precious memory be blessed. It was but an embodiment of the opinion of the whole Church to which he belonged, when the Executive Committee of the Board of Foreign Missions, in their recognition of his decease, resolved, "That we record our high estimate of the ability with which he managed the affairs of this Board; of the indefatigable industry with which he prosecuted its interests; of the wisdom with which he guided its policy in times of difficulty; of the humble, earnest, and prayerful confidence with which he always carried forward the work; of the persuasive and effective eloquence with which he urged the claims of missions upon the churches, and of the self-denial to which he submitted in sacrificing high secular position, in consecrating his fortune and life, and giving his children to be laborers in the great work of the world's evangelization."

Lowrie, Walter H., LL.D., son of Matthew B. and Sarah Lowrie, was born in Armstrong county, Pa., March 31st, 1807, during the removal of his father's family from Butler county to Pittsburg, Pa. He graduated at the Western University of Pennsylvania, in 1826, and was admitted to the Bar in Pittsburg, August 4th, 1829. On August 20th, 1846, he was appointed by Governor Francis R. Shunk to the Judgeship of the District Court of Allegheny county, Pa., made vacant by the elevation of Judge Grier to the Supreme Court of the United States, and occupied this position until elected to the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, in October, 1851. This being the first election of Judges in the Commonwealth (previously they were appointed by the Governor), the five then newly elected to the Supreme Court resorted to the lot to fix the term of office for each. By this, Judge Lowrie was allotted a twelve-year term. The last six years of this period he filled the office of Chief Justice. The term expired in December, 1863. For a few years after he resumed the practice of law in Pittsburg. Subsequently he was elected President Judge of a Judicial District in the western portion of the State, which position he retained until his death.

Judge Lowrie served some years, beginning with 1836, as Ruling Elder in the Second Presbyterian Church of Pittsburg (where his father had been Ruling Elder before him). He was a contributor to the Princeton Repository, and several other journals, monthly and quarterly. Several communications which he presented to the American Philosophical Society, on the "Origin of the Tides" and on "Cosmical Motion," have been published in pamphlet form. He is best known by his judicial opinions, amounting to many hundreds. Many of them contain very thorough historical and philosophical discussions of complicated judicial questions, pervaded by a pure and decided tone of individual and social morality and order.

Lucky, Rev. George, was a minister of Maryland, although a member of the Presbytery of New Castle. He labored and died at Bethel, Harford county, Md., and for a large part of his time also preached at Centre Church, about seven miles north of Bethel, on the Maryland and Pennsylvania line.

He was born in Fagg's Manor, Chester county, Pa., and brought up under the ministry of Mr. Blair. He was a fine classical scholar, an intelligent preacher; in his manners plain, in labors unwearied; in his pastoral labors from house to house he excelled. Few, very few, had an equal acquaintance with the Scriptures, and he had an art, possessed by but few, of introducing religious duties when thrown into society who were ignorant of them and had an aversion from them. He was a Calvinist, full grown. His name first appears on the minutes of Synod in 1785. It is last mentioned in 1819.

Ludlow, Hon. James R., a son of the Rev. John Ludlow, D.D., LL.D., for nearly twenty years Provost of the University of Pennsylvania, was born at Albany, N. Y., May 3d, 1825. He graduated with distinction at the University of Pennsylvania, in 1843; was admitted to the Bar in June, 1846, and for eleven years engaged in a general practice. In October, 1857, he was elected a Judge of the Court of Common Pleas of the county of Philadelphia, and has, at each successive election since, been re-elected to that important and responsible office.

The whole career of Judge Ludlow is singularly honorable. Since his elevation to the bench, his course has been such as to reflect not only the highest credit upon himself, but lustre upon the judiciary of the State. He has always shown himself a learned jurist and an incorruptible judge. His decisions have ever been received with the greatest consideration, both by the Bar and by the community generally. Gifted with nice discrimination, and a man of scrupulous conscientiousness, he has always striven his utmost to discover and defend the right in civil suits, some of his opinions being, therefore, models of judicial acumen and carefulness. In criminal jurisdiction he has always manifested marked judgment, being stern and severe in his sentences when he deemed the convict's crimes and the public welfare demanded sternness and severity, and merciful toward the erring whom there was hope of reclaiming. In his private relations Judge Ludlow is highly esteemed, as a gentleman of wide culture and true refinement. Simple and unostentatious in his life, he yet exerts a large influence for good, and is an earnest supporter of all schemes for the social advancement of the community. He is a member of the Princeton Presbyterian congregation, West Philadelphia.

Lumpkin, Joseph Henry, LL. D., was born in Oglethorpe county, Ga., December 23d, 1799. Entering the University of Georgia at an early age, he pursued his studies in this Institution till the death of the Rev. Dr. Finley, its President, when he went to Nassau Hall, Princeton, and was admitted to the Junior Class, half-advanced. Here he was graduated with distinction, a prominent fact in his education being his devotion to classical learning. On returning to his native State, he took great interest in the development of her University, founding the Phi Kappa Society which, for nearly half a century felt the impress of his genius. He studied law under Judge Cobb, and was admitted to the Bar, October, 1820. Twenty years of arduous life in his profession affected his health, and he was induced to go abroad to find rest and renewal. Amid the scenes of the Old World the eager heart of the classical student found much to quicken and inspire. And the heart, too, of the Christian was none the less impressed, for when asked what most interested him abroad, he replied: "The Three Taverns, where St. Paul met the Roman Christians, and the Tomb of Virgil."

During his foreign tour the Supreme Court of Georgia was organized, and he was elected by the Legislature, without opposition, for the long term. To this high office he brought an intellect finely trained in the knowledge and logic of the law; nor was he less remarkable for those strong and balanced instincts which underlie all the noblest forms of mind. In 1824-25 he served in the Legislature of Georgia, but his singular success in this sphere of public life had the effect to disenchant his ambition of politics, so that he abandoned political aspirations forever. He joined the Presbyterian Church in 1828, and for nearly forty years was an active and prominent member of her communion. By his exertions, and those of General T. R. R. Cobb and W. H. Hull, Esq., the Lumpkin Law School was established in Athens, Ga.; and in 1860 he was elected Chancellor of the State University, which he declined in order to remain on the Supreme Court Bench. His death occurred June 4th, 1867.

Happily for Judge Lumpkin in his various relations to the State and the Church, he was a man of rare endowments, and yet a man who was a laborious student all through his career. There was not wanting the keen, quick, comprehensive insight of genius, and this was supplemented by those acquiring powers which are so essential to the great jurist. Year by year he grew to his profession, as well as in it; and year by year his heart widened its reach in the direction of every philanthropic effort. Intensely sympathetic, who can ever forget his eloquence, so lofty in tone, so fervid, so chivalric? Men rightly called him "the father of Temperance in Georgia." One may enumerate his extraordinary gifts, his fine culture, his charms of appearance and manner, his un abused popularity, his manifold services to his State; and yet one who saw the flowers of youth ripen in the fruits of age would say, "the greatest of these was charity."

Lumpkin, Rev. Thomas, was born in Bedford county, Va.; studied theology under the Rev. Dr. Hoge; was licensed to preach by the Hanover Presbytery; spent some time as a missionary in Albemarle; was settled as pastor of the Church at Charlottesville, Va., in October, 1809, and died in great peace and triumph, about six months afterwards. Mr. Lumpkin was a man of superior abilities, great courage, and unfeigned piety.

Lupton, Rev. Jonas W., son of Jonah and Mary Lupton, was born near Winchester, Va., December 19th, 1833. Soon after completing his studies in college, peculiar circumstances, together with his tastes, led him to choose agriculture as his vocation. In September, 1860, he entered the Western Theological Seminary, Allegheny, Pa., where he remained one year, and then completed his theological course in 1861-2, at Union Seminary, Prince Edward county, Va. On the 25th of April, 1862, he was licensed to preach the gospel, and on the 25th of April, 1864, was ordained. His regular ministry began in Winchester, Va., where he served from September 1st, 1865, for nearly two years, as assistant pastor with Rev. A. H. Boyd, D.D. March 1st, 1867, he entered upon his work as pastor of the Leesburg and Catoctin churches, Va. Thence he was called to his present charge, in Clarksville, Tenn., where he began to labor September 1st, 1872.

Mr. Lupton possesses a rare combination of qualities, which fit him for and have helped to make him very successful in his work. His winning manner, manifestly reinforced by large sympathies, gives him a magnetic power which draws the affections of others. At the same time, his more than ordinary gifts of mind, coupled with unaffected modesty, command respect and forbid envy. As a preacher, he is clear, strong, pointed, and exceedingly terse. Few men can say as much, and say it as well, in a few words. His delivery is earnest and impressive; his method is to convince the reason and awaken the conscience, rather than appeal to the emotional nature. As a pastor, visiting among his people, he greatly excels.

Luzerne Presbytery, when it became consolidated, with others, into the Presbytery of Lackawanna, at the time of the Reunion, had had an existence of twenty-seven years. It had grown from four ministers and eleven churches to twenty-nine ministers and thirty-two churches, and had become one of the most important bodies in the Church.

As first organized it consisted of the churches of Wilkesbarre, Kingston, Hanover and Lackawanna, detached from the Presbytery of Susquehanna; Mauch Chunk, Beaver Meadows, Conyngham and Summit Hill, detached from the Presbytery of Newton; Berwick and Briar Creek, detached from the Presbytery of Northumberland; and Port Carbon, detached from the Second Presbytery of Philadelphia.

The Synodical connection of the Presbytery was with New Jersey.

The development of the coal fields caused great increase in the population of the region included in this Presbytery, and called for much mission work in new settlements. Large and prosperous churches grew up in a decade, and became among the most liberal in beneficence within the bounds of the Church. The Presbytery averaged more than a new house of worship each year during its existence. Many powerful revivals of religion were experienced by the churches. Educational institutions were established and maintained, and did good work in training a number of young men for the ministry and for important stations in the Church.

Prominent among those connected with the Presbytery now passed away, are the names of John Dorrance, Richard Webster, Thomas P. Hunt, Nicholas Murray, and Milo J. Hickok. Living ones well known are Rev. A. A. Hodge, D. D., LL. D., Rev. Jacob Belleville, D. D., Rev. J. D. Mitchell, D. D., Rev. S. C. Logan, D. D., and Rev. N. G. Parke.

The name "Luzerne" was taken from the county in which the greatest number of its churches was found, though its territory embraced also the counties of Schuylkill, Carbon, and a portion of Columbia. Great love was manifested by the members for their ecclesiastical body, and a warm bond of sympathy existed among them.

Lyle, Rev. John, the son of John and Flora (Reed) Lyle, was born in Rockbridge county, Va., October 20th, 1769. He was a student at Liberty Hall, where, in the more advanced stage of his education, he was employed as a Tutor to the younger classes. He graduated about the year 1794, and immediately after leaving college he was employed in teaching a school in Rockbridge county, while he pursued his theological studies under the direction of the Rev. William Graham. He was licensed to preach the gospel by the Lexington Presbytery, April 21st, 1796; during the succeeding Autumn and Winter was a missionary on the frontier of Virginia proper; and in the Summer of 1798 was in Kentucky, in the same capacity. He was ordained by the West Lexington Presbytery, some time in the Fall of 1799, and in 1800 took charge of the churches of Salem and Sugar Ridge, in Clark county, where he remained several years and opened a school. In 1805 he was appointed, by the Synod, to ride two months within the bounds of the Cumberland Presbytery, afterwards to sit as one of the Commissioners on the difficulties of that body, and was a member of the General Assembly when the subject came up for adjudication, in 1809. In May, 1807, he removed to Paris, Ky., where he established an academy, which flourished greatly under his superintendence. At the same time he preached to the churches of Cane Ridge and Concord. About 1810 he withdrew from the academy, as well as from the congregations, and soon after commenced preaching to Mount Pleasant Church, near Cynthia, Harrison county. Between the years 1815 and 1818 he gave up the labors of a pastor, and devoted the rest of his life to missionary service. He died July 22d, 1825, and was buried in his garden, in a spot selected by himself, under the shade of a favorite tree. Mr. Lyle was a thorough scholar, and an eminent benefactor to the cause of education in the West. He was one of the very first to suggest the plan of circulating the Scriptures by means of colporteurs. As a preacher, he was ardent, zealous and highly evangelical. He was an earnest and vigorous defender of the order, discipline and doctrines of the Presbyterian Church, and ranked among the foremost of his day in preserving its unity and prosperity, under trying circumstances.

Lyle, Rev. Matthew, was born in what was then Augusta county, in Virginia, but is now Rockbridge, in that part of the county called Timber Ridge, October 21st, 1767. He was a subject of the great revival which spread over so large a part of Virginia in 1789. After going through a course of theological study, under the direction of the Rev. William Graham, he was licensed by the Presbytery of Lexington, April 28th, 1792, to preach the gospel. For about two years he was engaged in missionary labors, both in the northeastern and southwestern parts of Virginia. He was sent several times into the Northern Neck, where his labors were highly appreciated by the people, especially in the county of Lancaster. Having received a call, October 4th, 1794, from the congregation of Briery, for one-half his labors, and from the congregation of Buffalo for the other half, he accepted the same, and was ordained as pastor of these two churches by the Presbytery of Hanover, shortly after. The late Rev. Archibald Alexander, D. D., of Princeton, was his colleague in Briery. Here he remained, in the unremitting and faithful exercise of his ministry, for thirty-three years. His decease occurred March 22d, 1827. Mr. Lyle was by nature endowed with a sound, discriminating mind, and was possessed of inflexible firmness and great energy and decision of character. Honesty was the very texture of his soul. His sermons were remarkable for clearness, conciseness and energy, and they were always truly evangelical. In social intercourse, he had a benignity of manner and a lively pleasantness of remark, which rendered him an exceedingly agreeable companion.

Lyon, George Armstrong, D.D., was born in Baltimore, Md., March 1st, 1806. He graduated at Dickinson College, Pa., in 1824. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Carlisle, April 9th, 1828. In December of the same year he was invited to preach at Erie, Pa., in the First Presbyterian Church, where he was ordained and installed by the Presbytery of Erie, September 9th, 1829. He continued in this relation until 1871, blessed in his labors, esteemed by the community, and honored by his brethren, as an exemplary, faithful and successful minister of the gospel. Dr. Lyon died at Avon, N. Y., March 24th, 1871.

Lyon, James Adair, D. D., was born in Washington county, East Tennessee, April 19th, 1811; was graduated at Washington College, Tennessee, in 1832, and in the same year entered the Theological Seminary at Princeton, N. J., as a candidate for the ministry, under the care of the New Brunswick Presbytery. He was licensed by this Presbytery in 1836, and ordained in 1837, by the Presbytery of Holston, Tennessee. He preached in Tennessee until 1841, when he became pastor of the Church at Columbus, Miss. In 1848 he accepted a call to the Westminster Church, St. Louis, and from 1850 to 1854 he conducted a female seminary in that city. In 1854 he was recalled to Columbus, and remained in that charge until 1870, when he was elected Professor of Mental and Moral Philosophy in the University of Mississippi, at Oxford. Declining health required him to resign this position in 1881. His life closed on the 15th day of May, 1882.

Dr. Lyon was, throughout his life, a close student and a diligent worker. He was firm in his convictions, and fearless in enunciating them. In his first pastorate, in Mississippi, he was called to confront infidelity in one of its strongholds. He proclaimed the truth and rebuked sin, often at the peril of personal violence, but with a persistent and chivalric zeal which ultimately wrought a moral revolution in the community. He was conscientious in every work in which he engaged, used his talents as a trust committed to him by God, and diffused his influence through almost every accessible channel. He was a frequent contributor to the Reviews of his Church; was instrumental in obtaining the endowment of the "Perkins Professorship" in the theological seminary at Columbia, S. C., and was concerned in successfully establishing the "Southwestern Presbyterian University," at Clarksville, Tenn. He repeatedly represented his Presbytery in the General Assembly before the late civil war, and was Moderator of the General Assembly, South, in 1863. It may be eminently affirmed of Dr. Lyon, that he "served his own generation by the will of God."

Lyon, Rev. William, was born at Carlisle, Pa. He graduated at Dickinson College, in 1839, studied theology at Princeton, N. J., and was ordained by the Presbytery of East Hanover, in 1843. He was pastor of Bethlehem Church, Va., 1843-48; teacher at Uniontown, Pa., 1849-50; teacher at Richmond, Va., 1852-53; stated supply at Amelia Church, 1853-54, and Agent of the Bible Society, Richmond, 1854-62; in all his spheres of labor characterized by ability, conscientious fidelity, and an ardent desire to advance the Redeemer's kingdom.

Lyons, Rev. Jesse Lorenzo, was the third of nine children of Deacon Jesse and Malinda (Bennet) Lyons, and was born in the village of Montrose, Susquehanna county, Pa., April 18th, 1824. His parents were eminent for godliness. Having graduated at Williams College, in 1851, he studied theology in Union Theological Seminary, New York, graduating May, 1854. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Montrose, in April, 1851; ordained an evangelist, November 9th, 1854, and sailed for Syria, November 19th in the same year, as a missionary of the A. B. C. F. M. He was married, October, 1854, to Miss Catharine N. Plumer, of South Berwick, Maine. After spending a year in Beirut and Mt. Lebanon, he was stationed at Tripoli, Syria, April 1856, where he remained until the Winter of 1860-61, when he was transferred to the city of Sidon, where he labored for three years. During the massacre, in the Summer of 1860, he was actively engaged in visiting the refugee Christians in the desolated villages of Northern Lebanon and Baalbek, distributing charity to the needy. A serious illness, in 1857, affected his head and eyes to such an extent that, for years, his writing and the most of his reading were done by the aid of his devoted wife.

In the Summer of 1863 Mr. Lyons was obliged to return to America, on account of impaired health, and for five years was confined to a bed of suffering. He then rallied in a very remarkable manner, and has been engaged as District Superintendent of the American Bible Society, for Florida and Georgia, since the year 1871. His experience in the Foreign Missionary work, his affability and knowledge of human nature, and long experience in dealing with men, make him acceptable to the people and eminently useful in the work in which he is now engaged. His enforced abandonment of the Foreign Missionary work was a severe trial to him, and a few years since he offered to return to Syria, but his health was not deemed sufficient. Mr. Lyons' uncle, the Rev. Lorenzo Lyons, went to the Sandwich Islands, as a missionary, more than fifty years since, and is still laboring there.

M

Maccaule, Rev. Thomas Harris. Nothing is known of the parentage of Mr. Maccaule. He was ordained and settled as pastor of Centre Presbyterian Church, in North Carolina, in 1776. He entered warmly into the Revolutionary struggle, and in the time of the invasion went with his flock to the field, and was beside General Davidson when he fell. Such was his reputation in civil life, that he was nominated for Governor, but lost his election by a few votes. In 1784 he was appointed President of Mount Zion College, South Carolina. Besides his duties in the college, Mr. Maccaule had charge of Jackson Creek and Mount Olivet Presbyterian churches, until September, 1792. He was popular, both as a preacher and a man. He died about 1796.

Macalester, Charles, merchant and banker, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., February 17th, 1798. He received a liberal education, first at Grey and Wylie's School, and afterwards at the University of Pennsylvania. While at the latter Institution, during the war of 1812, when fifteen years of age, he commanded a company of forty boys, who worked for two days, assisting to make the fortifications upon the west side of the Schuylkill. Early in life he embarked in mercantile pursuits, and, in 1821, removed to Cincinnati, Ohio, where he remained until 1827, when he returned to Philadelphia, and commenced business there, amassing a large fortune. He retired from active business in 1849, occupying himself subsequently with his private affairs, and various trusts and executorships. He died, December 9th, 1873, regretted by an unusually wide circle of friends and acquaintances.

Mr. Macalester was one of the Trustees of the Peabody Education Fund, from its first institution. He was also president of the St. Andrew's Society, and of the Orthopædic Hospital, a director (from the time of its organization) of the Fidelity Insurance, Trust and Safe Deposit Company, of the Presbyterian Hospital, and of the Insurance Company of the State of Pennsylvania, of which latter company his father had been president. In 1873 he gave, for the establishment of a college in Minneapolis, a valuable property, consisting of a large building, with extensive grounds attached, then named by the Trustees the "Macalester College," and also confirmed the same by his will.

Eminently successful himself in all his undertakings, Mr. Macalester was always ready to aid by his advice, and by active assistance, those who were beginning life's battle or struggling with adversity. Unobtrusive in all he did, generous in every sense of the word, he was universally beloved and honored. His private character was one of the greatest purity, unselfishness and loveliness; charitable in all his judgment, and indulgent to the weaknesses and faults of others, no harsh comments or unkind aspersions ever passed his lips. For a number of years he was a faithful elder of the Second Presbyterian Church.

Maccorkle, Samuel Eusebius, D.D., was born in Lancaster county, Pa., August 23d, 1746. His parents removed to North Carolina when he was quite young. After graduating at Princeton College, in 1772, he studied theology with his maternal uncle, the Rev. Joseph Montgomery, and was licensed by the Presbytery of New York, in 1751. For two years he labored as a missionary in Virginia, and in 1776 returned to North Carolina, and on the 2d of August, 1777, was installed pastor of the church at Thyatira, where he remained until his death, January 21st, 1811. Dr. Maccorkle was an active friend of his country in its struggles for liberty, and an earnest champion for the truth against the rising tide of French infidelity which threatened to sweep the land. In 1785 he commenced a classical school in his own house, to which he gave the name of Zion Parnassus. Forty-five of his pupils afterwards became ministers. He was elected the first Professor in the University of North Carolina, having the Chair of Moral and Political Philosophy. He was a thorough scholar, and received his honorary degree from Dartmouth, in 1792. A number of his sermons were published.

MacCracken, Henry Mitchell, D. D., was born at Oxford, O., September 28th, 1840, and graduated at Miami University in 1857. After teaching for a time, he studied theology in Xenia Seminary, O., and in Germany. He was stated supply of the First Church, Toledo, O., 1862; ordained by the Presbytery of Columbus, November 7th, 1863; pastor of Westminster Church, Columbus, O., 1863-67; pastor of the First Church, Toledo, 1868-81, and since 1881 has been Chancellor of the Western University of Pennsylvania, Pittsburg, Pa. Dr. MacCracken is a gentleman of studious habits, of scholarly attainments, and an instructive and faithful preacher. He has translated into English, and edited, with added lives by American writers, the "Lives of the Leaders of our Church Universal," by Dr. Ferdinand Piper, of Berlin, which has been issued by our Board of Publication.

Mack, William, D. D., was born at Flushing, N. Y., July 29th, 1807; graduated at Union College, in 1831, and at Princeton Seminary, in 1834. He was licensed by the Presbytery of New York, February 4th, 1834. Dr. Mack's successive fields of labor were as follows: 1. Pastor of the Third Church of Rochester, N. Y., where he was installed, February 5th, 1835, and released, July 23d, 1839. 2. Stated supply of the Second Church of Knoxville, Tenn., from 1840 to 1843. 3. Stated supply of the First Church of Columbia, Tenn., from December, 1843, to January, 1858. In the latter year he became a voluntary evangelist, devoting one-half of his time to the Presbytery of Columbia, of which he was a member, and the other half to work beyond its bounds. In this labor he continued until very near the time of his death.

Dr. Mack held the office of President of Jackson College, at Columbia, Tenn., from 1843 to 1849, whilst also supplying the First Church in that town. He was afterwards re-elected President, in 1852, but again resigned in 1853, as the office interfered with his preaching work. For about a year preceding his death, by reason of declining health, he was unable to preach. He died, January 10th, 1879. He had long labored faithfully in the gospel, preaching in different portions of the country, and died in a good old age, beloved and honored wherever he was known. Kind, gentle, true, devoted, his praise is in all the churches.

MacKellar, Thomas, an elder of the First Presbyterian Church, Germantown, Pa., was born August 12th, 1812. His course has been of the typical American sort, so dear to the writers of biographies. Nearly sixty years ago he was a poor boy, beginning to make his way in New York, though of good old stock on both sides. His father's father was a Presbyterian elder in Scotland, as he is now at Germantown, Pa. His mother's family were Dutch Protestants, and settled in New York before 1641. They had been wealthy, but the wealth had taken to itself wings. Being left an orphan at eighteen years, with younger brothers and sisters mainly dependent on him, he consulted a Quaker lawyer as to the feasibility of recovering some part of the paternal property, and received this wise advice: "Thomas, I hear thee is an industrious lad. Now thee had better stick to thy work, and thee will make a fortune before thee can get this one." On this he acted. Years before he had struck out for himself, beginning as a printer, at fourteen, and soon entering the service of J. and J. Harper, where he became proof-reader, in his seventeenth year. He was an omnivorous reader, and carried on his education as best he might.

THOMAS MACKELLAR.

In the Spring of 1833, when not yet of age, he removed to Philadelphia, and entered, as proof-reader, the type and stereotype foundry of Johnson & Smith, where he soon became foreman, and in 1845, a partner. His zeal and skill added greatly to the business and reputation of the firm, which, in 1860, took the name of MacKellar, Smiths & Jordan. Their specimen books, prepared by him, had some years ago "cost at least $100,000." He founded and long conducted the Typographic Advertiser. His "American Printer" (1866) is the most successful book of that kind extant, having reached a fourteenth edition in 1883. His house is the largest and most celebrated type foundry in the world, with ramifications over the civilized surface of the globe. It has depots of supplies in every part of our country, besides an agency in London and another in Australia.

Presiding over this vast business, and watching with loving care for all improvements in his art, do not absorb Mr. MacKellar's energies. Historical societies, academies of science and art associations of one kind and another, find in him a member and officer. Especially has he been active in philanthropic and religious work. For a quarter of a century he was Corresponding Secretary of the Philadelphia Bible Society. He opened one of the first mission schools in this city. His eldership has not been a sinecure.

Active and successful men of business have often been good Christians, but seldom workers of the Muse. Mr. MacKellar is an exception. Constant occupation and eminent success in a very different field have not dampened his early love for song, nor checked his fertility in producing rhymes, and in this, as well as in type-founding, he has made his mark. His lyrics are, in substance, true hymns, full of ripe experience and of the simplicity and fervency of faith, hope and charity. His first piece was printed in 1833 or '31. For some time he wrote weekly for Neal's Gazette. He has published "Droppings from the Heart," 1844; "Tam's Fortnight Ramble," 1847; "Lines for the Gentle and Loving," 1853; "Rhymes Atween Times," 1872; "Hymns, and a few Metrical Psalms," 1883. This last volume appeared very recently, and gathered up most of his sacred lyrics, written since 1840, with considerable additions of the last two or three years. Several of the earlier ones are more or less familiar.

Mackey, Rev. James Love, was born in Coleraine township, Lancaster county, Pa., January 26th, 1820. He was fond of study, made rapid progress, and thus became qualified to help himself. When he was fourteen years old he opened a school in his father's house. He afterwards taught public school in the neighborhood, attended Hopewell Academy and New London Academy, Pa., and taught in the latter, and in the Academy at Strasburg, Lancaster county, Pa. He studied theology at Princeton Seminary. In November, 1849, he sailed as a missionary to Africa, and located himself at Corisco, where, amidst many trials of his firmness and faith he labored with great zeal and success, until broken health, to his deep regret, required him to return to his native country, in 1865. After a season of rest, his active mind, too active for his frail body, refusing longer inactivity, he took charge of the New London Academy. But he had over-calculated his strength, and in performing the duties of this new position his health declined, until his earthly career was closed, and his soul went up to wear the missionary's crown. His grave, in the New London Cemetery, is marked by a low monument, on the top of which is a representation of the Bible, open at the command, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature," and on one side is the inscription:

"REV. JAMES L. MACKEY;

Missionary at Corisco, in Western Africa, for sixteen years.

Died at New London, Pa., April 30th, 1867,

In his forty-eighth year."

Mackey, Hon. Jeremy, was born in Belyidere, N. J., in 1809. He removed to Monroe county, Pa., about 1833, and followed the business of tanning. In 1860 he was elected an Associate Judge of the county, and served the full term. He then became Cashier of the Stroudsburg Bank, which greatly prospered under his energy and skill. He was for many years a leading elder in the Presbyterian Church in Stroudsburg, and gave largely of his means for its support. Judge Mackey's whole life was characterized by eminent purity and goodness. He was greatly respected by the community in which he lived so long. He died, May 18th, 1883, and his remains were laid to rest in the Stroudsburg Cemetery, amid the tearful regrets of a large company of friends.

Maclaren, Rev. Robert F., son of Rev. Wm. Maclaren, D.D., was born in the city of New York. He studied at Brown University, and at Union College, where he graduated in 1861. His theological course was largely directed by his father. In 1870 he became pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Delaware, Ohio, where he accomplished the difficult task of harmonizing the O. S. and N. S. churches of that place into one strong united church. In November, 1873, he became pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Redwing, Minn., where he remained six years; the church, in that time, becoming one of the foremost and most prosperous in the State. In 1879 he became pastor of the "Central Presbyterian Church" in St. Paul, his present charge.

Mr. Maclaren's ministry has developed harmony, activity, and spirituality among Christians, and has been attended by large and constant accessions of converts. His sermons are prepared with great care, and are delivered with spontaneous earnestness, without the use of a manuscript.

Maclaren, Rev. William, D. D., was born in Perthshire, Scotland. When a child he was brought to this country by his parents, who settled near Albany, N. Y. He graduated at Union College; studied theology in Newburgh Seminary; and was ordained, in September, 1836, by the Presbytery of New York. His early ministry was in the United Presbyterian Church, where he held a very prominent position as pastor of Franklin Street Church, in New York city, and afterward of Pearl Street Church, in Fall River.

In 1869 he united with the Presbyterian Church, and became a member of the Presbytery of Maumee. In this new field he was eminently successful as a peacemaker. He was called to several churches that were weakened by strifes and divisions, and in every case restored harmony and prosperity. In 1875 he was elected President of "Ohio Central College."

His residence, at present, is at St. Paul, Minn., with his son, Robert Forrest.

Dr. Maclean has never used manuscript in the pulpit. His preaching is biblical, earnest and eloquent; and in his pastoral work he has ever manifested the greatest prudence and wisdom.

Maclean, John, D. D., LL.D., eldest son of Dr. John Maclean, the first Professor of Chemistry in the College of New Jersey, and of his wife, Phoebe Bainbridge, was born in Princeton, N. J., March 3d, 1800; entered the College at Princeton in the Spring of 1813, and was admitted to the first degree in the Arts in the Autumn of 1816. In the Autumn of 1818 he was appointed a Tutor in the College, and he was at this time a student in the Theological Seminary of Princeton. In 1822 he was made Teacher of Mathematics and Natural Philosophy, and in 1823 was chosen Professor of Mathematics. In 1829 he was transferred to the Chair of Ancient Languages, and at the same time he was chosen Vice-President of the College. In December, 1853, he was chosen President of the College, and entered upon the duties of his office, June 2th, 1854. In December, 1857, he tendered his resignation, to take effect at the ensuing commencement in June, at which time he gave up his connection with the College, after a faithful service, in various offices, of fifty years.

JOHN MACLEAN, D. D.

Dr. Maclean was several times a member of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, and took an active and prominent part in its proceedings. In 1844 he published, in The Presbyterian, ten letters on the "Quorum or Elder Question," which afterwards were printed in pamphlet form, together with three letters on the "Imposition of Hands." He has also given to the press, "A Lecture on a Common School System for New Jersey;" a revision, in 1831, of Professor Stuart's Prize Essay on "Temperance;" in 1853, two letters on "The True Relations of the Church and State to Schools and Colleges;" besides a number of sermons, and articles on different topics, in the public papers, and in the Princeton Review. Dr. Maclean's life has been one of great activity and usefulness. He is remembered with affection by those who were, as students, under his direction; and now, residing on the classic spot on which he was born, and has ever lived, and waiting for the time of his departure, he is, amid the infirmities of advanced years, held in the highest reverence and esteem by all who know him.

Macurdy, Rev. Elisha, occupies a prominent place among the pioneer ministers of Western Pennsylvania. He was born in Carlisle, Pa., October 15th, 1763. His father removed to Ligonier Valley, Westmoreland county, in embarrassed worldly circumstances. At this time the son was about twenty-one years of age, and engaged in the transportation of freight to and from Baltimore, for about eighteen months, which enabled him to aid materially in the support of the family. After his conversion he became, in 1792, a student of the Academy at Cansonsburg, completing his literary and theological course in 1799; the latter chiefly under the direction of the Rev. Dr. McMillan.

Mr. Macurdy was licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of Ohio, June 26th, 1799. For some time subsequently he was engaged in missionary labor in the region bordering on Lake Erie, but in June, 1800, he was ordained and installed pastor of the united congregations of Cross Roads and Three Springs, by the Presbytery of Ohio. His ministry, from its commencement to its close, was a scene of the most self-denying and unremitting labor. He had an important agency in connection with the great revival in Western Pennsylvania, that commenced about 1801-2. He was among the few leading spirits that formed the Western Missionary Society, designed especially to diffuse the knowledge of the Gospel among the new settlements and the Indian tribes, and he engaged personally in the missionary work, frequently leaving his own immediate charge for a considerable time, to break the bread of life to those who were otherwise entirely destitute of it. His health having suffered from sickness during a missionary appointment at Maumee, which he fulfilled in 1823, he resigned his charge of the Church at Three Springs, and confined himself to that of Cross Roads. In 1835, by reason of increasing bodily infirmities, he resigned the pastoral charge of the latter congregation, and in the Spring of 1836 he removed to Allegheny, where he resided during the rest of his life, still employed, as opportunity offered and his strength allowed, in preaching the gospel. It was mainly through his agency that the way was prepared for the organization of a church in the town of Manchester, adjoining Allegheny. He, also, as he was able, made frequent visits to the inmates of the Western Penitentiary. He died, July 23d, 1845, having a complete triumph in the last hour, and on the day following his remains were conveyed to Cross Roads, the scene of his most extended labors, and, in the midst of a large congregation, committed to their final resting place.

Mr. Macurdy, as a preacher, was distinguished for directness, earnestness, boldness, in both matter and manner. He never daubed with untempered mortar; he never softened down God's truth for the sake of conciliating those who pronounced it a hard saying. Though plain in manner and style, there was a rich vein of evangelical thought and an air of deep sincerity in his preaching, that were far more effective than any mere rhetorical exhibitions could have been. He had a clear, loud voice, which was usually brought into exercise in the pulpit, under the influence of intense feeling, and very often in the utterance of the most terrible denunciations of God's Word. His earnest piety, which may be considered the leading element of his usefulness, kept his heart always beating and his hand always busy for the promotion of the great interests of Christ's kingdom. He has left a bright record of fidelity to the Master.

Magistrate, The Civil. Some writers have maintained that magistracy, or civil government, is founded in the social compact. But this is a mistake. It is a divine institution. It is the will of God that the happiness of mankind be promoted. But government is indispensable to their happiness, to the preservation of peace and order, to the safety of life, liberty and property. It is, indeed, necessary to the very existence of any considerable number of mankind in a social state. The deduction naturally follows that it is the will of God that government should exist, and this deduction of reason is amply confirmed by the express declaration of an inspired apostle: "There is no power but of God; the powers that be are ordained of God. Whosoever, therefore, resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God" (Rom. xiii, 1-2). It is important to remember, however, that although God has instituted civil government, yet he has not enjoined any one form of government as obligatory upon all communities; he has left it free to the several countries to choose that form which they think fittest for themselves, and in this respect the apostle Peter calls it "the ordinance of man" (1 Pet. ii, 13).

Magistrates are appointed for the promotion of the public good, in subordination to the glory of God. Magistrates are called "the ministers of God for good" (Rom. xiii, 4). They are invested with dignity and power, not for their own honor and advantage, but for promoting the welfare of society; especially "for the punishment of evil doers, and for the praise of them that do well." As this is the design of civil government, so this end is in some measure gained, even by the worst of governments. But when this design is systematically and notoriously disregarded, when rulers become habitual tyrants, invading and overthrowing the liberties and privileges of the nation, the governed must have a right to remedy the evil.

Christian magistrates ought to maintain piety, as well as justice and peace. The Apostle (2 Tim. ii, 1) exhorts that prayers be made by Christians "for kings, and for all that are in authority; that we may lead a quiet and peaceable life in all godliness and honesty." "What Christians are here to pray for," says Calvin, "that magistrates must be bound to promote as their end; and this is not simply 'a quiet and peaceable life,' but 'in all godliness and honesty.' Rulers are not, in their official capacity, to be indifferent to godliness any more than to honesty; both are to be countenanced and promoted by them" (Ezra vi, 8-10).

Christian magistrates may lawfully, under the New Testament, wage war upon just and necessary occasions. War must be regarded as a great evil, but in the present state of the world it is sometimes necessary; and if a nation were to adopt and act upon the principle that war is absolutely unlawful, it would soon become a prey to its ambitious neighbors. Under the Old Testament, wars were undertaken by the express command and with the approbation of God; but he could never command and approve of what is morally wrong. In the New Testament, too, there are various circumstances stated which countenance the lawfulness of magistrates waging war, and of Christians bearing arms. When the soldiers inquired of John what they should do, he said unto them, "Do violence to no man, neither accuse any falsely;" but he did not command them to relinquish their profession, as unlawful; on the contrary, the precept which he added, "Be content with your wages," supposed them to continue in their situation (Luke iii, 14). The first Gentile convert who was received into the Christian Church was a centurion; but Peter, when he baptized him, did not require him to give up his situation in the Roman army (Acts x). To determine the several cases in which war may be justifiable would be out of place here; it may, however, be generally stated, that aggressive wars, or such as are undertaken to gratify views of ambition or worldly aggrandizement, cannot be justified; but that defensive wars, or those which, as to the first occasion of them, are defensive, though in their progress they must often be offensive, are lawful. (See Confession of Faith, Chap. xxiii, Secs. I, II.)

Magraw, James, D. D., was born in Hart township, Lancaster county, Pa., January 1st, 1775. He commenced the study of languages at a classical school near Strasburg, and completed his classical and literary course at Franklin College, Lancaster, Pa. He studied theology under the Rev. Nathanael Sample, pastor of the churches of Leacock and Middle Octorara, and was licensed by the Presbytery of New Castle, December 16th, 1801. After spending some time as supply at New London, Chestnut Level, West Nottingham, Fagg's Manor, Little Britain, Chatham, and Deer Creek, and as a missionary in Luzerne county, Pa., he was ordained and installed pastor of the Church of Lower West Nottingham, Md., April 1th, 1804. At this time the church was comparatively feeble, but under his ministry it steadily prospered, and at the time of his death it was a large and flourishing congregation. During his pastorate, about 1810, the Upper West Nottingham Church was organized, and he became its pastor, giving it one-third of his time, until 1821. In 1822 he became the pastor, for one-third of his time, of the recently organized Church of Charlestown, and continued to serve it until his death, which occurred October 20th, 1835. The church soon afterwards became extinct.

Dr. Magraw was of a kind, genial and sympathetic nature, which had a magnetic influence in attaching to him friends. He was endowed with intellectual powers far above the ordinary standard. He was emphatically a man of action. His administrative abilities were of a high order. As Superintendent of the West Nottingham Academy, which he was instrumental in establishing, he was most efficient. As a minister of the gospel, he was faithful, earnest, devoted. As a preacher, he was able and impressive. As a pastor, he was diligent in the discharge of every duty. Of the Church courts he was a prominent and influential member. His ministry was crowned with signal success.

Mahon, Rev. Joseph, is a native of Cumberland Valley, Pa., so well-known for its excellent type of Scotch-Irish Presbyterianism. He was born in Shippenburg, June 25th, 1805; graduated at Jefferson College, Pa., in 1824; was teacher in Union Seminary, Va., 1828-30; ordained in his Presbytery of New Brunswick, April, 1836; agent of the Board of Education, 1831-5; pastor at Lawrenceville, N. J., 1836-48; agent of Board of Publication, 1850-4; agent of Pennsylvania Colonization Society, 1856-60; stated supply at Petersburg and Irish Grove, Ill., 1871-2. Mr. Mahon now resides in his native place, and responds to all applications in his Presbytery for his ministerial service. He is an affable gentleman, a good scholar, an excellent preacher, clear, logical, direct, scriptural; and, amidst the shadows of advanced age, can look back upon a life of usefulness in the Master's service.

Makemie, Rev. Francis was an Irishman—born near Rathmelton, Donegal county, Ireland. The date of his birth is not known. He is supposed to have prosecuted his academical, if not his theological, course, at one of the Scottish universities. All that is known of his early religious exercises is, that he became hopefully pious at the age of fourteen, chiefly through the instrumentality of an excellent school-master, under whose instruction he was placed.

In 1680 the Irish Presbytery of Laggan received a letter from Judge William Stevens, a member of Lord Baltimore's Council, entreating that ministers be sent to Maryland and Virginia. The next year it licensed Mr. Makemie, and probably ordained him soon afterwards, as an evangelist for the distant colonies. He preached for a time in Barbadoes. About 1684 he began his labors on the continent. In the Southeast corner of Maryland there were three or four "meeting houses," and in the one at Snow Hill he organized a church. The brogue of his kindred was there. An elder and merchant, Adam Spence, had probably signed the Solemn League and Covenant in Scotland, and a descendant of his, reciting the tradition of a hundred and thirty years, thus writes of Mr. Makemie: "One generation has uttered his praises in the ears of its successor, and you may, even yet, hear their echo. Parents made his surname the Christian name of their children, until, in the neighborhood of Snow Hill, it has become a common one." This bill was his base of missionary operations.

The people were scattered like sheep in the wilderness, and a large portion of Mr. Makemie's labors was to search them out. Soon after he had commenced his ministry in Maryland, he found on Elizabeth river, in Virginia, "a poor desolate people" mourning the loss of their "dissenting ministers from Ireland," who had been removed by death the Summer previous. It was not long before quite a number of congregations were gathered in the region which he had selected as his field of labor. An itinerant missionary, and in reality the bishop of a primitive diocese, he journeyed from place to place, sometimes on the eastern shore of Maryland, sometimes in Virginia, and sometimes extending his journeys as far as South Carolina. To the extent of his ability he supplied the feeble churches, but he deeply felt the need of others to assist him. To obtain these was an object of paramount importance, and he spared no efforts to attain it. With this end in view, he corresponded with ministers in London and in Boston. But he was not content with this. He broke away, we may be sure, at a great sacrifice, from the pressing calls around him, that he might personally urge his appeals. He crossed the ocean, and applied to the Independent and Presbyterian ministers of London for aid. He visited New England and consulted with Mather. He was indefatigable in effort, clear-sighted and sagacious in his views, liberal in sentiment, fearless in the discharge of duty, and shrank from no burden.

In 1707 Mr. Makemie and his friend and fellow-laborer, the Rev. John Hampton, stopped a few days in New York, on their way to New England. Lord Cornbury, the Deputy Governor, who had no respect for the Act of Toleration, forbade the use of the Dutch Church to Mr. Makemie, whose friends secured him a private house. There he preached "in as public a manner as possible, with open doors." Mr. Hampton was granted a church by the people of Newtown, on Long Island. They were arrested. In the presence of Lord Cornbury, Mr. Makemie argued that the Toleration Act extended to all the colonies, and that the license taken in Virginia was good in New York. The answer was, "You are strolling preachers; you shall not spread your pernicious doctrines here." "As to our doctrines," said Mr. Makemie, with admirable dignity, "we have our Confession of Faith, which is known to the Christian world, and I challenge all the clergy of York to show us any false or pernicious doctrines therein. We are able to prove that its doctrinal articles agree with those of the Church of England." "But these articles," replied the Governor, "you have not signed." "As to the Articles of Religion," said Mr. Makemie, "I have a copy in my pocket, and am ready at all times to sign, with those exceptions specified in the law." But all argument was vain. The accused were sent to jail, where they continued nearly two months. At the end of that time they were brought before the Chief Justice, who had been absent at the time of their imprisonment, by a writ of habeas corpus, and admitted to bail, though no bill was found by the Grand Jury against Mr. Hampton, as he had not preached in the city, and he was therefore discharged. In June following, Mr. Makemie returned from Virginia to New York, to stand his trial. The result of it was an acquittal by the jury. But the court would not discharge him from his recognizance till they had obliged him to pay all the fees of his prosecution, which, together with his expenses, amounted to little less than three hundred dollars. This injustice was soon denounced by the Legislature. He preached in the French Church, and narrowly escaped arrest in New Jersey. At Boston he published the sermon which caused his imprisonment. One of the texts was: "We ought to obey God rather than men."

Even after this Mr. Makemie was not left unmolested. He narrowly escaped a second prosecution, based, if possible, on even weaker grounds than the first. A strange intolerance pursued him, as a chief offender, but the object was to obstruct the preaching of all Presbyterian ministers. The Dutch and other dissenters neither asked nor would receive a license, yet they were not disturbed. But any attempt of Presbyterian ministers to extend their Church was seriously obstructed. There is also evidence that New York was not the only province in which Mr. Makemie had to encounter gross and severe intolerance. His preaching, far and wide, drew on him the anger of the Virginia clergy, and he was seized and carried to the Governor, at Williamsburg, but his noble vindication obtained for him the Governor's license to preach throughout the Old Dominion. And, as a result, it is thought, of his argument, the Virginia Legislature entered, April 15th, 1699, the Act of Toleration on their Statute-book.

Mr. Makemie died at his residence in Virginia, in the Summer of 1708, leaving a widow and two daughters. He made liberal bequests to charitable objects, and distributed his valuable library among his family and two or three other friends. An original portrait of him was destroyed in the burning of the house of the Rev. Dr. Balch, of Georgetown, D. C. His influence in the region in which he chiefly exercised his ministry was extensive and powerful. Dr. Miller, upon the authority of some venerable men of the generation immediately succeeding him, speaks of him as a man of eminent piety and strong intellectual powers, adding to force of talents a fascinating address, and being conspicuous for his natural endowments and his dignity and faithfulness as a minister of the gospel. What gives him his grand distinction is, that he is generally regarded as the first regular and thorough Presbyterian in this country, and the father of the American Presbyterian Church. (See Denton, Rev. Richard.)

The following extract from an article by the Rev. Robert H. Williams, of Annapolis, Md., in a recent number of the Presbyterian, is of interest in this connection:—

"The discussion carried on for some weeks in our Baltimore paper, as to which is the oldest Presbyterian church in the land, has brought out a good deal of interesting material for a future history of the Denomination. It is wonderful what a number of facts about old churches can be gathered when the men in these old churches set to work to obtain them.

"We have always supposed that the churches on the Eastern Shore of Maryland were the oldest in the land. Then, looking carefully into the history of Presbyterianism on the Western Shore of Maryland, we found that Annapolis could claim an earlier date for her Presbyterianism, and that from the capital of the State of Maryland the ancient people drifted to the Patuxent river, and founded the church now known as Mt. Paran, as early as 1715, and probably to Deer Creek, and founded the Churchville Church, as early as 1739.

"Now it is claimed that the church at New Castle, Del., is nearly as old, and that churches at Hempstead, L. I., and Windsor, Conn., are older. Instead of being two hundred years old, Presbyterianism in this country is more than two hundred and fifty years old."

Malin, David, D.D., was born in Philadelphia, Pa., January 21st, 1805. He graduated at Hamilton College, N. Y., in 1833; for a time teacher in Auburn Seminary; studied theology at Princeton, and was ordained by the Presbytery of Cayuga, April 25th, 1838. He was pastor of the Church at Genoa, N. Y., 1838-42; District Secretary of the A. B. C. F. M., 1842-57; Associate Secretary of the American Tract Society, Philadelphia, Pa., 1857-9; Principal of a Classical School, Philadelphia, 1859-62; in the service of the U. S. Sub-Treasurer, New York city, 1865-68; and pastor of the Fifteenth Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, Pa., 1870-78. Dr. Malin still resides in Philadelphia, without any pastoral charge, but frequently called to assist his brethren, and occupy vacant pulpits. He is a gentleman of good scholarly attainments, of pleasing address, an instructive preacher, and an able debater. He is an active and useful member of the Presbytery of Philadelphia.

Maltby, Rev. John, graduated at Yale in 1747, and was a Tutor in Nassau Hall from 1749 to 1752. Probably he studied theology with Mr. Burr. He was ordained by New York Presbytery in 1753 or 1754, and was for a number of years the much-loved pastor of the Church on the Island of Bermuda. In 1770 Mr. Maltby was dismissed to South Carolina Presbytery, and is said to have labored in Charleston, but, his health failing, he removed to Hanover, New Hampshire, and died there, in 1774.

Man. When God originally formed man, it was after his own image and in his likeness (Gen. i. 26, 27; v. 1); bodily shape being not thereby intended, but moral qualification. A very excellent creature was man; invested with extensive dominion, placed in a fitting habitation, and supplied with sources of enjoyment which, had he kept the law of his being, would have ensured his happiness (i. 28; ii. 8). Doubtless there would have been intimate union between him and his Creator. He was not at once complete in knowledge, and he would have learned more and more of Him whom to know is life eternal, whose works and providence would have sufficiently illustrated his great character. And this advancement, and the obedience he rendered, would have been delightful. Whether this earth would have been always man's habitation, or whether he would have been removed, prepared by his residence and behavior here, to a higher sphere, we cannot tell. His condition had a short and sad termination; he transgressed God's command; and suffering and death were the consequence of sin. "God made man upright; but they have sought out many inventions" (Eccles. vii. 29). Into the theological questions of the fall of man, and the means of recovery mercifully provided by Jesus Christ, it is not intended to enter here. But there are matters which have called forth much discussion—the antiquity of man upon the earth, and the problem whether the nations have all descended from a single pair, of which something must be said. It can be but brief; the full discussion would demand a volume.

According to the systems of chronology generally adopted, even in their more lengthened form, the creation of man was not, by the Mosiac account, more than six or seven thousand years ago. But this period, it is alleged, is not long enough to explain the phenomena of the present state of the world, more especially if we are to imagine mankind sprung from one pair. The differences of type between different races must have required immense duration to establish them as we see them established; and we find them on ancient monuments two or three thousand years old depicted pretty nearly as they now are. Again, the languages in use, which can be traced up to very few, possibly even to one, could not, it is said, have reached their present divergence, except in the course of almost innumerable ages. Moreover, relics have been found, implements, the work of men's hands, and human bones, in localities and embedded in strata where they must have lain from a date long prior to that to which our chronology reaches. Startling conclusions have hence been drawn; the more so because some investigators have left the Bible testimony entirely out of their calculation; they have reasoned on the principles and from the data above referred to, and have not confronted these with the sacred record—a proceeding about as sensible as if, in a judicial enquiry, probabilities alone were weighed and obscure hints relied on, whilst living evidence, with much to say for illustration, was not even allowed to speak. There are others, indeed, who have acted in a more becoming manner; and some of these, interpreting Scripture passages differently from the ordinarily-received mode of exposition, declare that the vast antiquity of man and the distinct varieties of human species are not, in their view, opposed to the great doctrines of Revelation.

Now, it must be observed, first of all, that differences of type are assumed to proceed at the same rate through the long chapter of the world's history. Laying out of sight for a moment the Scripture narrative of the three branches into which mankind were divided after the flood, different regions being, in God's providence, assigned for their habitations, and also the presumable conclusion that he would speedily fit each for its respective condition of life, we may well ask whether all analogy is not against a uniform rate of change. Take man, take animals generally, in their ordinary life. How rapid and strange are the changes and developments of infancy and youth; how slow the alteration in maturer years. Subject an individual to the influence of a strange climate; its effects are considerable at first; but let him live through these; let his body be brought, so to speak, into union with what surrounds him; let him become acclimatized—and how trifling in effect comes to be the previously-disturbing influence, even through long years. The vegetable world will furnish other illustrations. Under the guiding hand of the husbandman changes are readily produced which the unassisted powers of nature, to adopt common phraseology, would perhaps never accomplish. Are we to deny, then, that the finger of God is at all upon his works? It is as unphilosophical as it is dangerous, to reason from progress under conditions which we can understand to progress under conditions of which we know literally nothing. And well might the Creator ask such a reasoner, as he did the less presumptuous Job, when puzzled only about the anomalies of Providence, "Where wast thou when I laid the foundations of the earth? declare, if thou hast understanding . . . have the gates of death been opened unto thee? or hast thou seen the doors of the shadow of death?" (Job xxxviii. 4, 17). The influences of climate, soil and temperature, taken in connection with the reasonably greater effects they would produce when the tribes of the earth were only taking those positions which, with comparatively little change, they have now occupied for many centuries, are not insufficient to account for the divergence we now witness. This is corroborated by the contrasts often now seen in the same family.

The argument from the variety of languages is not much more forcible. Languages are now in a state of flux, of rapid flux. And yet in the civilized parts of the world, where there is a standard literature, change seems almost precluded. If, for example, our own tongue has so altered that the English of four hundred years ago is now well-nigh unintelligible, with how much greater ease, with what accelerated swiftness, must an unwritten tongue, floating in the rude conversation of wild tribes, be modified, enlarged, contracted, give birth to fresh and strange dialects. Modern examples are not wanting to illustrate this. In Burmah, it is said, people that have migrated to a distance have lost their own language in two or three generations. And we are assured that a dictionary of a Central American tongue, carefully compiled, became nearly useless in ten years. In the face of such facts, who can reason from the variations of language to the vast antiquity of man, more especially when the finger of God was, as the sacred testimony assures us, in this matter also put forth; He who made man's mouth, for adequate cause disposing that mouth rapidly to modify its utterance, changing, very possibly, not merely the words and syllables, but the very type of language itself?

The argument taken from the discovery of implements or human remains in positions which seem to indicate an immense antiquity, is at first sight very formidable. But there are many considerations which show that it is necessary to receive conclusions deduced from such discoveries with extreme caution. For instance: something has been found deeply imbedded in alluvial soil, the accretion of which is proved to be now advancing at a certain rate. Considering the rate as uniform, it is calculated that so many thousand years must have elapsed since the deposits began to form over the substance in question. But who is to assure us that this rate is uniform? And cases have occurred in which the antiquity claimed has been clearly demonstrated to be erroneous. Thus, some pottery in the Nile deposits was at first imagined by the explorers to be 13,000 years old; it has since been proved of modern date. The bones, again, of extinct animals, have been found in connection with the traces of men; it is assumed that men must have existed at an earlier date, to be contemporaneous with the animals. But why should not the conclusion rather be that the animals existed at a later era, to be contemporaneous with men? And, after all, does the juxtaposition prove that the men and the animals were contemporaneous? Dr. Duns pertinently observes that, 'where traces of man are met with, many of the bones are broken. The use of bones in the chase, and in the manufacture of flint implements, is illustrated by the habits of some of the Esquimaux tribes, even in our day. Sir Edward Belcher informs us that they use pieces of horn in the preparation of their flint weapons. Is it not in the highest degree probable that these bones of huge mammals would be eagerly sought for by the tribes who have left traces of their presence in gravel heaps and in caves? Instead, then, of holding that the animals lived at the same time as the men, it would be much more in keeping with the facts before us to hold that the men had found these bones and had taken them to the places to which they resorted. Other remains which are supposed to testify to the great antiquity of man furnish but the same uncertain kinds of proof. When stone implements are found, it is concluded that they were used by races more ancient than those who had metallic implements. But we know that metallic and flint utensils have been used together. Certainly the children of Israel in the wilderness were acquainted with metals; and yet their knives for the solemn circumcision, when they had crossed the Jordan, were of flint (Josh. v, 2). The conclusions deduced, then, are conjectural; and it is observable, as a proof of uncertainty in the evidence relied on, that different philosophers compute differently from the same premises; nay, that the same philosophers draw at different times different conclusions from the same data.

In opposition to arguments such as those which have been noticed, we have, besides the Scripture record, to place the fact that history ascends but a very few thousand years. Some nations, indeed, claim a vast antiquity; but when their annals are sifted, the result is—and it is very remarkable that in different lands and among different nations there should be such agreement—that their chronicles and traditions begin at a period not greater than four or five thousand years ago! It is not likely that men existed for fifteen or twenty thousand years, leaving no trace but a few bones or some weapons, and that then they made a sudden start, and filled the earth with monuments of their intelligence and histories of their deeds, to which we can with confidence ascend, while all beyond is but the blackness of darkness, which may be felt. "When we are asked," says Mr. Birks, "in the total absence of all historical evidence, in direct opposition to the teaching of the Scriptures, and on the strength of conjectures on the date of two or three skulls, or some hundreds of rudely-shaped flint-heads in the valley of the Somme, to add ten or twenty thousand years to these ages of moral gloom and darkness, our heart and understanding, if not perverted and ossified by false science, recoil instinctively from the monstrous demand. . . . The license is still bolder and more intolerable, when two or three skulls and skeletons, and some scores of rude implements, found in districts still uncivilized only two thousand years ago, become the pretext for interpolating the world's history with three or four hundred generations of utter barbarism and heathenish darkness, of which all trace and memory has long since passed away. Such speculators degrade the course of Providence into a moral chaos, deeper and more melancholy than the natural confusion out of which the present world arose.

There is another branch of enquiry which comes, if some modern theories be adopted, into more direct collision with what inspired men have told us. The plain teaching of the Scripture is that our race, now so multitudinous, sprung from a single pair; that there is, therefore, a bond of brotherhood between all nations; that, in consequence of the transgression of the original parents, all have shared the same degradation, and can obtain recovery only through the mediation of that divine Person who, taking flesh, allied Himself to the whole human race, and became thereby a fit and adequate Mediator between God and man (Acts xvii, 26; Rom. v, 12-19).

Now it has been maintained that men vary so much in habit, constitution, intellectual power, color, bodily conformation, that they cannot have all descended from the same parents. But there are, certainly, very plain and weighty reasons for the descent of all men from the same stock, which have been summed up by Dr. Dana. "The oneness of species is sustained by the following considerations: 1. The fact of an essential identity among men of all races in physical and mental characteristics. 2. The capability of an intermixture of races with continued fertile progeny. The inferior race, in case of mixture with a superior, may dwindle, the people becoming, from their position, discouraged, debased, and in their poverty and superstition an easy prey to disease; and it may possibly die out, as the weaker weeds disappear among the strong-growing grass; such decay is hence no evidence that there is a natural limit to the fertility of "mixed breeds," as some have urged. 3. Among mammals the higher genera have few species, and the highest group next to man, that of the orang-outang, contains only eight; and these eight belong to two genera—five of them to the genus Pithecus of the East Indies, and three to the higher genus Troglodytes of Africa. Analogy requires that man should here have pre-eminence. If more than one species be admitted, there is scarcely a limit to the number that may be made."

The capability of man to spread himself and live in all the regions of the earth is very noteworthy. Some have been disposed to doubt the fact, and to imagine that men of one clime could not permanently establish themselves in another. There is a complete answer to this. The Jewish race, a standing illustration of the truth of prophecy, are a standing proof also of the capability mentioned. Demonstrably, of old seated in one extremity of Asia, they are now spread over every continent, accustomed to every climate, suited to every varying mode of life.

The reader must be reminded that philosophical theories are frequently changing. Let him never be allured by any of them, however specious, to doubt the Bible revelation. That stands upon proof so large and satisfactory that we may well be sure that, even if discoveries we cannot at present comprehend are made, they will ultimately be found not discordant with God's voice in His Word. The humble student of that Word will wait for fuller light, in patience and in faith.

It was a crowning work when man proceeded from the creative hand. "Man," says Dr. Dana, "was the first being that was not finished on reaching adult growth, but was provided with powers for indefinite expansion, a will for a life of work, and boundless aspirations to lead to endless improvement. He was the first being capable of an intelligent survey of nature and comprehension of her laws; the first capable of augmenting his strength by bending nature to his service, rendering thereby a weak body stronger than all possible animal force; the first capable of deriving happiness from beauty, truth and goodness, of apprehending eternal right, of looking from the finite toward the infinite, and communing with God, his Maker. Made in the image of God, surely he is immeasurably beyond the brute. . . . The supremacy of the animal in nature, which had continued until now, here yields, therefore, to the supremacy of the spiritual. . . . And the earth subserves her chief purpose in nurturing this new creation for a still more exalted stage, that of spiritual existence."

It is revelation which discloses the last noble destiny of men. Redeemed from the degradation of the fall by the condescension of the Son of God, they shall partake His glory. The mind cannot now, indeed, conceive its splendor, nor can human tongue adventure to describe it. Even inspiration falters here. "It doth not yet appear what we shall be; but we know that when He shall appear, we shall be like Him; for we shall see Him as He is" (1 John iii, 2). How fatal the ruin of those who miss, by unbelief and sin, this excellent consummation.

Mangasarian, Rev. Mangasar M., was born December 25th, 1858, at Mashgerl, on the River Euphrates, in Asia Minor. He entered college in 1871, and graduated in 1876 (Robert College, Constantinople). He began the study of theology at Maisooran, Turkey, and completed his studies at the Theological Seminary in Princeton, N. J., 1882. The same year he was called to the Spring Garden Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia. Mr. Mangasarian is a very impressive speaker. His Eastern imagery, added to his rich, distinct voice, and great fervor in delivery, class him among the successful ministers of Philadelphia. His sermons are carefully written, and his wonderful memory enables him to dispense with using his notes. His manner of treating some of his subjects is quite original; his words are full of the gospel; his themes are Christ and His cross; and the desire of his heart is that sinners should be converted. His familiarity with the manners and customs of gospel lands, together with his earnest, sincere manner, make him a pastor beloved—one who has been instrumental in bringing great prosperity to the church of which he has charge. The first year of his ministry in this church was blessed by over one hundred additions to its membership, mostly by profession of faith.

March, Francis Andrew, LL.D., eldest child of Andrew and Nancy Parker March, was born in Millbury, Mass., October 25th, 1825. He graduated at Amherst College, in 1845, with the highest honors. After practicing law for a short time he taught three years (1852-55), in Fredericksburg, Va.; went to Easton, Pa., as tutor in Lafayette College, in 1855; was appointed Adjunct Professor of English Literature, in 1856; and Professor of the English Language and Comparative Philology in 1858. This professorship he still holds.

Prof. March published a "Method of Philological Study of the English Language," 1865; "A Parser and Analyzer, for beginners, with diagrams and suggestive pictures," 1869; "A Comparative Grammar of the Anglo-Saxon Language, in which its forms are illustrated by those of the Sanskrit, Greek, Latin, Gothic, Old Saxon, Old Friesic, Old Norse, and Old High German," 1870; and "An Anglo-Saxon Reader, with philological notes, vocabulary and a brief grammar," 1870. He has also contributed a great number of philological articles to the leading Reviews in America, and to the Jahrbuch für Rom. und Englische Literatur, Berlin, 1859, 1860, 1861. Two articles from his pen, on Sir William Hamilton, in the Princeton Review, were thought to contain the first elaborate exposition of the difficulties in applying Hamilton's views to the facts of Perception, and attracted appreciative attention and notice from eminent scholars, at home and abroad.

Markoe, Francis, from the Island of Santa Cruz, graduated at Princeton College in 1791. His ancestors were of Huguenot descent, and of high rank, the Duke of Sully being among them. After some time spent on his native island, where he was, by a remarkable providence, converted to God, he settled in Philadelphia about the beginning of the century, and entered into mercantile life. Here he was abundant in labor, especially in the instruction of the ignorant, in which was his great delight. Removing from Philadelphia to New York, he became an elder in the Mercer Street Presbyterian Church, of which Dr. Skinner was pastor, and his Christian character shone forth pre-eminently. Dr. Skinner wrote of him: "Among contemporary Christians, so far as my acquaintance has extended, as complete and perfect pattern of holiness as he was

I have not seen, nor have I heard or read of many among saints of former times that seem to have more adorned, in all things, the doctrine of Christ." Mr. Markoe died in triumph, in New York, February 16th, 1848.

Marks, Lafayette, D. D., was born in Hancock county, West Virginia. His academic education he received at Wellsville, Ohio, and Hookstown, Pa. Two years he spent at Jefferson College, Canonsburg, Pa., and then went to Franklin College, New Athens, Ohio, where he graduated in 1856. His theological studies he pursued at the United Presbyterian Seminary, in Allegheny City. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Monongahela, in 1859, and ordained and installed pastor over the United Presbyterian congregation of Union, near Pittsburg, in 1860, where he remained for seven years. He then resigned, and was shortly after called to take charge of the North United Presbyterian Church, in Philadelphia, where he remained till called, in the Fall of 1868, to Hanover Street Church, in Wilmington, Del., of which he is still pastor. A few years since, he received the degree of D. D. from his Alma Mater. Dr. Marks is yet in his prime, a sound theologian, an earnest and forcible preacher, and a faithful pastor.

Marquis, Rev. James E., the son of William and Sarah Marquis, was born near Cross Creek, Washington county, Pa., November 20th, 1815. He was educated in Jefferson College; studied theology in the Western Seminary, Allegheny; was licensed by Washington Presbytery in 1841, and ordained by Sidney Presbytery in 1848. During the first ten years of his ministry he labored in the churches of Kenton, Mansfield, Shelby, and Ontario, Ohio. In 1858 he removed to Bloomington, Ill., and labored one year as a Presbyterial Missionary for the Presbyteries of Peoria and Bloomington. At the close of this engagement he accepted the united charge of the churches of Salem, Brunswick, and Elmwood, which he retained until his decease, February 23d, 1863. He was a faithful and useful man. His preaching was ever characterized by love and deep earnestness. As a pastor his highest aim was to follow in the footsteps of his Divine Master.

Marquis, Rev. Thomas, was born in Opequon, near Winchester, Va.; received his classical education at Canonsburg Academy; studied theology with Dr. McMillan, and was licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of Redstone, April 19th, 1793. On April 23d, 1791, he was installed, by the Presbytery of Ohio, pastor of the congregation of Cross Creek. In addition to his labors at Cross Creek, he acted as a stated supply one-half of the time at Upper Buffalo, until that church called the Rev. John Anderson to be their pastor, when his connection with it ceased. He continued, however, in the charge of the Church of Cross Creek, until October 3d, 1826, which, from the time of his settlement as their pastor, included a period of thirty-two years. Several precious revivals occurred during his ministry, and upwards of four hundred persons were added to the Church.

Mr. Marquis died peacefully and triumphantly, on September 27th, 1827. He was upwards of seventy years of age. All who knew him speak of him as an eloquent and impressive preacher. The tones of his voice were exceedingly musical. Hence he was often called "the silver-tongued Marquis." In the judicatories of the Church he was esteemed a wise and judicious counsellor. Hence, when, in 1804, the General Assembly determined to appoint a committee to visit the Synod of Kentucky, and endeavor to heal the disorders which had taken place within the bounds of that Synod, he was chosen one of the number for that purpose. The Assembly, in 1805, commended the committee for the diligence, prudence, zeal, and fidelity with which they appeared to have executed their commission.

Marr, Rev. James Hervey, was born at Lewisburg, Pa.; graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1862, and pursued his theological studies at Princeton. He was ordained an evangelist by the Presbytery of San Francisco, March 21st, 1868. He has been stated supply, Baltimore, Md., 1865; Clearfield and Harrisburg, Pa., 1865-6; La Crescent, Hokah and Brownsville, Minn., 1866; San Francisco, Cal., 1867-9; East Orange, N. J., 1870-78, and is at present pastor of the Cumberland Street Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, a new enterprise, which he is laboring diligently to promote and strengthen.

Marr, Rev. Joseph, son of William and Mary (Barber) Marr, was born at Milton, Pa., March 14th, 1806; spent two years at Jefferson College; studied theology at Princeton Seminary, and under the Rev. Thomas Hood, and was licensed by the Presbytery of Northumberland, April 15th, 1831. Mr. Marr's successive fields of labor were as follows: From 1831-38 he labored as an evangelist at Williamsport and its vicinity, in Northumberland Presbytery; from 1838-40 was stated supply at Buffalo, Pa.; from 1840-42 was a domestic missionary in Northumberland Presbytery, the next ten years, 1842-52, were spent in successful labors in Canada West, where he built up several feeble churches, and performed a large amount of useful missionary service; the years 1852-58 were spent at Milton, Pa., where he and his wife conducted a female seminary, he also serving, as stated supply, the Church at Berwick, Pa., 1852-54, the remainder of the time being in ill health. He then removed to St. Louis, Mo., where he had charge of a classical school 1858-60; the years 1860-75 were mainly spent in Missouri, at Carondelet, 1861-70, St. Louis, 1870-72, and Kansas City, 1872-75, much of the time in feeble health. In the latter year he returned to Pennsylvania, steadily supplied the churches of Williamsport and Clear Spring, Md., for one year and thenceforth resided at Harrisburg, Pa., until his death, June 27th, 1881. He was a man of devoted piety, an earnest workman, of great gentleness of spirit, and was ardently attached to the doctrines, polity, and simple scriptural worship of the Presbyterian Church.

Marshall, Rev. Alexander Stewart, son of John and Elizabeth (Stewart) Marshall, was born in Wayne township, Armstrong county, Pa., April 29th, 1829. He graduated at Washington College, Pa., in 1853, defraying his expenses by teaching. He received his theological training at Allegheny and Princeton seminaries. In June, 1855, he was licensed by the Blairstown Presbytery. In April, 1856, he became stated supply of the Presbyterian Church at Marion, Iowa, and April 11th, 1857, he was ordained and installed pastor of the same church, which he has served ever since.

He was the last Stated Clerk of the Cedar Presbytery, and at the union of the Old and the New School branches, and the constitution of the Synod of Iowa North, he was chosen its Clerk and Treasurer. These offices he held until the two Synods of Iowa were united, in 1882. He was chosen the first Moderator of the new Synod of Iowa.

When Mr. Marshall commenced his labors at Marion, Iowa was new and undeveloped; it had no railroads, and it gave little promise of the prosperity to be seen now. He was called upon to endure the hardships of the pioneer preachers; but he has seen the land "blossom as the rose," and few, if any, have done more to shape the religious thought of the State. His first sermon at Marion, April 20th, 1856, was preached in a school-house, to an audience of thirty-five. A church building was completed the following Spring, and from that time the church has been a power for good. Four years ago Mr. Marshall was able to make the following remarkable statement: "All the children of the families connected with the church over thirteen and fourteen years of age, with only two or three exceptions, have become communicants, and there is no one who has been a regular attendant during the past five years but what is now a member of the church." This one fact gives some indication of his influence during the twenty-eight years of his pastorate.

As a man Mr. Marshall is a kind, courteous, refined Christian gentleman, never doing anything to compromise his manhood or his profession; as a preacher he is conservative, evangelical and earnest, his well-known sincerity and uprightness of life giving force to his words; as a pastor he is "instant in season and out of season," giving advice to those in perplexity, bringing consolation to those in sorrow, and rejoicing with those that rejoice; as a presbyter he is wise and practical, his words having great weight in the councils of the Church; as a member of the community his daily life is an eloquent sermon, and he commands the highest respect.

Marshall Matthew Morton, D.D., was born in Fredericksburg, Va., on the 19th of February, 1801. He commenced preaching at the early age of twenty, and faithfully preached the gospel for fifty years. When he was but a boy, his parents moved to Tennessee, in which State he spent his long and useful life. At the close of the war he was called to the pastoral charge of the Presbyterian Church in Trenton, Gibson county, Tenn., where he entered upon his work with great energy and efficiency. Few men of his age accomplished more in the last decade of their lives than did this faithful servant. Not confining his labors to his immediate charge alone, he went forth among the waste places, confirming the saints and winning souls to Christ. By his untiring zeal and assiduity, under the divine blessing, he was instrumental in erecting a beautiful brick church in Union City, costing some three or four thousand dollars, and it now stands as an enduring monument of his usefulness. Yielding to the advice of his physician and friends, he traveled for his health, in Virginia and East Tennessee, telling his family, as he left, that he would not return alive. True to his prediction, he departed this life, in Chattanooga, on Sabbath morning, August 23d, 1874.

Marshall, Rev. Robert, was born in County Down, Ireland, November 27th, 1760, and in the twelfth year of his age accompanied his family to Western Pennsylvania. He enlisted, at the age of sixteen, as a private soldier during the Revolutionary War, and was in six general engagements, one of which was the hard-fought battle of Monmouth, where he narrowly escaped with his life, a bullet grazing his locks. After his conversion, when about twenty-three years old, he commenced preparation for the ministry. His academical studies were conducted under Mr. Graham, at Liberty Hall, Va.; his theological course under Dr. McMillan. After being licensed by Redstone Presbytery, he returned to Virginia, and labored in the revival, with great zeal and success. He was remarkable for his fidelity in visiting and conversing upon religion. In 1791 he removed to Kentucky, in the capacity of a missionary of the Synod, and on the 13th of June, 1793, was ordained pastor of Bethel and Blue Spring churches. He also conducted a classical school, at which many received their education who afterwards made a very prominent figure in the world.

In the great revival of 1800 Mr. Marshall was one of the chief leaders, and carried away by the torrent of enthusiasm that swept over Kentucky, and sincerely believing his more sober brethren to be wrong, he joined with Stone, in 1803, in fomenting the New-light Schism. He afterwards saw his error, and in 1811 returned to the bosom of the Church. He took an appointment under the Assembly's Standing Committee of Missions in 1812, and was soon after reinstated in his old charge of Bethel, where he continued till his decease, in 1833, at the advanced age of seventy-three.

Marshall, Rev. Samuel Vance, the son of Rev. Robert and Jane (Vance) Marshall, was born in Fayette county, Ky., February 6th, 1798. He graduated at Transylvania University in 1821, and at Princeton Seminary in 1825. He was licensed by New Brunswick Presbytery the same year, and on returning to Kentucky he was ordained by West Lexington Presbytery, in 1826. His first year of ministerial labor was as a missionary in South Carolina, then to North Middleton and Mount Sterling churches, in Bourbon and Montgomery counties, Ky., then in Woodford Church, Ky. He was elected Professor of Languages in Transylvania University, which position he held for two years, until his election to the same Chair in Oakland College, in 1837. Here he spent the most of his life. For some years he was a teacher, and a partially voluntary evangelist, especially among colored people. He was a man of strong character and large attainments, a good preacher, and eminently kind and social in his disposition. He died November 30th, 1860.

Marshall, W. J., son of William J. and Sarah Lyne Marshall, was born in Henderson county, Ky., December 27th, 1827. He joined the Presbyterian Church in 1842; was made an elder in 1853; and has been for a number of years superintendent of the Presbyterian Sunday school at Henderson. Strong in his convictions, steadfast in his purposes, earnest and zealous in behalf of his church, he has given his time and his means liberally to her upbuilding. He is one of the most useful and substantial citizens of the county, and is as ready in business as in church matters to wield his influence for the public good. The force of his solid, practical sense is felt in nearly every public enterprise.

Martien, William Stockton, was born June 20th, 1798, and belonged to a family of Huguenot descent. From 1828 to 1834, he was engaged in business in Philadelphia, with Mr. James Russell. In 1830, in connection with some other gentlemen, he engaged in the establishment of the Presbyterian, at a period when such an enterprise was attended with great difficulty, and from the year 1834 until 1862, continued to be its chief proprietor and publisher. In 1833 he commenced the publication of religious books, a business in which he was actively engaged during all his life. As a member of the Executive Committee of the Board of Domestic Missions, his earnest devotion and wise counsels were long regarded as an element of great value to that cause. In the early infancy of the Board of Publication of the Presbyterian Church he extended to it a helping hand, and from that time until his death he continued to serve the Board as a most faithful and efficient member.

During the Rev. Dr. William M. Engles' pastorate of the Seventh (now Tabernaclc) Presbyterian Church, Mr. Martien made a profession of religion, April 18th, 1830; was afterwards chosen to the office of deacon in the church, and subsequently, in the year 1846, he was elected and ordained ruling elder, in which office he continued to serve with great fidelity until his death, which occurred April 16th, 1861. Mr. Martien favored the largest liberality in plans and purposes of doing good. He frequently expressed the sentiment, that when an application was made to a Christian from any worthy source, a favor was conferred upon him who was asked to give, and not upon him who was to receive.

Martin, Professor Benjamin N., was born at Mount Holly, N. J., October 20th, 1816, and died in New York city, December 27th, 1883. He graduated at Yale College, in 1837, and at the Theological School in New Haven. Three years after being graduated from this Institution he was settled, as a Congregational minister, over a church at Hadley, Mass., where he remained for five years. His next charge was at Albany, N. Y., where he became the pastor of the Fourth Presbyterian Church. In 1852 Dr. Martin received the appointment of Professor of Rhetoric and Intellectual Philosophy in the University of the City of New York, a position he held until death. Among the clergy and literary circles Professor Martin enjoyed a large acquaintance. He was very popular among the students, and gave up his whole time to the University.

Martin, Mrs. Cornelia, daughter of John and Eliza Williams, was born at Utica, N. Y., December 25th, 1818. Her paternal grandparents and father emigrated from Wales to Utica, about the year 1800. The parents and grandparents for many generations were in the Presbyterian Church. At the age of thirteen she united with the First Presbyterian Church of Utica, under the pastoral care of Rev. Samuel C. Aiken. In 1837 she was married to Mr. E. T. Throop Martin, and removed to New York city. In 1841 they returned to Utica, where she assisted in founding the Westminster Presbyterian Church. In 1852 they removed to Willowbrook, a beautiful country seat near Auburn, N. Y.

In January, 1856, Mrs. Martin received through Miss Sarah Oliphant a letter from Rev. Dr. Titus Coan, of Hilo, Sandwich Islands, in which he expressed an earnest desire that a small vessel be secured to ply among the Islands of the Pacific Ocean, in the interests of the missions. The matter took hold upon her mind, and she at once set about securing the vessel. After correspondence with the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, certificates, at the suggestion of Mr. Ten Eyck, of Cazenovia, of five and ten cent shares of stock, were issued, and an appeal made to the Sabbath-school children; the result of which was the building and outfitting of the mission ship "Morning Star."

Mrs. Martin is better known, however, as the pioneer leader in woman's home mission work. As her children grew up, three of them became connected with the army, and were stationed at the outposts of civilization. Their letters, speaking of the religious destitutions of New Mexico and Arizona, enlisted her Christian sympathies. These letters were privately circulated among her friends, who also became interested, until, in 1867, this interest culminated in the organization, at Auburn, N. Y., of the "Santa Fe Missionary Society," for the purpose of establishing and supporting a school at Santa Fe, New Mexico. On the 4th of December, 1868, at the Bible House, New York city, Mrs. Martin secured the organization of the New Mexico, Arizona and Colorado Missionary Association, to which the Auburn Society became auxiliary. March 1st, 1870, she secured the organization of an auxiliary society, at Albany, N. Y., which, in 1871, became an independent organization, under the name of the "Ladies' Union Mission School Association," having, for its chief work, the establishment of schools in the Territories, and particularly at the frontier military posts.

In all these organizations Mrs. Martin has been the leading spirit, "the power behind the throne."

Martin, Rev. Elon, O., was born in Underhill, Vermont, April 15th, 1806, and was licensed to preach by the Northwestern Association of his native State. He went to Alabama, as an agent of the American Sunday-school Union, and was received under the care of the Presbytery of South Alabama, February 27th, 1834. He was ordained and installed pastor of the churches of Hopewell and Sandy Ridge, November 21st, 1835. He was of a peculiarly gentle spirit. With talents such as would have graced any pulpit, he chose to cast his lot with the humble poor of God's people, and for ten years, on a mere pittance, he did the work of a pastor, faithful and true. He died in the Spring of 1845, and in the burying-ground of Sandy Ridge Church sleeps the dust of her first pastor. A neat monument, erected by his people, who esteemed and loved him while living, and honored him when dead, marks his grave.

Martin, Rev. John, studied theology with Mr. Davies, and was licensed by Hanover Presbytery, August 25th, 1756. He was widely employed in supplying vacancies, and was called to Albemarle, April 27th, 1757. He was ordained June 9th, 1757, being the first minister of our Church ordained in Virginia. Mr. Martin was engaged in the Indian Mission, January 25th, 1758; the prospects were at first cheering, but the Cherokees having joined the French on the breaking out of war, the enterprise was abandoned. He settled in South Carolina.

Martin, John Wynne, D. D., was born in Ireland, and entered the ministry there. Owing to loss of voice he gave up preaching, and in 1837 became Principal of the Deaf and Dumb Asylum at Belfast. In 1840 he took charge of the National Institution for the Deaf and Dumb at Dublin. Three years later, with recovered voice, he resumed the ministry, but in 1846 he again took control of the Belfast Deaf and Dumb Asylum. In 1853 he came to the United States, and a year later settled in Ohio. In 1857 he took charge of the Doe Run Presbyterian Church, Chester county, Pa. In 1860 he became connected with Lincoln University, as Principal and Professor of Languages; afterwards labored in the City Mission in New York, and then became Principal of the academy in Beaver, Pa. For a number of years he resided in the neighborhood of Norristown, where he died June 11th, 1883, in the seventy-seventh year of his age. Dr. Martin was in some respects eccentric, being often strongly biased by his own convictions of right; yet all who knew him were compelled to acknowledge his ability, his sincerity, and his sterling purpose to act always conscientiously. His last months were months of growing weakness and increasing debility. His piety and calm trust in God were unquestionable.

Martin, Joseph Hamilton, D. D., who is of Scotch-Irish descent, was born in Jefferson county, Tenn., August 11th, 1825; graduated at East Tennessee University (now the University of Tennessee), in 1843, with the first honor of his class, and at Union Theological Seminary, New York city, in 1846. After being licensed by the Fourth Presbytery of New York, April 9th, 1846, he labored as a missionary for nearly two years among the seamen of New Orleans. In August, 1848, he was installed pastor of the Church in Huntsville, Alabama; resigned in 1849, and made a visit to Great Britain and Ireland. July 1st, 1851, he became stated supply of the Second Church, Knoxville, Tenn., and continued so until 1861. On August 1st, 1864, he took charge of Bethesda Church, South Carolina, and was its pastor till February 1st, 1867. His next charge, for two years, was the Church in Wytheville, Va. From that date he preached for nearly five years to a number of churches in Tennessee. From November 16th, 1873, until October 31st, 1882, he was pastor of the First Church, Atlanta, Ga., where his labors were much blessed. At his resignation, the congregation testified their high esteem for him, and the Ministers' Association of Atlanta, in a series of resolutions respecting his removal from the place, expressed their high regard for him as an able, earnest and loving brother, and their warm appreciation of the devotion he had displayed to the cause of Christ. Dr. Martin has been successful in his pastorates, and during several of them new church edifices were erected by the congregations. He now resides at Orlando, Florida. Besides his work in the ministry, he has made extensive use of the pen, in contributions to the weekly press, in the composition of miscellaneous poems, two of which have been published in book form, and in writing hymns for various Sabbath-school song-books.

Martin, Samuel D. D., was born in Chestnut Level, Lancaster county, Pa., January 9th, 1787; graduated at the University of Pennsylvania, July 8th, 1790; was licensed by the Presbytery of Baltimore, in May, 1793, and was soon after ordained and installed pastor of the congregation of Slate Ridge, in York county, Pa. At the expiration of five years he accepted a call from the congregation of Chanceford, for one-half of his ministerial services. In 1812 he removed to Rockville, Md., where he remained about eighteen months, when he accepted a unanimous call to return to Chanceford. With the exception of the short interval just noted, his whole ministerial life, of nearly fifty years, was spent in the congregations of Slate Ridge and Chanceford. For a time, in connection with his pastoral duties, he conducted a classical school, in which were educated a number of young men, some of whom subsequently stood high in office and in public estimation. June 29th, 1845, his spirit ascended to the "rest that remaineth for the people of God."

Dr. Martin possessed traits of character peculiarly attractive. He was remarkably free from worldly ambition, and his great aim was to be useful. He was a master in Israel; one whom the wisest might consult, with the certainty of receiving benefit and instruction. His ministerial qualifications were of no common order. An intimation that he was expected to preach in any of the neighboring congregations always secured a crowded house. He was an able and efficient member of Presbytery, and in the higher ecclesiastical courts he was surpassed by few, as an able debater and zealous advocate of the doctrines and government of the Presbyterian Church.

Martyn, Rev. Ashbel Green, son of Rev. John L. and Fanny (Bruner) Martyn, was born at Livonia, Washington county, Indiana, November 24th, 1849. He graduated at Wabash College, in the class of 1868. His theological studies were pursued at the Northwest Theological Seminary, at Chicago, Illinois, and at Danville, Kentucky, under the tuition of Dr. Robert J. Breckinridge. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Vinton, Iowa (O. S.), in April 1870; ordained as pastor at Wilton Junction, Iowa, by the Presbytery of Iowa City, on June 12th, 1872; ministered to the Church at Malcom, Iowa, as supply, for four years, from November, 1876; on January 1st, 1881, accepted a call as pastor at Mediapolis, in the Presbytery of Iowa, where he still labors in a large and growing congregation. In the year 1871 he received, from his Alma Mater, the honorary degree of Master of Arts. He served the Presbytery of Iowa City for several years as Permanent Clerk, and then as its Stated Clerk. In October, 1879, he was chosen Moderator of the Synod of Iowa South, in its sessions at Council Bluffs. He has represented his Presbytery several times in the meetings of the General Assembly.

Marvin, Rev. Edward Payson, was born in Bethany, N. Y., December 12th, 1831. He graduated at Centre College, Kentucky, in 1860, and studied theology at Princeton Seminary. He was ordained by the Presbytery of Buffalo city, February 9th, 1864; stated supply at Black Rock, N. Y., 1862; then pastor, 1864-5; stated supply of Second Ward

Church, Lockport, N. Y., 1865-77; and stated supply of Calvary Church, Lockport, 1879. Mr. Marvin is an earnest and faithful preacher, ready for every good work, and, in his several fields of labor, has had the Divine blessing upon his ministry.

Marye, Hon. J. L., son of John L. Marye and Ann M. Marye, was born at Brompton, near Fredericksburg, Va., on the 1th of November, 1823. He graduated at the University of Virginia in 1842, and was admitted to the Bar in 1845. Since then has continued in active legal practice at Fredericksburg and other Courts in Virginia. Served as Mayor of Fredericksburg in 1852, and as member of Virginia Legislature several sessions. Was Lieutenant-Governor of Virginia from 1870 to 1871. Elected elder of the Presbyterian Church of Fredericksburg in 1851; has been chosen delegate to four meetings of the Southern General Assembly, 1866, 1874, 1875, 1877. Was one of the delegates chosen by that Assembly to attend the Presbyterian Alliance at its session at Philadelphia, in 1880. Mr. Marye has always been noted as a dignified, genial and courtly gentleman, of the old school, and for the purity and uprightness of his political character, as well as his usefulness in the Church. He has retired from the arena of politics, but will never be released, or have any wish to be released from his eldership. He is also well known throughout the State as an eminent and clear-headed lawyer.

Maryville College, East Tennessee. This institution is located in Maryville, fifteen miles south of Knoxville, on the Knoxville and Augusta Railroad. The earliest settlers of East Tennessee were Scotch-Irish Presbyterians, who began to occupy this region toward the close of the last century. They brought with them the seeds of Christian civilization, and their old Presbyterian faith and polity, which took deep and firm root. With these brave and hardy pioneers there did not come an adequate supply of ministers. But among them was a young man named Isaac Anderson, who became a preacher, of apostolic zeal, proclaiming the gospel with great power and effect in log cabins, barns, and under the trees of the forest, with a heart burdened and grieved in view of the moral and religious destitution of the people. Thus he was forced to the thoughtful consideration of this question: "How and whence is this field to be supplied with an educated and evangelical ministry?" To solve this difficult question he tried several methods. The claims of East Tennessee for help were laid before the Home Missionary Societies of the East. An effort was made to get pious young men of the North to come to East Tennessee, and live and study, free of all expense, in the families of ministers, and thus prepare for the ministry. But this effort was unavailing.

East Tennessee, imbedded in the mountains, was difficult of access, far away from the great centres of commerce and population, and in those times quite an isolated community. The people were poor and the churches small and unable to offer to young men inviting inducements. But the Scotch-Irish will of Dr. Anderson would not succumb to difficulties and disappointments. He was at last driven to this conclusion: That there is no possible way to supply East Tennessee with an educated, evangelical ministry, but to educate native young men on the ground. The ministers of the region must be the sons of the soil, trained there for its needs. And this became his grand idea. It was the thought that gave, in the Autumn of 1819, existence to the Southern and Western Theological Seminary, which was chartered in 1842, by the Legislature of the State of Tennessee, by the name and style of the Directors of Maryville College, at Maryville. The college is governed by a Board of thirty-six trustees, one-third of whom are appointed annually by the Synod of Tennessee. And to this Synod the trustees are required to make an annual report of the financial condition and educational work of the college. It is emphatically a Christian Institution, founded by Christian men, chiefly for Christ and His Church. It has served a long apprenticeship to poverty. Its little fund of $16,000 was gathered in small sums, through forty-two years, and year in and year out was largely supplemented by the faith, prayers, and self-denying labors of Dr. Anderson and those associated with him in the work of instruction.

Up to 1861 several hundred alumni were sent out. Of these at least one hundred and fifty went into the ministry. Hundreds entered other of the learned professions, and many became useful and successful

Christian teachers. During the war the work of the college was suspended for five years. The Faculty was broken up. The library was badly damaged. The college buildings were destroyed. Two-thirds of the endowment funds were lost. In short, the war left Maryville College in ruins, not worth, in funds and real estate, more than seven thousand dollars. And moreover, all East Tennessee was stripped, impoverished and desolated. In view of these facts, some of the best and oldest friends of the college thought it dead, to live no more. But the Synod of Tennessee met in the Fall of 1865, and resumed organic relations with the old General Assembly; and feeling that it could not hold its ground and extend its influence without Maryville College, it resolved, if possible, to resuscitate it. The only Professor then remaining on the ground was ordered to reopen the college, for instruction, as soon as practicable. This was done in the Fall of 1866, with an attendance of thirteen students. In less than three years two more Professors were added to the Faculty, and there was a large increase of students.

New grounds and new buildings became an imperative necessity, and to secure them, an appeal was made to the friends of Christian learning in the North, with the following results: 1. A beautiful college campus of two hundred and fifty acres. 2. A professor's house, costing $3000. 3. A large brick building for college purposes, costing $23,000. 4. Two handsome, convenient dormitories, costing each $12,000. The total cost of grounds, buildings, and other needful improvements, with the requisite furniture, is $65,000, all paid.

The Faculty of the college now consists of five Professors. The number of students enrolled last year, was two hundred and seventy-five. There is now a good subscription of $80,000 toward $100,000, which sum it is hoped will soon be raised. Since 1866 there have been connected with the Institution one thousand students, some for a shorter, some for a longer time, but all receiving a moral and religious impress and scholastic training that will give permanent shape and tone to their character and conduct. Hundreds have become efficient teachers in the public schools and academies, and in destitute fields of the South and West, among the colored people, poor whites, and Mormons. Fifty students have taken the full course and graduated. Of these, twenty-nine have chosen the ministry. They are now widely scattered. Two, with their wives, also educated at Maryville, have gone (1883) to the Foreign field, Japan and India. Next Fall another will go to India, and two colored young men to Africa. About thirty young men of the African race have been educated and trained for teachers and preachers, and are now scattered over eight different States, working for the good of their race.

Mason, Erskine, D. D., was the youngest child of the Rev. John M. and Anna (Lefferts) Mason, and was born in the city of New York, April 16th, 1805. Having graduated at Dickinson College, Carlisle, Pa., of which his father was then President, in 1823, he studied theology for some time under the direction of the Rev. Dr. Duncan, of Baltimore; and in the Summer of 1825 entered the Theological Seminary at Princeton, where he completed his professional education. He was licensed to preach by the Second Presbytery of New York, in 1826, and on the 3d of May, 1827, was installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Schenectady. He became pastor of the Bleecker Street Presbyterian Church, in New York, September 10th, 1830. In February, 1836, he accepted the Professorship of Ecclesiastical History in the Union Theological Seminary, and held it till 1842. His death occurred May 14th, 1851. When the last moment came he declared, "It is all bright and clear."

Dr. Mason had the advantage of impressive manliness and dignity of form. His bearing was courteous and kind. He was of that happy organization which excites admiration without jealousy, and was so considerate and just towards others that all were pleased to acknowledge what was due to himself. He was a strong, substantial, honest man, with no pretension, and without attempt to appear more and greater than he was. His style of preaching was vigorously intellectual, and yet his sermons were characterized by religious pathos. A masculine imagination gave a glow and warmth to all his appeals. His demonstrations were tremulous with emotion, and his proofs were with power, because they were so earnest and sincere. He was generally regarded as a remarkable preacher. During his life he published a number of discourses; and after his decease a selection from his manuscript sermons appeared, under the title of "A Pastor's Legacy."

Mathes, Rev. Alfred Harvey, was born at Greenville, S. C., May 7th, 1828; graduated at Washington College, Tenn., in July, 1852; at Princeton Seminary in 1855, and was licensed by the Presbytery of Houston (Tenn.), April 28th, 1855. He labored as stated supply for Providence and Rocky Spring churches (Tenn.), from 1857 to 1866. He then removed to Georgia, and was stated supply for the Church at Fort Gaines, Ga., from 1866 to 1871. He also opened, and for some time taught, an academy at Fort Gaines. In 1873 he removed to West Florida, where he was instrumental in establishing a church at Freeport. In 1876 he settled at Apopka, Florida, and was appointed by Florida Presbytery as evangelist for several neighboring counties, and made extensive trips from time to time. He organized a church at Apopka, which he continued to supply until his death, September 4th, 1878.

Mr. Mathes was most warmly loved by those who knew him best. He was an earnest and faithful servant of Christ, always ready to endure hardness for His sake. He was noted for the punctual and un-finching performance of all his engagements to preach, going long distances even in the worst weather, and when his feeble health would have been deemed by most men a sufficient reason for staying at home.

Matthews, John, D. D., was born in Guilford county, N. C., within the bounds of the Alamance congregation, January 19th, 1772. Having served for some time in mechanical pursuits, he entered, at the age of about twenty, on a course of study in the school of the Rev. Dr. David Caldwell. Licensed by the Presbytery of Orange, in March, 1801, the next winter he was sent as a missionary to Natchez, and on his return to North Carolina, received and accepted a call, in April, 1803, from the Nutbush and Grassy Creek churches, of which he remained pastor until 1806, when he was installed over the Church in Martinsburg, Va. After a little more than a year in this pastorate, he accepted a call to the Church in Shepherdstown, Va. He preached as stated supply to this church, and that of Charlestown, until about 1826 or 1827, dividing his time equally between the two places, and preaching frequently, also, at Harper's Ferry. He then gave up his charge at Charlestown, and took that at Martinsburg in its place, dividing his time equally between Martinsburg and Charlestown, until he removed to the West. On the 29th of June, 1831, Dr. Matthews was inaugurated Professor of Theology in the theological seminary which had then just been established at Hanover, Indiana, and from that period until the close of his life, seventeen years, his devotion to the interests of the Institution was most untiring and exemplary. During part of the time he acted as Vice-president of Hanover College, and often supplied vacancies in the college, in the way of instruction. He died May 19th, 1848. Dr. Matthews possessed talents of a high order. His reasoning powers were acute. His method was easy, perspicuous and logical. He was distinguished for simplicity and consistency of character. He was a pattern of meekness, a discreet man and eminently conscientious. While the general character of his preaching was expository, or argumentative, yet, on some occasions, his discourses were pathetic and exciting in a high degree. In the judicatories of the Church he was a wise counsellor. Great confidence was placed, by all his brethren, in his sound judgment. He was a clear, vigorous and impressive writer. His two most important publications were entitled "Letters on the Divine Purpose" and "The Influence of the Bible." His life was one of deep and abiding usefulness.

Matthews, R. C., D.D., was the son of Rev. John Matthews, D.D., formerly a Professor in the Theological Seminary at New Albany, Indiana. He was born in Shepherdstown, Va., April 2d, 1822. He graduated at Hanover College in 1839. After this he studied law, and after being admitted to the Bar, he removed to Mississippi and engaged in teaching. During his stay in the South he was converted. He then returned, and entered the Theological Seminary at New Albany. He was licensed to preach in 1851, and on the 20th of December following he preached his first sermon, in Monmouth, Ill., and was ordained and installed pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Monmouth, on the 2d day of December, 1852. This relation was continued up to the time of his death, a period of thirty years. He received the degree of D.D. from Hanover College, June 20th, 1873. As a man, Dr. Matthews was manly, honest, natural and simple in all his mental and physical actions. Tall and commanding in person, and in his address pleasing, he never failed to attract the respect and esteem of all. His intellect was clear and strong; his perceptions good; his heart warm, and his disposition kind. As a preacher of the gospel, he had few equals or superiors. He spoke with ease, and in the fullness of his heart delivered with earnestness and power the message he received from his Lord, and nothing else.

As a pastor, Dr. Matthews was faithful, kind and devoted to his people. His church was his home, and his pulpit his throne. His weekly prayer meeting was near his heart and the place of his delight. Home and foreign missions were very dear to him, and the burden of his prayers. In the Church courts, though always shrinking from publicity, he was regarded as a leader and safe counsellor. His death, November 15th, 1881, was deeply and universally lamented.

STANLEY MATTHEWS, LL. D.

Matthews, Stanley, LL.D., is the oldest son of Prof. Thomas J. Matthews, later of Miami University, and Isabella Matthews, and was born in Cincinnati, July 21st, 1824. He graduated at Kenyon College, Gambier, O., in 1840; studied law at Cincinnati; was admitted to the Bar in Tennessee, at Columbus, in 1843, and subsequently in Ohio, in 1845, having returned to Cincinnati, where he continued to practice his profession. In 1851 he was elected Judge of the Court of Common Pleas of Hamilton county; in 1855, to the Senate of Ohio; in 1857, was appointed United States Attorney for the Southern District of Ohio. In 1863 he was elected Judge of the Supreme Bench of Cincinnati; in 1877, was elected to the Senate of the United States, to fill the unexpired term of John Sherman; in 1881, was appointed Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States.

In 1859, at Glendale, near Cincinnati, Dr. Matthews united with the Presbyterian Church of that place, and soon became a ruling elder. In 1861 he was appointed by the Presbytery of Cincinnati as one of its delegates to the General Assembly of that year, which met at Newark, N. J., and as one of the Committee on Bills and Overtures, reported the deliverance adopted by the Assembly on the subject of slavery.

Matthews, William Caldwell, D. D., was born September 23d, 1805, in Granville county, N. C. He graduated at Jefferson College, Pa., in 1827, and at Princeton Seminary in 1830, and was licensed by the Presbytery of Winchester, April 20th, 1830, and was ordained sine titulo by the same Presbytery, April 9th, 1831. He served the Church at Martinsburg, Va., as stated supply, from April 9th, 1831, until April 29th, 1836. He was installed pastor of the First Church of Madison, Ind., December 31st, 1837, and continued in this relation until April 11th, 1842. His pastorate here was very prosperous, and he was highly esteemed and respected by the whole community. His second pastoral charge was at Winchester, Ky., where he was installed October 13th, 1843, and released September 16th, 1848. Here also he was greatly beloved and honored. His third charge was at Shelbyville, Ky., where he was installed November 25th, 1848, and labored with great fidelity and success over twenty-two years, until he was released, March 1st, 1871. His fourth and last pastorate was in the Fourth Church at Louisville, Ky., where he was installed March 10th, 1871, and labored over eight years, until released June 16th, 1879, on account of feeble health and increasing infirmities. His death occurred August 24th, 1880, in the seventy-fifth year of his age.

Few men have been so successful, so useful, and so honored in the ministry, as was Dr. Matthews. In his convictions in regard to theology and church government, he was a strict, old-fashioned Presbyterian; devotedly attached to his Church and its Standards, of which, as well as of the Holy Scriptures, he was an able expounder. His services in Church courts were invaluable. Always an admirable preacher he preached better and better to the very last. The sermons of his last years were distinguished for the fullness, sweetness, pathos and power with which he set forth the gospel. It was often said of him, that his mild and beaming face "was as good as a sermon." He thoroughly enjoyed the respect and confidence of every community in which he ever dwelt.

Matthews, Rev. W. T., was born in Union county, North Carolina, January 10th, 1857; graduated at Erskine College, South Carolina, July 18th, 1878; spent two years in Theological Seminary at Columbia, S. C.; graduated in theology at Princeton Seminary, N. J., in May, 1881; licensed to preach the gospel by Bethel Presbyterian Synod, S. C., at Beersheba Church, April, 1880; ordained at Olivet Church, by same Presbytery, October, 1881; installed pastor of Olivet and Zion churches, October, 1881, and is now pastor of the same churches. His preaching was greatly blessed in the early part of his ministerial labors, in the addition of many members to both of his churches, fifty-five being added to the Zion Church at one meeting.

As a preacher, he is sound, clear, and forcible, preaching always and only Christ, and Christ crucified the hope of a lost world; his style is clear and concise in the exposition of the Scriptures, and he has the power of communicating the great truths of the gospel, as revealed in the Old and New Testament, in a clear, simple, and plain manner, so that the unlearned can understand his meaning.

As a pastor, he is faithful, diligent, and conscientious in the discharge of every duty, and has already gained the love and confidence of his people to a degree, seldom attained by one of his age.

His life is a model of a conscientious, exemplary Christian gentleman. Always unselfish, whenever his personal pleasure and comforts only were involved; he is inflexible in questions of duty, and he never gives offence unless it is by his steadfast adherence to principle. Beginning his ministerial work in 1881, with two feeble churches they have now increased and grown to be one of the best fields in Bethel Presbytery.

Mattoon, Charles Nash, D. D., was born in Lenox, Mass., in 1812, and graduated from Middlebury College in 1832. He was ordained and installed at Canoga, N. Y., by the Presbytery of Geneva, July 6th, 1837. He preached at Aurora, from 1841, and at LeRoy, from 1850. He was President of Farmers' College, Ohio, from 1857, and labored in the ministry at Rockford, Ill., 1861-2, and at Monroe, Mich., 1863-77; where he still resides. His life has been one of active and useful service.

Mattoon, Stephen, D. D., was born in Champion, N. Y., May 5th, 1815, and graduated at Union College in 1842. He was ordained an evangelist by the Presbytery of Troy, February 11th, 1846. He was missionary in Siam, 1846; pastor of the First Church, Bangkok, 1860-6; pastor at Ballston Spa, N. Y.,

1867-9; stated supply at New Hope, N. C., 1870-71; stated supply of the Second Church, Charlotte, 1871-78; stated supply of Caldwell, Hopewell and Good Hope, 1879. Since 1870 he has been President of Biddle University, Charlotte, N. C., and he is at present also stated supply of Emanuel Church. Dr. Mattoon is a gentleman of scholarly attainments, excellent administrative ability, and has conducted the affairs of the Institution of which he has charge, with success.

Maxwell, John Allen, is the only son of John Allen and Ann Mary Maxwell, and was born in New York city, December 29th, 1833. His studies preparatory to college were pursued chiefly in New York, and for a short time in Newark, N. J. He was graduated at the University of the City of New York, in 1857, and at Union Theological Seminary, in 1860. In the Autumn of the last named year he was ordained to the ministry, and installed as pastor of the Presbyterian Church of South Orange, N. J. After a pastorate of more than ten years, he resigned, and became pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Hazleton, Pa., in September, 1871. From this field he was called to the First Presbyterian Church of Bridgeton, N. J.; was there installed in the Spring of 1874, and continued to be the pastor of that church for nearly seven years. In December, 1880, he was called to the Presbyterian Church of Titusville, Pa., of which he is now pastor. The several churches which have been privileged to enjoy the ministrations of Mr. Maxwell have respectively borne testimony to his fidelity and efficiency in pastoral work, and to his ability as a sermonizer. Thoroughness of preparation and clearness of expression, both in thought and composition, are characteristics of his sermons, many of which have, by request, been published. In addition to church work, Mr. Maxwell's talents have been occasionally employed in the preparation and delivery of popular lectures, and in contributions to the local and religious press. By this means a larger portion of "the field," which is "the world," has been reached, and richly benefited, through the scattering of seed-thoughts, gathered from a highly cultured mind.

Maxwell, William, LL. D., was born of English parentage, at Norfolk, Va., February 27th, 1784. He graduated at Yale College, September, 1802; afterwards studied law in Richmond, Va., and in 1808 commenced the practice of law in Norfolk. In 1830 he was chosen to represent the Borough of Norfolk in the Legislature of Virginia, and was elected to the Senate of Virginia in 1832, where he continued till 1838. In November of that year he accepted the presidency of Hampden-Sidney College, which he held till September, 1841, when he resigned and removed to Richmond. Here, in 1847, he engaged in the enterprise of reviving the Historical and Philosophical Society of Virginia, and in 1848 he established the "Virginia Historical Register," a Quarterly, devoted to the past and present history of his native State. His death occurred near Williamsburg, Va., January 9th, 1857. His reputation as a lawyer and advocate was very high. But though absorbed in his profession, he found congenial relaxation in literary pursuits, and his pen was not idle in the cause of truth.

Ever zealous for the promotion of education, in 1828 he erected in Norfolk, at his own expense, a Lyceum, for the diffusion of useful knowledge, by means of lectures, etc., thus anticipating the popular movement on that subject. He was also active in promoting the charities of the day, especially the Bible and Colonization societies, in whose behalf his voice was often heard.

WILLIAM MAXWELL, LL. D.

As a ruling elder in the Church in Norfolk, at their meetings for prayer, he often led the devotions of the congregation, enchaining the attention of all by his lucid and eloquent expositions of the Divine Word, which was his constant study and delight.

In the judicatories of the Church he was known as an accomplished debater, and in the General Assembly of 1837 he took a prominent part in the exciting controversy of the time.

With a commanding person, ease and grace of manner, great dignity of deportment, a chaste and fluent diction, enlivened by brilliant wit, he was regarded as one of the model speakers of his day.

As a typical man of the past generation, he united the noblest principles with all that was refined and graceful in social life, adorning whatever he touched with the charm of an elegant culture, such as comes from familiarity with the best classical authors, and from personal association with the most cultivated men, from the time he was a pupil of Dr. Dwight and the friend of Dr. Rice, and the compatriot of the very best men of his generation, to the end of his useful life.

Maybin, Joseph A., was the third son of John and Anna Joanna (Peters) Maybin, and was born in Philadelphia, March 6th, 1795. At the age of eighteen he graduated, with high honors, at Dickinson College. He entered upon the study of law in the office of Hon. Horace Binney, in Philadelphia, and in 1816 was admitted to the practice of his profession.

Mr. Maybin went to the city of New Orleans in 1817, where he has had a home for nearly sixty years, and for more than half a century he has been identified with its educational, legal and religious interests. As the oldest practicing member of the Bar, he was highly esteemed and beloved by all who came in contact with him.

Mr. Maybin was one of the founders and fathers of the first Presbyterian Church that had its beginning in New Orleans, in 1822, and of which he was elected elder, in 1827, the duties of which office he so faithfully performed that his pastor, Rev. B. M. Palmer, could say "that in all his experience he had never seen an elder who could approach to Mr. Maybin, in the zeal and patience with which he did the work of the church." He was much beloved, not only by the members of his church, but also by those not connected with it, as his piety possessed that liberal charity that could embrace all. He could be called a truly Christian gentleman; dignity and humility were so beautifully blended in him as to make it impossible not to love and reverence him.

Cut off by partial blindness from reading, with a memory constitutionally strong, he could draw upon the knowledge which earlier reading gave him, and was able to stand up in the house of God and expound the Bible or lead in prayer; for two years before his death he supplied the pulpit of a mission connected with his church. His visits in the homes of the church will long be remembered by old and young, for all were glad to see and hear him.

His earnest wish "to die in the harness" was granted. On the 14th of May, 1876, he went to preach, as usual, and coming home weary, he did not go out in the afternoon; at night, he conducted family worship, and after bidding his children good night retired. When his daughters came to his bedside, in the morning, they found him dead. He was not, for God took him. He was buried in the church, May 16th, 1876, where the large crowds of mourners testified their love and esteem for one whose memory will long be cherished.

McAdam, Rev. William T., was born, August 5th, 1823, in Harrison county, Ohio. He graduated at Franklin College, New Athens, in 1842; studied theology in the Associate Reformed Seminary, Allegheny; was licensed to preach, April 23d, 1845, by the Second Presbytery of Ohio. After preaching at several points, by the appointment of Synod, he was installed pastor of the Church of Mercer, Pa., May 19th, 1847, and continued in this relation till September, 1853, raising the church from nearly a complete wreck to prosperity. He was pastor of the Stone Street Church, Rochester, N. Y., from April, 1854, to February, 1857, after which he united with the Presbytery of Shenango, O. S. Presbyterian. As pastor of the Church in Sharon, Pa., 1857-60, he did a good work. After engaging in the service of the country for a time, he went to Colorado for the improvement of his health, and after preaching at Fort Collins for a short period, without compensation, organized the Presbyterian Church there. After three years of gratuitous work he went to Mommouth, Ill., where, for nearly two years, he preached, part of the time in vacant churches. In 1871 he served the Church in Cherokee, Northern Iowa, three months, and at the expiration of that year was installed its pastor, where his labors were crowned with success. He resigned the charge, April 1st, 1879. Since 1880 he has been Chaplain in the United States Army, located at Fort Niobrara, Nebraska.

Mr. McAdam possesses very attractive social qualities. His discourses have always been on important themes, of material thoroughly Biblical, with logical arrangement, and full of vigorous thought. He is highly esteemed by the congregations of which he has had charge.

McAden, Rev. Hugh, was born of an humble but pious parentage, in Pennsylvania. After graduating at the College of New Jersey, in 1753, he studied theology with the Rev. John Blair, and was licensed by New Castle Presbytery, in 1755. He was immediately sent on a missionary tour through the South. Returning to the North, he was ordained by the New Castle Presbytery, in 1757, and became pastor, soon after, of the congregations in Duplin and New Hanover, North Carolina, where he remained about ten years, and then removed to Caswell county, finishing his days there, January 20th, 1781. Mr. McAden was systematic in study, in visiting and in labor, and faithfully fulfilled his ministry. He was truly one of the chief founders of the Presbyterian Church in the Southern States.

McAllister, Hon. Hugh N., was of Scotch-Irish descent. He was the eldest son of Hon. William McAllister and Sarah Thompson, and was born on the farm owned by his father and grandfather, in Lost Creek Valley, Juniata county, Pa., June 28th, 1809. He entered the Freshman class at Jefferson College, in 1830, and stood so high before the end of the year as to be chosen by his society as one of its debaters, which honor, however, his modesty and timidity induced him to decline. He graduated in 1833, high in a class in which were many more, since distinguished in the Church and State. In 1835 he was admitted to practice in the several courts of Centre county, Pa., and at once took a high position at the Bar. As a counsellor he was always discreet, careful and safe. As an attorney he was faithful, honest and industrious. As an advocate he was earnest, zealous, and at times, impressively eloquent. He would embark in no man's case unless thoroughly impressed with its justice, and then he battled as only a man of his temperament could battle for the right.

Mr. McAllister was not ambitious of public positions. The first public office he ever held was as a member of the Convention to reform the State Constitution. He entered upon this work with the energy and zeal which ever characterized him, but not limiting his labor to his physical capacity to endure it, his strength gave way under incessant toil, and he died at his boarding-house in Philadelphia, May 5th, 1873. Upon the announcement of his death, the Convention adjourned until the following day, when appropriate resolutions were offered and passed, in relation to the sad event, and glowing eulogies on the character of the deceased were pronounced by many members of the Convention, and a committee of seven appointed to convey the body to its home in Bellefonte, and attend the funeral. At a meeting of the Bellefonte Bar and members of the Bars of Clinton, Clearfield and Huntingdon counties, suitable resolutions were adopted, expressive of their sense of the great loss which they had sustained, in common with the community, the Church and the State.

As a citizen, Mr. McAllister was always enterprising, public-spirited and patriotic. He was one of the projectors, the constant friends and liberal supporters of the Agricultural College of Pennsylvania, now the Pennsylvania State College. He was a friend of the common schools, academies and seminaries, as well as Sunday schools. He was an earnest friend of the cause of temperance. As a neighbor, he was ever considerate, obliging and liberal. As a man, he was just, upright and inflexibly honest. As a Christian, he was sincere, faithful and most exemplary, liberal as a giver and earnest as a worker. He was a member and an elder in the Presbyterian Church of Bellefonte for many years, and in all his church relations commanded the confidence and respect of all who knew him. If not the originator of the scheme of ministerial sustentation, he was a very active friend to it. The crowning glory of his life was his devoted, consistent, humble walk with God.

McArthur, John, was a prominent member, and for many years an influential and useful elder, of the Tenth Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia. He was a native of Scotland, where he served an apprenticeship at carpentering. He came to the New World a very young man, and entered at once upon the pursuit of his trade in Philadelphia. His first employment was upon the Naval Asylum, as a journeyman, from which modest beginning he eventually became one of the largest and most successful builders of his day. Among the prominent and old-time buildings which he constructed were the Athenaeum, the Girard House, the West Spruce Street Presbyterian Church, and the premises now occupied by St. George's Hotel, which he built for the purposes of an academy. He died February 16th, 1883, at the age of eighty-three years. Mr. McArthur was a remarkable man in appearance. He was very tall and slim, and wore his whitened locks down to his shoulders, a characteristic which gave him an extremely venerable look. He was an earnest, old-fashioned Presbyterian, and one of the most active and public-spirited elders in the city in which he was so well known and highly esteemed. He was the uncle of the eminent architect, John McArthur, Jr., next noticed.

McArthur, John Jr., was born at Bladenock, in Wigtonshire, Scotland, May 13th, 1823. He came to Philadelphia when only ten years of age. Here, in connection with the study of architecture, he learned drawing and designing, for which he had always felt a strong taste. So assiduously did he apply himself to these studies that he soon attained extraordinary skill. And this skill soon met with public recognition, for, in 1848, he was awarded the first premium for his plan for a new House of Refuge, and was entrusted with the entire charge of the erection of the building. In 1849 he served as foreman for his uncle, noticed above, who had secured the contract for the erection of the west wing of the Pennsylvania Hospital. About a year later he was appointed superintendent on the east wing of the same hospital. These successes may be said to have fairly started him in the profession in which he has since won so much distinction, and of which he is one of the acknowledged leaders. Monuments to his finished art abound in the city of his residence and throughout the State and the country. His fame will be perpetuated by the new City Hall and the United States Post Office, in Philadelphia, constructed under his superintendence. Not less remarkable than his artistic skill are his unswerving integrity and indomitable energy. The first has won him the entire confidence of every client, while to the second may, in great measure, be attributed his success in life. He has made his way to the front rank of a profession, in which eminence is peculiarly difficult of attainment, in spite of obstacles that might well have seemed insurmountable. Mr. McArthur is an exemplary member, a warm supporter, and a trustee, of the Woodland Avenue Presbyterian Church, West Philadelphia.

McBryde, Rev. Duncan Daniel, A.M., is the son of Daniel and Margaret (McArn) McBryde. He was born in Richmond county, N. C., June 12th, 1827. Having graduated with distinction at Davidson College, in 1851, he entered the theological seminary at Columbia, S. C., where he completed his professional education, in June, 1854. On November, 1853, he was licensed by Fayetteville Presbytery, and was ordained by the same Presbytery, September 2d, 1854. In July previous to his ordination he took charge of Sardis Church, and continued to supply its pulpit. In 1855 he was installed pastor of Bluff Church, in the same Presbytery. In this first and only charge he has spent the strength and vigor of his ministerial life.

Gifted with a well balanced mind and an easy flow of language, Mr. McBryde is a wise counsellor, as well as one of our best and most popular preachers. His style of preaching is practical and searching. Untrammelled by manuscript, he often warms into strains of impassioned eloquence, and his appeals are pungent and solemn. His manner is easy and graceful. Combining with these qualities a moral character untarnished, he wields great influence for good in his field of labor. The fact that he has spent his whole ministerial life among the same admiring and devoted people, is sufficient evidence, not only of his gifts and graces, but of his devotion to his Master's cause.

McCalla, Rev. William L., was born in Jessamine county, Ky., November 25th, 1788. In 1815 he was appointed an army chaplain, by General Jackson. In 1819 he was settled as pastor of the Church in Augusta, Ky. In 1823 he was settled over the Eighth or Scots' Church, Philadelphia, where his ministry was very successful. In 1835 he felt impelled to travel in Texas, and again served as an army chaplain, dressing in clerical costume and living in a tent. In 1837 he returned to Philadelphia, and labored successively in the Fourth, Tabernacle, and Union churches. In 1854 he engaged in missionary labor in St. Louis, among the boatmen, and afterward among the slaves in the South. He died in Louisiana, of congestive chills, October 12th, 1859, in the seventy-first year of his age.

Mr. McCalla was of a tall and commanding person, with black hair and eyes, and a clarion voice. He was more or less familiarly acquainted with the Hebrew, Syriac, Greek, Latin, French, Spanish and German languages. He preached without notes, had a wonderful command of language, and attained great popularity in the pulpit. But it was in debate that he excelled. In polemics he was a master. This he abundantly exemplified in his debates with Mr. Vaughn and Alexander Campbell, Baptists, in Kentucky; with William Lane, an Arian Baptist, in Milford; with John Hughes, afterward Archbishop, the Roman Catholic; with Abner Kneeland, the atheist; and with Joseph Barker, the infidel, which last afterward preached the faith he once labored to destroy. In the long controversy between the Old and New Schools he kept up his character for pugnacity, ability, and power of sarcasm. He was proud of his Kentucky birth. He had an uncommon power of self-control, and could say the most diverting or the most cutting things, without changing a muscle. In the fiercest contests he remained perfectly cool. Dr.

Miller remarked of him that he was smooth as oil, but it was the oil of vitriol.

Mr. McCalla was a gentleman of polished manners, and in social life was a most agreeable companion. His only publications were: "A Correct Narrative" of the affairs connected with the trial of the Rev. Albert Barnes, a small collection of psalms and hymns, in French, and "Travels in Texas."

McCarrell, Alexander, D. D., was born in Hanover township, Washington county, Pa., September 22d, 1817; graduated at Washington College in 1841, and, after a course of theological training, was licensed by the Presbytery of Washington, in April, 1845. For a time he served the churches of Wolf Run and Unity, as stated supply. In October, 1846, he commenced to supply the Church of Claysville, Pa., and having been greatly prospered in his labors, was installed as pastor of that church, December, 16th, 1852. And there, after a ministry of three and a half decades, peculiarly marked with love, tenderness, evangelicalunction, and pastoral fidelity, on April 18th, 1881, the Master called him from the "earthly house of this tabernacle" to "the house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." The elements of Dr. McCarrell's strength consisted of his evangelical spirit and earnest devotion to the work of saving souls. With a single eye he aimed to "preach the gospel with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven." His goodness was his greatness. He was the highly acceptable Stated Clerk of his Presbytery for many years, was useful as a member of the courts of the Church, and co-operated with his brethren, by whom he was greatly beloved, in every good work. He has left the record of a "good and faithful servant."

McCarrell, Rev. William Alexander, second son and child of the Rev. Alexander McCarrell, D. D., and Martha (McLain) McCarrell, of Claysville, Pa., was born August 20th, 1846, at Unity, Green county, Pa. He graduated at Washington and Jefferson College in 1868; at Western Theological Seminary, April, 1871; and was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Washington, April, 1870. He supplied the Second Church of Wheeling, W. Va., during the Winter and Spring of 1870-71, while at the seminary. He was pastor-elect and pastor of the churches of Cambridge and Gravel Run, Presbytery of Erie, from May, 1871, to May, 1875. On the second Sabbath of May, 1875, he accepted the pastorate of the Church at Shippensburg, Pa., where he still labors with zeal and fidelity, beloved by his people, blessed in his ministry, and esteemed by the entire community.

McCauley, Thomas, D. D., LL. D., was a native of Ireland. He graduated at Union College, New York, in 1801; was Tutor there in 1805-6, and Professor of Mathematics and Natural Philosophy from 1811 to 1822, meanwhile being licensed to preach, it is supposed, by the Presbytery of Albany. He was settled in New York city, as pastor of Rutgers Street Church. He then removed to Philadelphia, and had charge of what is now the Tenth Presbyterian Church. June 2d, 1830, he was elected President of the Board of Education, which position he filled but one year. Subsequently he returned to New York city, to assume the pastorate of the Murray Street Presbyterian Church. While thus engaged, he was elected, in 1838, to the Chair of Pastoral Theology and Church Government, in the Union Theological Seminary of that city, which position he held until 1841. For a year previous to his death Dr. McCauley lived in retirement.

McCauley, Rev. Thomas, was born in Franklin county, Pa., February 28th, 1828. He graduated at New Jersey College, in 1852, and studied theology at Princeton Seminary. He was ordained by the Presbytery of Long Island, June 5th, 1855. He was pastor at Huntington, L. I., 1855-63; at Hackettstown, N. J., 1867-8, and has been pastor of the Third Church, Chester, Pa., since 1878. Mr. McCauley is a good preacher, a diligent pastor, a faithful presbyter, and the Divine blessing has crowned his ministry with success in all his fields of labor.

McCay, Rev. David, the son of William and Catharine McCay, was born in Lewistown, Pa., February 17th, 1816. He graduated at Jefferson College in 1838; at Princeton Theological Seminary in 1841; was licensed by Huntingdon Presbytery in the same year, and on October 30th, 1845, was installed pastor of the united churches of Bethesda, Concord and Callensburg, Pa., in which he preached for about seven years, with great success, and afterwards, for more than twenty years in the last two of these churches, the blessing of the Lord largely attending his ministrations. He died June 4th, 1862. Mr. McCay possessed an intellect of a high order, clear, comprehensive, logical, and eminently practical. His piety was deep, tranquil, constant and heartfelt. He was a well read theologian, and a thorough Calvinist. He was zealous in doing good, and a brother beloved by those who knew him.

McCay, Hon. William, was born in Scotland, but while yet a child his father removed to Claughar, County Tyrone, Ireland. There he spent his youthful days. He came to this country in 1801, settled in Tuscarora Valley, Juniata county (then Mifflin county), in 1801, and in 1810 removed to Lewistown, where he connected himself with the Presbyterian Church, and was elected and ordained an elder in said congregation in 1811 or 1812. He was a man universally respected for his strictly religious character, conscientiousness, intelligence, and public spirit. He was a leading spirit in the church, in the town, and in the community generally. As an elder he had great influence, and was, in all matters of doctrine or discipline, the right hand of the pastor. As a citizen, the town of Lewistown, of which he was long the Chief Burgess, owed most of its public improvements to his foresight, prudence and diligence.

He was known and honored as a citizen beyond the limits of the town, and even the county in which he lived. He was a patriot, and at the time of the War of 1812 raised a company for the service of the country, and received a military commission from Governor Snyder, marched towards the front, but the war ended before he was called to any active service as a soldier. He was made a Justice of the Peace by Governor Hoister, a Notary Public by Governor Wolf, and Associate Judge of Mifflin county by Governor Porter. Judge McCay died at Lewistown, December 13th, 1841. He was the father of the Rev. David McCay, noticed above.

McClellan, William, was born August 4th, 1778, in Franklin township, Adams county, Pa. Removing to Gettysburg, Pa., about the year 1829, he was chosen an elder in the Presbyterian Church of that place, and was superintendent of the Sabbath school for some years. Removing to Harrisburg in 1839, he served in the office of the Surveyor General of the State for several years. In 1844 he was elected an elder of the Presbyterian Church of that place. He was a man of more than ordinary abilities, and had few superiors as a Christian of spotless character. He was a man of strong and ardent faith. His trials were many and severe. He met with reverses, and afflictions, and misfortunes; but his faith in God never failed him. He was benevolent. Out of his limited means he gave regularly and liberally to objects of Christian charity, especially to missions. He was admirably fitted for a leader, being intelligent, active, a fluent talker, a wise counsellor, and ever prompt in duty. Above all else, he was a man of prayer. He was peculiarly gifted in this respect. He was a man of prayer at home, in the morning and evening devotions of his family, and the silence of midnight was often broken as he kept vigils before the mercy seat. A good man, greatly beloved and respected, his death within two years after his installation as elder filled the church with mourning, and was felt to be no common bereavement. He had often expressed the desire, if the Lord willed, to die a sudden and painless death. The wish was gratified. He fell suddenly dead, in market, December 23d, 1846, in the sixty-ninth year of his age.

McClellan, George B., ex-Major General of the United States Army, was born in Philadelphia, December 3d, 1826, and is a son of the late eminent physician and surgeon, Dr. George McClellan. When fourteen years old he entered the University of Pennsylvania, and shortly afterwards accepted a cadetship in the United States Military Academy, whence he graduated in 1846, standing number two in his class. He entered the army July 1st of that year, and was at once ordered to Mexico, where, during the war, he won distinction. After peace was declared he was ordered to West Point, as Director of Field Labors and Instructor of Bayonet Exercise. His next sphere of duty was at Fort Delaware. Subsequently he proceeded with the expedition to explore the Red River. In September, 1851, he proceeded to Texas, to survey the rivers and harbors of that State; and in the Spring of 1852 was ordered to Washington Territory, where he explored the Yakima Pass, and other portions of the Cascade Range, and the most direct route to Puget Sound. He soon after this was occupied in examining the railroad system of the United States, with a view of obtaining such information relative to construction, equipment and management as might prove useful in the successful operation of the Pacific Railroad. A secret mission to St. Domingo, and other islands of the West Indian group, was entrusted to him, which he successfully accomplished, with resulting benefit to the Government.

In 1854 he was sent to the Crimea, as one of three officers to study the organization of the opposing armies. He resigned from the service, January 16th, 1857, removed to Chicago, and for three years filled the positions of Engineer and Vice-President of the Illinois Central Railroad Company. He afterwards became, first, the General Superintendent of the Ohio and Mississippi Railroad Company, and two months later, President of the Eastern Division of the same road, with his residence at Cincinnati.

General McClellan at present resides at Orange, N. J. He has contributed various articles to serial publications. He is an elder of the Presbyterian Church, and was a member of the Pan- Presbyterian Council which met in Philadelphia in 1880.

McClellan, Hon. Robert H., the son of Col. William McClellan and Margaret Randals, was born in Hebron, Washington county, N. Y., January 3d, 1822. His ancestry was Scotch and Presbyterian. He graduated at Union College, Schenectady, in 1847. After teaching one year in the Academy at Argyle, he began the study of law under the Hon. Martin L. Townsend, and was admitted to the Bar at Albany, in 1850. The same year he went to Galena, Ill., which has since been his home. Here he entered upon the practice of his profession, and for a few months conducted the Galena Gazette, during the absence of the editor. He has always been a polished and forcible writer. For many years he has held a leading position at the Bar. He has been Attorney for the Illinois Central Railway Company since 1852. As a counsellor his opinions carry great weight. He has twice been chosen to the Legislature of Illinois. He was a member of the House in 1861, and was elected to the Senate in 1876. He discharged these trusts with marked ability and influence, especially as Chairman of the Revenue and member of the Judiciary Committees of the latter body. Since the organization of the National Bank in Galena, in 1865, he has been President of that Institution, which he has managed with success.

HON. ROBERT H. M'CLELLAN.

For many years Mr. McClellan has been a member of the South Presbyterian Church in Galena, a wise counsellor and a liberal supporter. By the General Assembly of 1883 he was appointed a member of the "Board of Aid for Colleges and Academies." He is a man of exemplary probity in character and conduct, of decided and intelligent opinions, both political and religious. His tastes are scholarly and cultivated by wide reading in literature, for which he possesses a critical and discriminating appreciation. Though somewhat reserved in manner, he is yet generous and kind-hearted. He has "troops of friends" and wide influence, both of which are tributes to his sterling worth as a man.

McClelland, Alexander, D. D., was born at Schenectady, N. Y., in 1794, and died at New Brunswick, N. J., December 19th, 1864. He graduated at Union College in 1809; studied theology under Dr. J. M. Mason; was licensed by the Associate Reformed Presbytery in 1815, and was pastor of the Rutgers Street Presbyterian Church from 1815 to 1822, when he became Professor of Logic, Metaphysics, and Belles Lettres, in Dickinson College, Carlisle, Pa. From 1829 to his death he taught in Rutgers College, New Brunswick, N. J. (as Professor of Languages, 1829-32, and of Evidences of Christianity, 1840-51), and in the Theological Seminary of the Reformed Dutch Church in the same place, as Professor of Oriental Languages and Literature, 1832-57. He resigned in 1857, and passed his closing days in scholarly retirement.

As a preacher and a teacher, Dr. McClelland stood forth pre-eminent. In the pulpit he proclaimed God's truth with eloquence, unction and logical power. In the Professor's chair he was enthusiastic, inspiring, exacting and thorough, witty and severe. As a teacher of Hebrew he is remembered for his fidelity and success in grounding his pupils in that language. His condensed Hebrew Grammar, never published, was a masterpiece. The good students thanked him for his stimulating method, the dull ones writhed under his continual exactions. His publications were very few; among them were, "Manual of Sacred Interpretation," New York, 1842; second edition, under the title "Canon and Interpretation of Scripture," 1860. A volume of his "Sermons, with Sketch of his Life," was published in 1867.

McClintock, Rev. John Calvin, is the son of Rev. John and Mary (Orr) McClintock; was born August 20th, 1843, near Carmichaels, Greene county, Pa.; graduated at Washington College, Pa., class of 1862, and at the Western Theological Seminary, class of 1865; was licensed to preach, April, 1865, by Presbytery of Redstone, of which his father has been an honored member for some forty-six years. Moving Westward with the "Star of Empire," he was called to preach in the First Presbyterian Church, Mount Pleasant, Iowa, in which church he was ordained and installed pastor, by the Presbytery of Iowa, September, 1865. From this, his first charge, in which his faithful ministrations were greatly blessed, he was called to the First Presbyterian Church of Burlington, Iowa, and installed pastor, January, 1871, by the same Presbytery. Here he abides, by God's favor, the successful and beloved pastor. The writer, having been nearly thirty years pastor of a charge adjoining that of Mr. McClintock's father, has had the best opportunity to know of the model Christian home from which he has sprung to his present position of eminent usefulness. In such homes the blessed Saviour loves to sojourn; and from the Scriptural order and faithful training of such He calls many of His most able and exemplary ministers. Besides being a sound theologian, an instructive preacher, a vigilant and faithful pastor and presbyter, Mr. McClintock has more musical talent and culture than is common to his profession, which enables him to do much to promote a high degree of culture in the service of song.

McClintock, John David, D. D., son of John and Nancy (McKee) McClintock, was born in Nicholas county, Ky., February 24th, 1836. He graduated from Hanover College, Ind., in 1858; from Princeton Seminary in 1862; was licensed, July 7th of that year, by Philadelphia Central Presbytery, and was ordained an evangelist, April 11th, 1864, by Ebenezer Presbytery. From November 29th, 1862, until August, 1863, he supplied the Church of Flemingsburg, Ky., during the absence of its pastor as a chaplain in the army. In November, 1863, he went to Cabell county, Va., and supplied the Western (now Huntington) Church, doing evangelistic work, until April, 1865, by employing one-half of his Sabbaths at various mission points in West Virginia; in April, 1865, he took charge, as stated supply, of Catlettsburg Church, Ky., in connection with Huntington Church; was installed pastor of Huntington Church, June 7th, 1873, and was released therefrom May 15th, 1876; was installed pastor of Columbus Church, Miss., April 29th, 1877, and continued to hold that relation until the end of his life. He died December 12th, 1881. His departure was calm and peaceful, full of trust in the Saviour he had preached. He was an able, faithful, zealous and popular minister, quiet, unobtrusive and gentlemanly in his bearing; an unostentatious, but fearless preacher of the Word, esteemed and loved by all who knew him.

McClung, Rev. Samuel Milligan, was born in New York city, April 17th, 1808. He studied Theology at Princeton Seminary. He was ordained by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, April 20th, 1836. He was pastor of Plum Creek and Cross Roads churches, Pa., 1837-50; pastor of Plum Creek and Parnassus, 1850-59; New Texas, 1859-61, and pastor of Cross Roads, 1862-65. He died in Allegheny county, Pa., August 6th, 1869. Mr. McClung was a man of great geniality and benevolence of spirit. His ministry was an earnest one, and fruitful of good results. He preached with plainness and power. His pastoral duties were performed with great fidelity, and he was beloved by the people among whom he labored.

McClure, John, the son of Charles and Amelia McClure, was born near Carlisle, Pa. The family had settled at an early day in the Cumberland Valley, and one of them was an elder in the Church at the Meeting-house Spring, about 1740, the first Presbyterian congregation west of the Susquehanna river.

Mr. John McClure graduated at Dickinson College in 1802, and in that Institution he was Tutor in 1810. After his graduation he became a Divinity student, but, in consequence of impaired health, he was constrained to abandon his prospective work. He was ordained a ruling elder in the First Presbyterian Church of Carlisle, in 1825, and when the Second Church was organized there, in 1833, he was one of the first three elders elected. Eminently domestic and retiring, he spent his life generally in the duties and enjoyments of his quiet and happy home, on the Letort, in the education of his children, and in the supervision of the Willow Grove Farm, but he never forgot or neglected the welfare and claims of the Church. Though a delicate man physically, he had a strong and cultivated mind, a kind and generous heart, and withal a firm and decided will. He was an intelligent Christian gentleman and a well-read theologian. The Greek Testament was his valued companion, and among his works were the massive and solid "Institutes of Turretin," in Latin, and other books of like character. He was a pronounced Presbyterian. The Confession of Faith he understood, appreciated and cordially accepted; and his life was a beautiful confirmation and illustration of his simple and steadfast and practical trust in Christ, and the soul transforming and elevating power of inspired truth, accompanied by the efficacious grace of its Divine Author. He was a faithful office-bearer in the church, which he truly loved; and, after living to see it firmly established and prosperous, he departed this life, peacefully and hopefully, March 20th, 1841, aged 57 years. All his surviving children are members of the Presbyterian Church, in different places, and all are the worthy representatives of a no less worthy parentage.

McCluskey, John, D. D., was born in Great Valley, Chester county, Pa., June 17th, 1795. He graduated at Jefferson College, Pa., in 1822, after which he was one and a half years a teacher in the academy at Newtown, Bucks county, Pa.; also a teacher for a year at New Hope, in the same county, when he went to Philadelphia and spent one year in studying theology, under the guidance of the Rev. Ezra Stiles Ely, D. D. Subsequently he was a student in Princeton Seminary for a year. Licensed by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, October 19th, 1826, he was ordained and installed pastor of the Church at West Alexander, Pa., October 8th, 1828, by the Presbytery of Washington, and labored there faithfully, wisely and successfully for twenty-six years, until, at his own request, the pastoral relation was dissolved, April 15th, 1854. After this he was agent for the Presbyterian Board of Publication, for a year, in the States of Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois; labored from 1855 to 1856 as assistant to the Rev. Jacob Bellville, pastor of the Church at Neshaminy, Pa.; from 1856 to 1858, as stated supply of the same church, then vacant; and from April 1st, 1858, to April 1st, 1859, as supply or pastor elect with the church at Smyrna, Del.

Dr. McCluskey had always been deeply interested in the instruction of youth. As soon as he settled in West Alexander, he founded there a Church school, which accomplished great good, and helped to bring into the ministry many sons of the families of that place. In 1859 he founded a female seminary in West Philadelphia, and taught it for five years. Then placing it in younger hands, he established, in 1864, a school at Hightstown, N. J., with a special view to the education of children of missionaries and ministers of the gospel, free of charge. About July 1st, 1870, he returned to West Philadelphia, and was for several years Associate Principal of the Mantua Academy. He died, March 31st, 1880, in the eighty-fifth year of his age.

As a preacher, Dr. McCluskey was interesting, instructive, and often powerful. His ministry, especially in his earlier years, was marked by frequent revivals, of great power. His mind was clear, active and vigorous. As an educator he was wise, able and successful.

McConaughy, David, D.D., LL.D., was born in Adams county, Pa., September 29th, 1775. He was educated under Mr. Dobbins, of Gettysburg, and graduated in Dickinson College, September, 1795. He studied theology with the Rev. Nathan Grier, of Brandywine, and was ordained pastor of Upper Marsh Creek (now Gettysburg), and Upper Conewago, October 8th, 1800. In 1832 he was inaugurated President of Washington College. After eighteen years of service he resigned, in 1849. He died, January 29th, 1852, in the seventy-seventh year of his age.

Dr. McConaughy was a solid and thoughtful preacher. He excelled in pastoral capacity, and was held in universal esteem, as a good man. He spoke but little in the judicatories of the Church. As a president, he exhibited accurate scholarship, dignified deportment, and paternal care of his pupils. He published several occasional discourses, and two volumes of sacred biography, which were marked with ability.

McConnell, Rev. Thomas M., was born in Washington county, Va., July 13th, 1811; graduated at the College of Bristol, Tenn., in 1832; spent two years at the Theological Seminary, Columbia, S. C., and graduated at Union Seminary, Va., in 1835. He was licensed to preach by Abingdon Presbytery, April 24th, 1835. His first field of labor embraced Decherd and McMinnville churches, located in two villages in Tennessee, fifty miles apart, but connected by railroad. The membership of each church was doubled during his pastorate. Whilst at McMinnville, a house of worship was erected, and he was installed pastor of the church for the whole of his time, July 16th, 1836. In January, 1839, he began mission work in Nashville; organized Westminster Church, April 6th, 1879, and was installed its pastor in the following May, in which relation he still continues, with the divine blessing upon his faithful labors. During the past year he wrote an exposition of the Sabbath-school Lessons for the Christian Observer.

McCord, John Davidson, was born in Newville, Cumberland county, Pa., December 4th 1808. He was the son of James McCord and Susan Davidson. In 1826, at the age of eighteen, he confessed Christ and united with the Big Spring Church. He removed to Pittsburg, April, 1833, and began the business which is still carried on under the name of McCord & Co. The firm has been one of the leading business houses of the city for many years. Uniting with the first Presbyterian Church, Rev. Francis Herron, D. D., pastor, he continued a member of it until after his removal to Philadelphia, in 1867. He was elected to the ruling eldership, under the pastorate of Rev. W. M. Paxton, D. D., and was also superintendent of the Sunday school for ten years. While in Pittsburg he served for several years as a trustee of the Western Theological Seminary. On retiring from business, in 1867, and removing to Philadelphia, he united with the West Spruce Street Church, Rev. Dr. W. P. Breed pastor, and was elected an elder in it in 1870, an office which he still fills.

Mr. McCord was a member of the Board of Domestic Missions (O. S.) from 1867 until its removal to New York, in 1871. In 1868 he became a member of the Board of Publication, a position which he still fills. He has also for many years been a member of the Board of the Presbyterian Hospital, and their Treasurer from its commencement. In all his relations with men as a business man, and in his relations with the Church as a member and officer, and in connection with its benevolent and religious enterprises, he has borne a reputation for the highest integrity, for distinguished ability, and for devoted piety.

McCorkle, Rev. Samuel Eusebius, D. D., was born August 23d, 1746, near Harris' Ferry, Lancaster county, Pa. He was graduated at the College of New Jersey, in 1772; soon afterward commenced the study of theology under his maternal uncle, the Rev. Joseph Montgomery: was licensed to preach the gospel in the Spring of 1774, and immediately after was appointed by the Synod to go southward and spend one year preaching in that region, under the direction of the Presbyteries of Hanover and Orange. After thus spending about two years in Virginia, he was installed pastor of the congregation of Thyatira, by the Orange Presbytery, August 2d, 1777. During the Revolutionary War, and especially from the Summer of 1780, when the South became the theatre of conflict, the country was in a state of utter confusion, and vice of almost every kind prevailed to an alarming extent. Mr. McCorkle came out in reference to this state of things in his utmost strength. From the close of the Revolutionary War, and especially from the breaking out of the Revolution in France, when North Carolina, in common with other parts of the country, was overrun with French infidelity, he again stood forth the indomitable champion of Christianity, not only preaching but publishing in defence of Divine revelation. He wrote very minute directions respecting his funeral, designating the minister whom he wished to preach his funeral sermon the text which he desired him to use (Job xix, 25), the order of the funeral procession, the hymns to be sung on the occasion, and even the epitaph for his own tombstone. Dr. McCorkle, though cheerful and pleasant in the social circle, or at the family fire-side, never indulged in levity. He seemed never to forget for a moment that he was a minister of Jesus Christ. He was always ready to preach in destitute churches or regions, but his delight was in his study. He had, on the whole, a very successful ministry, and many were hopefully converted through his instrumentality.

McCorkle, William A., D. D., was born near Troy, in Miami county, O., November 2d, 1822. He graduated at Wabash College, Ind., in 1850, and studied theology at Andover and Lane Seminaries. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Crawfordsville, and on June 19th, 1853, the same Presbytery ordained and installed him pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Attica, Ind. He was settled pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Marshall, Mich., in December, 1858. He accepted a call to the First Presbyterian Church of Detroit, Mich., in March, 1865. He went to the Third Presbyterian Church of Boston, Mass., in May, 1871. Finding the climate too trying for his family, he moved to Princeton, N. J., to educate his sons, in 1873. The Second Presbyterian Church being without a pastor he was asked to take charge of the pulpit. He is now (1883) pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Ypsilanti, Mich.

Dr. McCorkle's ministry was greatly blessed in his first charge, and has been fruitful throughout. In Princeton he occupied a high rank in mental force and oratorical power. His style was logical and clear. His fine presence commanded any audience. His sermons were on such an elevated plane that he satisfied the scholar, and yet so spiritual that he as much satisfied all classes of hearers. He had a remarkable ability to make personal applications of the truth at the close of a discourse. Freed from his manuscript, these perorations were the gatherings of all the elements of power in the discourse, and enforced them upon the consciences and hearts of his hearers in the ardor of his personal glow and unction. And whatever the theme of his discourse, he never forgot that he might never again stand between the living and the dead, so that he always remembered to give enough of the plan of salvation in his sermon, and to invite sinners to Jesus Christ.

McCormick, Hon. Cyrus H., of Chicago, known as the inventor of the reaping machine, a leading manufacturer, and a stalwart Presbyterian, was born at Walnut Grove, Rockbridge county, Va., February 15th, 1809. His ancestors were of Scotch-Irish descent, and of good old Presbyterian stock. Early in life he developed inventive genius of a high order, and showed a love for mechanical pursuits, which qualified him for the great work which has made his name so world-wide in the annals of agriculture and human progress. In 1831 Mr. McCormick, in his twenty-second year, invented, and with his own hands built the first practical reaping machine the world ever saw, and demonstrated, by a public test of it in the harvest fields of that year, that it was no mere theory. But the world, at that date, dreamed as little of the capabilities of the reaping machine as it did of railroads, steamboats or telegraphs. The task, therefore, which lay before him, not only of manufacturing the newly invented machine, with little capital at his command, but the greater task of creating a market for it, might have appalled the stoutest heart; but Mr. McCormick was equal to the gigantic undertaking, and most magnificently has he accomplished it. By a wonderful gift of tact, sound business management, and an inflexible adherence to honest business principles, he soon convinced the agricultural and commercial world that he had invented an instrument that was destined to revolutionize it, and he lives to see that revolution complete, through the lessening of human toil and the cheapening of human food, so that, even now, the poorest in the land are eating of the "finest of the wheat;" and, literally, the wild western wilderness of our own and those of other lands have been made to "bud and blossom as the rose."

Great as has been the distinction achieved by the subject of this brief sketch in the Inventive, Manufacturing and Commercial world, we are proud to say that his Christianity has kept even pace therewith, and that he is as noted for his large-hearted philanthropy and unostentation in giving, as for his worldly greatness. He has bestowed of his abundance to all the interests of the Presbyterian Church, and what is better, he has given wisely, and given during his lifetime, affording him the satisfaction of seeing with his own eyes the full accomplishment of his purposes in giving. With a far-reaching sagacity, which has so distinguished him in his business enterprises, he saw the necessity, many long years ago, of founding seats of Christian learning in the great West, where a sound Presbyterianism could get a firm foothold and ultimately dominate this wide domain of the West for Christ. He was, therefore, the founder of the Presbyterian Seminary of the Northwest at Chicago, and at the start donated One Hundred Thousand Dollars to endow a Professorship in that Institution, and during the long years of its early struggle for existence, his purse was ever open to replenish its empty coffers, until he has nearly trebled his original donation to the seminary, and now he, as well as all the other friends of that school of the prophets, has the proud satisfaction of seeing it on the high tide of prosperity, with a full corps of Professors, and more students seeking admission to its benefits than its walls can accommodate, necessitating extensive additions, which are now in progress. We cannot recount, for few but himself know, the numberless other Christian enterprises he has aided. We do know, however, that many a struggling church, seminary and college throughout the land has felt the impulse of new life and energy through his timely benevolence, which seems to run peculiarly in this channel. It can be said with special truth of Mr. McCormick, that through life he has sought to provide for the good of his fellow-men, and his hand has been ever ready to assist in extending the kingdom of our Lord; and as a man among men his genial sympathy and large-hearted liberality have given him a world-wide reputation, and won for him friends in all parts of the earth.

McCormick, James, son of James McCormick and Eliza Buehler, was born at Harrisburg, Pa., October 31st, 1832. After preparation in the Harrisburg Academy he entered Yale College, where he graduated in 1853. Studying law in the office of his father, he was soon after admitted to the Bar, and for several years continued in the practice of his profession. At the death of his father the care of a large estate was mainly thrown upon him, and he abandoned the work of his profession. He has been eminently successful as a man of business. But it has been chiefly in the religious and benevolent work of the times that he has been conspicuous. Confessing Christ while a young man, he entered earnestly upon Christian work; connected himself with the Presbyterian Church; began labors in the Sunday school, the Young Men's Christian Association, and such other charitable enterprises as were opened to him. In 1858 he became an elder in the Pine Street Presbyterian Church, and has since then been one of the most active promoters of all its Christian work. For years his large Sunday-school class of about three hundred young men has been an agency of immeasurable good. In the wide operations of the Young Men's Christian Association in the State and nation he has been a trusted leader and wise counsellor. His power has been felt, and his counsel and help have been sought (and never in vain), by the charitable enterprises of the city. His wealth has been used freely and religiously for all good objects.

McCoy, Rev. James, was born in Bourbon county, Ky., September 30th, 1802. He was of Scotch extraction, his father, Alexander McCoy, being a native of the eastern highlands of Scotland, and his mother, Nancy Campbell, a native of Argyleshire, Scotland. His more advanced and classical education was secured in the Presbyterian Academy established by Rev. William Martin, at L'Avonia, Ind., which was one of the earliest educational institutions opened in the State. He was licensed, in 1839, by the Presbytery of Madison (N. S.), and in 1843 was ordained by the Presbytery of Logansport. His work during his ministry extended from Floyd county as far north as Logansport, in Cass county, and east to Decatur. He subsequently labored in Boone, Marion and Johnson counties, taking charge, while laboring in Noblesville, of a young ladies' seminary, and later, a select school for both sexes.

He was suddenly stricken down by disease, and on the 6th of February, 1865, passed into rest. As a Christian, Mr. McCoy was above reproach; as a friend, loving and tender; as an ambassador of Christ, he was thoroughly imbued with the responsibility of his calling. He was a thoroughly scriptural preacher, earnest and faithful, turning neither to the right nor left, dealing manly blows for the truth, making terrible assaults upon sin and wrong. He never daubed with untempered mortar. He was a lover of souls, deeply in sympathy with the Master, with a heart as firm as a rock, but kind and loving as a woman's. He belonged to a class of preachers that has mostly passed away, as to style and method, but whose memory is blessed. From his lips multitudes heard the sweet gospel, and have entered with him into rest, who were among the lowly ones. Others are toiling and waiting for the meeting beyond.

McCullagh, Rev. Archibald, was born at Kildarton, Ireland, January, 1812; graduated at New Jersey College in 1868; studied theology at Princeton, and was ordained by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, North, May 20, 1871. He had a successful pastorate at the Second Church, Germantown, Philadelphia, Pa., 1871-8, and since 1878 has been pastor of the Ross Street Church, Brooklyn, N. Y., with the Divine blessing upon his ministry. He is a fervent, forcible, and impressive preacher.

McCullagh, Rev. John, is a native of Scotland. When but a youth he connected himself with the church of Rev. Thos. Chalmers, and while yet in his teens chose the Sunday-school work as his mission in life. He organized Sunday schools among the colliers and fishermen in Scotland, and subsequently continued his work among the Catholic Irish in Cannaught.

About fifty years ago, under the advice of his friends, Drs. Chalmers and Dill, he determined to emigrate to America, hoping to find a wider field of usefulness. He landed in New York, and seeking some organization through which he could most efficiently work, he chose the American Sunday-school Union, and straightway entered the service as a volunteer missionary. He selected Sullivan county, New York, as his first field; went to Monticello, connected himself with the Presbyterian Church, under Rev. James Adams, D. D., and begun his labors among a lot of home heathen, known as the "Bark Peelers." His next field of labor was in southern Illinois, then known as Egypt, on account of the great moral darkness pervading that region, and some of the grandest results of his life were accomplished there.

In 1839 he selected the South as his field, and Kentucky as his home; moved to Henderson, Ky., where he found the church almost extinct, and no Sunday in the State within seventy-five miles. He immediately organized a Sunday-school, and the church soon catching somewhat of his enthusiasm, awoke to new life. In less than three years, mainly through the instrumentality of Mr. McCullagh, sufficient means had been raised to erect a handsome brick building, and the church started on a career of prosperity which has continued to the present time.

In 1840, Rev. Joseph Huber, General Agent of the American Sunday-school Union, visited Henderson, and at the earnest request of the Society, through Mr. Huber, Mr. McCullagh entered regularly into their service. In the course of his work he organized schools in seventy-five counties in Kentucky, and in one year, 1850, he organized ninety new schools, containing 626 teachers and 6300 scholars. In 1852 he was taken out of the active missionary work, and made superintendent of missions in the South.

The following is a summary of the work of the American Sunday-school Union in the South for the past fifty years, during most of which period Mr. McCullagh was either a missionary or superintendent: 13,362 Sunday schools organized, numbering 84,877 teachers and 707,182 scholars, besides aid extended to 21,588 other schools.

In 1840 Mr. McCullagh was elected and installed a ruling elder in the Henderson Church. Subsequently he was licensed to preach by the old Muhlenburg Presbytery. His public addresses are original, entertaining and instructive to both young and old, and what is still better, they have the happy effect of enlisting the co-operation of those who hear, and loosening their purse strings.

McCurdy, Rev. Irwin Pounds, the eldest child of Alexander J. and Sarah (Pounds) McCurdy, is of Scotch-Irish descent, and was born near Livermore, Westmoreland county, Pa., March 23d, 1856. After teaching for several years and studying law for one year, he graduated at the Normal School, Indiana, Pa., in 1876, standing first in his class. Having spent some time at the University of Wooster, he entered Lafayette College, where he took a high standing, and graduated in 1880, winning the Fowler prize, for having made the greatest proficiency in English Philology. After his graduation he studied theology, partly under private direction, but mainly at Princeton Seminary. In March, 1881, before leaving the Seminary, he was called to his present charge, as pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Frederick City, Md., and having been licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Kittanning, April 17th, 1881, he was, on July 8th of the same year, ordained and installed by the Presbytery of Baltimore. Since April, 1881, in connection with his pastorate, he has held the Professorship of Greek and Higher Mathematics, in Frederick Female Seminary. Mr. McCurdy's labors in his first charge have been greatly blessed. He is distinguished for activity and untiring energy. As a speaker he is forcible, eloquent and logical. He has published a number of special essays and discourses, among which are a graduating thesis, on "The Successful Teacher," and a prize essay, entitled "A Philosophical Discussion of the Works, Style and Language of Edgar Allen Poe."

Macdonald, James Madison, D.D., was born at Limerick in Maine, May 22d, 1812. He graduated at Union College, with high honor, in 1832, and at the Yale Theological Seminary in 1835. He was licensed to preach August 6th, 1834; took charge of the Third Congregational Church of Berlin, Conn., April 1st, 1835; was pastor of the Second Congregational Church, New London, Conn., for three years from 1837; and in 1841 accepted a call to the Presbyterian Church at Jamaica, Long Island, where he continued to labor with great usefulness and success until 1850, when he was installed over the Fifteenth Street Church in New York city. Three years later he removed to Princeton, N. J., and was installed as pastor of the First Presbyterian Church there, November 1st, 1853. At this post of duty he continued until his death, April 19th, 1876. His ministry at Princeton was greatly honored by the attending power of the Holy Spirit.

Dr. Macdonald was a man of untiring industry.

He published a number of sermons at various times, also about six volumes. Among the best known is probably, "My Father's House, or the Heaven of the Bible." His greatest and most valuable work, however, has appeared since his decease: "The Life and Writings of St. John." In a high degree his ministrations were able, varied and evangelical. As a preacher he was solid, dignified, instructive, yet earnest and tender. He was largely successful in winning souls and building up the Church in every field of labor he occupied. In the councils of the Church he was universally esteemed wise, prudent and faithful. He was a warm friend, a pleasant companion, affectionate and kind, and greatly beloved by his people and his ministerial brethren. He departed in the exercise of a clear and calm faith in his Redeemer.

McDowell, Rev. Alexander, a native of Ireland, was licensed by Donegal Presbytery, July 30th, 1740. In the Spring he was sent to Virginia, requests for him having been made by North Mountain, James River, Rockfish, Joy Creek, Bush Mountain, South Branch of Potomac, and by the Marsh, in Maryland. He was ordained, October 29th, 1741, to go as an evangelist to Virginia, and in the Fall he was directed to itinerate in New Castle Presbytery. He seems to have settled at Nottingham, and, in 1743, to have become pastor of White Clay and Elk River. The Synod's school was intrusted to him, and was for several years at Elk, and finally, in 1767, at Newark, Del. On the union Mr. McDowell gave up the charge of Elk. In April, 1760, Conococheague asked for him. He died January 12th, 1782.

McDowell, John, one of the early elders of Chartiers Church, Presbytery of Redstone, during the pastorate of Dr. McMillan, was born September 23d, 1736, in the north of Ireland, of Scotch ancestry. When a young man he went to the West, about 1773. In or at his log cabin John McMillan, as appears in his journal, preached his first sermon in Chartiers settlement, August, 1775. Mr. McDowell was tall and slender in person, grave in manner, of sound judgment, general intelligence, well read in theology, and highly esteemed and honored in his day. He was appointed, in 1783, one of the "Council of Censors" for the State. Was a representative in the Legislature from 1798 to 1801, and the year following was commissioned, by Governor McKean, an Associate Judge of the Court of Common Pleas. He was active in the establishment of Canonsburg Academy, and President of its Board of Trustees; was a trustee of Jefferson College from its organization till his death, August 12th, 1809.

Among Judge McDowell's descendants have been several prominent Presbyterian ministers, also many elders, some of them men of national reputation. Such an one, pre-eminently, was the Hon. Josiah Scott, of Bucyrus, Ohio, for many years a Judge of the Supreme Court, a man of versatile talent, great ability in his profession, and a devoted Christian. Like many other eminent men, he testified openly to the advantages received from his early training in the Shorter Catechism. His highest honor he esteemed it to be, that he was a ruling elder in the Church, as had been his father Alexander, his grandfather Josiah, his great-grandfather Abraham, and his great-great-grandfather, Hugh Scott.

McDowell, John, D.D., was born in Bedminster, N. J., September 10th, 1780. He graduated at Nassau Hall, September, 1801, and studied theology with Dr. John Woodhull, of Freehold, N. J. December 26th, 1804, he was installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Elizabethtown. Frequent and powerful revivals occurred under his ministry. In twenty-eight years and a half the additions to the church.

JOHN M'DOWELL, D. D.

on profession of faith, were nine hundred and twenty-one. But his health requiring a change, he removed to take charge of the new Central Church of Philadelphia, June 6th, 1833. Here he remained for twelve and a half years, resigning the charge November 20th, 1845. In three weeks he started a new church, the Spring Garden Church, and was followed by one hundred and thirty-six of his former parishioners. Over this congregation he was installed, February 3d, 1846, and in it he labored with gratifying success until his death, which took place from natural decay, February, 1863, at the age of eighty-three. In 1861 the late Mr. Sutphen was brought in as a colleague, to relieve him.

Dr. McDowell's life was so protracted that he had the opportunity of taking part in all the great institutions of the Church and benevolent societies. In 1820 he was made Moderator of the General Assembly. From 1836 till 1840 he served as Stated Clerk.

Dr. McDowell was a plain, practical, systematic preacher, who never sacrificed to the graces. As a pastor, he was unrivaled. One thousand three hundred and seventeen persons were brought into the several churches to which he ministered, on profession of faith. Dr. McDowell's was not a brilliant, but a well-rounded life, complete and admirably proportioned. He was never out of his place, and without the slightest pretension, was extensively useful. Signally memorable was his founding a new and prosperous church, at the age of sixty-five. It was a verification of the promise, "They shall still bring forth fruit in old age" (Ps. xcii, 14).

Dr. McDowell's published works were a "System of Theology," in two volumes, a "Bible-class Manual," in two volumes, and "Bible-class Questions," the first of the kind ever used.

McDowell, William Anderson, D. D., was born at Lamington, N. J., in May, 1789. He graduated at Princeton College in 1809, and was Tutor in the college from November, 1810, until September, 1811. His theological studies, commenced under the direction of Dr. John Woodhull, were completed in Princeton Seminary, in 1813. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, April 28th, 1813, and installed pastor of the Church of Bound Brook, N. J., on the 23d of December following. This relation continued until October 19th, 1814, and on the 15th of the next December he was installed pastor of the church at Morristown, N. J. Here his ministry was characterized by great acceptableness and usefulness. His health requiring a milder climate, he accepted a call from a Presbyterian Church in Charleston, S. C., and was installed its pastor December 3d, 1823. Here he continued, occupying a wide sphere of ministerial usefulness, about ten years. In 1832 he was Moderator of the General Assembly. In 1833 he was appointed Secretary of the Board of Domestic Missions of the Presbyterian Church, which position he retained until 1850. His death took place September 17th, 1851.

Dr. McDowell was truly a Christian in his views of divine truth, in his intercourse with God, and in the eminent prudence, circumspection, and consistency, of his public and private walk. As a minister of the gospel, he cheerfully consecrated himself to his work. His sermons were well planned, thoroughly digested, solid, and rich in evangelical instruction. His manner was characterized by a fervor and unction that gave it very considerable effect. As a pastor, he was diligent and faithful. Under his administration, the Board of Missions, which had been in a comparatively low and crippled condition, assumed a higher position, the sphere of its influence was enlarged, its importance was more fully appreciated by the Church, and its efficiency became visible in many hundred places which before were literally spiritual desolations.

McElhenny, John, D. D., was born in Lancaster District, S. C., in March, 1781. He was a graduate of Washington College, Lexington, Va.; studied theology in the same place, under Dr. Baxter; was licensed by the Lexington Presbytery; and in February, 1808, sent by that body to preach in the neighboring mountains, a region occupying a space of one hundred miles square. Then he crossed the Alleghenies, and before him lay the scene of his future labors and success. At the end of the month, having had a view of what was before him, he returned to Lexington, and was sent by his Presbytery to Lewisburg, as its pastor, where he lived and died, after a pastorate of sixty-three years.

Mr. McElhenny entered this broad field, preaching as he came. He occupied the rude structures then in use; preached in private houses, in the open grove; in the morning in one place, in the evening as far he could ride, in another. There was not a minister of his belief in all that region, so that, without counsel from an earthly source, he had to determine in all critical cases according to his own judgment, and no exception was ever known to be taken to his decisions. In addition to his public preaching, he was for many years the Principal of the Academy in that place, often its only teacher. He had wonderful influence over his pupils, many of whom, among the rest Drs. Plumer and Ruffner, became men of great influence and usefulness. One great cause of his success was his love for the Master, and for all classes of men, especially for little children, for whom he had an affection only equaled by theirs for him.

Dr. McElhenny was tall, straight, and graceful in all his movements. His fine gray eye told of the brightness of his mind, and nothing escaped its observation. His voice was very pleasant, always reaching the ears of his audience. He sometimes wrote his sermons, but never took a note into the pulpit. His delivery was rapid, but clear and simple. He said as much in fifteen minutes as most men would have done in double the time. Dr. McElhenny exerted a most extensive and happy influence. In the region of his active and useful labors, now well filled with an industrious God-fearing people, his name is fragrant with precious memories. He died, January 2d, 1871, and over his remains, which repose in the old churchyard, his grateful people have erected a beautiful monument.

McElroy, John M., D. D., was born near Greenville, Fayette county, Ohio, on January 21st, 1830. His parents were of Scotch-Irish and Presbyterian descent. He graduated with high rank as a scholar, at Jefferson College, Pa., in 1851. After graduation he was for two years the efficient assistant teacher of Rev. Dr. Donaldson, in Eldersridge Academy, where he was greatly beloved by the students, and gave direction and stimulus to the aims and thoughts of many young men who have been greatly useful in various callings and some of whom have attained eminence.

He studied theology at Princeton, and was licensed to preach in June, 1855; and soon after accepted the pastorate of the newly-organized Church at Ottumwa, Wapello county, Iowa, where he performed successful ministerial labor for nearly fifteen years. The young mission church grew vigorous, self-sustaining, and built a commodious church edifice. Resigning in 1869, with impaired health, he some months later became pastor of the Church in Jefferson county, Iowa, where he labored for thirteen years. Emigration having depleted this church, he has recently removed to Ottumwa and taken charge of the neighboring Church of Kirksville.

Dr. McElroy has exerted a wide influence for religion, education and patriotism. And his work has been accomplished under the affliction of deafness for many years. Recently he had a glad surprise, when, at the close of a service of which he had heard no word, the notes of the closing hymn, borne through the Dentaphone, were distinctly heard, like the echoes from the heavenly choir: "And crown Him Lord of all."

McElroy, Joseph, D. D., was born near Newville (then called Big Spring), Pa., in 1791 or 1792; graduated at Jefferson College, and studied theology under the direction of Dr. John M. Mason. From the day of his licensure Mr. McElroy became, as a preacher, a man of mark, not only in his Denomination, but in the whole of Western Pennsylvania. In 181- he undertook to establish an Associate Reformed Church in Pittsburg, and soon gathered a strong congregation. He was subsequently called to the church formerly served by Dr. Mason, the Scotch Church, New York, then located in Cedar street. This congregation grew rapidly under his ministry, subsequently worshiped in a church at the corner of Grand and Crosby streets, and then removed to the spacious and elegant structure which it now occupies, in Fourteenth street, near Sixth avenue. Here he labored with great energy and success, until increasing years and failing health constrained him to seek assistance in the pastorate.

Dr. McElroy was a man of mark and of great influence, whilst strength remained. Not only was he a great preacher and attractive pastor, but he was a wise counsellor, and a man of great discernment, sound judgment and prudent discretion. He rarely spoke in the Church courts, but when he did, it was with weight, such as usually secured the success of his recommendations. He was a man for executive work; knew men and how to measure them, knew things and how to manage them discreetly. He was, during his active life, a member of most of our Church Boards, and his counsels were always sought and heeded. His church was always amongst the most liberal in our body, and his business tact challenged respect in all affairs of public interest.

McFarland, Mrs. Amanda R., was born in Brooke county, W. Va., on the Ohio river, and was educated at Dr. Beatty's Steubenville Female Seminary. In 1857 she married Rev. David F. McFarland, and for the following five years assisted her husband in the Presbyterian churches of French Grove, Elmwood and Havana, Ill. From 1862 to 1866 her husband was in charge of the Mattoon (Ill.) Female Seminary, where she exhibited, in the judicious training of her pupils, those traits which have since made her so successful in the training of Indian girls. In 1867 Mr. McFarland removed to Santa Fe, and commenced Presbyterian missions in New Mexico. In her new home Mrs. McFarland organized and conducted a successful mission school among Mexican children. From 1867 to 1873 she crossed, several times, in a coach, the plains between Santa Fe and the Missouri River. Upon one trip, for twelve days and nights she was the only woman in the coach, and a portion of the way they were pursued by wild Indians. The health of her husband failing, in the Fall of 1873 they removed to California, and established an academy at San Diego.

In 1875 they re-entered the mission work, accepting positions among the Nez Perces Indians, where he died, May 13th, 1876. Unable to endure the loneliness of her position, Mrs. McFarland removed to Portland, Oregon, January, 1877. But her missionary spirit would not allow her to be contented out of the work. Consequently, upon the arrival at Portland of her friend, Dr. Jackson, under whom she had labored in New Mexico, she at once applied for a place. It was arranged that she should accompany him to Alaska and take charge of the school at Fort Wrangell.

On the 10th of August, 1877, Mrs. McFarland and Dr. Sheldon Jackson reached Fort Wrangell and commenced Presbyterian Missions in Alaska. After arranging for the work he returned to the East, leaving her in charge of the mission. At the time she was the only Christian white woman in the place; for seven months the only Protestant missionary in Alaska, and for twelve months the only one at Fort Wrangell. During that time she was the clergyman, physician, and lawyer of the Indians. All their difficulties, political, religious, physical, and moral were brought to her for solution, and her decisions were universally accepted. She was called upon to preside over a native constitutional convention; interfere in cases of witchcraft; and when a vigilance committee would hang a white man for murder, she was sent for to act as his spiritual adviser. Her fame spread far and wide among the tribes. Great chiefs left their homes and came long distances to enter the school of "the woman who loved their people," or plead that teachers might be sent to their tribes. The school soon developed into a permanent industrial training school for girls, and was named by admiring friends "The McFarland Home." It is noted for its Christian influence, nearly all the adult girls becoming Christians.

McFarland, Francis, D. D., was born in the county Tyrone, Ireland, January 8th, 1788. His pious parents emigrated to Western Pennsylvania in 1793. Having completed his collegiate education at Jefferson and Washington colleges, Pa., he entered Princeton Seminary in 1818. In 1819 he was licensed and spent several years in missionary work in Indiana, Missouri and Georgia. He was ordained while supplying, for a short time, the recently organized First Church of Brooklyn, August 1st, 1822. Ill health requiring a journey South, he was invited to the Bethel Church, in Augusta county, Va. He continued a faithful and acceptable pastor and able "minister of the word," till invited, in 1835, to take charge of the Board of Education as Secretary. This office he vacated in 1841, on being again called to his former charge. There he spent his remaining years. He was all his life a man of infirm health, afflicted by paroxysms of asthma, so that he seldom "knew the luxury of uninterrupted sleep." Not only was he distinguished for his tenderness and sympathy as a pastor, and ability in the pulpit, but was eminent for his sound, wise views in the courts of the Church. He was often sent to the Assembly, of which body he was elected Moderator in 1856, and he presided so as to excite marked admiration. Seldom has any Church court enjoyed better services as Stated Clerk, than the Synod of Virginia during the unusually long period of his holding that office. His decline was protracted, though not painful, and borne, in all its tediousness, with eminent patience and Christian submission. By more rapid decline during the last few weeks of his life, re-attended by more pain, the silver chord was soon broken, and his soul returned in peace, to final rest with the Lord, October 10th, 1871.

McFarren, Alexander, was born in Scotland on the 18th of April, 1800, and died in Detroit, Mich., August 23d, 1869. He was first connected with the Rev. Dr. Robert Carter's Church on Canal street, New York city, whence, in 1832, he removed to Detroit, where he was ordained elder in the First Presbyterian Church, May 23d, 1848. Afterwards he became an elder in the Second (or Fort Street) Presbyterian Church, and was so connected with that church at the time of his death. He was a bookseller, and well read in the theology of the Presbyterian Church, a rugged and stern adherent and advocate of his religious faith, but a man of kind and tender heart and well beloved by many friends.

McGaw, James Alexander Porter, D. D., was born at Fairhaven, Ohio, February 4th, 1835. In 1856 he graduated at Miami University. He was brought up in the Associate Reformed Presbyterian Church, attended the Oxford Theological Seminary, and was licensed in April, 1857. During his seminary course the South Henderson Church, near Oquawka, Ill., being vacant, and being much interested in Mr. McGaw, as having been brought up under its care, and also on account of his early orphanage, and his intellectual and religious promise, called him to its pastorate, an office which he very acceptably and usefully filled until 1867, when he resigned to accept the Vice-presidency of Monmouth College, Ill. In 1868 he transferred his ecclesiastical connection to the Presbyterian Church, and on the 1st of January, 1869, he entered upon the pastorate of the First Presbyterian Church in Urbana, Ohio. This he resigned, July 1st, 1880, to accept a call to the Central Church, Rock Island, Ill. The next year he was called to the First Presbyterian Church, Toledo, Ohio, and began his labors there September 1st, 1881.

JAMES ALEXANDER PORTER M'GAW, D. D.

Dr. McGaw is a substantial man, physically, intellectually and religiously. As a preacher, he is earnest and clear, and instructive and evangelical. Being a man of much kindness, and readiness and strength of judgment, and of courage to urge his convictions, he is useful and influential as a pastor. In his ministry he has been acceptable and successful.

McGee, Rev. William C., the son of Patrick and Mary (Ray) McGee, was born in Paterson, N. J., August 15th, 1816. He graduated at New Jersey College in 1836, and pursued a full course of studies at Princeton Theological Seminary. He was licensed by New York Presbytery, and soon after called to Hardwick and Markshoro' churches in New Jersey, being ordained and installed by Newton Presbytery in 1841. Here he labored diligently, faithfully and with success. He died May 25th, 1867. He was esteemed by the churches to which he ministered, by his co-presbyters and by the general public, as a good and most genial man; as a preacher, earnest, lucid and practical; as a neighbor, kind and sympathizing; as a citizen, intelligent, public-spirited and loyal. The Church in which he was trained he loved, and he was ever ready on all suitable occasions to vindicate her faith, her polity and her order. In the discharge of his high and responsible calling he was constant, zealous and laborious, literally wearing himself out.

McGiffert, Rev. Joseph N., was born December 8th, 1829, in New York city. His parents were of Scotch descent, and were Christian people, and their son was instructed as Presbyterians were generally accustomed to teach their children fifty years ago. At the age of eighteen years he became a Christian, and united with the Presbyterian Church at Hudson, N. Y., to which city his parents had removed. His father was a thorough classical scholar, and under his instruction the son took a full collegiate course of study. He graduated from the Auburn Seminary, in 1853, and was licensed to preach, and afterwards ordained, by the Presbytery of Columbia. For three years he was pastor of the Church in Hillsdale, N. Y., and for the same length of time of the Church in Sanquoit, in the same State. In 1867 he was installed pastor of the Church in Ashtabula, Ohio, now included in Cleveland Presbytery, where, for sixteen years, he has been the able, faithful, successful and beloved pastor. Notwithstanding the constant drain which is made on our village churches, under the ministration of Mr. McGiffert the Church in Ashtabula has grown from a membership of ninety-two to two hundred and thirty. As a preacher, he is decidedly able and effective, and as a pastor, he has secured the love of his people. In Presbytery and in Synod he ranks among our best men, and his services in the cause of Home Missions have been most valuable.

McGill, Alexander Taggart, D. D., LL. D., was born at Canonsburg, Pa., February 24th, 1807, and graduated at Jefferson College, in 1826. After a short service in this college, as Tutor, he went to Georgia; studied law, and was admitted to the Bar, receiving, almost immediately afterwards, several important appointments from the Legislature of that State. In 1831 Mr. McGill returned to Pennsylvania; relinquished the law for theology, the study of which he pursued in the Theological Seminary of the Associate (now United Presbyterian) Church, then located at Canonsburg. In 1834 he was licensed to preach, and in 1835 he was ordained and installed, at Carlisle, Pa., as pastor of three small churches, distributed through as many counties, Cumberland, Perry and York.

In 1838 Mr. McGill became discontented with the peculiarities of the Church in which he was born and reared, and connected himself with the Old School Presbyterian Church. Soon after this he became pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church in Carlisle, of which he continued to be the popular preacher and useful pastor about three years, until his election as a Professor in the Western Theological Seminary, at Allegheny. On that work he entered with the greatest alacrity and pleasure, and continued in it until the toils and anxieties of the position told on his health. Having received a call to the Seminary at Columbia, S. C., he accepted it, and spent the Winter of 1852-3 at Columbia. In 1853 the General Assembly elected him again to Allegheny, where his family had remained, and he returned to that position. In 1854 he was transferred to the Seminary at Princeton, leaving Allegheny in a prosperous condition.

ALEXANDER TAGGART M'GILL, D.D., LL.D.

Dr. McGill's chair at Princeton was that of "Ecclesiastical, Homiletic and Pastoral Theology." He was Moderator of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church (Old School) in 1848, Permanent Clerk from 1850 to 1862, and Stated Clerk from 1862 to 1870. Dr. McGill's method of preaching without a manuscript or brief before him, has been of great advantage to his popularity as a speaker. He is a finished scholar and a superior preacher. With his pen, in the pulpit, and in the professorships he has filled, he has rendered valuable service to the Church of his adoption, and registered his name high on the record of her representative men, both for the present age and the generations to follow.

In May, 1883, Dr. McGill, in consequence of impaired health and growing infirmities, resigned his professorship at Princeton, and the Rev. William M. Paxton, D. D., was chosen to take his place. He was, however, by the unanimous vote of the Directors of the Seminary, continued as Emeritus Professor, in grateful appreciation of the long and valuable service which he had rendered to the Institution.

McGill, Rev. Daniel, joined the Presbytery in 1713, having accepted a call to Marlborough, where he labored for some time. In 1719 the Synod sent him to preach to the people of Potomoke, Va., where he spent some months, and put "the people into church order," but declined their call. Mr. McGill was called to Elk River, in Maryland, but after a long delay, declined. He was a supply for short periods in Kent, at Birmingham, on Brandywine, at Snow Hill, White Clay, Drawyers, Conestoga, and Octorara. He died February 19th, 1721, his home being in the London Tract, New Castle county, Del. He was a valuable member of Synod, a good preacher, and a learned man.

McGill, John, was born in northern Chester county, Pa., June 10th, 1824. His parents were natives of Dumfriesshire, Scotland. His boyhood was spent on a farm, in the neighborhood of Churchtown, Pa., where he enjoyed the ministrations of Rev. Alfred Nevin, then serving his first pastorate. He exhibited great thoughtfulness, was fond of reading, and industrious and persevering in whatever engaged. As a youth, he was for a short time a student in Lafayette College, when presided over by Dr. George Junkin. He entered upon business life as a country merchant, at South Hermitage, Pa., and by his enterprise, aptness and energy, soon attracted an extensive trade, from a large extent of country. In 1861 he removed to Philadelphia, and with William Wood formed the firm of William Wood & Co., manufacturers of cotton and woolen fabrics, which has developed into one of the largest manufacturing interests in the city. As a prudent business manager, wise economist, noble-hearted philanthropist and patriotic citizen, the city has few superiors to John McGill. He has, from earliest life, been identified with religion. The Church owes much to his sagacity, liberality and piety. For some years he has been a ruling elder in the Alexander Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia.

McGinley, Amos A., D. D., was born in the vicinity of Fairfield, Adams county, Pa., in 1778; graduated at Dickinson College in 1798; pursued his theological studies under the direction of his pastor, the Rev. William Paxton, D. D.; was licensed by the Presbytery of Carlisle in 1802, and was ordained and installed pastor of the churches of Upper and Lower Path Valley, Franklin county, Pa., in 1803, in which churches he labored the remainder of his days. Dr. McGinley was an interesting and impressive preacher. His colloquial talents were of a high order. His manner was uniformly polite and courteous. He was a practical man, fertile in resources, skillful in adapting means to ends, and wise to compose difficulties. He died May 1st, 1856. His removal from the Church militant to the Church triumphant, was not only a loss to that portion of the Church with which he was more immediately connected, but also to the Church in general. In his Presbytery his loss was greatly felt. He was one of its most active and influential members, one of its wisest counsellors, and most judicious; a firm defender of the faith, and yet always kind and courteous, and conciliatory; one whom all who knew him loved and revered; one whose memory is embalmed with filial affection in many a heart.

McGinnis, Rev. James Y., son of George McGinnis, Esq., long an honored elder of the Presbyterian Church of Shippensburg, Pa., was born at that place, December 8th, 1815. He graduated at Jefferson College, Pa., in 1835; studied theology at Hanover, Ind., and was licensed by the Presbytery of Madison, June 27th, 1840. On September 14th, 1841, he was ordained by the Presbytery of Peoria, and installed pastor of the Church at Lewistown, Fulton county, Ill., where, for a year previous, he had labored with great zeal and success. Two years afterwards, with health much impaired, he was constrained to return to his native place. After a temporary rest, having supplied for a year the Church at Shade Gap, Huntingdon county, Pa., he became its most admired, devoted pastor. His unwearied labors, with their precious fruits, his wondrous zeal, and success in the establishment of "Milwood Academy," his excellent address to the literary societies of his Alma Mater, on Commencement Day, August 5th, 1861, the last effort of his devoted life, as also his triumphant death on the last day of the same month, are all detailed in his biography, written by the Rev. D. L. Hughes.

McGready, Rev. James, was of Scotch-Irish extraction. When he was quite young his parents removed to Carolina, and settled in Guilford county. In his youth he accompanied an uncle to Pennsylvania, and after pursuing his studies under Mr. Smith and Dr. McMillan, was licensed by the Presbytery of Redstone, August 13th, 1788. He obtained leave to travel to Carolina during the ensuing winter, and on his way thither passed through the places in Virginia which had been visited by the great revival, and with his heart warmed by what he heard and saw when he reached Guilford, preached the truth with an earnestness and power which broke up the spiritual apathy of the people, and led to an extensive and glorious revival. In 1796 he removed to Kentucky and settled in Logan county. He had three congregations, Muddy, Red, and Gasper rivers. In the latter began that mighty revival which spread so far and wide through all the West, from 1800 to 1801. Mr. McGready was one of the sons of Thunder, both in matter and manner, and an uncompromising reprove of sin in every shape. The effect of his impassioned preaching was visible for years in the religious interest which it awakened. This distinguished servant of God, with some irregularities which he lived to correct, pursued his bright and useful career for many years, and was instrumental, directly or indirectly, in the conversion of many souls. He died in 1817.

McGuffey, William H., D. D., LL. D., was born of Scotch-Irish Presbyterian parents, in Western Pennsylvania. He was eminently a self-made man, having, in the face of great obstacles, not only secured a regular education, but the highest graduating honors in Washington College, Pa. It was while there that the great Shepherd gathered him into His fold, and called him into His service in the ministry. When but a recent graduate he was appointed Professor of Ancient Languages in the Miami University, and soon selected to preside over that Institution. His preparation for licensure was made by careful study of the Scriptures in the original languages, with the help of lexicons, grammars, and other suitable apparatus. Three times he thus read the Hebrew Bible, and oftener the Greek Testament. His preaching was characterized by a careful analytical exposition of Scripture, corresponding to his course of study. Both in Ohio, where, when residing in Cincinnati, he prepared the widely-known series of school books, bearing his name, and in Virginia, he was distinguished as the apostle of popular education. In both States he was the unwearied and efficient advocate of a system of public schools, and his labors also ensured abundantly to extend and deepen the interest of the people in the progress of higher education. This effect was most clearly evinced in the great increase of the patronage of the University of Virginia, an Institution which he brought into closer contact with the hearts of the people. His pulpit was the stand of the lecture room, and while clearly unfolding the teachings of moral philosophy, he imbued the minds of his pupils, as well, with those of the gospel, on which he founded the principles of the science he taught. His end was peaceful, and he departed in the faith and triumphant hope of the gospel, whose teachings he had long illustrated in his life.

McHenry, Rev. Francis, was from Ireland. He was licensed by Philadelphia Presbytery in 1737, and directed to supply Amwell, Bethlehem, and other vacancies in Hunterdon county, N. J., and to preach every third Sabbath at Newtown, Bucks county, Pa. When Mr. Tenment, in October, 1738, consented to have an assistant, "to preach day about" at Neshaminy, Mr. McHenry was sent to spend every third Sabbath, giving the rest of his time to Deep Run. In the Spring Neshaminy asked for half of his time. He was installed at Deep Run and Neshaminy, March 16th, 1743. In the Spring of 1750 Mr. McHenry spent eight weeks as a missionary in Virginia. He died in 1757.

McIlvaine, Rev. Jasper S., was eminent for his Christian spirit and consecration to the work of the Master. As a missionary of the Presbyterian Church he was a member of the Shantung Mission and of the Presbytery of Pekin, China. He died on the 2d of February, 1881, after an illness of a few days.

"He had no equal in North China in many respects," wrote one of his missionary companions after his decease, "since the days of William Burns." He was a man of singular devotedness, and gave himself with unreserved consecration to the work of preaching the gospel to the perishing millions of China. His own private fortune, and his salary, were freely offered to this work, and he felt himself largely repaid for all the sacrifices which he made by the advancement of the Church in the great provinces where his missionary life was spent.

Mr. McIlvaine was a native of New Jersey, and was educated in Princeton College and Seminary. He went to China in 1868 and wrought faithfully in the missionary work until called to his reward. His health was not always vigorous, but his spirit impelled him to labors which would have overtaxed strong men, and in the thirteen years of his life in China he accomplished a great work for the Saviour's cause. His companions in the mission field mourned over his departure with unaffected sorrow.

The following extract from a letter of the Rev. Dr. Ellinwood, one of the secretaries of the Board of Foreign Missions, shows the estimate put upon the man by those who knew his work most intimately:—

"Although he has died so young, at the early age of thirty-six years, yet there is a completeness about his work that is beautiful. Some ten years ago, unattended save by one Chinese helper, he struck out into the interior, even against the remonstrances of his brethren, and at a time when it was considered hazardous to take such a step. He then laid the foundation of what is already the most promising station in North China, situated in the centre and capital of perhaps the most important province of the empire, in an intellectual and moral point of view. For several years he lived alone, though subsequently joined by Mr. and Mrs. Crossette.

"He has been singularly self-denying, appearing to disregard, not only personal comfort, but his bodily health. But he has been permitted to see the blessed fruits of his work. He was also enabled to bear his part in the glorious work of distribution in the famine period, helping to gain that high vantage ground of influence which has been so great a gain to the mission. He has seen the mission reinforced. As a crowning act he has, by his own private funds, provided it with a chapel in a favorable part of the city. And after accomplishing all these ends, and having gained a large place in the hearts of his brethren, and having challenged the respect of all intelligent men, foreigners and natives in China, by his scholarship and contributions to the literature of missions, he has laid down his armor and fallen asleep, having the highest assurances of perfect peace and even joyous trust."

"Soldier of Christ! well done;
Praise be thy new employ,
And, while eternal ages run,
Rest in thy Saviour's joy."

McIlvaine, Joshua Hall, D. D., was born, in 1815, at Lewes, Del.; graduated at the College of New Jersey, in 1836; entered Princeton Seminary in the same year, and remained there till 1840. In 1844 he organized the Westminster Church of Utica, N. Y., and was its pastor about five years. His next charge was the First Church of Rochester, of which he was pastor twelve years. In 1859 he was invited to deliver the oration before the two literary societies of the College of New Jersey, and chose for his subject, "A Nation's Right to Worship God," and in 1860 he was elected to the Chair of Belles Lettres in that Institution. This position he held until 1870, but, during his professorship he was constantly engaged in preaching on the Sabbath in the neighboring cities, and he is now pastor of the High Street Presbyterian Church, Newark, N. J.

Dr. McIlvaine is a thorough scholar, and an able and earnest preacher. He is a Fellow of the American Oriental Society, and in 1858 delivered a course of lectures on Comparative Philology, the Sanskrit languages, and the Arrowhead Inscriptions, before the Smithsonian Institution, and in 1870 he gave a course of lectures on Social Science, in the University of Pennsylvania. He is the author of "Eloquence, the Sources and Elements of its Power." He has also contributed several valuable articles to the Princeton Review.

McIlwaine, Richard, D.D., was born in Petersburg, Va., May 29th, 1834. His parents, Archibald Graham and Martha Dunn McIlwaine, were of the good old Scotch-Irish stock. He graduated at Hampden-Sidney College, with distinguished honor in his class, in June, 1853. The next two years he spent at the Virginia University. His theological training was accomplished at the Union Theological Seminary, Va., and at the college of the Free Church of Scotland in Edinburgh. He was licensed to preach in April, 1857, and in December, 1858, was ordained by East Hanover Presbytery, and installed pastor of the Amelia Church, where he remained in arduous and devoted labor until June, 1861. His next call was to the Presbyterian Church in Farmville, of which he was pastor from October, 1862, until September, 1870, when he removed to the city of Lynchburg, to take charge of the Second Presbyterian Church in that place. In July of 1872 he was elected co-ordinate Secretary and Treasurer of Home and Foreign Missions in the Southern Presbyterian Church. From July, 1882, to July, 1883, he was Secretary of Home Missions, when he resigned his position to become President of Hampden-Sidney College, to which office he had been unanimously elected by the Board of Trustees, on April 12th, 1883. On the 13th of June of this year, he was inducted into office, and delivered the inaugural address.

Dr. McIlwaine is a man of most admirable and attractive qualities. A devoted Christian, the warmest-hearted of friends, a wise and sympathetic counsellor.

full of zeal and enthusiasm in his work, and absolutely untiring in his labors, which are directed by the very best common sense, he wins the affection and admiration of all. As a preacher, his discourses are designed always to be eminently practical. He preaches to save souls, and not to win applause. His sermons, while not so eloquent and polished as those of less efficient ministers, and with fewer graces in delivery, are clear expositions of the truth, in strong and telling words, spoken with great earnestness and solemnity. As a pastor he was ever most careful, diligent, faithful and sympathetic. As Secretary of Home and Foreign Missions, and especially in the last year of his labors, he accomplished a great and enduring work for the Church. As President of Hampden-Sidney College, he entered upon his new duties under the most cheering and encouraging auspices. Dr. McLwaine was appointed by the General Assembly of 1853, a delegate to the Pan-Presbyterian Council to meet in 1851, in Belfast, Ireland.

McInnis, Richmond, D. D., was born, March 17th, 1817, in Greene county, Miss. He graduated in his literary studies at Oakland College, in 1839, and then became a student in the Theological Department of the Institution. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Clinton, September 18th, 1840. Soon after, he went to Yazoo City, and was successful in organizing a church there, of which he became pastor, continuing to be so eleven years. In 1854 he became the editor and publisher of the True Witness, at Jackson, and in connection with this enterprise, supplied the pulpit in that city for some two years. In 1857 he moved to New Orleans, and there continued the publication of the True Witness, which gained a wider circulation and became an agency of great usefulness to the Church. In 1866 the Presbytery of Central Mississippi employed Dr. McInnis as an evangelist. His long and earnest labors in this capacity resulted in great good. Feeble churches were strengthened. About twenty-five churches were organized, and it is estimated that through his evangelistic work some fourteen or fifteen hundred persons were induced to make profession of faith in Christ. As a preacher he was earnest, sound, clear in the presentation of the truth. As a presbyter he was punctual, and always kept pace with the spirit, work and enterprises of the body. He was Stated Clerk of Synod for twenty-eight years. He died, January 13th, 1881, and the announcement of his decease was the occasion of wide and heartfelt sorrow throughout the bounds of the Synod.

McIntire, Andrew, son of Samuel and Araminta McIntire, was born in New Castle county, Del., A. D., 1786. An accident which mutilated his left hand, led to his employment, in early life, in the office of the New Castle and Frenchtown Turnpike Company, at Frenchtown, in connection with the line of steamboats to Baltimore. Here he rose steadily in position until he became the General Agent, which office he held until the Company decided to run a train on the Lord's day, when he tendered his resignation, much to the regret of the Company, who offered to employ a man in his place on that day. In the Spring of 1833 he removed to his farm near Elkton, Md., where the remainder of his life was spent in farming. In 1831 he united with Pencader Church. Upon the organization of the Elkton Church, May 3d, 1833, he transferred his membership from Pencader, and was at once elected an elder and a trustee, both of which offices he held until his death, January, 1851, discharging their duties with exemplary fidelity and success. Mr. McIntire was a man of extraordinary mental power. Few men in the community surpassed him in genuine intelligence upon all topics of public interest. His favorite reading and study was the Bible and such books as illustrated and explained it. He was a lover of good men, and delighted to entertain them. His religion was not demonstrative, but it was a deep perennial fountain. To the eye he was always the same, on the week-day or the Sabbath, and the man of firm principle, who needed not to consult his feelings as to his duty, but simply to ask what is duty? He was noted for his punctuality, in all seasons and all weather, in the services of God's house. He commanded the unwavering confidence of the community in his integrity; "his word was his bond;" men relied upon him instinctively, and no man had ever occasion to regret his trust.

MacIntosh, John Samuel, D. D., son of Joseph Mason and Maria (Taylor) MacIntosh, was born in the city of Philadelphia, September 30th, 1839. His father died when he was quite young. In his early years he was a scholar in the Sabbath school of the First Reformed Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia, of which the Rev. Samuel B. Wylie, D. D., was then pastor, his mother being a communicant in that Church. He was for some time a pupil in the Preparatory Department of the University of Pennsylvania, of which the Rev. Samuel W. Crawford, D. D., was the Principal, and also in the classical school of Mr. Thomas D. James. The condition of his health determined his mother, in accordance with the advice of the late Dr. McClelland, her physician, to visit Ireland and spend a few years there. She accordingly went to Belfast, and subsequently relinquished the plan of returning to this country. Her son successfully continued his studies in Queen's University, Belfast, taking scholarships from year to year, until he had completed his undergraduate course. From Belfast he went to Glasgow, and there pursued a course of theological and ethical study, which he subsequently completed at Edinburgh. He then spent several years of study in Germany, at Erlangen, Tubingen, Halle and Berlin, during which, besides theological and philosophical studies, he completed a full course of medicine and law. From Germany he went to Scotland, with the intention of entering the ministry of the Free Church of Scotland. But he was induced by the solicitation of friends to visit Ireland and to supply the Church of Connor, noted for the revival of 1859. The parish was a large one, containing about one thousand families, but his labors were so acceptable that he received a unanimous call. This call he concluded to accept, and he was accordingly ordained and installed November 5th, 1862, at the age of twenty-three years. Here he ministered for five years, until called, in December, 1867, to the May Street Church, Belfast, as the colleague and successor of Dr. Henry Cooke, the most distinguished man of his day in the Irish Presbyterian Church. In this charge he labored with great acceptance and success for more than thirteen years. In 1881 he visited this country, and finally accepted the call of the McIntyre, Rev. John, was born in August, 1750, in the parish of Lismore and Appin, Argyleshire, Scotland. After being engaged in business some years he embarked for the United States, and landed at Fort Johnson, Brunswick county, N. C., November 11th, 1791. In his fifty-third year he felt a strong desire to preach the gospel, and, having laboriously pursued his studies, he was licensed to preach, September 25th, 1807, by the Orange Presbytery, and sent on a missionary tour to the Marlborough District, S. C. After laboring for two years as a licentiate he was ordained to the full work of the gospel ministry, July 1st, 1809. The field of Mr. McIntyre's labors was mostly in the county of Robeson, N. C. For nearly thirty years he supplied the four churches of Philadelphia, Bethel, Lumberbridge and St. Paul's; but in 1832 he relinquished his charge of the Church of Philadelphia, and confined himself to the remaining three. He labored with untiring assiduity and very considerable success, until 1838, when, by reason of the infirmities of advancing age, he resigned his charge. He died November 17th, 1852, in the one hundred and third year of his age. Mr. McIntyre was pre-eminently a man of a devout spirit. He never shrank from any duty. He was an earnest believer in the doctrines set forth in our Confession of Faith, and was jealous of any departure from them. Though he came into the ministry at so late a period in life, and under many disadvantages, he rendered very important service to the Church, and doubtless will be found among those who have turned many to righteousness.

McKay, Neill, D. D., is descended on both sides from a race of sterling Presbyterians. His father, grandfather and great-grandfather were ruling elders. He was born in Cumberland county, N. C. (now Hamett), February 11th, 1816; graduated at Union College, N. Y., in 1838; finished his theological course at Columbia Seminary, S. C., in 1841, and the same year was licensed and ordained by Fayetteville Presbytery. His first and only charge consisted of Tirzah, Sardis and Buffalo churches, in the same Presbytery, and his connection with the last named continued about thirty years; but he has supplied a number of other churches, as their necessities and his time would permit, and has been abundant in ministerial labors. He has ever been warmly attached to the welfare of the Church of his nativity, and an uncompromising defender of her faith. He has been much devoted to the prosperity of his native State, a constant and effective advocate of education, an active and influential Trustee of the State University, and was one of the original movers in the establishment of the North Carolina Presbyterian. He has freely labored for the moral, mental and material advancement of the colored race, and is ready to co-operate liberally in any possible plans to this end, availing himself of every opportunity to preach the gospel to this people, and to the poor of all races, without charge. Dr.

JOHN SAMUEL MACINTOSH, D. D.

Second Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia, over which he was duly installed by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, March 17th, 1881. Dr. MacIntosh has had rare facilities for literary and intellectual culture, and has industriously improved them. He devotes himself, with great energy, mainly to the interests of his large congregation, but is always ready to assist his brethren and to help forward every good work. His ability as a preacher is recognized and acknowledged, and his sterling qualities as a man have gained for him the respect and confidence of the community, whilst his sympathizing faithfulness as a pastor has greatly endeared him to the flock of which he is bishop and overseer. He received the honorary degree of D. D. from Princeton College in 1883.

McKay lives in the region of his birth, an intense North Carolinian, a conspicuous and respected figure in the history of the State, a sturdy champion of all her interests, but recognizing the fact that the field of Christian work is the world, his heart, his worldly means and the high resources of his mind are consecrated to the gospel agency, without respect to race or country.

McKee, Redick, the youngest child of John and Sarah Redick McKee, was born in McKeesport, Pa., December 7th, 1800. In 1817 he united with the First Presbyterian Church, Pittsburg; the next year he removed to Wheeling, Va., and resided there for thirty years, as a prominent merchant, closely identified with all its leading interests. He established the first Sabbath school in Wheeling, and remained its superintendent for more than twenty-five years. He was also active in the organization of the Presbyterian Church there, and was elected a ruling elder in it in 1823. He assisted Dr. Hallock in organizing the great American Tract Society, in New York, in 1824-5. In 1827 he was selected by the General Assembly, as one of thirty Trustees, for the location and organization of the Western Theological Seminary, at Allegheny city, Pa. In 1850 he was appointed, by President Fillmore, as Chief of the Board of Indian Commissioners to California. Retiring from that office three years later, he engaged in mercantile business in San Francisco, where he assisted in the organization of Calvary Church, in 1854, and served as an elder under the ministries of Rev. Drs. Scott, Wadsworth and Hemphill. In 1873 he was appointed one of the representative delegates of the General Assembly to the next meeting of the English and Irish Assembly, but was prevented, by business, from going abroad.

Mr. McKee has, for some years, resided in Washington city, and, until incapacitated by almost total loss of sight, has been frequently employed by successive Secretaries of the Treasury, on confidential missions for the examination of sub-treasuries, and the inspection or reorganization of National Banks. He has a happy blending of indomitable energy, and strong but gentle moral attributes, and a boundless generosity. For more than sixty years he has been a man of mark, an influential and respected citizen, a leader in good works wherever his abode has been, and a noble example of the power and beauty of the Christian life.

McKennon, James Wilson, D.D., the son of Colonel William McKennon, was born in Washington, Pa., September 2d, 1804. He graduated in Washington College, in 1822; was admitted to the Bar, and practiced his profession for a short time in Millersburg, Ohio. Dedicating himself to the work of the ministry, he studied theology with John Anderson, D.D., of Upper Buffalo Church, Pa.; was licensed by Washington Presbytery in 1828, and ordained and installed the following year, as pastor over the churches of Lower Buffalo and West Liberty, Pa. Here he labored until 1835, when he took charge of the Church in Indianapolis, Ind., where his labors were crowned with marked success, but owing to infirm health, he had to resign. After spending some time in traveling, he took charge of the Church in Florence, Pa., and he subsequently preached in Elizabethtown, Lower Ten Mile, and Frankfort Springs churches. He also engaged in teaching for some time in Wheeling and at Woundsville, Va., and as rector in the preparatory department and Adjunct Professor of Languages in Washington College.

In all the positions Dr. McKennon occupied, as well as in all the relations and circumstances of his life, he never failed to concentrate the affectionate confidence and abiding friendship of all with whom he came in contact. He was an earnest and impressive preacher. His character was remarkable, in candor, benevolence and meekness, in simplicity and directness of purpose, in compassionate sympathy and in the fidelity of friendship, which was on the alert to defend the absent and to admonish his intimate friends of their faults. In the strength of his faith and the fervor of his zeal as a Christian, and in his indifference to the applause of men, he was a model for imitation.

McKennon, Thomas, M.D., was born at Washington, Pa., May 21st, 1825, and there he still resides, being now the senior and leading physician of the place. The father of Dr. McKennon was the Hon. Thomas M. T. McKennon, one of the most honorable men and distinguished lawyers of Pennsylvania, and a no less distinguished member of the United States House of Representatives during four and a half terms, and, for a time, Secretary of the Interior, under President Fillmore's administration. A senior brother of the Dr., the Hon. William McKennan, U.S.D., is now Judge of the Third Circuit Court of the United States, embracing in its jurisdiction the States of Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Delaware.

Dr. McKennan is a graduate of Washington College, Pa., of the class of 1812, and also of the Medical University of Pennsylvania, of the class of 1816. He made a profession of faith in Christ in the Spring of 1856, in the First Presbyterian Church of Washington, Pa., under the pastoral care of the Rev. James I. Brownson, D.D., and since 1859 has been an efficient ruling elder in the same church. He has frequently represented his session in Presbytery and Synod, and in 1863 was one of the commissioners of the Presbytery of Washington to the O. S. General Assembly, which held its sessions in Peoria, Illinois. In that body he served efficiently on several committees, and also attracted attention upon the floor of the house, especially by his clear, sensible, sympathetic and forcible speech in behalf of the Relief Fund for disabled ministers and the families of deceased ministers.

He is an ardent and efficient friend of education, having for many years held the offices of School Director and Trustee of Washington and Jefferson College; Trustee of the Washington Female Seminary; Trustee of the Washington Cemetery Company; Manager of the Presbyterian Reform School at Morgansa, and Director of the Western Theological Seminary at Allegheny. Though shunning political life, he was chosen by the people of Pennsylvania a member of the Electoral College, in the Presidential election of 1880, as his brother had been in 1860, and his father in 1840 and 1848.

But of all the spheres in which the Doctor has been called to act, that which most engages his heart is the work of the Church and of Christ. He is thoroughly attached to the doctrines and order of the Presbyterian Church, and earnestly devoted to its schemes for the propagation of the gospel. But with broad charity he is ready to cast his influence in favor of every wise effort for moral reform and the evangelization of the world. He is a Presbyterian, but still more a Christian.

McKenna, Rev. William, was probably a native of Drawyers, Del. He was licensed by New Castle Presbytery before May, 1752, and was sent by the Synod of Philadelphia to supply North and South Mountain, Timber Grove, North River and Cook's Creek, and at John Hinson's in Virginia. He spent seven or eight months in the South. Before May, 1756, he was settled at Wilmington and Red Clay; he resigned the former in 1794, and continued in charge of the latter till his death. Dr. Martin says, "he was venerable for his years and his piety."

McKinley, Daniel, D.D., was born in Carlisle, Pa., December 7th, 1800; graduated at Dickinson College, in 1821; studied theology at Princeton; was licensed by the Presbytery of Carlisle, in 1827, and was soon after installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Bedford, Pa., which was gradually strengthened under his ministry. In 1833 he became pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church in Carlisle, which he served about five years, and his labors in that field were eminently successful. He then became an agent of the Board of Foreign Missions, and for upwards of three years served it with a vigor, efficiency and success which told powerfully upon the progress of the cause. In 1841 Dr. McKinley was chosen pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Chambersburg, and continued this relation for about nine years, during which he was eminently faithful, and his labors were greatly blessed. In 1850 he took charge of the Sixth Church, a new enterprise in Pittsburgh, and continued there one year. After this he was engaged by the Presbytery of Carlisle to undertake the work of Church extension within its bounds, and his labors in behalf of this enterprise contributed greatly to its success. After a year in this service he became agent and evangelist of the Board of Domestic Missions, in which also he was eminently successful. He died, December 7th, 1855. Dr. McKinley's life was marked by eminent consecration, zeal and success in his Master's work. He was, indeed, an exemplary Christian, and most devoted minister. His piety made a deep impression upon all with whom he had intercourse, and his efforts to save souls filled multitudes with thankfulness and praise.

McKinney, David, D. D., was a son of Isaac and Jane (Fleming) McKinney, and was born in Kishacoquillas, Millin county, Pa., October 23d, 1795. He graduated at Jefferson College, Canonsburg, Pa., in 1821; entered Princeton Seminary the same year, and remained in that Institution over two years. Licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, April 23d, 1824, he was installed pastor of the Church at Erie, Pa., April 13th, 1825, where he labored assiduously and successfully until he was released from that charge, January, 1st, 1828. Subsequently he removed to Meadville, Pa., where he taught in Meadville Academy, and was a Professor in Allegheny College from October, 1828, to October, 1830. Was installed, December 19th, 1831, pastor over the churches of Sinking Creek and Spring Creek, in the Presbytery of Huntingdon, where he labored until released, June 8th, 1841, and June 30th, in the same year, became pastor of the Church at Hollidaysburg, Pa., where he labored over eleven years until released, October 1st, 1852.

In 1852 he became founder and editor of The Presbyterian Banner, located in Philadelphia. In 1855 he removed with his paper to Pittsburgh, purchased the Presbyterian Advocate and merged the Banner into it. In February, 1864, he sold the Banner, and, until 1868, edited The Family Treasure (afterwards called Our Monthly), a popular monthly magazine. From 1866 to 1869 he was a co-editor and proprietor of The Northwestern Presbyterian, published in Chicago. At the same time, in 1866, he was appointed Librarian and Treasurer of the Board of Colportage of the Synod of Pittsburg and Allegheny, a position he held until 1874, and a part of which, the treasurership, he held until his decease. He died May 25th, 1879, in the firm and blessed hope of the gospel.

Dr. McKinney was a man of decided ability, a sound theologian, an effective preacher, a faithful and laborious pastor, a proficient in all ecclesiastical affairs, and of admirable business qualifications. He was a clear thinker, a ready debater, a vigorous writer; in action, bold, earnest and especially persistent; a faithful defender, an honest and loving servant of the Church of Christ; a Presbyterian from deep and firm conviction of its Scriptural doctrines and polity. He was both a Director and Trustee of the Western Theological Seminary at Allegheny, and devoted much time and labor to its interests.

McKinney, Mordecai, Esq., was born, it is believed, in 1796, in Cumberland county, Pa. His early studies were pursued at Dickinson College, Carlisle, where he spent six years, graduating while quite a youth. He began the study of law in the office of Judge Duncan, of Carlisle, and having removed to Harrisburg, in 1817, completed his studies in the office of Hon. Amos Ellmaker, the Attorney General of the State, and was admitted to the Bar in May, 1817. In 1821 he was appointed District Attorney of Union county, by Attorney General Elder. In 1827 Governor Shultz gave him the appointment of Associate Judge of Dauphin county, in which position he presided, in the absence of the President Judge, at the trial of several civil and criminal cases. Somewhat later, he turned his attention to the compilation of law, and published "McKinney's Digest," and several other works of value to the profession. Later still in life, he published a work of labor, research and value, called "Our Government," an explanatory statement of the system of government in this country in its various departments, of the State and the Nation. He was a man of extended and accurate knowledge in his profession, an honest and conscientious counsellor, but so modest and retiring that he shrank from the public contests of the Bar. He was highly esteemed by his professional brethren. In 1855 he was elected an elder of the Church at Harrisburg, in which office he served for thirteen years, leaving an untarnished record.

Mr. McKinney principally wrought his mission in the world as a Christian. His life as a man and a citizen was completely transfused by his religion, sanctified and elevated by it. He was modest and unobtrusive in manners, free from all guile, a man of sterling honesty and conscientiousness. He was remarkably free from all taint of selfishness and all pride. Spending all his years in comparative poverty, no more contented, happy and trusting man walked the streets of the city. As a citizen he was faithful to all obligations, a friend of all that was venerable and good, a defender of law, and a supporter of all that tended to the welfare of society.

Mr. McKinney was distinguished as a philanthropist. He was an unwavering friend of the poor. Unable to give of wealth to their necessities, he gave what is often far more acceptable—time and attention, and his most hearty sympathy. A true-hearted man, like the old Roman, he counted nothing foreign to him that was human, giving in his genuine unselfishness, his faithful and earnest devotion to those who, by many, were passed by as the outcasts and Pariahs of society. He knew no ambition beyond the simple doing of right; and though so modest and unassuming in all things else, in this he was as brave a man as ever faced an enemy. He could not be turned from his course by any notions of policy or expediency. There was a nobleness about his loyalty to principle; to the cause of the poor, the oppressed, and the despised, that might well command universal admiration. And touching as was the tribute to his worth, when, on the day of his burial, the officers of the Court and members of the Bar, headed by the Presiding Judge, passed before his coffin, taking their last silent look, and giving their unspoken fare-well to their old friend and associate, it was by no means so noble and so impressive a testimony to his goodness and worth, as when the long procession of parents and children from the colored population of the city passed, and with the touching eloquence of sobs and tears, told that they had lost their best earthly friend.

McKnight, Rev. Charles, was taken under the care of New Brunswick Presbytery, June 23d, 1741, and was licensed probably in the Fall. He was ordained pastor of Staten Island and Baskingridge, October 12th, 1742. He was installed, October 16th, 1744, at Cranbury and Allentown. Mr. McKnight was dismissed from Cranbury in October, 1756, and Burden's Town obtained one-fourth of his time in 1758. He was called, May 28th, 1766, to Middletown Point and Shrewsbury, and in the Fall Trenton asked for him. He was dismissed from Allentown in October, and accepted the call to Middletown Point, Shark River and Shrewsbury, April 21st, 1767. He was seized by the British, and his church was burned. He died soon after his release, in 1778.

McKnight, William James, D. D., was born in Mecklenburg county, North Carolina, December 21th, 1829. He graduated at Hanover College, and studied theology at Columbia, Princeton and Danville Seminaries. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Transylvania, April, 1855; ordained by the same body, April, 1860; Professor of Latin and Greek in Austin College, Texas, 1856-57; Principal of the Grammar School of Centre College, 1857-60; Professor of Belles Lettres and Political Economy in the same Institution, 1860-64; stated supply of Harmony and Mt. Pleasant churches, Ky., 1857-61; pastor at Danville, Ky., 1861-70; pastor at Avondale, Cincinnati, Ohio, 1870-73; pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, Springfield, Ohio, 1873-79; and since 1880 has had pastoral charge of the First Presbyterian Church, New Brunswick, N. J. Dr. McKnight is a gentleman of winning address, scholarly attainments and admirable Christian character. As a preacher, he is solemn, instructive, impressive. He has been much blessed in his ministry, and is beloved by his brethren.

McKnight, Dr. John, was born near Carlisle, Pa., October 1st, 1754. He graduated at Princeton in 1773. His theological studies were pursued under Dr. Cooper. After ministering to a congregation in Virginia, from 1775 till 1783, he was settled over Lower Marsh Creek Church, in Adams county, Pa. December 2d, 1789, he was installed colleague pastor with Dr. Rodgers, in New York. In 1791 he was elected Moderator of the General Assembly. After twenty years' service in New York, in consequence of new arrangements made in the collegiate charge, he resigned, April, 1809. The Church of Rocky Spring solicited him to become their pastor, but as his health was delicate, he consented to be a stated supply only, at the same time declining other flattering invitations in the State of New York. In 1815 he accepted the Presidency of Dickinson College, but finding its financial embarrassments in a hopeless condition, resigned in a year. He now retired to a farm, and preached as opportunity offered, until his death, October 21st, 1823, in the seventieth year of his age.

Dr. McKnight combined the dignity of a clergyman with the urbanity of a gentleman. As a preacher, he was Biblical, didactic and dispassionate, without being dull. He appears to have been a noteworthy exception to the rule that "a prophet is not without honor save in his own country." Six discourses on Faith and several occasional sermons were given by him to the world.

McKnight, Hon. Robert, son of William McKnight, merchant, was born in Pittsburg, Pa., in 1820. He graduated at the College of New Jersey, in 1839. After the study of law in the office of Richard Biddle, Esq., he was admitted to the Bar of Allegheny county, Pa., in 1842. He was a member of the Common Council of Pittsburg in the years 1848, 1849, 1850, and during the last two was President of the Council. He was elected to the House of Representatives of the United States in 1858, and in the Thirty-sixth Congress served on the Committee of Elections. He was re-elected to the Thirty-seventh Congress, and was a member of the Committee of Foreign Affairs. This committee reported the bill for the recognition of Hayti and Liberia, in favor of which Mr. McKnight addressed the House, and which became a law. For his services in behalf of the Liberian Republic he received a token of thanks from the three Commissioners of Liberia. In the same Congress he was placed on a joint commission with two Senators and two Representatives, Captain Dupont, U. S. N., and Major General Gareschie, U. S. A., to examine and report as to the compensation of all officers of government, civil, naval, and military.

Mr. McKnight was elected and ordained ruling elder in the Central Presbyterian Church of Allegheny, in March, 1857. He transferred his membership to the North Church of Allegheny in 1868, and was elected elder in that year. He still serves in this office in the North Church. He was a commissioner to the General Assembly in Pittsburg in 1865, in St. Louis in 1866, and in Albany in 1868. In 1862 he was elected Director of the Theological Seminary at Allegheny. In 1866 he was appointed on the Joint Committee on Reunion of the Presbyterian Church. In 1868 he was appointed on the Committee on Reunion of the Old and New School and United Presbyterian churches. In 1869, with the Rev. Drs. Beatty and Musgrave, he represented the Assembly of his own Church in the General Assembly, then in session in the Church of the Covenant, in the city of New York. By the General Assembly of 1869 he was appointed on the committee to investigate the affairs of the Theological Seminary at Danville, Ky., and in the discharge of this duty visited Kentucky.

At the adjourned meeting of the General Assembly in Pittsburg, Mr. McKnight was appointed on the committee to inquire and report on the best means of raising and distributing funds for the Reunited Presbyterian Church. He was appointed as delegate to the General Assembly at Chicago, in 1877; and at the General Assembly at Saratoga, in 1883, was appointed as one of the Commissioners to the Pan-Presbyterian Council at Belfast, Ireland, in 1884.

McLanahan, Rev. Samuel, is the son of Mr. James Craig McLanahan and Mrs. Sarah McLanahan, daughter of Dr. Stewart Kennedy, of Chambersburg, Pa. He was born in Franklin county, Pa., a few miles from Greencastle, on the 12th of February, 1853. He united with the Presbyterian Church of Greencastle when fifteen years old. After two years spent at the Chambersburg Academy he entered the Sophomore Class of Princeton, N. J., in 1870. There he was graduated in 1873, and delivered the honorary Metaphysical Oration at the Commencement. He decided to study for the ministry; entered immediately upon his theological course, spending two years at Union Seminary and one year at Princeton, N. J., where he was graduated in 1876. Having been licensed by the Presbytery of Carlisle, June 14th, 1876, he accepted an invitation to supply the church at Waynesboro, Franklin county, and began to preach there the following October. After six months' service he received and accepted a call from the congregation, and on June 19th, 1877, was ordained and installed pastor of the Waynesboro Church, by the Presbytery of Carlisle.

In December, 1879, he was invited, by the committee which had in charge the erection of a new church on Lafayette Square, Baltimore, to come to that city, and engage in the work of gathering a congregation and organizing a new church. Having accepted this invitation, he moved to Baltimore, February 2d, 1880. February 23d, 1880, the church was organized, and he was called to the pastorate of it, and installed by the Presbytery of Baltimore, May 4th, 1880. The Lafayette Square Church had received, during the first three years of its history, two hundred and eighty members, and has now on its roll two hundred and thirty-three names. Mr. McLanahan is a diligent student, a forcible and popular preacher, and a successful pastor.

McLane, James Woods, D. D., was born in Charlotte, N. C., May 23d, 1801. He graduated at Yale College, in which he took a high stand in his class, in 1828; studied theology at Andover Seminary, and after being ordained in 1835, remained at Andover a year, preaching frequently to vacant congregations. He subsequently became pastor of the Madison Street Presbyterian Church in New York, and continued so eight years, blessed in his labors. He was then called to the First Presbyterian Church in Williamsburg, Long Island, where he was zealous and successful until failing health obliged him to resign the charge. He died February 26th, 1864. Dr. McLane was a godly, conscientious, whole-souled Christian, ardently devoted to the Church. He was a sound and earnest preacher of the gospel. Firmly attached to the doctrines of grace, and abhorring the rationalistic and infidelizing views of the German School of Theology, he resisted its beginnings wherever he met it, and made open, bold and uncompromising defence of the truth as it is in the word of God, which was his ultimate arbiter in religious discussions.

McLaurin, John, editor of the North Carolina Presbyterian, Wilmington, N. C., the organ of the Synod of North Carolina, is of Scotch extraction. He was born at Wilmington, January 7th, 1832. On January 22d, 1855, he joined the First Presbyterian Church in that city; was ordained a ruling elder of the same, February 2d, 1868, and has been ever since and is now an active member of its Session. He is a devoted, positive Presbyterian, a good presbyter, an active Church worker, a useful citizen, and a man of fine character and influence. Engaged in mercantile pursuits until November, 1871, Mr. McLaurin became business manager of the North Carolina Presbyterian, and in March, 1874, its editor. Under his energetic and judicious management the paper has been a success. It is faithful to the old landmarks, conservative, practical and evangelical, and has steadily advanced in worth and acceptability. It is doing good service for the cause of Christianity in general, and Presbyterianism in particular.

McLaren, John Finlay, D. D., was born in Manlius, N. Y., February 7th, 1803. He graduated at Union College in 1825, and studied theology three years in Princeton Seminary. He was ordained by the Associate Reformed Presbytery, Caledonia, January 7th, 1830; was stated supply at Geneva, N. Y., 1828, and pastor, 1830-45; editor of Christian Magazine, 1832-43; pastor at Hagerstown, Md., 1845-46; pastor of the First Associate Reformed Church, Pittsburg, Pa., 1846-51; Agent of the Board of Domestic Missions, 1851-55; President of the Western University of Pennsylvania, 1855-58; stated supply of Pine Creek Church, 1855-62; and stated supply in the Presbytery of Detroit, 1868-74. During the later years of his life he was a resident of Princeton, N. J., where he died, March 14th, 1883, at the house of his son-in-law, Dr. A. A. Hodge.

Dr. McLaren was a diligent, faithful, and successful minister of the gospel, preaching with great clearness and earnestness the great doctrines of the gospel. He used the press also very efficiently, seeking always to impress Scriptural truth on the minds of his readers. Thus busying himself with the work of his Master, a long and useful life passed away, and closed in peace and in the blessed hope of an immortal life.

McLean, Charles G., D.D., was born in the county of Antrim, Ireland, in 1787. His father was a surgeon in the British army, and died in early manhood, on the coast of Africa. His mother afterwards married Rev. James Gray, D.D., and came with him to this country; Dr. Gray was for many years the honored pastor of Spruce Street Church, Philadelphia. Under him Dr. McLean studied preparatory to entering the University of Pennsylvania, from which he graduated. He was trained in theology under the celebrated Dr. John M. Mason, who was his model as a preacher and gentleman. For twenty-seven years he had charge of the Associate Reformed Church of Gettysburg, Pa.; afterwards, for eight years, of the Reformed Church in Fort Plain, N. Y. His health failing, he came, in 1852, to Indianapolis, Ind., and founded "The McLean Female Institute." He died July 4th, 1860, leaving the Institution in charge of his associate and son-in-law, Charles N. Todd. He united with the Indianapolis Presbytery. He possessed rare pulpit gifts, a wonderful power and wealth of language, and a brilliant elocution. Always preached without notes, but with thorough preparation. He possessed much discrimination, independence and originality. In his public efforts he was remarkable for securing and holding the attention of his hearers. He was a superior reader and unusually gifted in prayer. Dr. Mason said he knew but few who could compare with him. He never had a hobby and never adopted an opinion because others did. His plans were practical rather than speculative. As a pastor he was laborious and faithful, deeply interested in all the families of his flock. The widow and orphan found in him a warm friend. The young were drawn to him. There was a seeming playfulness about him, a blending of wit and humor that rendered him entertaining and attractive. His faith was remarkable; it kept him buoyant and hopeful in the darkest scenes. He scarcely put a limit to the power of prayer. He could not say enough of the goodness and mercy of God. Though for eighteen months his body was encumbered by paralysis, his mind was unclouded, and seemed to beam forth with more than usual brilliancy; he talked familiarly of death, and waited its approach with cheerful hope.

McLean, John, D. D., pastor of the Church at Beloit, Wis., was born in Waterville, N. Y., September 3d, 1837. He graduated from Hamilton College, in 1862, and studied theology at Auburn Seminary. He was Tutor in Hamilton College, 1865-6. He was ordained and installed pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, Galena, Ill., in 1866, and continued in this relation until 1872, from which date he has had charge of the congregation in which he now labors. He is a faithful and successful preacher, and beloved by the people to whom he ministers. Dr. McLean has published sermons, speeches and essays.

cer, Pa. He graduated at Union College, N. Y., and after teaching and studying theology five or six years, he was licensed by the Northern Presbytery of the Reformed Presbyterian Church. In 1833 he was ordained pastor of Galway Church, to succeed his father, and continued there until 1838, although he ministered part of the time at Schenectady, in connection with Galway. In 1838 he changed his ecclesiastical connection, and the same year took charge of the Fourth Presbyterian Church of Pittsburg, where he ministered four years. He then filled the pulpit of the Church at Westfield, Pa., with abundant evidence of God's blessing during twelve years, and subsequently, for twenty-four years, served the Church of Poland, Ohio, where his ministrations were marked with distinguished ability and success. He died in October, 1882.

Dr. MacMaster was a learned and able theologian. In the pulpit he was "a workman that needed not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the Word of Truth." His preaching was doctrinal, practical and edifying. His pulpit reading of the Scriptures was peculiarly solemn and impressive. His prayers were remarkable for their earnestness,unction and power. As a pastor, he was faithful in visiting the sick, comforting the mourning, and catechising and instructing the children of the Church. As a presbyter, he was thoroughly versed in our Form of Church Government, and always exerted a strong influence in Presbytery, synod, and in the General Assembly, where his voice was frequently heard. Dr. MacMaster was thoroughly orthodox, firm for the right, cordial and genial in his friendships, and always the true Christian gentleman.

MacMaster, Erasmus D., D.D., the son of Rev. Dr. Gilbert and Jane (Brown) MacMaster, was born at Mercer, Pa., February 4th, 1806; graduated at Union College, in 1827; studied theology under his father, and was licensed by the Northern Presbytery of the Reformed Presbyterian Church, June 16th, 1829. He was installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Ballstown, N. Y., by Albany Presbytery having changed his church relation. This relation, which lasted seven years, was dissolved, April 24th, 1835, by reason of the concern he felt for the great West and the education of its sons.

In 1838 Dr. MacMaster was elected President of Hanover College, Indiana. August 13th, 1845, he was inaugurated President of Miami University, Oxford, Ohio, which position he resigned in 1849, subsequently he was offered the Professorship of Systematic Theology in the Seminary at New Albany, Ind., which he accepted, reluctantly. He was elected by the Assembly, June 2d, 1866, to the Chair of Theology in the Northwestern Theological Seminary, Chicago, Ill., and died at his residence in that city, December 10th, 1866. His death was one of triumph.

Dr. MacMaster was justly distinguished for his eminent talents, and his varied and his extensive acquirements. As a preacher and a theologian he was confessedly one of the foremost men of our Church. He was a true Christian gentleman. All who made his acquaintance were deeply impressed with the dignity, solemnity and excellence of his character, and with the uniform kindness of his deportment. Among his most prominent traits were profound humility, a manly independence of thought and action upon questions of truth and duty, decided convictions upon all practical questions, and an inflexible purpose to do what was right, when he had determined what that was. But perhaps his most marked characteristic was his sympathy with man as man. Such was his estimate of the soul, its future capabilities and immortal destiny, that he made little account of the accidental differences distinguishing one from another in this world. In his planning and prayers for the good of others he looked upon the race as on an equality before God and in view of law, and he labored for the souls of men as lost and ruined, but redeemed by Christ, with a singleness of purpose and elevation of aim rarely attained. With an intense yearning he looked and longed for the day when civil, intellectual and religious freedom should be universal, and, if his aims were too high to be realized during his life, he so impressed his views upon hundreds of his pupils that they will aid in their realization hereafter.

McMillan, John, D.D., was born at Fagg's Manor, Chester county, Pa., November 11th, 1752. After being fitted for college at Fagg's Manor Academy, by Dr. Samuel Blair, he graduated at Nassau Hall, Princeton, under Dr. Witherspoon, in 1772. While at college he was one day so impressed by his solitary reflections of truth and duty that he became the subject of a sudden conversion, and, in consequence, upon graduating, studied theology with Dr. Robert Smith, of Pequea. He was licensed by New Castle Presbytery, in 1774, at the age of twenty-two, and performed missionary service in Maryland, Western Virginia and Western Pennsylvania. In 1775 he organized the churches of Pigeon Creek and Chartiers, over which he was ordained the following year by the Presbytery of Donegal. He was soon after married, and removed his worldly all to his field of labor on pack-horses. He lived in a log cabin, and was a stranger to all the luxuries of life. (For a representation of this humble dwelling see p. 508.) He established a school, which became the nucleus of Jefferson College. From this theological school issued a hundred young men, many of whom afterwards became distinguished preachers. He died November 16th, 1833, aged eighty-one.

As a preacher, Dr. McMillan was zealous and powerful. His style partook of the athletic ruggedness of his person. Though he wrote and memorized his sermons, he gave little attention to the beauties of rhetoric. He lashed with unsparing hand whatever he conceived to be vices or weaknesses worthy of reproof. Widespread and powerful revivals occurred under his ministry. He witnessed, without approval, the falling and jerking exercises which deformed the great revival of 1800. His own people he took care to indoctrinate thoroughly. When the Presbytery of Redstone was attached to the Synod of Virginia, Dr. McMillan's relations to his native Synod, of course, ceased, but it is pleasant to reflect that the early labors of this patriarch of Western Pennsylvania were fostered by the Synod of Philadelphia.

McMillan, Rev. Neil, was one of the three who constituted the Presbytery of Alabama. The Rev. Robert Nall, in his discourse entitled "The Dead of the Synod of Alabama," observes, "I suppose I may safely say that he was the first Presbyterian minister to remove to our State." Mr. McMillan came to that region as early as 1815. For a series of years he ministered to four churches, Uchee Valley and Escambia, in Florida, and Union and Euphronia, in Monroe county, Ala. As long as he lived he kept these churches together, but after his death, in 1837, they disappeared, with the exception of Uchee Valley, from the Presbyterian roll. Presbytery, in recording Mr. McMillan's death, says, "He came to this country at the time of its earliest settlement, and has labored long and faithfully in the ministry, enduring hardships, privations, and sometimes poverty and danger, too, from love to the cause of his Heavenly Master. His labor is ended, his warfare accomplished, and the victory, we trust, achieved, and he is now enjoying the rewards of his labors."

McMillan, Rev. William, was licensed by the Presbytery of New Castle, September 23d, 1724, after which he subscribed a declaration of his adherence to the Westminster Confession, being the first who is recorded to have done so. He was ordered to supply the people of Virginia during his abode there. It is probable that it was Rehoboth, on Poconoke, in Coventry parish, with Accomac county, which contained "the people of Virginia."

McMordie, Rev. Robert, was ordained by Donegal Presbytery, in 1754, pastor of Upper Marsh Creek and Round Hill, and released from the charge in January, 1761. He accepted, in 1762, a call to Hanover. In 1765 he joined the Second Philadelphia Presbytery. They sent him the next year South, and the Synod sent him, in 1772, to Virginia and Carolina. In May, 1777, he was called to Tinkling Spring, New Dublin, Reedy Creek and Fourth Creek. He went South again in 1784. Mr. McMordie was a chaplain in the war of Independence, and a member of the Order of the Cincinnati. He died May 22d, 1796.

McNair, Evander, D. D., entered the ministry from Union Theological Seminary, Virginia, before reaching his majority, and for half a century has been devoted exclusively to his profession, half the time in his native State, North Carolina, the other half in the Southwest. His field of labor in Carolina covered a large extent of country, from the sources of Little River to its junction with the Cape Fear, and east of the same to Black River, including Bethesda, Cypress, Long Street, Cina Grove, Mount Pisgah, Sardis and Bluff churches, several of which he organized. He was looked for at the Spring and Fall communions of adjacent churches, especially Tirza, Buffalo, Euphronia and Union, with almost as much certainty as the pastor of the same.

Here his influence still abides, and the recollection of him will never fade from the memory of those who loved him as friend, counsellor and guide, while his abundant labors, faithful and efficient ministry, will remain among the most cherished traditions of these churches.

In Alabama, Texas and Arkansas Dr. McNair's labors were signally blessed. His commanding presence, physical and moral courage, gentlemanly bearing, coupled with his gifts and graces as a preacher, gave him a conceded advantage in a new and frontier country. Popular at home and abroad, he is specially so with young men, even with the careless, reckless and wayward, and can approach such on the subject of religion without embarrassment or offence. His preaching is direct, earnest, awakening, especially in times of revival. His tender sympathy, in the home of trial, trouble, sorrow and death, has endeared him to many who have enjoyed his pastoral care.

McNair, John, D. D., was born near Newtown, Bucks county, Pa., May 2nd, 1806; graduated at Jefferson College, in 1828; studied theology at Princeton; was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, in 1831, and was ordained as an evangelist by the Presbytery of Erie, November 7th, 1833.

and unaffected, lucid and easily comprehended. As a logician he took a high rank, and consequently was an able debater.

McNair, Rev. Malcolm, was born in Robeson county, N. C., August 24th, 1776. He was for a while a member of Dr. McCorkle's school in Rowan, but finished his course, classical and theological, under Dr. Caldwell, of Guilford, at whose school he became hopefully pious. He was licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of Orange, March 27th, 1801. On June 2d, 1803, he was ordained and installed pastor of Centre and Ashpole churches, in Robeson county, and Laurel Hill, in Richmond county, and in preaching to these congregations and others in the neighborhood, he passed his life, which was brought to a close August 4th, 1822. He is represented as having been a man of a most gentle

DR. M. MILLAN'S LOG CABIN.

Dr. McNair labored as an evangelist about eight years—one in Warren, Pa., one in Fairmount, Philadelphia, one in Vincennes, Ind, one in Milford, N. J., one in Stroudsburg, Pa., and more than three in Musconetcong Valley, N. J. His first permanent settlement was in Lancaster, Pa., where he labored, faithfully and successfully, eleven years. After leaving Lancaster he preached at Clinton, N. J., for six or eight years. His death occurred January 27th, 1867.

Dr. McNair, though retiring in his manner and deportment, was ever cheerful and kind, possessing, however, a firmness and integrity of purpose which made itself felt in his expressed opinions, together with a sincerity unquestioned, which gave a high tone to his public ministrations. His sermons evinced a high order of talent: they were eloquent, yet plain and kindly spirit, and an eloquent preacher.

McNair, Rev. Solomon, was born near Brownsburg, Pa., August 3d, 1815, and graduated at Jefferson College in 1840. He was ordained by the Presbytery of Donegal, May 8th, 1846; stated supply at Middle Octorara, Pa., 1844, and pastor, 1846-53. He was pastor at Mansfield, N. J., 1853-61; stated supply at Upper Mt. Bethel, Pa., 1862-64; stated supply at Little Britain, Pa., 1864; pastor, 1867-73. He died December 29th, 1873. Mr. McNair was highly esteemed by all who knew him. He was a modest man, and of a retiring disposition, but faithful and successful in his high vocation.

McNeill, Rev. George, was born in Fayetteville, N. C., September 24th, 1827, of Scotch lineage. His academical studies were pursued in the High School of his native town, and his college education was begun in the University of North Carolina and completed at Delaware College, in 1846. While a student at the latter Institution he made a public profession of faith in Christ, and consecrated himself to the work of the ministry. After spending some time at Union Seminary, New York, he entered the Middle class in Princeton Seminary in 1847, where he graduated in 1849. Returning home, he was licensed by his Presbytery, and on the 12th of July, 1850, ordained to the full work of the ministry. He preached for some years as a Domestic Missionary and stated supply, at Ashboro and Cedar Falls. In consequence of failing health he was laid aside from the active duties of the ministry, but in his retirement still meditated schemes for the advancement of the cause of Christ. One of these schemes was the establishment of a Presbyterian newspaper, specially adapted to the wants of the Church in North Carolina. Securing the approval of the Synod and some of the Presbyteries, and enlisting other influential men, a joint stock company was formed, and the first number of the North Carolina Presbyterian issued from Fayetteville, January 1st, 1858, with Rev. George McNeill as editor.

The paper was ably conducted by Mr. McNeill until his death, August 18th, 1861. The announced design of the paper was, primarily, to advance the cause of Presbyterianism in North Carolina, and this design has been largely accomplished. Mr. McNeill was peculiarly fitted, by his readiness, accuracy, courage, and vigorous style, for editorial work, and the paper, surviving till the present, has been useful in arousing, not only North Carolina Presbyterians, but the whole Southern Church, to greater diligence and faithfulness in the work of Christ. He being dead, yet speaketh, in the enterprise originated by him.

McNish, Rev. George, was a native of Scotland or Ireland, and came to this country in 1705, with the Rev. Francis Makemie. The Rev. John Hampton came at the same time. They were no doubt induced to come through the influence of Mr. Makemie, who had already labored here for a number of years. In the Spring of 1710 Mr. McNish was called as the eighth pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Jamaica, L. I. He was one of the original members of the Presbytery of Philadelphia, the first formed in America. For a short time he labored among the people of Monokin and Wicomico, in Maryland, but, it appears, was not settled as their pastor.

In 1711 Mr. McNish became the minister of Jamaica. In 1710 he was the Moderator of the Presbytery. He may be said to be the father of Presbyterianism in the State of New York. In 1716 he was again Moderator of the Presbytery of Philadelphia, and consequently preached the synodical sermon at the first meeting of the Synod of Philadelphia, in 1717. The same year he was deputed by the Synod to act as its representative abroad, for the promotion of religion in this country. This visit, however, he did not make, but the appointment and other important service assigned him, prove that he was a leading and influential minister, and enjoyed, in no small degree, the confidence of his brethren. In 1723 Synod recorded its "great grief" at his decease. In the Church Register of Newtown it is stated that he died March 10th, 1722. His remains were buried in the Jamaica cemetery.

McNulty, Joseph McCarrell, D. D., was born in Fayetteville, Franklin county, Pa., September 18th, 1827. He was named for his mother's brother, Rev. Dr. Joseph McCarrell, of Newburgh, N. Y. Graduating from the Associate Reformed Classical Institute in Newburgh, he studied theology in the Associate Reformed Seminary, of which his uncle was President, at the same place, and was licensed to preach by the First Associate Reformed Presbytery of New York, in May, 1851. He became pastor of the Associate Reformed Church of West Kortright, N. Y., in September, 1852, and continued so four years. He then built up a missionary church in Hobart, Delaware county, N. Y., in the same connection. He took charge, for four years, of the Independent Congregational Church of Clarkson, N. Y., in 1857. In 1862 he accepted a call to the Presbyterian Church in Montgomery, N. Y., and in 1867, a call to the Presbyterian Church of Winoma, Minn. He was installed, in 1872, over the Claremont Presbyterian Church, Jersey City, N. J. In July, 1874, he became pastor of the Church at Woodbridge, N. J., where his labors for nearly nine years have proved eminently successful.

Dr. McNulty is a frequent contributor to the current religious literature of the day. For seven years he has prepared a weekly study of the International Sabbath-school Lessons for the local press, with great acceptance. As a man, he is affable, frank, kind-hearted and manly. In professional and social life he is endeared to all by consecration, personal devotion and sacrifice. He is an eloquent, forcible and effective preacher. An unction pervades his sermons and makes him "wise to win souls." As a pastor, he is conscientious and faithful, and in every Christian enterprise he is active and earnest.

McPheeters, Samuel Brown, D. D., so called after the Rev. Samuel Brown, of New Providence, Virginia, the fifth child of Rev. William McPheeters, D. D., and his wife, Margaret Ann Curry, was born in Raleigh, N. C., September 18th, 1819. He graduated at the University of his native State in June, 1841. After his graduation, he returned home and began the study of law, which he prosecuted for more than a year. Toward the end of August, 1843, the young law student left Raleigh for Princeton, N. J., with a view of joining the Theological Seminary in that place. After his licensure he was a preacher to the colored people of Amelia and Nottaway counties, Va., 1846-8, and was diligent, faithful, successful and very acceptable in his work. He was ordained an evangelist by the Presbytery of East Hanover, June 10th, 1848, and was pastor-elect at Amelia, C. H., Va., 1848-51. Here his lot was cast among a cultured and generous people, by whom he was highly esteemed. In 1851 he took charge of the Westminster (Pine Street) Church, St. Louis, Mo., and continued to be its pastor until 1863, amid constantly increasing evidences of his usefulness, and constantly repeated tokens of mutual affection between himself and the people whom he so faithfully served as an ambassador for Christ. From 1868-70, he was pastor of Mulberry Church, Ky., where he was eminently faithful and greatly beloved. He died March 9th, 1870, whispering with his latest breath, "To live is Christ, to die is gain."

SAMUEL BROWN M'PHEETERS, D. D.

Dr. McPheeters' life and character presented an admirable specimen of well ordered natural endowments, sanctified and ennobled by grace. He was endowed with a wisdom that delivered him, consistently, from hasty, foolish and ill-tempered things. With a judgment pre-eminently sound, it was safe at all times to trust him as a counsellor. His piety was cast in the loftiest mould, and yet there never appeared in its composition a shadow of fanaticism. Everything about him betokened a sojourner and the pilgrim, staff in hand, waiting only for the morning. As a preacher, he would not, in common acceptance, be called eloquent. And yet the people always heard him gladly. His apt illustrations and intense common sense arrested attention from the start, and the preacher, rapt in the fervor of his earnestness, spake as one who came directly from the presence of God, while the message which he bore was fragrant with the incense that burns in the Holy Place.

McPheeters, William, D. D., was born, September 28th, 1778, in Augusta county, Va. He began his classical course in Staunton, and finished his education at Liberty Hall Academy. In 1797 he commenced the study of medicine, at Cynthiana, Ky., but abandoned it. His theological studies were pursued chiefly under the Rev. Samuel Brown, at New Providence. He was licensed to preach, April 19th, 1802, by the Presbytery of Lexington; in October following visited the State of Kentucky, and preached in various places till about March, 1803; then passed over to Ohio, preached in Chillicothe and other places, and after an absence of a few weeks, returned to Kentucky, taking charge of a church in Danville, also opening a school. After one year he returned to Cynthiana, and subsequently made a second visit to Chillicothe. After a visit to Kentucky he returned to Virginia. During the winter of 1804 he visited the counties of Greenbriar and Monroe, and subsequently took charge, for six months, of the congregations of New Lebanon and Windy Cove. In December, 1805, he began to officiate as a stated supply at Bethel Church; received a call from it, April 15th, 1806, and two or three days after was ordained to the work of the ministry. In June, 1810, he took charge of the Academy and Church in Raleigh, N. C. His connection with the academy continued until 1826, and his connection with the church, as a stated supply, several years longer. From February, 1836, to July, 1837, he had charge of a female school in Fayetteville. In the Autumn of 1837 he undertook an agency under the direction of the Board of Domestic Missions of the General Assembly, which he continued till the Spring of 1839. In 1840 he was chosen President of Davidson College, but owing to ill health, declined the election. He died, November 7th, 1842. Dr. McPheeters received many testimonies of high public regard, and fulfilled with exemplary fidelity every public trust that was committed to him. He was several times a commissioner to the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, and never failed to command in that body a high degree of respect. He was for many years a faithful and efficient Trustee of the University of North Carolina. He was an eminently practical, useful and respectable man.

McPheeters, William M., M. D., second son of the Rev. Dr. William McPheeters, was born in Raleigh, N. C., December 3d, 1815. He was educated at the University of North Carolina, and graduated from the Medical Department of the University of Pennsylvania, in 1840. Having served a year as resident physician at Blockley Hospital, Philadelphia, he moved to St. Louis, Mo., in the Fall of 1841. Soon afterward he was chosen Professor of Clinical Medicine and Pathological Anatomy, and subsequently, of Materia Medica and Therapeutics, in the St. Louis Medical College, in which positions he served, with distinguished ability, for fourteen years. At the close of the war he filled a Professorship in the Missouri Medical College, which he resigned, in 1874, to accept the office of Medical Director of the St. Louis Life Insurance Company. From 1856 to 1861 he was surgeon of the United States Marine Hospital, at St. Louis, and for sixteen years was physician in charge of the medical wards of the Hospital of the Sisters of Charity of the same city. From 1843 to 1861 he edited, with great ability, the St. Louis Medical and Surgical Journal, and has been President of the City and State Medical Associations. Dr. McPheters is an earnest and active Christian.

WILLIAM M. M'PHERTERS, M. D.

Able and convincing in speech, he is outspoken and fearless, on all occasions, for the truth. The son of a minister, and the brother of the saintly S. B. McPheters, D. D., and thus knowing something of a minister's trials, he has always been the pastor's sympathizing and devoted friend. He enjoys the unbounded affection and confidence of the Grand Avenue Presbyterian Church, of St. Louis, over which, for many years, as an elder, he has ruled so wisely and well.

McPherrin, Rev. John, was born in York (now Adams) county, Pa., November 15th, 1757; graduated May 7th, 1788, at Dickinson College, and studied theology under the direction of Rev. John Clark, pastor Bethel, Allegheny county, Pa. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Redstone, August 20th, 1789, and installed pastor of the united congregations of Salem and Unity, Westmoreland county, Pa., September 22d, 1791. Here he labored with great success for a number of years. On June 25th, 1800, he resigned the charge at Unity, and on April 20th, 1803, that of Salem, and having accepted a call from the united congregations of Concord and Muddy Creek, within the bounds of the Erie Presbytery, he was transferred to that Presbytery, April 9th, 1805. A few years afterwards he had charge of Concord and Harmony, and still later, of Butler and Concord. He is said to have been the founder of the Church in the town of Butler, and was its pastor for ten or twelve years. He was Moderator of the Synod of Virginia in 1799, and of the Synod of Pittsburg in 1805. He died February 10th, 1822.

Mr. McPherrin was a thorough Latin and Greek scholar, and for a number of years after he was settled in the ministry, taught a class of young men, most of whom became ministers of the gospel. He was an able, faithful and devoted minister of Jesus Christ. For some years before his death he appeared to be remarkably weaned from the world; he, indeed, lived above the world. His whole heart and soul were absorbed in the love of God, and his aim was, by all means, to promote the interests of the Redeemer's kingdom.

McPherson, Hon. Edward, LL. D., was born in Gettysburg, Pa., July 31st, 1830. He graduated from Pennsylvania College in 1848. He began the study of the law with Hon. Thaddens Stevens, in Lancaster, but from ill health did not complete the course. He turned his attention to newspaper pursuits, as correspondent and editor. In 1851 he edited the Harrisburg Daily American; in 1852-4, the Lancaster Independent Whig; in 1855, the Pittsburg Daily Times; in 1878-80, the Philadelphia Press. He was elected a representative in Congress for his native district, in 1858 and 1860, to the Thirty-sixth and Thirty-seventh Congresses. At the close of his congressional service he was for eight months Deputy Commissioner of Internal Revenue, Treasury Department, and was chosen the Clerk of the House of Representatives of the United States, from the Thirty-eighth to the Forty-third Congress, inclusive, being a continuous service of twelve years, and again for the Forty-seventh Congress, being a total service of fourteen years in that office. In 1881 he was appointed Chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, Treasury Department, which position he occupied for a year and a half. Mr. McPherson's publications have been numerous. Among them are the "Growth of Individualism," "The Christian Principle, Its Influence upon Government," "The Family in its Relations to the State," "Know Thyself, Personally and Nationally Considered," and "Handbook of Politics for 1872, for 1874, for 1876, for 1878, for 1880, for 1882."

McPherson, Simon John, D. D., is the second child of John Finlay and Jeannette Fraser. McPherson, and was born in Wheatland, Monroe county, N. Y.

January 19th, 1850. He graduated at Princeton College in 1874, with the first academic rank in his class. For one year he was Tutor in Mathematics at Princeton. In 1875 he entered Princeton Seminary. In 1877 he gave the Master's oration. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Rochester, in April, 1877, and was installed, by the Presbytery of Morris and Orange, pastor of the East Orange Presbyterian Church, in September, 1879. Here his labors were largely blessed. In November, 1882, he entered on the pastorate of the Second Presbyterian Church of Chicago, Ill., in which he still continues. Dr. McPherson has gained the admiring love of his church and of his ministerial brethren, and has already taken rank among the leading preachers of the country. He speaks entirely without notes, from most thorough preparation. In his pulpit work he happily blends the teacher and the orator. As a speaker, on occasions, with his rapid earnestness of manner, vigor of style and delightful humor, he has proved himself equal to the best. His sermons, frequently published, show generous scholarship, philosophic comprehension of truth, a rare faculty of generalization, originality and fertility of thought, and fine powers of illustration. His unusual abilities, consecrated faithfulness, his tact and wisdom as a pastor, his strong traits and attractive qualities as a man, show him to be worthy of the important position he occupies.

McQueen, Donald, D. D., was born in Chesterfield District, South Carolina, June 21st, 1810, and died in the town of Sumter, S. C., January 22d, 1880. He was of Scotch-Irish descent. After graduating from South Carolina College, in 1832, he taught for a time in the Academy at Cheraw. He graduated at the Theological Seminary at Columbia in 1836, and after supplying the Church at Sumter, S. C., for a time, was installed, in the Spring of 1837, pastor of this church, jointly with the Concord Church, situated a few miles from the town. This joint pastorate continued until 1853, when he was called to the Sumter Church singly, where he remained till his death, his whole ministry of forty-three years being thus devoted, jointly and singly, to this one charge.

As a pastor, Dr. McQueen was much beloved and respected. Genial disposition, cheerful in temper, jocund in spirit, his presence was a sunbeam in every circle. At the same time there was no heart more sensitive than his to the shadows that fell from the sorrows of others. He was faithful and untiring in his labors. Having a large colored membership in his church, he devoted the Sabbath afternoon service especially to their instruction, so that, for years, he preached three times each Lord's day. As a preacher he was plain and practical, striving only to present the simple teachings of the Word of God, for the edification of believers and the conversion of sinners. He was greatly blessed in his work, having received many into the church as seals of his ministry. He was a good man, full of the Holy Ghost, and of faith.

McQueen, Rev. Martin, son of Col. Donald and Catharine McQueen, was born in Robeson county, N. C. He graduated, with distinction, at Davidson College, in June, 1851, and entered the Theological Seminary at Columbia, S. C., in the Fall of the same year. He was licensed to preach by Fayetteville Presbytery, on the 5th of November, 1853, and completed his theological course in June of the year following. His first charge was the temporary supply of the Greensboro Church, where his labors were attended with a revival of religion which resulted in the addition of quite a number to the church. In April, 1855, he was ordained, and for four years supplied Harmony and Mizpah churches, in Richmond county, and Sharon, Macedonia and Mt. Carmel churches, in Montgomery county.

In 1859 he took charge of the Second Church of Wilmington, where, after two years and a half, his labors were increased by the additional charge of the First Church, left vacant by the Rev. M. B. Grier, its pastor. In 1864 he accepted a call to become pastor of Union and Carthage churches, in Moore county, where he still continues—1883. During this long continued pastorate Mr. McQueen has been abundant in labors, having supplied, for several years, Buffalo and Bethesda churches, and still continues to preach to Cannon Church, on the R. & A. A. L. R. R. He has thus, for a long period, singly and alone, cultivated this important and extensive field, and has had the pleasure of seeing the work of the Lord greatly prospering in his hands. Indeed, this is his crown of rejoicing, that God has owned and blessed his labors wherever he has preached.

Mr. McQueen's large-heartedness and generous disposition make him strong in his personal attachments, and a general favorite, especially with the people of his charge who are devotedly attached to him. As a Church officer, he is conservative and practical, a good debater, and in the courts of the Church is prominent and influential. He has the gifts and qualities which eminently fit him for the pastoral office. As a preacher, he ranks deservedly high. His sermons are lucid, Scriptural and searching, and his manner of delivery is earnest, impressive, and often powerful.

McRee, James, D. D., was born in North Carolina, May 10th, 1752; was educated at Princeton, and was licensed by Concord Presbytery in April, 1778, and immediately settled as pastor of Steel Creek congregation, in North Carolina, where he remained about twenty years. In 1798 he left Steel Creek and settled as pastor of Centre Church, and continued its pastor about thirty years. Dr. McRee was dignified in the pulpit, fluent in his delivery, and a most popular preacher. He was always a friend of education. His death occurred March 28th, 1840.

McSurely, William Jasper, D. D., of good old Scotch-Irish stock, was born in Adams county, Ohio, September 1st, 1831. He graduated from Miami University, Ohio, in 1856, having throughout his course maintained a high standing in his class. He studied theology in the Associate Reformed Seminary at Oxford, finishing his course at that Institution in 1859, after its removal to Monmouth, Ill. In the Spring of 1859 he entered upon his labors as pastor of the United Presbyterian Church, Oxford, O. After a successful pastorate of more than seven years at Oxford, he was called to the United Presbyterian Church of Kirkwood, Ill., where he labored with great acceptance during the years 1867-8. Subsequently he supplied, for nearly a year, the Presbyterian Church of Loveland, Ohio. In 1869 he was called to the Church at Hillsboro, Ohio, where he still continues. Under his ministry the church has had a steady and healthy growth. Precious seasons of revival have been enjoyed, resulting in the bringing of many souls into the kingdom. Dr. McSurely is a man of scholarly attainments and pulpit ability. His sermons, written out with great care, are full of the marrow and fatness of the gospel, and are always interesting and instructive. His style is clear and sufficiently ornate, and his delivery earnest and forcible. In the prime of life and in the maturity of his powers, he has before him the prospect of many years of usefulness in his loved employment of preaching "the unsearchable riches of Christ."

McWilliams, Hon. Jonathan, was born in Spruce Creek Valley, Huntingdon county, Pa., in 1797. In 1827 he was elected a ruling elder of the church of his childhood, in which capacity he served them with fidelity till within five years of his death, at which time he removed out of the bounds of the congregation, and resided in McVeytown, Pa. He was twice elected to the State Legislature from Huntingdon county, and served during the years 1842 and 1843. He was also elected an Associate Judge of the county. He enjoyed in the highest degree the confidence of the community among whom he spent almost the whole of his life. His intelligence, piety and public spirit commanded the esteem of all who knew him. He was a great reader, collected a large library of standard works, and became possessed of a very general information. His face was always set against wrong, and he employed his pen frequently in the inculcation of virtue and in the defence of Christianity. He early enlisted in the cause of Temperance, and spent both time and money in urging forward the reformation, both by speech and by the press. His piety was marked by simplicity and humble trust. He was an example in all the relations of life. As a Presbyterian, and especially as a Presbyterian elder, he was sincere and intelligent in his adoption of the doctrines of the Confession of Faith and the Catechisms, and tolerated no departure from them in those who professed to adopt them. Judge McWilliams died at McVeytown, September 2d, 1870.

McWhorter, Alexander, D. D., was born in New Castle county, Delaware, July 15th, 1734; after graduating in Princeton College, in 1757, studied theology with Rev. William Tennent, of Freehold, and was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, August 3d, 1758. In the Summer of the same year he was installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Newark, N. J. In 1761 he visited North Carolina, by order of the Synod, and was very efficient in establishing churches in that region. In 1775 he was appointed, by Congress, to visit North Carolina, and use every effort to bring over the enemies of independence to the American cause. In 1778, at the solicitation of General Knox, he acted as chaplain while the army lay at White Plains. In 1779 he left Newark, that he might accept a situation in North Carolina, but was soon obliged to fly before the army of Cornwallis, losing almost all that he possessed. Returning to Newark, he resumed his old charge, which he retained until the day of his death.

In 1802, at the advanced age of sixty-eight, Dr. McWhorter was agent for soliciting funds in New England, for rebuilding Princeton College, which had just been destroyed by fire, and had great success. He was one of the leading spirits in the organization of the Presbyterian Church. He was a man of order and method, an accomplished teacher, and among the most successful and popular preachers of his day. His influence in Church courts was very strong. He died in the triumph of a rapturous faith, July 20th, 1807.

Means of Grace, are the instrumentalities which God has ordained for our use, to secure spiritual enlightenment and edification. Such are hearing and reading the Scriptures, the Sacraments of the Lord's Supper and Baptism, self-examination, meditation, prayer, praise, Christian conversation, etc. These means are to be used without any reference to merit, solely with a dependence on the Divine Being; nor can we ever expect happiness in ourselves, nor be good exemplars to others, while we live in the neglect of them. It is in vain to argue that the divine decrees supersede the necessity of them, since God has as certainly appointed the means as the end. Besides, He himself generally works by them, and the more means He thinks proper to use, the more He displays His glorious perfections. Jesus Christ, when on earth, used means; He prayed, He exhorted, and did good by going from place to place. Indeed, the system of nature, providence and grace, are all carried on by means. The Scriptures abound with exhortations to them (Matt. v; Rom. xiii) and none but enthusiasts or immoral characters ever refuse to use them.

Mebane, Rev. William Nelson, the son of David and Annie (Cummins) Mebane, was born in Guilford county, N. C., March 10th, 1809, of Scotch-Irish descent. He was prepared for college in Greensboro, N. C., by Rev. William Paisley and E. W. Caruthers, D. D. He was graduated from the University of North Carolina in 1833, with distinction. He served as a Tutor in the University for one year, and in 1834 entered Princeton Seminary, took the full course, and was graduated in 1837. He was licensed by Orange Presbytery in October, 1837, and for two years labored as a missionary in Louisiana and Texas, where he was the means of founding a number of churches. On his return to North Carolina, he was called to the Spring Garden Church, in Rockingham county, and was ordained as an evangelist at Danville, Va., September 22d, 1839, and installed pastor of Spring Garden in July, 1841. He was installed over Madison, a new church formed out of his old charge, in August, 1851. In 1859 he was released, on account of declining health, from his charge, and died May 8th, 1859, of pulmonary consumption. When asked concerning his prospect, just before his death, he replied, "I have no fear; my peace flows like a river."

Mr. Mebane was a good preacher, possessing independence of thought and sprightliness of manners. For twenty years he labored to build up the Church, beginning with one small organization, and with few families of Presbyter-ian affinities. The Lord blessed his labors, and several churches were organized and strengthened under his care.

Mr. Mebane had a quick, active, and at the same time, patient mind. He never forgot his sacred calling, and possessed, in an eminent degree, the happy art of leading people to converse freely upon experimental and practical religion. With a heart full of love to Christ, he seldom spoke without impressing his hearers. As a pastor, he had no superior in the Synod of North Carolina.

Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence. During the stormy times of the Revolution, while public sentiment in North Carolina and its sister colonies was making rapid strides toward a bold resistance to augmenting oppressions, the people of Mecklenburg and vicinity, between the Yadkin and the Catawba, were neither indifferent nor inactive, notwithstanding their distance from the seaboard. There was no printing press in the upper country, and as no regular post traversed that region, a newspaper was seldom seen there, among the people. They were in the habit of assembling at stated places to hear printed handbills from abroad read, or to obtain verbal information of passing events. Charlotte was a central point for these assemblages, and there the leading men in that section often met, at Queen's Museum or College, the Faneuil Hall of North Carolina, to discuss the exciting topics of the day. These meetings were at first irregular, and without system. It was finally agreed that Thomas Polk, Colonel of the militia, long a surveyor in the province, a man of great excellence of character, extensive knowledge of the people around him, and deservedly popular (who was also great uncle to President Polk), should be authorized to call a convention of the representatives of the people, whenever circumstances should appear to require it. It was also agreed that such representatives should consist of two from each captain's company, to be chosen by the people of the several militia districts, and that their decisions, when thus legally convened, should be binding upon the people of Mecklenburg. This step was in accordance with the recommendation of the eleventh article of the American Association, adopted by the first Continental Congress, and now generally acted upon throughout the colonies.

In due time Colonel Polk issued his notice for the committeemen to assemble in Charlotte, on the 19th of May, 1775. On the appointed day between twenty and thirty representatives of the people met in the Court House, in the centre of the town, at the crossing of the great streets, and surrounded by an immense concourse, few of whom could enter the house, proceeded to organize for business by choosing Abraham Alexander, a former member of the Legislature, a magistrate, and ruling elder in the Sugar Creek congregation, in whose bounds they were assembled, as their chairman, and John McKnitt Alexander and Dr. Ephraim Brevard, men of business habits and great popularity, their clerks. Papers were read before the Convention and the people; the handbill brought by express, containing the news of the battle of Lexington, Massachusetts, on that day one month, the 19th of April, came to hand that day and was read to the assembly. James Bulch, pastor of Poplar Tent, Dr. Ephraim Brevard and William Kemm, Esq., addressed the Convention and the people at large. Under the excitement produced by the wanton bloodshed at Lexington, and the addresses of these gentlemen, the assembly cried out, as with one voice, "Let us be independent! Let us declare our independence, and defend it with our lives and fortunes!" The speakers said, his Majesty's proclamation had declared them out of the protection of the British Crown, and they ought, therefore, to declare themselves out of his protection, and independent of all his control.

By this Convention a Declaration of Independence was made, May 31st, 1775, thirteen months before that made by the Federal Congress, in Philadelphia, July 4th, 1776. This document was sent by a messenger, Captain Jack, to the Continental Congress, then in session in Philadelphia, and placed in the hands of Caswell, Hooper, and Hewes, the delegates in Congress from North Carolina. These gentlemen, perhaps considering the movement premature or too radical, did not make the action of the Convention public. They still hoped for reconciliation with the mother country, and were willing to avoid any act that might widen the breach. They addressed a letter to the people of Mecklenburg, complimenting them for their patriotism, recommending the strict observance of order, and expressing their belief that the whole continent would soon follow their example, if the grievances complained of were not speedily redressed.

It is now an established fact, that the honor of preparing this Declaration of Independence belongs to the Presbyterians of North Carolina. Of the members of the Convention that proclaimed it, May, 1775, one was a minister of the gospel, nine were elders in the Church, and all in some way were connected with the seven churches and congregations that embraced the whole county of Mecklenburg, viz.: Sugar Creek, Steel Creek, Providence, Hopewell, Centre, Rocky River, and Poplar Tent—all of which were of Presbyterian origin and constitution, and have a history of peculiar interest.

"Who were these people," says Dr. Foote, "and whence did they come?" In what school of politics and religion had they been disciplined? At what fountains had they been drinking such inspirations, that here in the wilderness, common people, in their thoughts of freedom and equality, far outstripped the most ardent leaders in the Continental Congress? Whence came these men, who spoke out their thoughts, and thought as they spoke, and both thought and spoke inextinguishable principles of freedom of conscience and civil liberty? That they were poor and obscure but adds to their interest, when it is known that their deeds in the Revolution were equal to their principles. Many a "life" was given in Mecklenburg in consequence of that declaration, and much of "fortune" was sacrificed, but their "honor" came out safe, even their great enemy, Tarleton, being witness. They did not get their ideas of liberty and law from Vattel, or Puffendorf, or the tomes of English law. From what book, then, did they get their knowledge, their principles of life? Ahead of their own State in their political notions, as a body, they never wavered through the whole Revolutionary struggle, and their descendants possess now just what these people asserted then, both in religion and politics, in conscience and in the State.

To North Carolina belongs the imperishable honor of being the first in declaring that Independence which is the pride and glory of every American. "Honor to whom honor is due!"

In 1851 the Rev. Samuel J. Baird, then a resident of New Castle, Tenn., addressed a letter to Mr. James P. McRee, a respectable citizen of Somerville, in the same State, requesting him to give, in writing, some facts which he had mentioned in conversation, respecting the writer of the Mecklenburg Declaration. In his reply, Mr. McRee, whose wife was a daughter of Adam Brevard (to whom he ascribes the authorship of the Declaration), and in whose family Mr. Brevard lived for some years preceding his death, said:—

"Dr. Ephraim Brevard was a delegate, and one of the Committee that was appointed to draw up a Declaration of Independence, to be acted on by the Convention. Adam Brevard was then a student of law, living with his brother, the Doctor, who got him to write out the Declaration. After it was adopted, General Thomas Polk read it, at the court-house door, to the multitude that was standing outside, when, after hearing it, they raised a shout and threw their hats into the air. Some of their hats fell on the court house, and they did not get some of them off till the next day. All the delegates in that Convention, and nearly all the citizens of that section of country, were Presbyterians, mostly emigrants from the North of Ireland. Adam Brevard, whom I got my information from, told me that he took the Westminster Confession of Faith for his guide. The above I got from Adam Brevard, and it is confirmed by others."

The fact will be observed, with interest, that the Westminster Standards are here declared to have been the model of the Mecklenburg Declaration. These Standards, as then published, included the Scotch Covenants, to which Dr. Smyth has, from internal evidence, traced both the Mecklenburg and National Declarations.

Mecklin, Rév. Robert Wilson, was born in South Carolina, October 8th, 1843. He graduated from LaGrange College, Tenn., in 1861, and after studying theology, was licensed by the Tombeckbee Presbytery, October, 1866, and ordained by the same, October, 1867. In November of the latter year he was installed pastor of Bethsalem and Lebanon churches. In 1872 he began to supply Batesville and Pleasant Grove churches, and for five years labored at intervals at Land Spring and Courtland. In 1877 he was installed pastor, for all his time, of the Land Spring Church. During almost all this time he has been engaged in the arduous labor of the school-room, and besides preaching twice each Sabbath to his church, he has organized and ministered to a colored congregation. In addition to this, he has written, and has in press, a Historical Romance, giving the story of the early struggles of the Presbyterian Church in Mississippi. Mr. Mecklin is a most effective and impressive preacher, earnestly setting forth the truths which he as earnestly believes. His life has been blessed with usefulness in the Master's service.

Merrick, Major George W., was the Independent Republican nominee for Secretary of Internal Affairs of Pennsylvania, in 1882. He was born at Wellsboro', Pa., in 1810. His father, Israel Merrick, migrated from Delaware in 1804, when a lad of fifteen years, and settled in the then unbroken wilderness of Tioga county. His son, from ten years of age, was reared on a farm, and by hard work laid the foundation of a rugged constitution. He was schooled in the common schools until he had advanced to the period of young manhood, when he began a course of study at the Wellsboro' Academy. Subsequently he read law and was admitted to practice, and has since followed the profession with marked success. His home paper, the Agitator, says of him: "He has discharged every public duty, as he always has every private one, with scrupulous fidelity and ability." Major Merrick is a poor man and lives frugally; one of the "plain people," to use his own language, but is hospitable, and frank, and affable in manners, and has a contempt for all shams, and a burning indignation against all forms of wrong. He is a strong advocate of Temperance, President of the Board of Trustees of the Presbyterian Church at his home, and for many years President of the Board of Public Education. He is an honored citizen, and admired by people of all sects in religion and every shade of politics.

Merrill, Samuel, elder of the Fourth Presbyterian Church, Indianapolis, was born in Peacham, Vt., October 29th, 1792; died in Indianapolis, Ind., August 24th, 1855. He entered Dartmouth College, but in his Junior year left, to teach with his brother James, in York, Pa., where he also studied law. His associates were Thaddeus Stevens, John Blanchard and his brother James, all from Peacham. After three years he came to Vevey, Ind., and commenced the practice of law. In 1821 he was elected to the Legislature. Before his term of two years expired he was chosen Treasurer of State, removing first to Corydon, and, in 1824, to Indianapolis. This office he held until 1831, when he was chosen President of the State Bank. The duties of this office he discharged with unwearied fidelity and unimpeachable honesty, until 1844. He subsequently served four years as President of the Madison and Indianapolis Railroad. Though prominent in Christian work and superintendent of a Sabbath school, he did not make a profession of religion until 1838, when he joined and helped to form the Second Presbyterian Church, November 19th. In September, 1846, he was elected an elder, and served until November, 1851, when, with twenty-three others, he united in forming the Fourth Presbyterian Church, in which he was an elder from its organization until his death. He took great interest in missions, and was a corporate member of "The American Board." In reading the Missionary Herald he found great delight. His time, talents and money were devoted freely to the public good—to this the Second and Fourth churches and Wabash College can bear witness. In mental culture he was an example to all. On an average he read two hundred volumes and the entire Bible yearly. Learned in the Scriptures, versatile in thought and expression, his words had great weight in ecclesiastical bodies. Remarkable for uprightness, no ill-gotten wealth disturbed his dying hour. His richest record was in the hearts of the poor and in God's book of remembrance. Almost his last words were to send a refreshing drink to a poor Irish woman.

Middle Spring Church, Cumberland county, Pa. This congregation, located about two miles north of Shippensburg, in all probability came into existence about the year 1740. Antecedently to this Middle Spring was a preaching place, and was frequently favored with ministerial service by neighboring pastors, as well as by supplies under appointment of Presbytery, but not until that time was a congregation regularly organized. The earliest records of the congregation now to be found, and probably the first ever written, go back to 1742. The title-page is as follows: "A Session Book, for the use of the Session of the Congregation of Middle Spring. Bought for the above-mentioned use, men. Decembris, Anno Dom. 1745. (2 Chron. xix, 8, 9) "Moreover, in Jerusalem did Jehoshaphat set of the Levites, and of the priests, and of the chiefs of the fathers of Israel, for the judgment of the Lord, and for controversies when they returned to Jerusalem. And he charged them, saying, Thus shall ye do, in the fear of the Lord, faithfully and with a perfect heart." In these records mention is made of the following names of elders of the congregation: Allen Killough, John McKee, David Herron, John Reynolds, ordained 1742. John Finley, William Anderson, Robert McComb, ordained 1744. John Maclay, ordained 1747.

Among the cases of discipline recorded in this ancient book, is the following:—

"1746. J. P. was cited to the Session for taking venison from an Indian, and giving him meal and butter for it on the Sabbath day.

"J. P. appeared, and acknowledged that, being at home one Sabbath day, he heard a gun go off twice, quickly after each other, and said he would go out and see who it was; his wife dissuading him, he said he would go and see if he could hear the horse-bell; having gone a little way he saw an Indian, who had just killed a fawn and dressed it; the Indian coming towards the house with him, to get some victuals, having, he said, eat nothing that morning, he saw a deer, and shot it, and charged and shot again at another, which ran away; said P. stood by the Indian until he skinned the deer; when he had done he told said P. he might take it in if he wanted, for he would take no more with him, upon which, said P. and W. K., who then had come to them, took it up, and carried it in; when he had given the Indian his breakfast, said Indian asked if he had any meal; he said he had, and gave him some; then the Indian asked for butter, and asking his wife about it, he gave the

him, by deed, a farm belonging to them, which lay near to the church, and contained about two hundred and fifty acres. During his ministry here he made two visits to Virginia, preaching with great power in various places, organizing several new congregations, and leaving an enduring impression of his piety and eloquence. On account of his exposure, in this frontier settlement, to the hostile incursions of the Indians, he found it necessary, after a while, to retreat into the more populous and civilized part of the colony. Accordingly, he resigned his pastoral charge. His subsequent career is elsewhere noticed in this volume. At a Sessional meeting, September 3d, 1744, we find mention made of the Rev. Mr. Robinson, as being present. After this, notwithstanding the minutes of Session continue until 1748, there is no reference in them at all, either to preaching or a pastor. By reason of this fact, as well as the chasm in the minutes of Presbytery, reaching from 1750 to 1759, that portion of Middle Spring's history is a blank. In 1760 a call was given to the Rev. John Carmichael, of New Brunswick Presbytery, but if it was ever presented, it was not accepted. In 1765 Rev. Robert Cooper was chosen overseer of the flock, and continued in the pastoral relation until 1795. The Rev. John Moody, D. D., succeeded Dr. Cooper, in 1803, and continued in office about fifty years. The pastors of the church, since his resignation, have been the Rev. Messrs. I. N. Hays, — Richardson, and S. S. Wylie. (See the sketches of all these brethren.)

The first place of worship of the Middle Spring Congregation was a log building, near the gate of the graveyard, which was about thirty-five feet square. It was erected about the year 1738. Soon this edifice, in which, for awhile, there was preaching only four or five times a year, was found to be too small to accommodate the people, and it was demolished, and another, of the same material, erected on the same spot. This was considerably larger, being about fifty-eight feet long and forty-eight feet wide. In a little while it became necessary again that the house of worship should have its capacity extended, and this desideratum was effected by removing three sides of the building then in use, and embracing a little more space on either side, which was covered with a roof, something in the form of a shed. Up the sides of these additions to the main edifice, and over the roofs, were fixed wooden steps, by which access was gained into the gallery. This arrangement was made for want of room in the interior of the building for the construction of a stairway. Of the internal appearance of this ancient structure we are not able to give any very definite information. We have been told, however, that the pulpit, which was of walnut, was a remarkably neat piece of workmanship for that day. This interesting relic, which, with other portions of the building, at the time it was torn down, was purchased by Samuel Cox, Esq., was converted into a table,

Indian some, but he denies that he gave these things as a reward for the venison, inasmuch as they had made no bargain about it.

"The Session Judge that J. P. do acknowledge his Breach of Sabbath in this Matter, and be rebuked before the Session for his Sin."

The Rev. Mr. Calls, of Ireland, and the Rev. Mr. Clarke, of Scotland, each, with the sanction of Presbytery, served the congregation of Middle Spring about six months of a year. On December 27th, 1742, the Rev. John Blair, a younger brother of the Rev. Samuel Blair, of Fagg's Manor, Chester county, Pa., was installed pastor of the Church, in connection with that of Big Spring, and divided his time equally between them. Mr. Blair was highly esteemed by the congregation for his piety and his learning. As a proof of their affection for him, they conveyed to which is yet in the possession of his grandson, Mr. John Cox, now a resident of Shippensburg.

In this church, for many years, the growing congregation worshiped, and during this time the graveyard was filled with the dead. This sacred spot, which consists of about an acre of ground, is enclosed by a substantial stone wall, and stands by the roadside, teaching its solemn lessons to the passer-by. Among the epitaphs upon the few tombstones it contains are the following:—

"Here lies the body of John Reynolds, Esq., who departed this life on the twentieth day of October, 1789, aged 40 years.

"This modest stone (what few vain marbles can) May truly say, 'Here lies an honest man.'"

"Interred here is the body of Capt. Samuel Kearsley, a veteran survivor of the Revolution which procured the Independence of America, who departed this life on the 29th of March, A. D. 1830, in the 81st year of his age.

"In profession a Christian,
A soldier intrepid,
In body and mind vigorous,
Fearless of man,

But who confessed that Wisdom's beginning is God's fear."

About the year 1781 the old stone church was erected, whose site was just beside that of the present building. This was still larger than its predecessor (being 58 by 68 feet), and was necessarily so, by reason of the rapid increase of population. About the same time that this church was built, and which, for its day, was one of more than ordinary elegance, the graveyard, immediately in its rear, was located. The spot selected for the church edifice was one of peculiar attractiveness. The green slope to the right, the graveyard in the rear, the beautiful forest, stretching back with its refreshing shadows, "the old mill-dam," a few rods to the left of the road, calmly reflecting the light of heaven, the fountain of fresh water bubbling up close by, the murmuring stream, which rolls on under the thick over-hanging foliage, and the "Lower Graveyard," a little to the North, along which that stream flows in its course, chanting its sweet requiem for the dead—all combine to make the site one of rare beauty and interest.

The present building at Middle Spring, which was erected in 1848, is a neat brick edifice, one story high, with a gallery for a choir, and capacity to accommodate about four hundred. Though demanded by the dilapidated condition of the former building, it was with deep regret the necessity was yielded to that called for the erection of the new church. Hundreds were in full sympathy with one of our kinsmen (Prof. William M. Nevin, LL. D.), whose earliest associations were blended with that neighborhood, and who, returning to it after the absence of years, published a poem, in the following extract from which he thus graphically and touchingly alludes to the change that was soon to occur:—

"That Old Stone Church! Hid in these oaks apart,
I hoped Improvement ne'er would it invade;
But only Time, with his slow, hallowing art,
Would touch it, year by year, with softer shade,

And crack its walls no more, but, interlaid,
Mend them with moss. Its ancient souldre cast,
Dearer to me is than all art displayed
In modern churches, which, by their contrast,
Make this to stand forlorn, hold in the solemn past.

"Ah, now they tell me they will raze it low,
And build a lowlier, neater church instead;
And well, no doubt, it is it should be so:
But me not joy it brings, but drearhead;
For still my thoughts, like fondest ivy spread,
In memory green, do clasp that old church pale,
And round a softer, holier light is shed,
Than that through stained glass on chequered aisle;
Oh, must it then be torn, on me no more to smile?"

"Its pews of obdurate pine, straight-backed and tall,
Its gallery, mounted half three sides around,
Its pulpit, goblet-formed, half up the wall,
The sounding-board above, with worn crowned,
And Rouse's Psalms, that erst therein did sound
To old fugue tunes, to some the thoughts might raise
Of folks antique that certes there were found.
Ah no! I wot in those enchanting days,
There beauty beamed, there swelled the richest notes of praise

"What though no dainty choir the gallery graced,
And trod their tunes in soft, harmonious flow,
One pious clerk, tall-formed and sober faced,
With book enclitched, stood at his desk below,
And with his pitch all people's voice did go,
If not full blent, certes in soul sincere,
Up from their hearts their praises they did throw,
Nor cared they, e'en of some deaf dame, to hear,
At close, the voice in suit, lone quavering in the rear.

"Out from that pulpit's height, deep-bowed and grave,
The man of God ensooned, half-bust, was shown.
Weighty and wise, he did not thump nor rave,
Nor lead his folks, upwrought, to smile nor moan;
By him, slow east, the seeds of truth were sown,
Which, fighting on good soil, took lasting hold,
Not springing effoons, then to wilt ere grown,
But, in long time, their fruits increased were told
Some thirty, sixty some, and some an hundred fold."

In "that old stone church" there was, for many long years, a very large congregation, and out of it came many men of mark in all the learned professions. Its boundaries reached six or eight miles in several directions. When the Sabbath dawned, every road and avenue might be seen thronged with those who were assembling for worship, some on foot, some on horseback, and some in carriages. The spacious house was crowded. Even the galleries, above which "the swallow had built a nest for herself, where she might lay her young," was filled. Loud throughout the surrounding forest might be heard the praises of God. At "intermission," the people gathered together in little circles. Some wandered to the cemetery, to sigh over the departed loved ones, and drop a tear upon the sweetbriar that bloomed by their graves. Some flocked to the "Spring" to quaff its sparkling waters. Others met to exchange salutations and friendly greetings. The interval past, the public service of the sanctuary was resumed, and in a little while a scene of happy confusion was to be witnessed; the old and middle-aged and young, moving off to their homes, comfortable, at least, in the consciousness that, whatever other sins might be laid to their charge, they had not neglected the assembling of themselves together for the highest and holiest of all purposes—the worship of God.

Millard, Rev. David Kirby, son of John W. and Phoebe (Sprague) Millard, was born in Wellington county, Ontario, Canada, September 10th, 1812; was graduated from Knox College, at Toronto, A. D. 1839; spent two years additional in the theological department of Knox College; entered the senior class in Princeton Seminary, and after spending there one year, 1872-73, was regularly graduated; was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, February 5th, 1873; and was ordained by the Presbytery of Columbia (N. Y.), June 9th, 1873. On the day of his ordination he was installed pastor of Union Church, at New Lebanon, N. Y., and was released therefrom March 17th, 1874; was installed pastor at Tecumseh, Mich., December 19th, 1876, by the Presbytery of Monroe, and was released September 4th, 1878; was stated supply at Worthington, Minn., September 1st, 1878, to March 1st, 1880; and was stated supply at Barre Centre, N. Y., from May 1st, 1880, until his death, which occurred April 21st, 1881. His end was peaceful, and he expressed his cordial submission to the divine will concerning him. He was an able and faithful minister, and a fearless defender of the principles of the gospel.

Millard, Nelson, D. D., the youngest son of William and Anna (Loomis) Millard, was born at Delhi, Delaware county, N. Y., October 2d, 1831. At the age of fifteen he was employed for one year as assistant instructor in Delaware Academy. He graduated at Union College in 1853. He occupied a leading position in his class, and was unanimously elected Valedictorian of the Philomathean Society at the time of his graduation. He was tutor in the college for four years, and was offered a permanent Professorship in Rhetoric and Logic, but having the gospel ministry in view, he declined the offer. He graduated at Union Theological Seminary, New York City, in 1860. After spending a year and a half in Europe, for travel and for study in the German universities, he became pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Montclair, N. J., in 1862.

Subsequently to his ministry at Montclair, Dr. Millard was pastor at Peckskill, on the Hudson, until, in 1872, he was called to the large and important First Presbyterian Church in Syracuse, N. Y., where he has continued a very successful pastorate until January, 1884, having an influence upon the intellectual and moral and religious life of that city which was, perhaps, unexcelled by that of any other minister or public man. Dr. Millard, at the date last mentioned, accepted a call to the Broadway Church, at Norwich, Conn. He is, by original taste and tendency, especially fond of intellectual philosophy. At the same time the controlling purposes of his life have been eminently practical, coming at constant effectiveness in the way of moral and spiritual results. As a consequence of the combination of these two tendencies, aided by a bright imagination and a ready talent for felicitous illustration, his preaching (which is always without manuscript) has been vigorously intellectual, dealing with principles and the roots of doctrine, and yet practical and steadily fruitful, and popular in the sense that "the common people hear him gladly."

Miller, Rev. Adam, was born in Canajoharie, N. Y., January 13th, 1787. He graduated from Union College when but seventeen years old, and from the Auburn Theological Seminary three years later. At the age of twenty years he began the work of the ministry, performing missionary labors in the valley of the Mohawk for one year. In 1828 he commenced his pastorate in Harford, Susquehanna county, Pa.,

which place he reached after a journey on horseback, from Auburn, of four days. Here, and throughout Northeastern Pennsylvania, he at once became a power for good. Many precious revivals attended his ministry, and continually he had the joy of witnessing the demonstration of the Master's approval of his work. Numerous calls came to him to other fields, with increased salary, but he believed that duty required him to remain where God had placed him.

At the end of fifty years (October 31, 1878), a semi-centennial was held for the celebration of the strange fact that Adam Miller had been sole pastor of the Harford Church for half a century. On this joyful and blessed occasion, the great Presbytery of Lackawanna was represented by a large delegation,

People, formerly residents of Harford, came from distant parts, as pilgrims to a shrine where reposed hallowed memories; and from New England, New York and all parts of Pennsylvania, ministers, college professors, judges and others came, that they might once more look into the face of the man who was unspeakably dear to them. By brief addresses and other appropriate ways the time was most pleasantly and profitably spent.

Three years longer Mr. Miller continued sole pastor of that church. His last service was on a Communion day. He never preached and performed the other services in a more impressive manner. During the following week severe illness came upon him, and his thoughts wandered. He paid little attention to anything till, on Sunday morning, he heard the tolling of the old bell, when he sprang from his bed, saying that he must go and preach, as he had done for fifty-three years. Kind arms replaced him upon his bed, from which he was never again to arise. The days that followed he suffered intense pain, but was often heard to whisper: "Oh, the goodness of God! the goodness of God!" Just before his death he seemed to himself to be in a meeting of the Presbytery, and he was heard to ask leave of absence, saying that he was very tired and must go home.

Miller, Arnold W., D.D., was born in Charleston, S. C., and is a graduate of Charleston College and the Theological Seminary at Columbia. He was licensed to preach by Charleston Presbytery, and, in 1849, was ordained by Bethel Presbytery. His first pastorate was in Chester District, S. C.; his second in Charlotte, N. C., for two years; his third in Petersburg, Va., from whence, in 1865, he was recalled to Charlotte, where he has ever since remained, the faithful and much loved pastor of the First Church. Under his ministry the church has grown and prospered greatly.

Dr. Miller is one of the soundest theologians and ripest scholars, as well as one of the ablest and most eloquent preachers in the Southern Church. He is a laborious student, and a man of remarkable courage, indomitable energy and devoted piety. Decided in his convictions and loyal to the truth, he would not for any consideration betray or compromise it. His preaching is doctrinal and eminently characterized by the constant and clear presentation of the mediatorial office of Christ. His style is logical, clear and forcible, and the brightest ornaments of rhetoric and the graces of oratory are called into requisition to enforce the truths he so ably presents. A distinguishing characteristic of his preaching is his interest in God's ancient people, Israel, and his reliance upon the promises concerning them. He has a most excellent library, in which are some of the rarest theological works. As a pastor he is welcomed among his people as a faithful and tender counsellor, and the little children love him as a father.

Miller, Charles H., was a resident of Huntingdon, Pa. In 1826 he united with the Presbyterian Church in that place, under the ministry of the Rev. Mr. Peebles. In 1843 he was set apart to the sacred office of ruling elder, and shortly afterwards elected clerk of Session. As a Christian, his walk was close with God. As an officer in the church, he discharged his duties with conscientious fidelity, and enjoyed the confidence and affection of his brother officers and the people of his charge. Naturally unobtrusive in character and in all his activities, he closely imitated his Divine Master, "whose voice was not heard in the streets," who was "full of grace and truth." The ornament which adorned his soul was "a meek and quiet spirit, which, in the sight of God, is of great price." He died in peace, November 24th, 1880.

Miller, Rev. E. Smith, was born near the town of Vernon, Jennings county, Ind., March 15th, 1846. He graduated from Hanover College in June, 1873. He was then chosen Principal of the Public Schools at North Vernon, Ind., where he remained two years. He entered Union Theological Seminary, N. Y., in 1875, and graduated in May, 1878, and was soon after licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Indianapolis. In June of the same year he accepted an invitation to supply the churches of Iola and Carlyle, in Allen county, Kansas. He was ordained by the Presbytery of Neosho, in October, 1878, and installed pastor of the Church at Iola, in April, 1879, where he has since remained, laboring with great acceptance among the people.

His style as a preacher is strong, direct and impressive, with very little attempt at rhetorical display. He generally uses manuscript, but extemporizes with ease and fluency. He is a cultivated and excellent singer, and is never embarrassed by the want of a leader in that part of the service. He is an earnest and most efficient Sabbath-school worker, having had, during his theological course in New York city, much experience in that department of Christian labor.

Miller, Rev. John, was born in Boston, December 4th, 1722, and studied theology with Mr. Webb. He began to labor in Kent county, Delaware, in 1747, or 1748, and was ordained at Boston, in April, 1749. He took charge of Duck Creek (now Smyrna), and gathered the congregation in Dover. He joined the Old Side Presbytery of New Castle, after May, 1756. He visited Accomac county, and appeared before Lancaster Presbytery to represent the destitution of the Eastern shore, and the prospect of building up our interest, and they ordained Samuel Blair, Jr., and sent him thither. Mr. Miller died in July, 1791, and was buried at Dover. His congregation at Duck Creek built a handsome church after his death, and tried to secure the pastoral services of his son, Dr. Samuel Miller.

Miller, James Russell, D.D., is a native of Beaver county, Pa. He graduated at Westminster College, Pa., and pursued his theological studies in the U. P. Seminary at Allegheny City. He was licensed in 1866; preached two years in the First U. P. Church of New Wilmington, Pa.; resigned that charge to enter the Presbyterian Church, and soon after (November, 1869) began his work as pastor of the Bethany Church, Philadelphia, where he remained nine years, and was highly esteemed and greatly blessed in his labors. In November, 1878, he accepted a call to the Broadway Church, Rock Island, Ill., where success attended his ministry. Being elected to an editorial chair in the Sunday-school department of the Presbyterian Board of Publication, he resigned his pastorate at Rock Island, and entered upon his new duties in July, 1880, which he has continued to discharge with marked ability. In January, 1881, he became pastor of the Holland Memorial Mission, Philadelphia, which has since been organized into a church, and enjoyed very gratifying prosperity under his watchful care. He resigned this pastorate in 1883. Dr. Miller is a forcible and popular writer, and has prepared several valuable volumes for our Board of Publication.

Miller, Hon. John Q., an honored and useful elder in Missouri, was born in Danville, Ky., 1812, and died in 1856. His education was pursued at Centre College and Transylvania Law School. He became a resident of Boonville, Mo., in 1838, and continued to be until his death. His connection with the Presbyterian Church of that place was formed in 1817, and he was ordained ruling elder the following year. Mr. Miller was a servant of the people. He served two terms in the State Legislature, and was three times sent to represent his district in the Congress of the United States. As a man among men he sustained the reputation of an upright, righteous, generous-hearted gentleman, having the confidence of all. As a lawyer, he stood in the front rank of his profession, possessing a fine intellect and superior powers of oratory. As a politician, he was acknowledged to be a faithful, disinterested servant of the people. His record is singularly free from the stain of fraud, bribery, and corruption of every kind. The strong hold he had upon public confidence was maintained by his unblemished character. In the service of the Church his characteristic fidelity was conspicuous, as elsewhere. As a counsellor, helper, and ruler, he occupied a leading position. He was often a representative of his church in Presbytery and Synod, an active Sabbath-school worker, a prompt and regular attendant upon the various services of the church, often edifying the people by his counsels, and comforting them as he led them at the throne of grace.

It is to the praise of this man that, immersed as he was in public affairs, he "put on Christ," at all times and in all places. Whether in the National Congress, or in the privacy of his home, he acted, not as one claiming to be his own, but as one bought with the precious blood of the Son of God. To him every trust was sacred, and his accountability to God a solemn fact. A handsome monument, at Boonville, erected, in part, by the State, bears testimony to the appreciation in which he is held by a grateful people. He died, a comparatively young man, having filled many posts of public trust, which he never failed to dignify and adorn; and he was in death, as in life, triumphant in the Christian faith.

Miller, Linus Merrill, D. D., was born in Rochester, N. Y., October 13th, 1819. Trained up and taught by an excellent Christian mother, he early gave himself to the Saviour, and united with the First Presbyterian Church of Rochester, at the age of thirteen years. Preparing for college at the High School of his native place, he entered Hamilton College, in 1836, from which he graduated, with honor, in 1840. In the Fall of that year he entered the Theological Seminary at Princeton, N. J., where he completed his studies, in preparation for the ministry, and putting himself under the care of Steuben Presbytery, was, by them, examined and licensed to preach, in November, 1843. In May, 1844, he was called to the Presbyterian Church of Bath, N. Y., and was ordained and installed as its pastor, in October of the same year. After a service of seven years with that church, filling the offices of Stated Clerk of the Presbytery, and Permanent Clerk of the Synod of Buffalo, he was called to the First Presbyterian Church of Ogdensburg, N. Y., and was installed as its pastor, June 25th, 1851. Though several times invited to other desirable fields of labor, Dr. Miller still remains pastor of this church, where, for mere than thirty years, he has labored systematically and most faithfully, both as a preacher and pastor to his people. During his pastorate the church has been greatly prospered; its communicants have more than doubled in number; a new and ornate stone church edifice has been erected, and twelve young men have entered the ministry, most of whom are now successfully at work in different fields of labor. For more than a quarter of a century Dr. Miller has been Secretary of the St. Lawrence County Bible Society, and has been actively connected with the various ecclesiastical and benevolent associations of the county. For years he has been a Trustee of Hamilton College, and after the reunion of the O. S. and N. S. branches of the Presbyterian Church, of which he was an early and zealous advocate, he was chosen Moderator of the Synod of Central New York, in 1873. Dr. Miller is an able and earnest preacher, and a most acceptable and useful pastor; indefatigable in the work of his ministry, and for the advancement of the cause of Christ both at home and abroad, and is highly appreciated and esteemed by his brethren in the ministry, and by all who know him, as an able and faithful minister, a wise and safe counsellor, and a warm-hearted and genial friend.

Miller, Samuel, D. D., son of Dr. Samuel Miller, of Princeton, N. J., was born in that place, January 23d, 1816, and graduated at New Jersey College in 1833, where he was Tutor, 1835-6. For a time he was a lawyer in Philadelphia. He was ordained an evangelist by the Presbytery of New Branswick, October 5th, 1844; stated supply at Mt. Holly, N. J., 1845; pastor, 1850; Principal of West Jersey Collegiate Institute, Mt. Holly, 1845-57; stated supply at Tuckerton and Bass River, 1858-62; and from 1880, was pastor of the Church at Oceanic, N. J. Dr. Miller was elected a Director of Princeton Theological Seminary in 1864. He died in 1883. He was a gentleman of scholarly attainments, calm temperament, retiring disposition, and was very useful during his life as a preacher and instructor of the young.

Mills, Hon. Benjamin, was born in the town of Snow Hill, on the Eastern Shore of Maryland, in 1774. He was of Scotch-Irish descent by his father's side, and of Huguenot by his mother's. While he was quite young, his parents removed to Pennsylvania. He was fond of study, and became a good classical scholar and a proficient in mathematics. He first studied medicine, and practiced his profession for a short time, but finally gave it up, and after teaching school for a time, commenced the study of law.

He removed to Paris, Ky., in 1800, engaged in practice, rose rapidly in his profession, and was elected to the State Senate, and appointed by the Governor, Circuit Judge, which office he held for five years. In 1819 he took his seat upon the Supreme Court Bench. He united with the Presbyterian Church in Paris, Ky., in 1820, and three years after was ordained an elder. In 1828 he resigned his seat upon the Supreme Bench, and removed to Frankfort, where he resumed the practice of the law, and had a very extensive business all over the State. He died suddenly, in 1831, in the full hope of a blessed immortality.

Two things were remarkable in Judge Mills; one was his devotion to the classics in the original, and his fondness for the higher mathematics; the other was his realization of the responsibilities of the eldership. Meetings of Presbytery were attended by him as faithfully as his sessions of Court, or the consultations of his law office. He was, from his ordination to his death, superintendent of the Sabbath school. If the pastor was absent he would lead the prayer meeting, and on the Sabbath he often read a sermon, or made an address to the congregation. He was warmly devoted to the educational interests of the Church, being one of the founders of Centre College, Ky., and a friend of the Kempers in founding Lane Seminary, in Ohio, and also aiding a number of young men in obtaining an education for the ministry. He gave freely of his counsels and his means to every cause that was designed to advance the interests of the Church and promote the glory of the Redeemer.

Two of Judge Mills' sons entered the ministry, Rev. Thornton A. Mills, who died in 1867, and Rev. B. Mills, of Illinois; and one of his daughters became the wife of Rev. E. P. Pratt, D.D., now pastor at Portsmouth, Ohio.

Mills, Benjamin, D. D., was born at Paris, Bourbon county, Kentucky, June 23d, 1820. He is the third son of the late Hon. Benjamin Mills, of the Supreme Court of Kentucky, and of Mary Reade, daughter of General Anthony Thornton. He graduated from Miami University, in 1841; finished his theological course at Lane Seminary, in 1844, and his law studies in Kentucky, in 1846. His life presents a mosaic of pastoral, evangelistic, missionary, legal and military work. He preached the gospel in the States of Kentucky, Ohio, Missouri, Iowa, Minnesota, Illinois and Indiana, having also been active in planting the Presbyterian Church in Nebraska and Wyoming Territory. His law practice was confined almost entirely to Kentucky. His military service was against the Indians in the Northwest.

Intellectually, Dr. Mills is possessed of strong analytical power, a most retentive memory and a marked aptitude for forensic discussion. To these he has added a large observation and a careful investigation. Physically, he possesses the utmost vigor, linked with great power of endurance. In the thirty-ninth year of his ministry he was able to preach three times each Sabbath, with a ride of sixteen miles between the services, and sustain that amount of labor consecutively for a year. Notwithstanding the broad field over which his life-work has spread, its substance has been sufficient to create and maintain permanent impressions. He is still active in ministerial work, at the ripe age of sixty-three.

Mills, Henry, D. D., the son of John and Chloe (Wines) Mills, was born at Morristown, N. J., March 12th, 1786; graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1802, and for two years was Tutor in his Alma Mater. After studying theology with Rev. James Richards, D. D., he was licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of New Jersey, and in 1816 was ordained by the same body, and installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Woodbridge, N. J. He remained there, highly esteemed and eminently useful, until 1821, when he was called to the Professorship of Biblical Criticism in the Theological Seminary at Auburn, N. Y., which was just then established. For thirty-three years he performed the duties of this station with eminent ability. In 1854 he resigned the office, on account of physical infirmities, and was made Professor Emeritus. He died June 10th, 1867.

The character of Dr. Mills was one of rare excellence. His piety shone as a habit, rather than in any striking manifestations on particular occasions. It gave a uniform tone to his whole life, and was discerned and felt by others in the fixed principle and purpose that regulated him. The presentation of the gospel of Christ in its simplicity was his grand distinction in the pulpit. His style was simple, chaste, and direct. He honored his Master and the Word of God, in the matter and manner of his preaching. As a scholar and teacher he made his strong mark in the seminary. He loved his work, and the hundreds of young men whom he instructed delighted to testify to the accuracy and thoroughness of his teaching. Dr. Mills was a poet. In 1815 he gave to the press a small volume, "Horæ Germanicæ," "A Version of German Hymns," which was afterwards enlarged, and which, as a "manual for the closet," has proved a source of spiritual comfort to many.

Mills, Rev. Samuel John, one of the earliest promoters of the modern movement of Foreign Missions in the United States, was the son of a clergyman. He was born April 21st, 1783, at Torrington, Conn., and died June 16th, 1818, at sea, off the coast of Africa. He entered Williams College, 1806. His mind had been deeply interested in the work of sending the gospel to heathen lands, and while a student at college, he met with several of his fellow-students, under the shadow of a large haystack, to consult and pray with them over this question. In 1809 he entered Andover Seminary, where, together with Newell, Nott, Hall and Judson, he held consultations on the subject of missions, in which they were all alike interested. In June, 1810, Mills, Judson, Nott, and Newell, presented an address to the General Association of Massachusetts Proper, at Bradford, calling its attention to the claims of the heathen world. Between 1812 and 1815 Mills made two tours to the southwest, as far as New Orleans, engaged in distributing and selling Bibles, and organizing Bible Societies. Ordained at Newburyport, June 21st, 1815, he spent the next several years in the Middle States, and was connected with the Presbyterian Church. The suggestion of the American Bible Society came from him, as well as the project of the United Foreign Missionary Society, an association in which the Presbyterian, Dutch Reformed, and Associate Reformed churches united. In 1816 he suggested to the Synod of New York and New Jersey the plan of educating negroes for carrying the gospel to Africa. In 1817 the Colonization Society, which had recently been organized, sent him and the Rev. Mr. Burgess as their agents to explore Sierra Leone and Western Africa. Mr. Mills reached his destination, but on the return journey died, and, like Adoniram Judson, was buried in the sea. His name will always be indelibly associated with the history of foreign missionary endeavor in the United States, as one of those to whose enthusiasm it owed its first impulse.

Mills, Thornton A., D. D., the son of Judge Mills, of the Supreme Court of Kentucky, was born in Paris, Ky., September, 1810. He graduated at Miami University, Ohio, in 1830; was for a short period in Lane Theological Seminary, though he studied a full course privately, and was licensed by Cincinnati Presbytery in 1833. He labored for some time in Frankfort and vicinity, Ky., and in 1836 was installed pastor of the Third Presbyterian Church, Cincinnati, Ohio. With this church he remained about twelve years, during which time he was identified with all the religious movements of the city, and wielded an influence for good, second to that of no other pastor. In 1848 he purchased The Watchman of the Valley, and made it a decidedly Presbyterian paper, continuing to edit and publish it under the name Central Watchman, and then Central Christian Herald, from April, 1848, to January, 1853.

In 1853 Mr. Mills was Secretary and General Agent for the Church-Erection Committee of his branch of the Church, and having succeeded, with much toil, in completing the $100,000 fund, he accepted a call to the Second Church in Indianapolis. Here he remained about two and a half years, when, in 1856, he was chosen as general agent of the then just organized Permanent Committee of the General Assembly on Education for the Ministry. To this work the remainder of his life was given, and in it, by his sermons, and his pen in the various religious papers, he awakened a deep and abiding interest. He died in June, 1867. Dr. Mills was thoroughly a Western man, a man of large grasp of mind, clear and positive views of truth, of indomitable energy and perseverance, and inflexible in his adherence to what he regarded as the right. Thoroughly despising all shams and pretences of others, he was ever unassuming and modest in his intercourse with his brethren. He was a valuable standard-bearer of our Church, and yet, though adhering to its doctrines and usages, he was free from sectarian bigotry. Sound, solid, strong, he wielded a potent and permanent influence for good.

Ministerial Education, Board of. One marked characteristic of all Calvinistic churches, and of the Presbyterian body in particular, is an eminent regard for sound doctrine. A clear knowledge of spiritual truth is held by them to be essential to a firm faith and enduring piety. Hence the Presbyterian Church has, from the beginning, insisted strongly upon having a well educated ministry, "apt to teach." The qualifications for ordination required by its Constitution are such as can be obtained only by a nine years' course of diligent study. And to enable young men to meet this demand it has been liberal in providing institutions of learning, well equipped with all means of instruction. In this country the work of such provision was early begun. Within twelve or fourteen years after the organization of the first Presbytery, in the founding of Log College, in 1726, by the Rev. William Tennent (as the insufficiency of this school, together with the issues connected with it, led to the division of the Synod in 1741), the Old Side party adopted measures for founding a school under its own care, where all persons who pleased might send their children and have them instructed, gratis, in the languages, philosophy and divinity, and which should be supported by yearly contributions from every congregation in its connection, until Providence should provide for it in some other way. This school was established in New London, Pa., under the supervision of Mr. Alison, "the first Professor of Theology appointed by our Church." After it was deemed proper to "sess" students, as a general rule, those who were unable to bear the expenses of their education were exempted from payment. About the same time the Rev. Samuel Blair, of the other party, established a school at Fagg's Manor, from which went forth some of the most eminent ministers of our Church. Of these the most illustrious was an indigent youth, who was aided by the first money ever contributed in Virginia for the education of poor and pious youth for the gospel ministry. This youth was Samuel Davies, who afterwards became President of New Jersey College, and whose eloquent sermons are among the richest contributions to our pulpit literature. The success of this contribution was the earnest and pledge of much to come.

Such were the first efforts for raising up an efficient ministry in our Church. They proceeded on the broad policy of rendering the ministry accessible to all classes at equal advantage, and of utilizing all available gifts wherever found. The policy continued and proved its wisdom in the efficiency of the men thus liberally educated. In 1751 the Synod of New York recommended to all its members to make an annual collection "for the support of young students whose circumstances rendered them incapable to maintain themselves at learning; which contributions shall be at the disposal of such respective Presbyteries where they are made." Two years later funds were obtained in Scotland for the endowment of scholarships in connection with the college of New Jersey. In 1771 the Presbytery of New Castle brought into the Synod an overture recommending a scheme "for supporting young men of piety and parts at learning for the work of the ministry." This scheme, consisting of eight provisions, was adopted, but was prevented from being carried out by the excitements of the Revolutionary War. In 1805 the attention of the Assembly was called to an overture from the pen of Dr. Ashbel Green, urging that body to recommend, perhaps enjoin it upon the Presbyteries, to look out among them pious youth of promising talents, and endeavor to educate them for the ministry. The advantage apprehended from this scheme was that each Presbytery would be likely to be interested in and do more for candidates within its own bounds than it would do for those belonging to the Church at large. This overture met with general favor, and was acted upon for a number of years with no little success. In 1817 the number of candidates reported was thirty-nine, and the amount of the collections, $2843. Yet the scheme failed to develop the resources of the Church, and to meet the growing demand for laborers. New measures were called for, and as the result, in 1818 two organizations were formed, almost simultaneously, amid various strifes and contentions, viz.: "the Education Society of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America," at New Brunswick, N. J., November 26th; "the Education Society of the Presbyterian Church in the United States, under the care of the General Assembly," at Philadelphia, December 17th; and the outcome from the contention between the two was the organization of a Board of Education the following year. The first of these, which had its seat in New York, after maintaining a nominal relation to the Assembly's Board until 1826, entered into intimate union with the American Education Society as the Presbyterian Branch. The other became auxiliary to the Board.

The first meeting of the Board was held in the Session room of the Second Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia on the 23d of June, 1819, and elected the following officers: President, Robert Ralston; Vice Presidents, Rev. Ashbel Green, D. D., Rev. Andrew Elian, D. D., and Rev. George C. Potts; Treasurer, Alexander Henry; Corresponding Secretary, Rev. William Neill, D. D., and Recording Secretary, John M. Scott. For the first few years little was done directly by the Board. The business of collecting funds and aiding students was entirely carried on through the Presbyteries and auxiliary bodies, which reported to the Board. But in 1824 a change was made, and the auxiliaries transferred the management entirely into the Board's hands. And from this date its independent agency began, and its history has been one of advancing through varied success. As the field of labor broadened, and experience brought wisdom, its provisions have been modified from time to time, with a view to greater efficiency. Able and honored men have been its officers in the past, as may be seen by the following list: Presidents, Robert Ralston, 1819-21; Rev. Ashbel Green, D. D., 1821-29; Rev. J. J. Jame-way, 1829-30, Rev. Thomas McAnley, D. D., LL.D., 1830-31; Alexander Henry, Esq., 1831-47; Matthew Bevan, Esq., 1847-49; James N. Dickson, Esq., 1849-62; Rev. Charles Hodge, D. D., LL.D., 1862-69. Corresponding Secretaries, Rev. William Neill, D. D., 1819-21, and again 1829-31; Rev. E. S. Ely, D. D., 1821-29; Rev. John Breckinridge, D. D., 1831-35; Rev. Francis McFarland, D. D., 1835-1841; Rev. M. B. Hope, D. D., 1842-46; Rev. C. Van Rensselaer, D. D., 1846-60 (with him were associated Rev. William Chester, D. D., 1851-61, and Rev. James Wood, D. D., 1854-59); Rev. William Chester, D. D., 1861-65; Rev. William Speer, 1865-76.

After the separation of 1837, the so-called N. S. body conducted its educational work through the American Education Society, and also through various local organizations. But, in 1856, an Educational Committee was organized, which gradually engrossed the whole. Its Corresponding Secretary was the Rev. Thornton A. Mills, D. D., who served efficiently until his death, in 1867, when Rev. J. G. Atterbury was appointed in his place, and served until the reunion, in 1869. The Committee was then united with the Board, under the executive management of Dr. Speer. Since the reunion the Presidents have been the Rev. Herick Johnson, D. D., 1870-73; Rev. E. R. Beadle, 1873-74; Villeroy D. Reed, D. D., 1874-79; Rev. T. J. Shepherd, D. D., 1879-82; Rev. B. L. Agnew, D. D., 1882 to 1883, and Rev. J. F. Dripps, 1883. On the resignation of Dr. Speer, in 1876, Rev. D. W. Poor, D. D., was elected Corresponding Secretary, and still serves.

The policy of the Board proceeds on the assumption that the native abilities and gifts suited for the ministry exist in all classes of society; that the call of God comes to persons in all classes alike; that the Church needs the services of those who are accustomed to hardships and privations, and that, having put the conditions of ordination so high, it is both a duty and an advantage to herself to aid in the education of those worthy ones who have not the means to meet the expense. This benevolent policy has proved its wisdom in its results. To it is the Church indebted, both for the high average standing of its ministry in all the requisites for success, and also for the largeness of the supply. At the last count, in 1881, it was found that of the 5986 ministers upon the roll of the Assembly of 1881, 1791 had been aided by the Board. Of these 855 were settled pastors; 106 stated supplies; 61 foreign missionaries; 27 home missionaries, distinctively; 60 professors in colleges and seminaries; 28 teachers; 8 chaplains; 7 editors of religious journals; 3 Secretaries of our Board; 11 were superintendents of church work; 9 agents, and 61 were honorably retired. That is to say, out of 1791, 1455 were in regular church service. This may be called an honorable record. It is a justification of the Board's existence and an argument for its continuance.

The aim has been to provide only a partial support. At present the maximum of its scholarships is put at $150, and this is granted only to those who come recommended by their Presbyteries in all particulars, and are well reported by their instructors. The recommendations are required to be renewed every year, and the reports from the colleges and seminaries must be sent in three times during the annual academic sessions. No person is paid his installment unless upon favorable reports. Thus strict is the management of the funds; nothing could be stricter.

Miracles. Supposing God were about to grant a supernatural revelation of his will to mankind, there are two methods in which this knowledge might be communicated. It might, in the first place, be given to every human being in some way in which he would recognize it as Divine Revelation. This, however, would overbear moral agency, annul the power of choice, and make virtue and piety involuntary and inevitable, and therefore, characteristics not of self-determining individual wills, but of a race of automata, passively subjected to the Supreme Will.

The second alternative method is to commit Divine revelation to individuals chosen for that purpose, and to render it liable to those conditions of investigation, proof and acceptance or rejection, which are attached to all other subjects on which man is left to exercise his functions as a free moral agent. This desideratum is met by a revelation resting on evidence adequate, yet not irresistible; within the reach of inquirers, yet not forced upon them against their will; open to skepticism, yet with ample resources for converting honest skepticism into confident belief. But in what must this evidence consist? We answer, in one word, in miracle; that is, in phenomena aside from the usual course of nature, which are equivalent to the direct voice or the manifest seal of God. We can conceive of no other way in which a revelation can be promulgated as such. God without miracle might impart to the mind of an individual man so strong a persuasion of certain truths that he should absolutely know them to be true. But he has in that case no tangible, communicable evidence of these truths. To any other mind they are simply his opinions, not God's revelation. If he proclaims them, it must be on his own authority, backed by such reasoning as he can command, and if they lie beyond the sphere of consciousness, by no conclusive reasoning. But let him perform such an act as none can perform by the exercise of his own powers; let him give sight to a man born blind, or hearing to one born deaf; let him lift a dead man alive from the bier, or call forth from the sepulchre one who has lain there four days; then, if he talks of duty, God and heaven, if he proclaims truths beyond the realm of consciousness, his hearers know that they are virtually listening to the voice of God, that the Divine testimony attests his utterance, and that his words are absolutely and infallibly true. "In fact," says Dr. Gregory, "the very idea of a revelation includes that of miracles. A revelation cannot be made but by a miraculous interposition of Deity."

Are miracles possible? The best known and the most frequently repeated objection to them is that of Hume: "A miracle is a violation of the laws of nature, and as a firm and unalterable experience has established these laws, the proof against a miracle, from the very nature of the fact, is as entire as any argument from experience can possibly be imagined." This objection, however, is based on a wrong conception of the nature of a miracle. It is not "a violation of the laws of nature." It is the effect of a supernatural cause, acting along with and in addition to the natural causes constituting the system of the world. It is produced, therefore, by a different combination of causes from that which is at work in the production of natural phenomena. The laws of nature are only general expressions of that uniform arrangement according to which the same causes invariably produce the same effect. They would be violated by the production, at different times, of different effects from the same cause, but they are not violated when different effects are produced from different causes. The experience which testifies to their uniformity tells us only what effects may be expected to follow from a repetition of the same cause; it cannot tell us what effects will follow from the introduction of a different cause.

The God of the Bible is not, as Deism alleges, a God who, after He had created, retired to a place of rest; but He is the all-pervading life, the all-overshadowing power. "Upholding all things by the word of his power," is the declaration of Scripture, and the words of the Lord to the Jews who supposed the Sabbath of God was an end of all his works, are, "My Father worketh hitherto." Put these two ideas together—"God above all," and "God in all;" rise to the Bible's conception of the living God; then the idea of a miracle has nothing in it objectionable or difficult to our thinking. Miracles then become matters, in the higher sense, altogether natural.

See now this view is confirmed by the constitution of the world, of nature, as also of the human heart! How, then, is nature constituted? Reigns there in it actually the stiff, iron legalism which absolutely excludes the free ruling and interposition of God? Assuredly not. Plan there is, and order, certainly, in the whole course of nature, but no stiff sameness, no unbending necessity. Nature is by no means a mechanism, a nicely defined piece of clock-work, which winds itself up every day or every year; but it resembles a well-ordered commonwealth, in which laws reign, most surely, but such laws as leave play-room for the free-will. And so nature must be constituted, if it is to be the dwelling place of man, of man endowed with free-will. Only when so constituted can it allow in it the exercise of a will that chooses among different possibilities, and controls the event in nature to the attaining of its purposes. But if the free action of the human will is recognized, and room is found for it inside the laws of nature, why should just the Creator be excluded from such free action and ruling? As man in a peculiar way combines and disposes the forces in nature to his purposes, so that a result is produced which would never have been produced from the mere working together of the natural laws, so, only in an infinitely higher sense, God disposes the event in the world to His purposes.

The human heart, also, is so constituted that it must believe in the world-ruling God, as long as it believes itself. As soon as it knows of a Creator and Lord of the world, it cannot help praying to this God. That would be an absurdity and a contradiction, if the course of the world occurs according to unalterable laws, which form an insurmountable barrier, even for God, if everything proceeds according to blind necessity. But this the innermost voice of our own nature, of which we have the immediate assurance it cannot deceive, tells us that God's hands are not bound by natural law, but that He freely rules the world, and directs all according to His counsel. Therefore we pray. Can that be delusion? Can this prayer-impulse, with which every man, even the denier of miracles, is involuntarily affected when trouble presses hard upon the soul, can it be deception, or as the catching of a drowning man at a straw? No! it is a remnant of the truth in the human heart, which, when the earnestness of life brushes from the eyes the cobwebs of idle theories, stands out distinct and clear before the spirit.

By whom are the miracles of the Bible recorded? They were contemporaries who wrote the history of them. Moses was the author of Exodus, and the Evangelists published their accounts at the time when Christianity had its origin. There is thus contemporaneous authority. And the writers were certainly in a position to know the truth. Moses was the leader of Israel, taking part, indeed, having the command, in all things that were done. The Evangelists, too, were some of them apostles, always about the person of Christ, professing to be eye-witnesses of what they told; others were known to be the trusted companions of the apostles. They all had full means of information. And, if we look at the general character of their histories, we shall find them well worthy of credit. Many profane writers confirm various particulars recorded in the Penta-touch. The descriptions of countries, e. g., of the cities of Bashan, are verified by modern research. And, as to the evangelists, there is that air of truthfulness in their works which at once leads a reader to see that he is perusing an honest history. (See Holy Scripture—Credibility of.) It may be further added that, if untrue accounts of things are put forth by contemporaries, there is every probability of their being at once contradicted. The children of Israel must have known whether they passed dry-shod through the Red Sea; they were inclined to murmur and resist Moses; so that, when he frequently referred to that event, we can hardly conceive of their acquiescing in what he said, if he had given a false coloring to an ordinary fact. Moreover, a deep impression seems to have been made on neighboring nations (Josh. ii, 9–11). It was their interest to have the falsehood, if falsehood there were, exposed; and yet, so far as we can discover, there was no attempt of this kind. Take, again, some of the remarkable events narrated in our Lord's history, such as the raising of Lazarus, the casting out of devils, the curing of the sick, the resurrection of Christ Himself. We do not find, generally, the facts controverted, but explained away. Thus, when the people, surprised at what they saw exclaimed, "It was never so seen in Israel," the Pharisees declared, "He casteth out devils through the prince of the devils" (Matt. ix, 33, 34). The Jewish council, also, when Lazarus was raised, acknowledged, "This man doeth many miracles" (John xi, 47); and, to stifle the impression made upon the public mind, they consulted about putting Lazarus to death (xii, 10, 11). Certainly the simplest course would have been, if the fact reported were untrue, to expose its falsity, instead of trying to destroy the evidence of its truth. Later, in regard to the apostles, there is the same confession that a notable deed was manifestly done, which could not be denied (Acts iv, 16). An attempt, to be sure, was made, to discredit our Lord's resurrection; but the shift resorted to only proved the difficulty in which the chief priests felt themselves (Matt. xxviii, 11–15). So, then, neither at the time when the events occurred, nor a few years afterwards, when the histories were published, were the Jews able to impeach the truth of the recital. They had full opportunity of testing the facts; and they had certainly the will to convict, if they could, the Christians of mistake or imposture. But we see that for a series of years, through that whole generation, the facts were fearlessly appealed to by Christian teachers, appealed to under just the circumstances and in the very places where exposure of falsehood was most easy (Acts vi, 8; viii, 6, 7, 13; xiv, 3; Rom. xv, 19; Heb. ii, 4). It may fairly be said, then, that there is as much, nay, that there is more, historical evidence for these remarkable events than there is for any accepted statement of ancient authors, for the exploits of Alexander the Great, for example, or for the invasion of Britain by Julius Caesar.

Then, too, we have the testimony of enemies, without recourse to the Scriptures. The Jewish rabbies, in the Talmud, acknowledge these miracles, and pretend that they were wrought by magic, or by the power attendant upon a certain use of the name Jehovah, called tetragrammaton, which, they pretend, Jesus stole out of the temple. But we have positive testimony also from heathens. Celsus, who wrote in the latter part of the second century, not only allows the principal facts of the gospel history, but acknowledges that Christ wrought miracles, by which He engaged great multitudes to adhere to Him as the Messiah. That these miracles were really performed, so far from denying, he tries to account for, by ascribing them to magic, which, he says, Christ learned in Egypt.

Hierocles, President of Bythnia, and a persecutor of Christians, in a work written against Christianity, does not deny the miracles of Christ, but compares them with those which he pretended had been wrought a long time before, by one Apollonius, of Tyanea, a heathen, complaining at the same time that Christians made so much ado about the works of Jesus, as to worship him for God.

Julian, the Emperor, in the fourth century, acknowledges the miracles of Christ, and contents himself with trying to depreciate their importance. "Jesus," he says, "did nothing worthy of fame, unless any one can suppose that curing the lame and the blind, and exorcising demons in the villages of Bethsaida, are some of the greatest works." He acknowledges that Jesus had a sovereign power over impure spirits, and that He walked on the surface of the deep.

But then it is said that no testimony ever has been produced, or can be produced, strong enough to countervail the universal experience of mankind against miraculous interposition. There is really, however, a petitio principii here. The experience is assumed to be uniform only upon testimony, so that testimony and experience cannot be thus pitted one against the other. Besides, the experience that is for miracles is destroyed, in order to make out experience against miracles. The experience of the apostles and their contemporaries was, they have left on record, that miracles had been witnessed by them. So that the matter comes to a question of testimony at last—whether the testimony of those who declare that miracles were within their experience is to be overborne by the testimony of those who maintain that experience is against them. And observe, these testimonies are not fairly balanced unless the affirmative of eye-witnesses is met by the negative of eye-witnesses too, present at the same time, who could say that no miracle could have been performed without their perceiving it, and that they did not so perceive it. Indeed, the experience relied on by an objector comes, when it is sifted, to be the experience of a single individual, who disbelieves what others tell him from their experience, because he has not seen it with his own eyes, has not had experience of it himself. The legitimate conclusion from such a principle would be the destruction of all belief save that which was forced on a man by the evidence of his own senses. His own experience is against a thousand things in every-day life which he accepts without question upon another's credit, and acts accordingly.

The theories which have been invented to discredit the testimony we have for the occurrence of miracles are in the highest degree improbable and unsatisfactory. The coarse accusation of wicked fraud is perhaps now altogether abandoned; at least, it is held by none with whom it could be at all worth while to argue. Some, indeed, are still inclined to impute pious fraud, if not perchance to Jesus, at least to His disciples. It is in this way that they would account for the alleged resurrection of Lazarus. It was to give credit to the teacher whose influence was endangered, and was resorted to with the commendable motive of furthering his salutary projects of reform. The glaring improbability of this solution need not be dwelt on. How could such a deception be practiced under the very eyes of acute and powerful opponents? And, greater marvel still, how, if successful at first, was it that the mystery did not ooze out, or was not betrayed, especially when we know that there were false brethren, nay, even a traitorous apostle, who put himself in confidential communication with the priests and rulers, and could have enabled them to crush Christianity at once by the disclosure of the disgraceful secret? What a reward might Judas have obtained from the chief priests for such a disclosure!

The miracles of Christ, as to us reported, present many noticeable features. They were numerous; a multitude more having been performed than are described in detail (John xx, 30; xxi, 25). They exhibit great variety; they were wrought almost always instantaneously, by a word of power, without the use of auxiliary means, sometimes taking their effect at a distance from the place in which Christ personally was. They were permanent in their results, were subjected at the time to keen investigation, and convinced a hostile people of the truth of them, to such an extent that, though there were persons who concealed or resisted their convictions, very many in consequence attached themselves, to the great detriment of their worldly interests, in several cases with the sacrifice of their lives, to the person and doctrine of this extraordinary Teacher. They were miracles, too, of mercy, with no dark malignant influence; intended to relieve human suffering, and to promote the well-being of those on whom, or for whom, they were wrought. The only apparent exceptions were the cursing of the barren fig tree, with its consequent withering away, and the allowance of the devils' entry into the herd of swine. Reasons good may be found for both these, which cannot be detailed here. And the power of working miracles was conveyed by our Lord to his followers, was repeatedly exercised by them, and was continued for a while in the Church, how long, precisely, it is not easy to determine.

It is true that the evidence of the miracles, as addressed to us, has a different aspect, and rests on different grounds, from that which belonged to them at the time when they were first performed. But this change has not diminished their force as evidences, though it has somewhat changed its direction. If we have not the advantage of seeing and hearing and questioning those who were eye-witnesses of the miracles, the deficiency is fully supplied by the additional testimony that has accrued to us, in the history of Christianity, from their day to ours. If we have stricter conceptions of physical law, and of the uniformity of nature, we have also higher evidence of the existence of a purpose worthy of the exercise of God's sovereign power over nature. If the progress of science has made many things easy of performance at the present day, which would have seemed miraculous to the men of the first century, it has also shown more clearly how inimitable and unapproachable are the miracles of Christ, in the maturity of science no less than in its infancy. And when it is objected that "if miracles were, in the estimation of a former age, among the chief supports of Christianity, they are at present among the main difficulties and hindrances to its acceptance," we may fairly ask, What is this Christianity, which might be more easily believed if it had no miracles? Is it meant that the gospel narrative, in general, would be more easy to believe were the miracles taken out of it? The miracles are so interwoven with the narrative that the whole texture would be destroyed by their removal. Or is it meant, that the great central fact of the apostolic preaching—the resurrection of Christ—would be more natural and credible if he who thus marvelously rose from the dead had in his lifetime exhibited no signs of a power superior to that of his fellow-men? Or is it meant that the great distinctive doctrines of Christianity—such as those of the Trinity and the Incarnation—might be more readily accepted were there no miracles in the Scripture which contains them? We can scarcely imagine it to be seriously maintained that it would be easier to believe that the Second Person of the Divine Trinity came on earth in the form of man were it also asserted that, while on earth, he gave no signs of a power beyond that of ordinary men. In short, it is difficult to understand on what ground it can be maintained that the miracles are a hindrance to the belief in Christianity, except on a ground which asserts also that there is no distinctive Christianity in which to believe. It may with more truth be said, that the miraculous element, which forms so large a portion of Christianity, has its peculiar worth and service, at the present day, as a protest and safeguard against two forms of unchristian thought to which an intellectual and cultivated age is liable—pantheism, the danger of a deeply speculative philosophy, and materialism, the danger of a too exclusive devotion to physical science. Both these, in different ways, tend to deify nature and the laws of nature, and to obscure the belief in a personal God distinct from and above nature; against both these, so long as the Christian religion lasts, the miracles of Christ are a perpetual witness; and in so witnessing they perform a service to religion, different in kind, but not less important, than that which they performed at the beginning.”

Mitchell, Rev. Alexander, was licensed by the First Presbytery of Philadelphia, in April, 1767, and was ordained and settled as pastor of the Deep Run Presbyterian Church, Bucks county, Pa., in November, 1768. December 14th, 1785, he was installed pastor of Octorara and Doe Run congregations, Pennsylvania, and resigned the charge of the former in 1796. He still continued the pastor of Doe Run, where he remained until 1809, when, by reason of advancing years, he was unable to minister to them. He died December 6th, 1812.

Mitchell, Rev. Andrew Dinsmore, son of David and Martha (Dinsmore) Mitchell, was born in York county, Pa., February 20, 1821; graduated at Jefferson College, Pa., in 1841; spent three years in teaching, 1841-4; graduated at Princeton Theological Seminary in 1847, and was licensed in April of the same year, by the Presbytery of Donegal. On April 10th, 1850, he was installed pastor of the united churches of Paxton and Derry, Dauphin county, Pa., where he had a long and most useful pastorate of twenty-four years, and was released therefrom, February 12th, 1874. In June, 1876, he was appointed a Post Chaplain in the United States Army, and was stationed at Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, until 1881, when he was transferred to Fort Grant, Arizona Territory, where he died, March 26th, 1882. Mr. Mitchell was an amiable and warm-hearted gentleman. He was possessed of sterling and most substantial qualities, a delightful companion, a devout Christian, a conscientious and faithful pastor and chaplain.

Mitchell, Arthur, D. D., was the son of Matthew and Susan (Swain) Mitchell, and was born in Hudson, N. Y., August 13th, 1835. He was graduated at Williams College, Williamstown, Mass., in 1853, and was afterwards Tutor in Lafayette College, Pa., for one year. He spent the next year in travel through Europe and the East, and then entered Union Theological Seminary, New York city, from which he was graduated in 1859. He was licensed to preach by the Fourth Presbytery of New York, in April, 1859, and in May of the same year was ordained pastor of the Third Presbyterian Church of Richmond, Va. In October, 1861, he became pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church in Morristown, N. J. In 1868 he accepted a call to the First Presbyterian Church of Chicago, Ill. In 1880 he was installed pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Cleveland, Ohio. Dr. Mitchell is in the prime of life; an attractive and useful preacher; a devoted and beloved pastor; and influential in the benevolent and missionary work of the whole Church. He has been especially successful in awakening the interest of the Western churches in Sabbath-school and Foreign Missionary work, and one of his children is already a missionary in Mexico.

Mitchell, Elisha, D. D., was born in Washington, Conn., August 19th, 1793, and was the oldest son of Abner and Phebe Eliot Mitchell. His mother was a descendant of John Eliot, the “Indian Apostle,” of Massachusetts. Prof. Mitchell was graduated from Yale College, and after finding employment in a female seminary on Long Island, for two years, he became tutor in his Alma Mater; and the following year was appointed Professor of Mathematics in the University of North Carolina. After spending some time at Andover, Mass., he was licensed to preach the gospel by an Association in Connecticut. In January, 1818, he entered on his work as Professor at Chapel Hill. Upon the retirement of Dr. Olmstead, he was transferred to the Chair of Chemistry and Geology. In 1821 he was ordained by the Presbytery of Orange, thus becoming fully identified with the Presbyterian Church.

The sciences taught by Prof. Mitchell were then in their formative state, and daily additions were made to their stores. By diligent study of scientific journals, frequent experiments and exploring tours, with habits of close observation, he was able to keep abreast of his department, being forced to prepare the text-books for some of the sciences he taught. He was a rounded, catholic scholar, loving the classics, and familiar with English literature, while particularly devoted to Geography, History and the Natural Sciences. “Go ask Dr. Mitchell,” was the usual advice at Chapel Hill, when rare information on almost any subject was desired.

Dr. Mitchell's name is closely but sadly connected with the mountains of North Carolina. To them he came at no fewer than five different times, to explore their mineral treasures, to examine their trees and flowers, and to ascertain their heights. It was he that first made known the fact that the “Black Mountain” comprised the highest points of land east of the Rocky Mountains, and that the peak now bearing his name was the loftiest of the group. In June, 1857, he went to determine the exact height of the different peaks, and while, without a guide, he endeavored to descend into a valley, he was overtaken in a storm, and, losing his way, in the darkness, he fell over a precipice and was drowned in a pool of water at its foot. This occurred on the night of June 27th, 1857. His remains were not discovered until after a search of many days, and after being interred in Asheville, N. C., for a year, were exhumed and buried on the summit of Mt. Mitchell, six thousand seven hundred and seven feet above the level of the sea.

As he rests in his rock-hewn tomb, "before him lies the North Carolina he loved so well and served so faithfully. Its hills and valleys melt into its plains as they stretch away to the shores of the eastern ocean, whence the dawn of the last day stealing quietly westward, as it lights the mountain tops first, shall awake him earliest to hear the greeting of 'Will done, good and faithful servant!'"

Mitchell, Jacob Duche, D. D., was born in Philadelphia, November 2d, 1806; graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1827, and was a student of Princeton Theological Seminary two years (1825-7). He was licensed to preach by Oneida Presbytery, (N. Y.), September 18th, 1829. In Albany he labored about six months, in connection with Rev. E. N. Kirk, D. D., with great effect. He was ordained as an evangelist at New Hartford, N. Y., November 17th, 1829; received into the Presbytery of Winchester (Va.), October 22d, 1830, and dismissed from it to West Hanover Presbytery, April 8th, 1831. While in Winchester Presbytery his labors were chiefly given to Shepherdstown, Martinsburg, and Smithfield, in Jefferson county, where he labored with zeal and energy, and his labors were greatly blessed. In this early period of his ministry, and for years following, when he labored far and wide in Virginia as a revival preacher, all testimonies agree that he exhibited a most extraordinary pulpit power. Whole communities were aroused and entranced by him. His figure, face, voice, his expressive eye, his clear, earnest gospel sermons, all combined to produce remarkable effects. His gift of prayer was wonderful, and his gift of song not less so, and both were used frequently and most skillfully.

Dr. Mitchell was installed pastor of the Second Church at Lynchburg, Va., June 23d, 1832, and labored there with great success, until December 2d, 1835, when the pastoral relation was dissolved. For about two years he acted as Secretary of the Central Board of Foreign Missions for Virginia and North Carolina. He was installed pastor of Peak's Church, near Liberty, Va., March 16th, 1838. Here he conducted one or more series of meetings, which were productive of wonderful results. Large numbers were hopefully converted, among them several men who were afterwards prominent both in the Church and the State. This relation was dissolved, June 30th, 1852. Soon afterwards he was recalled to the Second Church of Lynchburg, installed October 25th, 1852, and remained pastor until October 28th, 1869. He then removed to Alexandria, Va., and labored from July, 1869, to March, 1873, as an evangelist, within the bounds of Chesapeake Presbytery. From the latter date until June, 1874, he acted as General Agent for Hampden-Sidney College. He died June 28th, 1877. Just before he was seized with the last illness, he expressed perfect submission to the Lord's will, and strong assurance of his readiness, through grace, to go and be forever with the Lord.

Mitchell, Rev. James, was born at Pequea, Pa., January 29th, 1747. His parents removed from Pennsylvania to Bedford county, Va., where they resided many years. Of the circumstances of either his classical or theological education little is known, though he was, for a time, previous to his entering the ministry, a Tutor in Hampden-Sidney College. He was licensed to preach the gospel by Hanover Presbytery, in October, 1781. Shortly after his licensure, he seems, by advice of his Presbytery, to have taken a missionary tour into the Western Territories. In 1772 he removed to Kentucky, where he exercised his ministry for a short time, and supported his family chiefly by teaching a school. In 1774 he was installed pastor of the churches of Hat Creek and Cub Creek, and preached to them about three years. In March, 1786, the Church of the Peaks, in Bedford, gave him a call, which he accepted, and here, with a congregation covering an indefinite extent of territory around the Peaks, he passed his long ministerial life. He died, February 27th, 1841. Mr. Mitchell often made missionary excursions, traveling for weeks and even months at a time, in the South-western counties of Virginia. Wherever he happened to be, he was always ready to preach, and his preaching was always acceptable and often highly effective. He was jealous of all innovations, not only in the doctrines but the usages of the Church.

Mitchell, James Young, D. D., son of James and Elizabeth Mitchell, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., in 1831. He graduated at Union College, Schenectady, N. Y., in 1851, and at Princeton Theological Seminary, in 1857. A call received to the pastorate of the Church at Phillipsburg, N. J., was promptly accepted, and during the four and a half years of his labor there the membership was largely increased, the church edifice, of which he found only the basement, when he settled, was finished, and practically freed from debt. In the early part of the year 1862 he accepted a call from the (now) "Temple Presbyterian Church," Philadelphia. This pastoral relation was sustained for fourteen years. Within this period, not only was the congregation largely increased in membership and spiritual growth, but its material advancement was signal. Another site was purchased, and a new church building erected at Franklin and Thompson streets. In 1876 he accepted a call to the Presbyterian Church, Lancaster, Pa., the field of his present labors. Here, under his prompt and successful energy, the church building was handsomely remodeled and improved, the expense of this measure met, and all previous financial obligations of the congregation paid off. During the succeeding years of his service to the congregation, it has steadily increased in numbers and influence, and now ranks among the first in the city.

Dr. Mitchell possesses rare social qualities. With dignity and affability of manner he unites energy, practical wisdom and reverential devotion. In his preaching he is thoughtful, fluent and direct in application. His clear enunciation and elocutionary powers add to his pulpit popularity. He is active and useful in Church judicatories, and was the Moderator of the old Synod of Philadelphia at its last session, in 1881, before it was merged, in 1882, in the new Synod of Pennsylvania.

Mitchell, Joseph Davis, M. D., son of John and Susan (Davis) Mitchell, was born in West Newfield, Maine, March 10th, 1823. He attended school at the Academy at South Newmarket, N. H., and later at North Parsonfield, Maine. After teaching a year he went to Boston (1844), and studied medicine in an office for one year. He then attended the Howard University Medical School for two years. The next year he studied Homoeopathy, and in 1848 graduated at the Eclectic School of Medicine, in Boston, and in 1850 graduated from the Howard University Medical School. Dr. Mitchell settled in St. Stephen, N. B. The severity of the climate soon compelled him to seek a warmer one, and in 1852 he removed to Jacksonville, Florida, where, with the exception of a few years' absence on public duty, he has continued to practice his profession with untiring energy and great success. After his location in Jacksonville he was made a trustee, April 11th, 1855, and April 17th, 1856, chosen an elder, of the Presbyterian Church of that city, in connection with the Northern General Assembly, which latter office he has ever since filled. Dr. Mitchell is a genial and kind-hearted gentleman, eminent as a surgeon, public-spirited as a citizen, faithful in the discharge of his duties as an officer of the Church, and justly held in high esteem by all who know him, for his manly, consistent and upright character.

Mitchell, Samuel S., D. D., was born at Clinton, N. Y., August 16th, 1839; graduated at New Jersey College, in 1861; studied theology at Princeton, and was ordained by the Presbytery of Carlisle, June 7th, 1861. He was pastor of the Pine Street Church, Harrisburg, Pa., 1861-9; of the New York Avenue Church, Washington, D. C., 1869-78; of the Reformed Dutch Church, "Heights," Brooklyn, N. Y., 1878-80, and since 1881 has been pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, Buffalo, N. Y. Dr. Mitchell has wielded a good influence in the important positions he has occupied. His pulpit talents are especially attractive, and his ministry has been one of large success.

* Deceased.

Moffat, James Clement, D. D., is a native of the south of Scotland and came to this country in 1833, with the intention of following his profession as a printer, but soon after landing he was introduced to Prof. Maclean, of Princeton, and learning from him that he was qualified to enter the Junior Class in the College of New Jersey, his love of learning prompted him to embrace the opportunity of receiving a collegiate education. He entered the Junior Class in 1833, and was graduated in 1835, and an offer being then made to him to engage as a private tutor to two boys about to study at Yale College, he accepted the proposal, and had the privilege of attending lectures in that Institution. At the end of about two years he returned to Princeton, as Greek Tutor, in which capacity he continued till September, 1839, when he accepted the appointment to the Professorship of Greek and Latin in Lafayette College, then under the Presidency of Dr. Junkin. In the Spring of 1841 he removed, with Dr. Junkin, to Miami University, Ohio, where he had been called to the department of Latin, and subsequently Modern History was added to his work. In the Spring of 1851 he was licensed to preach the gospel, and from September of next year he taught Greek and Hebrew in a theological school which had a short existence in Cincinnati.

Having been elected to the Professorship of Latin and History at Princeton, he returned to that place in the Spring of 1853. Upon the resignation of Dr. Carnahan, and the election of Dr. Maclean to the presidency, several changes were made in the Faculty, and Dr. Moffat was transferred to the Chair of Greek, which he held for a period of seven years, retaining still the lectureship of History, until a Professor was appointed to that department. In 1861 Dr. Moffat was elected by the General Assembly to the Chair of Church History in the Theological Seminary at Princeton, his present appointment. He is the author of an "Introduction to the Study of Esthetics," "A Comparative History of Religions before Christ," a "History of the Church in Scotland until the Reformation," and over one hundred historical articles in various periodicals. He is a gentleman of excellent spirit, attractive suavity of manner, and highly esteemed for his many virtues. As a scholar, writer, and teacher, he deservedly occupies a foremost rank.

Moffatt, David William, D. D., is a native of New Jersey. He was born at Morristown, January 9th, 1835, and studied theology at Princeton, N. J. He was ordained by the Presbytery of Madison, April 17th, 1863; stated supply at Jefferson, Ind., 1862-3, and pastor 1863-4; stated supply at Vernon, Ind., 1864-66; pastor of the First Church, Madison, Ind., 1866-70; pastor of Bridge Street Church, Georgetown, D. C., 1870-72; since which date he has had pastoral charge of the First Church, Ft. Wayne, Ind. He received the degree of D. D. from his Alma Mater, in 1881. Dr. Moffatt preaches with ability, directness, and unction, and has been blessed in his ministry. He is faithful in the discharge of pastoral duty, and is held in high esteem by those who know him.

Moffatt, James David, D. D., son of the late Rev. John Moffatt, of blessed memory, was born in New Lisbon, Ohio, March 15th, 1846. After teaching for a time, in the Fall of 1865, he entered the Freshman Class in Washington and Jefferson College, at Washington, Pa., but, under the imperfect union of the colleges then existing, spent the last three years of his course in Canonsburg, and was honorably graduated in the class of 1869, at the time of the consolidation at Washington. After spending the next two years as a student in the seminary at Princeton, N. J., he was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Washington, in April, 1871. Yielding to the earnest request of the Session of the Second Church of Wheeling, W. Va., on account of the disability of their pastor, his own beloved father, he supplied the pulpit during that Summer. But his father not recovering, as was expected, he was constrained to forego return to the seminary for the third year, and to become co-pastor, being to this end ordained and installed May 8th, 1872. In fact, he discharged the entire duties of preacher and pastor until his father's death, December 27th, 1875, and then succeeded him, abiding in strength and growing in popularity and usefulness until, under a call which he could not resist, he entered upon the office of President of Washington and Jefferson College, Pa., January 4th, 1882, his inauguration, for special reasons, being delayed until June 20th, following. The Degree of Doctor of Divinity was conferred upon him by Hanover College and Princeton College.

In his two years of actual service as College President, Dr. Moffatt has already vindicated the wisdom of the Trustees in their choice. His fine qualities as a pulpit orator are equaled by his ability in the classroom, and by his dignity and force as the head of the Faculty. Already he is in the full career of usefulness as the accepted and honored head of a college-second to no other in our land in its relative importance to the Presbyterian Church, having in the course of its history furnished fourteen hundred ministers of the gospel, out of an aggregate of three thousand graduates.

Moffatt, Rev. James Erskine, the youngest son of John and Letitia Moffatt, was born in the vicinity of Bloomington, Indiana, December 3d, 1843. He received his collegiate education in the Indiana State University and in Monmouth College, graduating from the latter with honors, in 1866. He was graduated from the Theological Seminary of the Northwest in 1869, and in May of the same year was ordained to the ministry, and installed pastor of the First Church in Decatur, Illinois. In the Fall of 1873 he became the pastor of the Church in Ottawa, Illinois, and since June, 1878, he has been the pastor of the First Church in Cumberland, Maryland.

Mr. Moffatt is a man of modest, frank and pleasing address; of cheerful temper; of warm affections, and a steadfast mind; judicious in counsel; prudent in speech; straightforward and honest in all things. Possessing the esteem and confidence of his fellow-men, his pastoral labors are highly valued, while from the pulpit he exerts a wholesome and widening influence through his varied discourses, which are clear, thoughtful, earnest, and often forcible presentations of the evangel, in its manifold relations to the true issues of life.

Monaghan Church, Dillsburg, Pa., was organized about 1742. The founders were Scotch-Irish, and in memory of their former home in Ulster, the Church was called Monaghan. The district is a portion of the far-famed Cumberland Valley, though the village lies within the limits of York county.

This venerable church, being for many years the only church in all that community, exerted more than ordinary influence for good. The foundations had all to be laid, as well as the superstructure built, and for a large part of its earlier history foundation-laying was its principal work. It was, therefore, the great conservator of morals and spirituality, its pulpit being the source whence emanated the religious instruction of the whole region of the surrounding country. It exerted a power that cannot be measured. It took a leading part in the educational interests of the day. In connection with the old church was a room (called the study) in which a secular school was kept.

The first preaching services at Monaghan were held about 1742. The house of worship first erected, and which was located about a quarter of a mile distant from the present building, was surrounded by a stockade, as a protection from the Indians. The early settlers carried their firearms to church, and stationed sentries on the ramparts. Rev. George Duffield, a name still highly honored in the church, was the first settled pastor. The Rev. John M'Dowell, for some time Provost of the University of Pennsylvania, was converted when only eight years old, by means of a sermon by Dr. Duffield, from Zech. ix, 12, "Turn ye to the stronghold," etc., in which these defences were used as an illustration.

Dr. Duffield's pastorate closed 1772. In 1782 a new stone edifice was erected on the present site. From that year until 1807 Rev. Samuel Waugh was pastor of the two churches, East Pennsboro, now Silver Spring, and Monaghan. He was a very acceptable preacher; his pastorate was the longest in the history of the church. From 1809 to 1815 Rev. John Hayes, Professor of Languages in Dickinson College, was pastor. From that year until 1832 the church was served by stated supplies, chiefly Rev. Alexander McClellan, D. D., subsequently Professor in the Reformed Theological Seminary at New Brunswick, N. J., Rev. Nathanael R. Snowden, the father of the late Hon. J. Ross Snowden of Philadelphia, Rev. Henry R. Wilson, father of the Secretary who bears his name, and presides over the Board of Church Erection, Rev. Nathanael Todd, and Rev. John M. Krebs, D. D., afterwards of New York.

Rev. A. B. Quay, father of the late Secretary of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, was pastor from 1830 to 1838. Rev. Edmund McKinney, afterwards missionary to the Indians, recently deceased at Keyport, N. J., was stated supply until 1842. From the beginning of this until the middle of 1858 extends the pastorate of Rev. Dr. J. A. Murray, with one exception the longest, and in many respects the most memorable, of the church. Rev. William D. Patterson, pastor-elect in 1859, died before installation. The Rev. John R. Agnew was stated supply for about a year. The Rev. John O. Proctor, now of Wooster, O., was pastor from 1862 to 1865. Rev. A. W. Hubbard, now a missionary (A. B. C. F. M.) in Turkey, next spent a brief but most fruitful pastorate of eighteen months with this people. He was followed by Rev. J. Q. A. Fullerton, ordained and installed June, 1873, who remained six years, and then resigned to accept a call to Curwinstown, Pa. The present pastor, Rev. John P. Barbor, has rendered an acceptable service for three years and is much beloved. It is noteworthy that, though by the influx of nationalities other than Scotch-Irish, and the removal of the latter, much of the population has changed within the last forty years, and though a Methodist and Lutheran church have been erected hard by, old Monaghan has held its own in point of numbers, and missionary work has made commendable progress.

The congregation at Petersburg, with which Monaghan formed a pastoral charge, was a part of this church, originally, and the history of both is necessarily almost identical.

The stone edifice erected 1782, burned and rebuilt 1813, was, in 1849, replaced by a brick structure, in which the church now worships. A comfortable brick parsonage was erected in 1874.

Among the children of the church were Rev. Messrs. Thomas Black, Thomas Eleock, of Van Wert, Ohio; George L. Shearer, one of the Secretaries of the American Tract Society, New York; Frederick E. Shearer, of San Francisco; Brice B. Blair and William H. Logan, of Millerstown, Pa., all of the Presbyterian Church; John Bailey, of the Huntingdon Bar; and Rev. Messrs. Fulton and Kerr of the Methodist and Lutheran churches respectively. Messrs. Black and Blair have gone to their reward.

The recent celebration (October, 1882), of the hundredth anniversary of Monaghan's occupation of its present site, was one of great interest. The attendance was very large, including many of those formerly connected with the church, and a goodly representation of ministers from the Synod of Pennsylvania, in session at the time, in Harrisburg.

The following sadly interesting incident was narrated by a speaker on Monday evening, the details of which were taken from an old copy of the Carlisle Herald, the date of 1804. "A communion service was being held in the church, Sabbath, July 15th, 1804. During the intermission a rain storm arose. A young man named John Patterson, while securing his saddle from the rain, was struck, at the foot of the tree, by lightning, and instantly killed. He had lately come into possession of an ample estate, and was soon to be married, having already procured his wedding-suit. The religious services proceeded under the deeply solemn impression that was made."

By this centennial celebration the memory of God's dealings with this people was quickened, the blessedness of those who are heirs of the promises of Israel's God stood out in new light, and Monaghan was inspired with renewed courage and cheer to move on in the name of the Lord.

Monfort, David, D.D., the son of Lawrence and Elizabeth (Casset) Monfort, was born in Adams county, Pa., March 7th, 1790. He was educated in Transylvania University; graduated at Princeton Theological Seminary in 1817; was licensed by Miami Presbytery in 1818, and soon became pastor of Bethel Church, in Oxford Presbytery. Here he labored for several years. Subsequently he was stated supply for Terre Haute Church, Indiana. In 1830 he was stated supply for Sharon Church, at Wilmington, Ohio. This lasted for a single year, when he became pastor at Franklin, Ind., and continued to be so for twenty years, greatly beloved by his people. In 1851 he was a member of Whitewater Presbytery, and remained without charge for a few years. In 1854 he took charge of the Church of Knightstown, Indiana, which he resigned in 1857, when he removed to Macomb, Ill., where he remained until his death, which took place October 18th, 1860.

Dr. Monfort was all his life a missionary preacher, until a year or two of his death, when he was laid aside on account of ill-health. He was thoroughly trained as a minister, an able expositor, an excellent linguist, an eminent ecclesiastic, an eloquent and popular preacher, and many seals were added to his ministry. He was the author of two sermons on baptism and one on justification, which appeared in a volume entitled "Original Sermons by Presbyterian Divines in the Mississippi Valley." He also contributed largely to the religious press.

Monfort, Francis C., D.D., was born September 1st, 1814, at Greensburg, Indiana. He came of two races of ministers. Both his grandfather, his father, and all the brothers of his father and mother, were ministers of the Presbyterian Church. He studied at Hanover and Wabash Colleges, graduating at the latter in 1861. He spent one year at the Seminary of the Northwest, two years at Lane Seminary, and three years abroad, at the universities of Edinburgh and Berlin. He was called, in 1870, to the Orchard Street Church, Cincinnati, where he remained three years, when the pastoral relation was dissolved, that he might accept a position as editor of the Herald and Presbyter, a position he still holds. In 1879, the First Church, Cincinnati, becoming vacant, Mr. Monfort was invited to fill the pulpit for a few weeks, at the close of which the invitation was renewed for a longer period. In 1881 he was called to and accepted the pastorate of the church, and has since that date combined the duties of pastor and editor, which he faithfully and acceptably discharges.

Monfort, Rev. Joseph Glass, D. D., son of Rev. Francis and Sophia (Glass) Monfort, was born in Warren county, O., December 9th, 1810. His father, who was for many years pastor at Hamilton, O., and Mount Carmel, Ind., was of Huguenot ancestry, and himself was born in Adams county, Pa. Dr. Monfort graduated in Miami University, Oxford, O., in 1834. He pursued his theological studies in 1835 and 1836, in Indiana Theological Seminary, at Hanover, Ind. In 1836 and 1837 he, in connection with Dr. W. L. Breckenridge, established and edited the Presbyterian Herald, in Louisville, Ky. He was licensed to preach in September, 1837, by the Presbytery of Oxford. He preached six months in Hamilton, O., from the date of his father's resignation of that charge. He received and accepted a call from Greensburg, Ind., in 1838, and was ordained and installed pastor of the churches of Greensburg and Sand Creek, by the Presbytery of Indianapolis, in April, 1839. The Church of Greensburg divided a few weeks before his call, soon after the Assembly of 1838. He resigned his charge in October, 1842, on account of the division. For two years after he was agent for the Theological Seminary at New Albany, Ind. In October, 1844, he was recalled to Greensburg, both divisions of the congregation uniting in the invitation. This call he accepted, and remained pastor at Greensburg until January, 1855, when he was invited, by the vote of the Synod of Indiana, and by a circular letter signed by a large majority of the Synods of Northern Indiana, Cincinnati, and Ohio, through the agency of Rev. Dr. E. D. MacMaster, T. E. Thomas, and J. M. Stevenson, to become the editor of the Presbyterian of the West, Cincinnati, from which the Rev. Dr. N. L. Rice had recently retired. He has since conducted this paper, first changing its name to The Presbyterian, and in October, 1869, uniting with the New School paper at Cincinnati, under the name Herald and Presbyterian. He was Stated Clerk of the Presbytery of White Water from its erection until his removal to Cincinnati.

He received the honorary degree of D. D., from Centre College, Kentucky, in 1853. For many years he was a member of the Church Extension Committee, and of the Boards of Domestic and Foreign Missions, and a Trustee of Hanover College, Indiana. For several years he was a Director of the Theological Seminary of the Northwest, and he is now a Trustee of Lane Theological Seminary, at Walnut Hills, Cincinnati, O.

For ten years preceding the event Dr. Monfort was an efficient promoter and earnest advocate, in his paper, of the reunion of the Presbyterian Church, and the Presbyter was the first Church paper that took decided ground for reunion. He was the author of the Newark paper on reunion, which was signed by seventy ministers and forty ruling elders in attendance upon the General Assembly of 1866, proposing negotiations for reunion. He was appointed by the General Assembly of 1866 a member of the Joint Committee on Reunion. He was the author and mover of the supplementary action of the General Assembly in Albany, in 1868, proposing to the other Assembly a change of the basis, so as to make its doctrinal theories, the Standards pure and simple, the basis of reunion. He was the author of an article in the American and Presbyterian Review, which was sent to all the ministers of both churches, proposing union upon the Standards alone as the proper basis.

Dr. Monfort was treasurer and manager of the finances of Lane Seminary, which he handled with skill and ability, from 1871 to 1883, covering the period of the great financial panic of 1873-75. He gave much of his time, for several years, to improving the grounds, re-grading and beautifying the campus, and in constructing new buildings. When it became apparent that the reduction of the rate per cent. of interest would impair the income of the seminary, he called in the funds and re-invested them in buildings, twenty-four of which he put up on vacant grounds, which have produced a net income of from eight to ten per cent. He is still, with his sons, E. R. Monfort, Esq., and Rev. F. C. Monfort, editor of the Herald and Presbyterian, and honored and esteemed by all who know him, as a firm friend and a wise counsellor.

Montague, Daniel Rice, was an honored and useful elder of the Presbyterian Church of Christiansburg, Va. He was born in Cumberland county, Va., October 16th, 1801, and removed to the county in which he died in 1821. He united with the Church at Christiansburg, August 18th, 1831, and was ordained a ruling elder in November, 1832. During the long period of forty-five years' service in this capacity, he was faithful, efficient, and increasingly acceptable in the church. Though a man full of business, he seemed always to hold his time at the disposal of the church when called upon to do anything for it. He was a good Presbyter, and took delight in attending the meetings of Presbytery and Synod. For long years he superintended the Sabbath school successfully. For three or four years before his death, together with another elder, he conducted a Sabbath school in the country, three miles distant from the town in which he resided.

Mr. Montague was universally esteemed in the community and county in which he lived. For more than twenty years he was clerk of the courts there. He represented the county in the Legislature also, and no citizen ever enjoyed more fully the respect and confidence of his fellow-citizens. He was a man of clear convictions, earnest piety, great decision of character, and justly noted for his devotion to duty. He died November 9th, 1877, in great peace. Not long before his death he asked for his Bible; he could no longer see, but grasped it with both hands; holding it thus, as the anchor of his hope, he engaged in prayer. Among his last utterances were the whispered words, the same with which his departed wife testified to the presence of the Lord on the borders of the great river—"Comfort, great comfort."

Montgomery, Alabama, Presbyterian Church of. The early population of the present city of Montgomery comprised a few staunch members of the Presbyterian Church, who, in emigrating, had brought their certificates with them, and continued steadfast in the faith. Indeed, the chief founder of the town, Mr. Andrew Dexter, was a Presbyterian. Although for several years without a regularly organized congregation, a place of worship or pastor, still they adhered to their profession of faith, awaiting the advent of the Presbyterian minister, and the enjoyment of the regular means of grace. No other professed servants of Christ exceeded them in their godly walk and conversation, and none were more prompt or more abundant in good words and works.

Presbyterian clergymen occasionally visited the town, and performed divine service previous to the erection of the Independent Church. In January, 1821, the Rev. Messrs. Sloss, of Cahaba, and Alexander, of Pleasant Valley, by order of the South Alabama Presbytery, sojourned for several days, conducting religious exercises, which were commenced with a sermon in the Court House by Mr. Alexander. During their stay the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper was administered by them to a few members living in the town and vicinity, members of other churches participating. This, it is believed, was the first time that solemn ordinance was ever observed in Montgomery.

The latter part of March, 1824, the Rev. Mr. White visited the town and organized the "Montgomery Presbyterian Congregation," there not being a sufficient number of communing members to constitute a church. This congregation was taken under the care of the Presbytery of South Alabama, which was to supply it with preaching. A committee of three were to be chosen annually to superintend the affairs of the Society. The committee for 1821, and the first chosen, consisted of Messrs. William Graham, William Sayre, and C. D. Connor. The first divine service, under the direction of the Committee, was conducted on Saturday, March 28th, 1824, when the Rev. Mr. White preached in the Court House, to a large and serious audience.

In 1825 the Rev. George Grey McWhorter (father of the late Dr. A. B. McWhorter), occasionally came over from Autauga county, and preached for the Presbyterians in Montgomery. This he continued to do until his death, in 1828. The Rev. Mr. McPhail and Rev. Mr. McGauley, also performed divine service here. In 1827 the Rev. Samuel L. Watson, of South Carolina, preached to the congregation during a part of six months, producing a lasting impression for good, and greatly encouraging the few faithful Presbyterians.

After the Rev. James Martin had preached here as a missionary for some time, he, in conjunction with the Rev. Isaac Hadden, of Claiborne, Monroe county, on November 8th, 1829, constituted the church. Application was made, November 12th, of that year, to the South Alabama Presbytery, to take the church under its care. This request was promptly granted, and the church, as the congregation organized in 1821 had done, worshiped at first in the house erected for all denominations, the present location of the First Methodist Episcopal Church.

In the early part of 1830 an effort was commenced for the erection of a house of worship for the congregation. In November of that year the Rev. James Hillhouse visited Montgomery, and preached to large congregations for three days in succession. The committee on the selection of a church lot purchased the present location on the south side of Adams street, between Court and Perry streets. The new building was commenced in the Spring of 1830, and was completed by the middle of November, 1831. On Sunday, the twentieth day of that month, it was consecrated to the service of Almighty God, with imposing and solemn religious ceremonies. This was the first church edifice regularly dedicated in Montgomery.

The Session records of the church until August, 1835, showed a constantly healthy increase of members, and a gratifying state of the church. From that period until October 11th, 1839, there appears to have been no regular records kept. Early in 1839 the Rev. Aaron B. Jerome, a graduate of the Theological Seminary at Princeton, N. J., was engaged as pastor, and entered upon the duties of his office. From March to July he labored assiduously, but the congregation was soon called to mourn the first death of a pastor. He fell a victim to the prevailing fever, July 23d. The Rev. David Finley became pastor of the church, January 12th, 1840. In that position he labored faithfully and with great acceptability until 1857, a period of seventeen years. His death occurred at Nashville, Tenn., January 2d, 1858.

The Presbyterians worshiped in the house dedicated to God in 1831, until 1844, when they resolved to provide for the necessity which had been felt for several years. They resolved to erect another edifice, and one more suited to the growth of the city and their increased congregation. They were the second denomination in Montgomery to erect a brick church. In July, 1844, the old building was taken down and converted into a lecture room, on the rear of their lot. This lecture room was used as a house of worship during the construction of the new edifice. The new church was completed early in 1847, at a cost of about $16,000, and has ever been an ornament to the city and a model of church architecture. The church was dedicated on Sunday, February 21st, 1847.

The Rev. George H. W. Petrie, D.D., the present excellent pastor of this church, who is elsewhere noticed in this volume, was the successor of the Rev. Mr. Finley in the pastorate, and was regularly installed by appointment of the East Alabama Presbytery, on Sunday, May 31, 1857. The church is now a large and influential one.

Montgomery, Rev. John, was born in Augusta county, Va. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Hanover, October 28th, 1778, and was for a time Tutor in Liberty Hall, Va. He was ordained, April 26th, 1780, and settled as pastor of Cedar Creek and Opecon churches, in Virginia. After spending a few years in these congregations, in 1789 he removed to Augusta county. Here he passed the remainder of his life. Mr. Montgomery was a very popular preacher, a good scholar, and an amiable man. In the latter part of his life his ministry was interrupted by bodily infirmities.

Montgomery, Rev. Joseph, was licensed to preach the gospel, by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, about 1759, and was ordained by the Presbytery of Lewes, about 1761, and settled as pastor of the Presbyterian churches of New Castle and Christiana Bridge, Del. From 1784 to 1788, Mr. Montgomery represented the State of Pennsylvania in the Continental Congress.

Montgomery, Thomas J., M. D., second son of James and Lydia (Johnson) Montgomery, was born at Danville, Ky., August 9th, 1812; received his education at St. Mary's College; studied medicine at Springfield, Ky.; graduated at the Louisville Medical College, 1838. He united with the Church at Springfield, in 1841; elected ruling elder, in 1843; practiced his profession and actively discharged his duties as elder till the Autumn of 1857, when he removed to Pettis county, Mo. He was one of the original members of the First Church, Pettis, from 1857 to 1865, when, with eleven others, he helped to organize the First Church of Sedalia, and became an elder in the same. In 1870 Dr. Montgomery was one of forty-two members who were organized into the Old School Presbyterian Church of Sedalia, and became, by election, a member of its first Session. In 1866 he was elected an Alderman of Sedalia; re-elected in 1869, and in 1871 was chosen Mayor of that city. For several successive years he was examiner of the medical department of the State University, a professorship in which he declined. He died May 17th, 1877.

In his religion Dr. Montgomery was calm, firm and devout, his faith was full and his hope bright, strong and comforting. A constant reader from his early youth, of more than usual mental power and logical acumen, his mind was stored with almost every variety of human knowledge and his convictions on most subjects clear, mature and firmly fixed. He especially loved to investigate topics connected with medicine and theology. His conversational powers were wonderful and from his first profession of religion he never failed to have Bible-classes, which he delighted to train in practical religious knowledge. The prayer meeting was seldom, if ever, missed, and greatly did he assist his pastor by the deep interest he felt in and the charm he threw around this important department of God's worship. He lived the life of an active Christian, and his end was peace.

Montgomery, Rev. William, was born at Shippenburg, Pa., 1768. In his early youth he emigrated with his father to South Carolina. He received a good education, classical and theological, and was licensed and ordained in North Carolina. In 1800 he was sent by the Synod of Carolina, with the Rev. James Hall and the Rev. James Bowman, on a missionary tour to the Territory of Mississippi, then just brought under American jurisdiction. This journey had to be made on horseback, along the only thoroughfare through the country, called the "Natchez Trace," leading from Nashville, Tenn., to Natchez, Miss., and was attended with great danger. Reaching the Territory, the missionaries visited the successive settlements, as far as Pinckneyville, in Louisiana, gathering together the Presbyterian element wherever found, and forming preaching stations which subsequently grew into churches. This mission was limited to a year. On his return, Mr. Montgomery became pastor of the Church at Lexington, Ga., and while in this charge, was concerned in the "Great Awakening" of the period, and was a witness to the extraordinary phenomenon of the "jerks." In 1810 he returned to the Mississippi Territory, with his family, with the view of making it his permanent home. He held for a short time the position of President of Jefferson College, an Institution established by the Territorial Government at Washington, the capital; then became pastor of the Pine Ridge Church, in connection with three others, and finally, for the last thirty-seven years of his life, served as pastor of the associated churches of Ebenezer and Union, in Jefferson county. He died in 1818, after having been fifty years in the ministry. He was an eminently simple, genial and benevolent man, maintaining through life a transparency and an equability, beautifully likened by one of his neighbors to those of the spring of water which gushed from a hill near his forest home, which poured forth its clear stream through all seasons of the year, and through all years alike. He was a devout Christian, a laborious pastor, and was permitted to witness large accessions to the flocks to whom he ministered. He was the fourth Presbyterian minister permanently settled in the Southwest.

Montrose Presbytery, Pa., was set off from Susquehanna by the Synod of New Jersey, October 18th, 1832. It comprised the territory of Susquehanna and Wayne counties, Pa., and consisted of seven ministers, viz., Ebenezer Kingsbury, Joseph Wood, Joel Chapin, Lyman Richardson, Daniel Dernelle, Adam Miller and Sylvester Cooke. The Presbytery had under its care eighteen churches. Some of these, notably Salem and Palmyra, Great Bend, Mount Pleasant and Bethany, were the first organized in Northern Pennsylvania. Their members were mainly of New England origin. Revivals of religion were early enjoyed among them. "County Prayer Meetings," "Conferences of Churches" and "Protracted Meetings" were accustomed to be held. Controversy at times raged over the great doctrines of the Church, and able champions of the faith were here found.

From the Presbytery of Montrose there went, as missionary, in 1817, to the Cherokee Indians, Rev. William Chamberlin; to the Sandwich Islands, in 1831, Rev. Lorenzo Lyons; to Patagonia and Borneo, in 1833, Rev. William Ames; to the Syrian Mission, in 1855, Rev. Jerre Lorenzo Lyons, and to the same, in 1855 and 1861, the brothers, Henry H. Jessup and Samuel Jessup. These were all commissioned by the American Board. Few Presbyteries can present a better missionary record.

The Presbytery of Montrose was associated with the New School body. It labored ardently for the reunion, and rejoiced heartily when it was consummated. At the time when merged into Lackawanna it consisted of thirty-four ministers, and had under its care thirty-one churches, and about three thousand communicants. Eminent ministers adorned its rolls. Among its elders one name will always be precious, that of Judge Jessup.

Moody, John, D. D., was a native of Dauphin county, Pa., and born July 4th, 1776. After graduating at Princeton College, in 1796, he studied theology under the direction of the Rev. James Snodgrass. Mr. Moody received a call, April 12th, 1863, to be Dr. Robert Cooper's successor as pastor of Middle Spring Presbyterian Church, Cumberland county, Pa., and, October 5th, 1863, was ordained and installed pastor of this church, where he remained until his death, in 1857. During the latter years of his life he was, through the infirmity of age, unable to perform ministerial work. Dr. Moody was an instructive preacher and a laborious, faithful and successful pastor. He was greatly respected and beloved in the community in which he so long lived and labored.

Moore, Charles Beatty, was born in Little Rock, Ark., March 31st, 1836, second son of Elizabeth G. and Rev. James W. Moore, the pioneer of Arkansas Presbyterianism; the first minister of this Denomination that ever settled or preached in the Territory, and a man of great piety and eminent usefulness. Charles Beatty graduated in the class of 57, at Princeton, N. J.; studied law under the Hon. John T. Jones, of Phillips county, and was admitted to the bar in 1859, at Clarendon, Ark., at which place he practiced for several years. He subsequently settled in Little Rock, where he now resides. In 1872 he was made a ruling elder in the church organized by his father in 1828, and is now ruling elder in the Second Presbyterian Church, built up largely through his instrumentality. He was elected Attorney General of the State in 1880, and re-elected in 1882, the best evidence possible that his services had proven acceptable to his constituency.

Major Moore is a man of strong convictions of duty and of unswerving integrity. His remarkable purity of character and sincere but unpretentious piety has secured for him the unbounded confidence of the people of his native State. He is, in his social habits, a most agreeable companion, and his house is the home of an abounding hospitality. Though at times appearing somewhat haughty and reserved, he is easily approached, and a generous friend to real worth in every station. His strength consists not so much in any peculiar brilliancy, as in sound judgment, and a rounded, full, well balanced moral and mental make-up; that sort of character which in its beneficent results infinitely exceeds, and is far more to be admired than what men call genius.

Moore, Rev. John Henry, son of James and Elizabeth L. (Check) Moore, was born in Green county, Ky., April 15th, 1823; graduated at Centre College in 1849, and studied theology at New Albany, Ind., and Princeton seminaries. He was licensed by Transylvania Presbytery, June 3d, 1852, and served the First Church of Hannibal, Mo., from December 1st, 1852, to May 1st, 1853. He supplied Clinton and Heyworth churches, Ill., from August 2d, 1853, to October 1st, 1854; Brazear Church, Mo., from November 1st, 1854, to May 1st, 1857; Atlanta Church, Ill., from November 1st, 1857, to May 1st, 1859; Farm Ridge Church, Ill., from June 1st, 1859, to June 1st, 1867. He was pastor of North Henderson Church, Ill., from November 2d, 1867, until April 5th, 1876, where he labored faithfully and successfully. Subsequently he had charge of the Church of Birmingham, Iowa, until his death, May 18th, 1880. Mr. Moore was an intelligent, earnest, laborious minister, a hearty lover of the doctrines and order of the Presbyterian Church, and an acceptable preacher. He was greatly loved by those who knew him, and many souls were gathered into his churches through his faithful labors.

Moore, Samuel, M. D., was born at Deerfield, Cumberland county, N. J., February 8th, 1774. His father was an officer of artillery in the Revolutionary Army, took part in the battle of Brandywine, and was wounded in the battle of Germantown.

Dr. Moore was a graduate of the University of Pennsylvania (1791), and was afterwards a Tutor in that Institution. He subsequently studied medicine, and practiced a short time in Bucks county, Pa. The state of his health obliged him to abandon the profession and enter into the East India trade, making several voyages to Canton and Calcutta. In 1808 he again settled in Bucks county, and in 1818 was elected to Congress from that district. He was twice re-elected.

In July, 1824, Dr. Moore was appointed, by President Monroe, Director of the United States Mint, Philadelphia. During his term of service the Mint was transferred from Seventh street to Chestnut street, the necessary appropriations for which were obtained chiefly by his own influence and exertions. The corner-stone of the new edifice was laid by him, July 4th, 1829. Dr. Moore resigned the office in 1835. He had thus filled this responsible place for eleven years, under the administrations of Monroe, Adams and Jackson. Subsequently he engaged in mining enterprises, and for many years was President of the Hazelton Coal Company.

He was a gentleman of high tone, great dignity, decision and energy, fine administrative ability, and a consistent member of the Presbyterian Church.

Moore, Thomas Verner, D. D., was born in Newville, Pa., February 1st, 1818. He was educated partly at Hanover College, Ind., under the venerable Dr. Blythe, and partly at Dickinson College, Carlisle, where he graduated in 1838. For a short time he was an agent of the American Colonization Society. His theological studies were commenced at Princeton, in 1839. In the Spring of 1842 he was installed pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church, Carlisle. In 1845 he resigned, in consequence of some church difficulties, and accepted a call to Greencastle. In 1847 he became pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, Richmond, Va. As a preacher he was eloquent and attractive. On account of delicate health, he accepted a call to the First Presbyterian Church, Nashville, Tenn., in 1868, but remained there only a short time. He was Moderator of the General Assembly (Southern) in 1867, at Nashville, Tenn. He died August 5th, 1871.

Dr. Moore was a voluminous writer. His published works, which indicate a highly finished scholarship, were "Commentaries on the Prophecies of Haggai, Zechariah and Malachi," the prophets of the restoration; "The Last Words of Jesus;" "The Culdee Church;" "Evidences of Christianity," and a number of occasional sermons. He was a contributor to the "Methodist Quarterly," the "Richmond Eclectic Magazine," etc., besides sharing in the editorship of the "Central Presbyterian."

Moorhead, Gen. James Kennedy, was born in Halifax, Dauphin county, Pa. He subsequently resided in Huntingdon, and came to Pittsburg in 1839, when he became Superintendent of the Pioneer Packet Line, which he established between Pittsburg and Philadelphia, his experience in that direction having been gained while Superintendent of the Juniata Division of the Pennsylvania Canal, and previously, as a contractor for part of the work on that canal. In 1839 he was appointed Adjutant-General of the State, and in the following year Postmaster at Pittsburg. In 1846 he was chosen President of the Monongahela Navigation Company, an office he has held ever since, much of that company's success being attributed to his management. During his residence in Pittsburg he has been connected with many business enterprises as well as educational and charitable institutions of the place. He was chosen to Congress, in 1858, and held the office five successive terms, in 1868 declining a renomination. During these years he served on the most prominent committees, and made an enviable record.

Of late years Gen. Moorhead has led a more retired life, but has, for all that, been prominent in Pittsburg, and is now President of the Chamber of Commerce, and Chairman of the Executive Committee of the Western Pennsylvania Hospital.

General Moorhead has been identified with the Third Presbyterian Church for over a third of a century, for many years one of the Board of Trustees and a ruling elder. He has frequently represented the Church in the General Assembly, and is chosen one of the twenty elders to represent the Presbyterian Church of the United States in the Pan-Presbyterian Council to be held in Belfast in 1884.

Of the General, the following is a truthful outline of character, written by the Clerk of the House while he was a Member of Congress: "General J. K. Moorhead is one of the manliest of men. He never prevaricates, equivocates, or shuffles on any question or on any occasion, and he has the faculty of saying 'No,' when he wants to, with the best grace, and so as to give the least offence, of any man I ever knew. Nobody ever had any doubt as to where Moorhead stood, and at home, as well as in Congress, his peculiar distinction was that of a man whom 'it would do always to tie to.' In all the material enterprises of Pittsburg, from the Monongahela Navigation, of which he was the father, down to a church meeting, or a meeting for charity, everybody felt that when Moorhead once put his shoulder to the wheel, as he most always did, the thing had got to move. He never flustered or blustered; was never in a hurry; never overburdened with work; never too busy to attend to the claims of charity, or even of society; but moved forward in all his enterprises and duties with the great power of a deep and flowing river; no noise; no grass and feathers; no nonsense of any kind."

Moorhead, Rev. William Wallace, tenth of eleven children of Judge Samuel and Martha (Bell) Moorhead, was born at Blairsville, Pa., February 28th, 1837. He graduated from Jefferson College in 1860; from the Western Theological Seminary in 1863, and was licensed by the Presbytery of Blairsville, April 9th, 1862. The first eight years of his ministry were spent at Camden Mills (now Milan), Ill. There he was ordained by the Presbytery of Bureau (now Rock River), October 25th, 1861. He labored much in adjoining churches, and outside his own charge. He was installed pastor of the Church at Greensburg, Pa., May 13th, 1871, and still continues in this relation. He is a devoted and efficient presbyter. As a pastor, he is eminently suited to his charge, by whom he is, each year, more and more beloved. The increase of his congregation made a necessity for an enlarged house of worship. Doctrinally, experimentally and practically he preaches an unadulterated gospel, and so as to inform the judgment, arouse the conscience and impress the heart.

Morgan, Hon. Edwin Barber, was born in Aurora, N. Y., May 24, 1806. He studied at Cayuga Lake Academy. His death occurred in Aurora, where he had always lived, October 13th, 1881. He was extensively engaged in mercantile pursuits. He was one of the original proprietors of the New York Times, one of the founders of the Wells and Fargo Express Company, one of the original shareholders of the United States Express Company, for many years President of the two former of these corporations, and Director of the latter. He was a member of Congress, 1853-59. For over a quarter of a century he was President of the Cayuga Lake Academy, and contributed largely to its support. He was a member of the Presbyterian Church at Aurora, and gave very liberally for its support.

Mr. Morgan was a trustee of the Auburn Theological Seminary many years. Together with William E. Dodge, each contributing one-half, he erected the Dodge-Morgan Library Building of the Auburn Theological Seminary. The edifice, which has room for holding 60,000 volumes, cost $10,000. Subsequently Mr. Morgan, in memory of his deceased son, gave $75,000 toward the dormitory building of the institution, since called "Morgan Hall." He was one of the charter trustees of Wells College, at Aurora, and afterward President of its Board of Trustees. To this Institution he not only gave his personal supervision for many years, but upward of a quarter of a million of dollars in gifts. His wife gave to the college the new Morgan Hall.

Besides these various gifts, Mr. Morgan's benefactions to worthy persons and institutions were almost innumerable. He helped many a young man to acquire an education and to start in business. He never oppressed a man for debt, and in several instances allowed the interest on securities to accumulate over and above the value of the property pledged rather than disturb deserving though unfortunate debtors. He not only gave largely to worthy objects, but in his giving he exercised a discrimination that is as rare as it is commendable. It was to him a pleasure to feel that he could aid in forwarding laudable enterprises of a benevolent educational nature, and there was no grudging in his gifts. He gave not to silence importunities, as many do, but because he was convinced that his benefactions would serve a good purpose. One anecdote out of many shows the spirit of the man. A well known gentleman of wealth, residing in New York, once complained to Mr. Morgan that he found it difficult to get proper investments for his money, and he asked for a suggestion. "Why," said Mr. Morgan, "not invest in some worthy charities? I have found them the best investments."

Morgan, Hon. Edwin D., whose death occurred February 11th, 1883, was a typical American citizen; as fine an example of the capabilities and fruits of our republican institutions as the country has ever produced.

He was born February 8th, 1811, on his father's farm, in the town of Washington, Berkshire county, Mass. At the age of eighteen he was a clerk in his uncle's store in Hartford, Conn., and a partner before he was of age. At the age of twenty-one he was elected to the City Council of Hartford. Removing to New York city in 1836, he engaged in mercantile business, and was very successful. Wealth was rapidly accumulated. In 1849 he was elected to the Board of Assistant Aldermen, and made its President. In 1850 he was elected to the State Senate, and became President pro tempore. In 1858 he was elected Governor of the State, by a plurality of 17,000 votes, and his administration of the State Government was one of marked economy and success. Having served two terms as Governor, he was, in 1863, elected to the United States Senate for the term ending on March 4th, 1869, and served on a number of important committees in that body. In 1865 he was offered the office of Secretary of the Treasury, but declined it, as he did also the same position when offered subsequently, by President Arthur.

After his retirement from the Senate, Governor Morgan devoted himself largely to his private business, and to the philanthropic, charitable and religious work of his useful life. He was an active member of the Brick Presbyterian Church, New York city, and was President of its Board of Trustees. His death was full of peace. To his pastor, who stood by his couch, he said, "I am ready to go now, if it is God's will, for it is better to be with him.

. . . I know that I have not been a good man, but I have tried to do God's bidding. I leave myself in His hands, for there I am safe." After a few moments spent in prayer the dying man raised himself on his couch and murmured, "How sweet, how precious, how comfortable. Christ, my Saviour."

Governor Morgan had a great heart. He was instinctively humane. The welfare of common people was very precious to him. If he never flattered, he surely never forgot, the masses. His sense of right was simply imperial. Politicians tried again and again to bend him to their purposes; reminded him of his obligations to them for office and honor; threatened him with their displeasure and hostility. But never to any purpose. His sturdy Puritan conscience stood out against them like a granite cliff. Merchant and support. The bequests in his will for charitable and religious purposes amounted to $795,000.

Morgan, Gilbert, D.D., was born in central New York, in 1791. Of his early life but few reminiscences are left. He graduated at Union College, Schenectady, N. Y., and studied theology at Princeton. Though earnest, evangelical and instructive in the pulpit, it was rather as a writer and as a teacher, that he was most remarkable. In 1836 Mr. Morgan removed to Pittsburg, Pa., having been elected President of the Western University, located there. Here he prepared, at the request of the Legislature, a report on Education, which was adopted by that State as a basis of their educational system. Later in life he taught in North Carolina, and finally settled in South Carolina, on the "High Hills of the Santee." Here, in a beautiful, salubrious location, retired from the bustle of the busy world, he spent seven years of laborious effort in the cause of education. The daughters of Eastern Carolina can never forget his faithful training; it was "polished stones" he aimed to make them. Gentle, courteous, patient, and withal so modest, that perchance the casual observer may not have suspected his wondrous stores of knowledge. The eminent Taylor Lewis, in a public document, pronounced him "one of the most learned men in the country."

In 1870 the University of New York conferred upon Mr. Morgan the degree of Doctor of Divinity. He died in New York city, at the residence of his son-in-law, Mr. E. DeLafield Smith, being still a member of Harmony Presbytery, Synod of South Carolina.

Morris, Edward D., D.D., the oldest child of David E. and Ann (Lewis) Morris, was born in Utica, N. Y., October 31st, 1825. There he resided, occupied during his youth chiefly as a clerk, until he had prepared himself for admission to Yale College in 1846. During his college course he was led to accept of the Saviour as the sinner's friend.

He was graduated at Yale in 1849. Thence he went to Auburn Theological Seminary, where his theological course was completed in 1852. He took charge of the Second Presbyterian Church of Auburn, and in June, 1852, was ordained to the work of the ministry by the Presbytery of Cayuga. He continued laboring successfully in this pastorate until the Autumn of 1855, when he was called to the Second Presbyterian Church of Columbus, Ohio. Here he labored with fidelity until 1867, when he was elected Professor of Church History and Church Polity in Lane Theological Seminary. He entered immediately upon the duties of his professorship, discharging them successfully until May, 1874, when he was transferred to the Chair of Systematic Theology. This position he still retains. He received the honorary title of D. D. from Hamilton College, in 1863, and was elected Moderator of the General Assembly which met at the city of Cleveland in 1875. Professor Morris has written extensively for the religious as he was, he indignantly refused to make money out of the war. One day, at his own table, to his wife he said, holding up a bit of bread, "Not the worth of this will I make out of this war."

But he was more than a man of conscience. He was a devout, consistent Christian believer and communicant. And as he drew near the end of his busy and eventful career, his heart opened itself more and more to Christian feeling, Christian purpose and Christian work. He gave $100,000 towards the land, and $100,000 to the buildings, now in the course of erection, for the New York Union Theological Seminary, and the library buildings, to bear his name. He also recently gave to Williams College a magnificent hall for dormitories, at a cost of nearly $100,000, which will bear his name. The Presbyterian Hospital and the Woman's Hospital were objects of his care.

newspapers, and for our Denominational Reviews. He has published, for the use of students, a volume of "Outlines in Theology." He is understood to be preparing other volumes for the press.

Dr. Morris is a careful writer, an earnest and able preacher, a painstaking teacher, conscientious and persistent in his labor. His connection with Lane Theological Seminary has marked a period of steady and valuable progress in that Institution. In his ministry and teaching his work has revealed deep underlying convictions, and unwavering devotion to those convictions. Blessed with a good share of physical health, he has crowded the years full of valuable labor for the cause of Christ, and is now in the midst of a life of large usefulness.

Morris, Herbert W., D. D., was born in Wales, July 21st, 1818, and received his education, classical and theological, at London, England; but ere he had quite completed his course in the latter branch, obliged to discontinue all study in consequence of an affection of his eyesight; came to America in 1842. After a reluctant rest in this country, of nearly four years, he presented himself, in 1846, before the Presbytery of Utica, N. Y., and was duly examined and licensed to preach. In the Fall of 1847 he became the pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Martinsburg, Lewis county, N. Y., where he remained until February, 1850, when he was called to the First Presbyterian Church of Little Falls, N. Y., of which he continued the pastor something over ten years. From this place he removed to Indiana, where the next six years of his ministerial labors were spent. Early in the year 1847 he was installed pastor of Calvary Presbyterian Church, in the city of Rochester, N. Y., which position he held for ten years, his labors resulting in doubling the membership and in building a handsome new edifice. This charge he resigned in 1857, to devote himself exclusively to literary labors. In 1850, and while pastor of Calvary, he published a work entitled "Science and the Bible," which in a short period reached a sale of fifty thousand copies. In 1875, this was followed by another, "Present Conflict of Science with Religion," which also met with a very favorable reception from the public. In recognition of his attainments and productions, the University of Rochester conferred on him, in 1876, the degree of D. D. In 1880, his "Testimony of the Ages to the Truth of Scripture" appeared, a work of immense labor, embracing some five thousand corroborations of the Bible, gathered from all accessible sources. And in 1883 a fourth volume appeared from his pen, entitled "The Celestial Symbol, or the Natural Wonders and Spiritual Teachings of the Sun," a production quite unique in its conception, and which has already received many high commendations. This writer is still hale, and laboriously engaged in his study, hoping, ere he lays down his pen, to make yet other contributions in furtherance of the cause of his Blessed Master.

Morris, Robert Desha, D. D., son of Joseph and Mary (Overfield) Morris, was born in Washington, Mason county, Ky., August 23d, 1814. He graduated from Augusta College, Ky., in 1834; entered Princeton Seminary the same year, and having spent four years in study there, was regularly graduated, in 1838; was licensed by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, April 19th, 1838; was ordained by the Second Presbytery of Philadelphia, October 23d, 1838, and was the same day installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Newtown, Bucks county, Pa. Here he spent a useful pastorate of eighteen years, teaching, for most of the time, in a parochial school, which he founded soon after his installation. For eighteen years he served as a Trustee of Lafayette College. He resigned his pastoral charge in Newtown, April 16th, 1856, and removed to Ohio. In 1859 he became President of the Female College of Oxford, Ohio, which office he held until his death. He was thenceforward known chiefly as an educator, to which profession he gave energetic and persevering labor, with abundant testimonies of the success of his work. For several years he was in feeble health. The last three months of his life he went out very little, but was confined to his bed only about one week. Understanding well his situation, he had clear views of his acceptance through the merits and mediation of Christ. "Oh, religion is a glorious reality; I feel this more now than ever before." "All my hope is in Christ, my precious Saviour." "Oh! the great, great salvation! cling to it." These and many like utterances of trust and triumph fell from his lips during the very last hour of his life. He died November 3d, 1882.

Dr. Morris was a man of high tone, warm in his friendships, a lover of good men and of the Church of God, to which he gave the services of a loyal son and the best labors of his life.

Morris' Reading House. This was the first of several buildings erected in the Valley of Virginia about the year 1740, and with which the rise of Presbyterianism in that region is inseparably connected. They were erected to accommodate those who were dissatisfied with the preaching of the parish incumbents, and anxious to enjoy the privilege of listening, on the Sabbath, to the reading of instructive and devotional works on religion.

"The origin of this movement," says Dr. Gillet, "was somewhat singular. The people had, for the most part, never heard or seen a Presbyterian minister. But reports had reached them of revivals in Pennsylvania, New Jersey and New England. A few leaves of Boston's 'Fourfold State,' in the possession of a Scotch woman, fell into the hands of a gentleman, who was so affected by their perusal that he sent to England, by the next ship, to procure the entire work. The result of its perusal was his conversion. Another obtained possession of 'Luther on Galatians.' He, in like manner, was deeply affected, and ceased not to read and pray till he found peace in Christ.

"These persons, with two or three others, all heads of families, without previous consultation or conference, absented themselves at the same time from the worship of the parish church. They were convinced that the gospel was not preached by the parish minister, and they deemed it inconsistent with their duty to attend upon his ministrations. Four of them were summoned on the same day, and at the same place, to answer to the proper officers for their delinquency. For the first time they here learned their common views. Confirmed in them by this unexpected coincidence, they thenceforth chose to subject themselves to the payment of the fines imposed by law rather than attend church where they felt that they could not be profited.

"They agreed, at first, to meet every Sabbath, alternately at each other's houses, to read and pray. Soon their numbers increased. Curiosity attracted some and religious anxiety others. The Scriptures and Luther on Galatians were first read. Afterward a volume of Whitefield's sermons fell into their hands (1743). 'My dwelling-house,' says Mr. Morris, 'was at length too small to contain the people. We determined to build a meeting-house, merely for reading.' The result was that several were awakened, and gave proof of genuine conversion. Mr. Morris was invited to several places, some of them at a considerable distance, to read the sermons which had been so effective in his own neighborhood. Thus the interest that had been awakened spread abroad.

"The dignitaries of the established Church saw the parish churches deserted, and took the alarm. They urged that indulgence encouraged the evil, and hence invoked the strong arm of the law to restrain it. The leaders in the movement were no longer regarded as individual delinquents, but a malignant cabal, and, instead of being arraigned merely, before the magistrates, they were cited to appear before the Governor and Council.

"Startled by the criminal accusation which was now directed against them, of the nature, extent, and penalties of which they had indistinct conceptions, they had not even the name of a religious Denomination under which to shelter their dissent. At length, recollecting that Luther, whose work occupied so much space in their public religious readings, was a noted reformer, they declared themselves Lutherans.

"But it so happened that, on the way to Williamsburg, to appear before the Governor, one of the company, detained by a violent storm at a house on the road, fell in with an old volume on a dust-covered shelf, which he read, to while away the time. Amazed to find in it the expression of his own religious sentiments, so far as they had been definitely formed, he offered to purchase the book, but the owner gave it to him. At Williamsburg he, with his friends, more carefully examined the work, and all were agreed that it expressed their own views. When they appeared before the Governor, therefore, they presented this old volume as their creed. The Governor, Gooch, himself of Scotch origin and education, looked at the volume, and found it to be the Confession of Faith of the Presbyterian Church of Scotland. He consequently denominated the men arraigned before him Presbyterians, and dismissed them, with the gentle caution not to excite disturbance. One of the party firmly believed that this leniency on the part of the Governor and the Council was due, in part, to the impression made by a violent thunder-storm, then shaking the house in which they were assembled, and wrapping everything around them alternately in darkness and in sheeted flame."

Morrison, Rev. George, was born at Whiteclay Creek Farm, in New Castle county, Del., January 15th, 1797, the oldest of six children of Douglass and Elizabeth (Wilson) Morrison. He pursued his classical studies under the Rev. Dr. Russell, Principal of the Newark Academy, and pastor, and his theological studies with the Rev. Dr. Samuel Martin, of Chanceford, York county, Pa., one of the eminent men of his generation. His licensure to preach the gospel was received from the Presbytery of New Castle, in 1822. In the same year he was called to the charge of the Bethel Church, in Harford county, Md., and about this time also purchased a farm in Baltimore county, at Sweet Air, at which place he shortly afterwards established a classical boarding-school, which he conducted in conjunction with his ministerial labors at Bethel and other points in Baltimore and Harford counties. After a successful and arduous ministry of fifteen years, he died, April 19th, 1837, and his remains are interred in the graveyard of the old and historic church of Bethel. Mr. Morrison continued pastor of Bethel Church through his entire ministry. He was an exemplary and useful man. His simplicity of manner, honesty, candor, integrity, fidelity and constancy in friendship, opened every heart to receive him without jealousy or suspicion. His visits to the families of his church were profitable beyond what is common. His discourses, which were plain and Scriptural, were always delivered with an earnestness and warmth which showed the deep sense which he had of his solemn station, as standing up in Christ's stead, and entreating sinners to be reconciled to God. He was a pure, old style adherent to the doctrines and order of the Presbyterian Church as stated in its Standards. He knew no sophistry. The metaphysics of the Bible were all the metaphysics he ever studied, and all his pride was spent in understanding them. His preaching was not with the enticing words of man's wisdom, but in demonstration of the spirit and of power."

Morrison, Rev. George, the son and fourth child of Rev. George and Elizabeth (Lovell) Morrison, was born at Sweet Air, Baltimore county, Md., January 30th, 1831. He graduated at Princeton College, in 1852. In the Autumn of the year of his graduation, he established a classical school at Sweet

Air, which proved to be a successful step. In 1854 he was elected Principal of the Baltimore City College, which position he held until 1857, the Board of School Commissioners on the occasion of his resignation passing resolutions highly complimentary to the faithful and efficient manner in which he performed his duties. After studying theology at the Danville Theological Seminary, he was licensed, in 1860, by the Presbytery of Baltimore, to preach the gospel. In the Autumn of that year he accepted the charge of a church at Cynthiana, Ky., and in 1865 resigned it to become pastor of the First Presbyterian Church at Terre Haute, Ind., in which position he remained until 1870, and whilst there, contributed to the "Herald and Presbyter," performed considerable missionary and educational work for his Presbytery and Synod, and paid off the debt of the church building at Terre Haute. In 1872 he was chosen pastor of the Bethel Church of Harford county, Md. In 1873 he became editor and one of the proprietors of the "Presbyterian Weekly" of Baltimore. In 1876 he resigned his charge of the Bethel Church, to assume that of the Grove Church, Harford county. Mr. Morrison is a gentleman of great force of character and marked individuality. As a preacher, he is earnest and impressive, and as a presbyter, active and faithful.

Morrison, Rev. James, was born in Cabarrus county, N. C., in 1795. His parents were eminently pious, and from childhood he was taught to "know the Scriptures." Prepared for college by his pastor, Rev. John M. Wilson, D.D., a distinguished teacher of a classical school, he graduated in the University of North Carolina, at Chapel Hill, in 1814. His services were at once obtained for the Raleigh Academy, after which he was appointed Tutor in the University, and served one year. His theological course was conducted under the direction of Rev. Robert H. Chapman, D.D., and he was licensed on the 5th of April, 1817, and ordained on November 15th following, by the Presbytery of Orange. He was called from missionary labor in the eastern part of North Carolina, to take charge of New Providence Church, in Rockbridge county, Va., and was installed September 25th, 1819. This was his only charge, and extended through a period of thirty-eight years. His and the pastorates of Rev. John Brown and of Rev. Samuel Brown, his immediate predecessor and father-in-law, made up a period of about one hundred years. During his pastorate, over seven hundred persons were added to the church, on profession of faith. His diligence and fidelity, united with affection in pastoral work and his scriptural preaching, thus received a decided testimony. He was remarkable for punctual attendance in the Church courts and the meetings of the Board of Trustees of Washington College, of which he was, till the infirmities of age closed his service, for nearly a generation, an active member. He was also, for many years, a Director of Union Seminary, and though attendance involved a ride on horseback of one hundred miles, he was rarely out of place. Besides the service of the largest congregation in the Synod, he, for most of the period of active life, conducted successfully a classical school. Such a life of labor broke down his constitution, so that from 1851 to his death he was an invalid. In much infirmity of body, he continued his work till April, 1857. During his thirteen years of decline, his soul was ever at peace, and "I know whom I have believed, that He is able to keep that I have committed unto him till that day," expressed his daily trust. However much both body and mind were impaired, his faith and hope never wavered, and thus, November 10th, 1870, he entered into "the joy of his Lord." His children and children's children rise up to call him blessed.

Morrison, Rev. James H., third son of Rev. W. N. Morrison, was born in Buncombe county, N. C., February 2d, 1819. He worked on his father's farm and attended school alternately, while a boy, and was greatly favored in enjoying the instructions of the late Colonel Stephen Lee, in his Classical and Mathematical school, near Asheville, N. C. After placing himself under the care of Meeklenburg Presbytery, he entered Davidson College, in 1869. He studied and taught school, alternately, until 1875, when he graduated, with marks of honor throughout his course. After spending two years (1877-78) at Union Theological Seminary, Virginia, he was invited to assist Rev. E. O. Guerrant in the wide fields of Bath and Montgomery counties, Ky. He was licensed to preach the gospel by West Lexington Presbytery, May 7th, 1878, after which he supplied the Owingsville and Springfield churches, in Bath county, for a year, and the Walnut Hill Church, near Lexington, Ky., for about six months. In May, 1879, he was called to the Portland Avenue Church, Louisville, Ky., where he was ordained as pastor, October 19th, 1879. Mr. Morrison is an earnest, able and successful preacher. His labors have been greatly blessed. During his present pastorate of four years, at Louisville, more than one hundred and fifty persons have made a profession of their faith in Christ, in his own church and other churches of Louisville Presbytery, through his instrumentalities.

Morrison, John Hunter, D. D., son of James and Eleanor (Thompson) Morrison, was born in Wallkill Township, Orange county, N. Y., June 29th, 1806. Was graduated from the College of New Jersey in 1831, and from Princeton Seminary in 1837; was licensed by the Presbytery of New York, September 12th, 1837, and was ordained by the same Presbytery, October 1st, 1837. Soon after his ordination he sailed for India, and thenceforward his whole ministerial life was spent in the Foreign Missionary work, in connection with the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions, twice making brief visits to his native land. During one of these, in 1863, he was elected and served as Moderator of the General Assembly, at its sessions in Peoria, Ill. It was at Dr. Morrison's suggestion, while in India, that the first week of January was set apart for united prayer for the conversion of the world to Christ. He lived and labored successively at Allahabad, Agra, Sabathlu, Simla, Ambala, Lahore, Rawal Pindi and Dehra Doon. He was a man of rare devotion to his work, doing the one thing only, of living to advance the kingdom of the Lord Jesus Christ. Through many trials he stood bravely at his post, until his Master called him home. He died of Asiatic cholera, September 16th, 1881, at Dehra Doon, India. His dying words were, "It is perfect peace; I know whom I have believed."

Morrison, Robert Hall, D. D., the son of William and Abigail (McEwen) Morrison, was born in "Rocky River Congregation," Cabarrus county, N. C., September 8th, 1798. His grandfather, Robert Morrison, emigrated from the Isle of Lewis, Scotland, about 1750, and settled in North Carolina. Robert Hall, the grandson, pursued his classical studies in Rocky River Academy, under Rev. John Makemie Wilson, D. D. He was graduated from the University of North Carolina, in 1818, in the class of President James K. Polk, Governor Mosely, of Florida, and Bishop Green, of Mississippi. After graduating he studied theology under his pastor, Dr. John M. Wilson, and was received under care of Concord Presbytery, September 1st, 1818; licensed by the same, September 6th, 1820, and ordained, by the same, pastor of Providence Church, April 21st 1821, and immediately elected Commissioner to the Assembly, at Philadelphia. He was dismissed to Fayetteville Presbytery, April 3d, 1822, and labored as pastor of Fayetteville Church for three years. About this time the College of New Jersey gave him the degree of A. M. During his stay in Fayetteville he edited a paper—called the Religious Telegraph, perhaps. In 1827 he returned to Concord Presbytery, and took charge of Sugar Creek Church, preaching a portion of his time in the neighboring village of Charlotte.

In 1835 he introduced into Concord Presbytery the resolutions that led to the establishment of Davidson College, and receiving an appointment as Agent, together with Rev. P. J. Sparrow, raised $30,000 for that purpose. At the opening of the College he was called, as its first President, to organize the Institution. He began work there in February, 1837, and faithfully and wisely reduced the enterprise into working order, as a Manual-labor College. The manual-labor feature was dropped after a couple of years, as impracticable. In 1838 the University of North Carolina conferred upon him the honorary degree of Doctor of Divinity. In 1840, in consequence of impaired health, Dr. Morrison resigned the presidency of Davidson College, and retired to his farm in Lincoln county, where he still survives. He continued to preach at several neighboring churches until 1880, when he ceased, through the infirmities of age.

Dr. Morrison was an impressive, elegant and instructive preacher, loving the Church and its Head, and laboring for its advancement as long as shattered nerves would allow. His influence in the Church was great, and probably none but he could have succeeded in carrying into effect the often tried enterprise of establishing a good college in western North Carolina. His piety, zeal for the glory of God, eloquence, and influence with public men, succeeded in securing a desirable charter for the College, and his untiring patience and acquaintance with affairs enabled him to put the scheme in successful operation.

Morrison, Rev. William N., now in the seventy-third year of his age, resides in Asheville, N. C., laid aside, as he has been for several years, from the active duties of the ministry, by the infirmities of age and disease. He is the son of John Morrison, who was, for many years before his death, an efficient and venerated ruling elder in Rocky River Church, in Cabarrus county, N. C. His academical course was taken under his eldest brother, Rev. James Morrison, in Rockbridge county, Va. After graduating at Washington College, Va., he went to the Theological Seminary at Princeton in 1831, but his health failing there, he intermitted his studies for a time, and then completed them at Union Seminary, Va. He was licensed to preach April 30th, 1835; ordained by Presbytery of Morgantown, November 11th, 1837; stated supply of Goshen and New Hope churches, N. C., 1836-7; pastor of Goshen, 1837-10; stated supply of New Hope, 1837-11; stated supply of Swannanoa, Reem's Creek, and Flat Creek, 1841-54, and teacher and Sunday-school missionary, Asheville, 1854.

For several short periods of time, Mr. Morrison was the only Presbyterian minister west of the Blue Ridge, in North Carolina. Very few of those who called him and grew in grace under his arduous ministry remain, but their children and children's children rise and call him blessed. He has been a faithful servant in the Lord's vineyard. "The revelation of the 'great day' only," writes a hand guided by affection, "will make known the toils and trials through which he and his family have passed to sow the seed of the gospel; but he will soon be called up higher, to receive from Him who 'gave Himself for us,' the 'Well done, enter into the joy of thy Lord,' the hope of which sustains him under all the infirmities of declining years."

Morse, Rev. Richard Cary, was born September 19th, 1811, in Hudson, N. Y., graduated at Yale College in 1862, and at both Union and Princeton Theological Seminaries in 1867. October, 1867, to December, 1869, was assistant editor of the New York Observer. January 15th, 1869, was ordained by the Third Presbytery of New York. In January, 1870, accepted an invitation of the International Committee of the Young Men's Christian Associations of the United States and British Provinces, to act as Editor and Secretary of the Committee. January, 1870 to 1872, was wholly occupied as editor of the Association Monthly, published by the Committee. January to September, 1872, acted as Visiting Secretary of the Committee, and in October, 1872, became the General Secretary of the Committee. In all these positions he has been diligent and efficient. In 1872, 1875, 1878, and 1881, he visited Europe, to attend, in each instance, the Triennial meeting of the World's Conference of the Young Men's Christian Associations, being appointed, in 1878, the American member of the Executive Committee of that Conference.

Morton, Rev. John Ballard, son of Elisha and Amelia (Ballard) Morton, was born in New York City, August 3d, 1815; was graduated from the University of New York, A. D. 1835; studied at Princeton Seminary nearly three years, 1835-38, but was not graduated; was licensed by the Presbytery of New York, October 10th, 1838; and was ordained by the Presbytery of Miami, at Middletown, Butler county, Ohio, April 25th, 1843. He successively labored as stated supply at Portsmouth, Va., from February to July, 1839; at Middletown, Ohio, as supply, from June, 1840, until installed as pastor there, April 25th, 1843; released for half his time, April 1st, 1845, and for the other half, March 15th, 1847; Franklin, Ohio, stated supply, April 7th, 1847, until installed as pastor, November 17th, 1848; released September 11th, 1850; Middletown, Ohio again, as stated supply and teacher, from 1852 to October, 1856, then again installed as pastor there, October 15th, 1856, and released January 31st, 1865; stated supply at Dick's Creek, Ohio, 1865-66; at Monroe, Ohio, from January to August, 1866; stated supply to Springfield, Ohio, Second Church, 1867-68; stated supply at Venie, Ohio, 1870-71; stated supply at Highland, Kansas, 1872-75; and stated supply at St. Charles, Mo., from February, 1875, until the end of his life. He died March 31st, 1882. His last days were marked by devotion to his Master's work, and faith and hope in lively exercise. As a man, he was kind, cheerful and affectionate; as a preacher, earnest, evangelical and able; as a teacher, analytic and thorough; as a writer, clear and critical; as a scholar his knowledge was wide and accurate; as a Christian, he was pure, consistent, and charitable.

Morton, Rev. Samuel Mills, was born in Lawrence county, Pa., April 20th, 1810. His father was for many years a ruling elder in the Presbyterian Church. He graduated at Jefferson College, Pa., in 1831, winning the Valedictory in a class of thirty-four members. After completing his theological course at the Western Theological Seminary, at Allegheny, Pa., he began his ministry, in the Autumn of 1837, by taking charge of the North Presbyterian Church, St. Louis. During his pastorate the church was freed from debt, and its communicants were increased from one hundred and forty to two hundred and eighteen. In 1871 he accepted a call to the First Presbyterian Church of Urbana, Illinois, where the roll of membership was more than doubled within three years. He came to Jacksonville, Ill., in 1874, as pastor of the Westminster Presbyterian Church, where he has remained until this writing, in 1883. Recent religious interest and fresh additions to membership bear witness to his ever-growing influence among his people. His theology is liberal, yet conservative; his preaching practical and earnest; his delivery fluent and attractive. Mr. Morton takes a prominent part in social reforms. He is a radical Temperance advocate, but he displays knowledge, as well as zeal, and shows tolerance toward those who entertain views differing from his own concerning method and present expediency. His cordial address, his catholic spirit and his genuine Christian manhood, have made for him a multitude of friends outside of his own flock, and have rendered him especially dear to his ministerial brethren in all denominations.

Morton, Rev. W. D., is the fourth son of W. B. and Margaret Morton; was born in Botetourt county, Va., June 7th, 1813. He graduated at Hampden-Sidney College, Va.; completed his theological course at Union Theological Seminary, Va., May, 1869; was licensed to preach May, 1868; took charge of a missionary field in Muhlenburg Presbytery, Ky., by which Presbytery he was ordained as an evangelist, December 11th, 1870; became pastor of Morganfield Church, in Paducah Presbytery, in 1872; was appointed to the evangelistic work, and entered on his work as evangelist January 1st, 1882. Mr. Morton is a man of robust frame, of active, vigorous mind, ardent, nervous temperament; is a thorough scholar, of varied culture. He is gifted with a voice of unusual compass and power. As a preacher, he is earnest, energetic, persuasive and instructive. He was eminently successful as a pastor, and is doing a noble work as an evangelist.

Moseley, Henry W., M. D., was born in Lynchburg, Va., and died December 21st, 18—, in the sixty-eighth year of his age. Though a native of Lynchburg, he was reared in Bedford, where he spent his life, becoming a member of Peak's Church about the year 1828, and not long after an elder, before he was thirty years of age, in which office, in the same church, he continued till the day of his death, a space of forty years. He was the oldest surviving elder in that church of those who, in that office, succeeded the admirable men, Michael Graham, John Leftwich, Rufus Thomas, and others who served as ruling elders under the Rev. James Turner and the Rev. James Mitchell, and the most of whom were spared to live through some part of the pastorate of the Rev. Dr. J. D. Mitchell.

Dr. Moseley was a man of uncommon firmness and very clear-sighted judgment, and most devoted and laborious in the pursuit of his profession, in which his practice was, through most of his life, very extensive. His name will long be remembered, as that of the faithful and skillful physician always is, in many a home among the hills of Bedford. He was a consistent Christian, and a faithful ruler and counsellor in the Church. His end was peace. A few words spoken to his pastor, in some of his last days, expressed his hope of the life immortal: "A great sinner, a great Saviour."

Mossy Creek Church, Va. On a grassy knoll, surrounded by views of surpassing beauty, stands Mossy Creek Church. The congregation that worships here occupies a considerable portion of that interesting region that renders northwest Augusta and southwest Rockingham so noted and attractive for beautiful scenery. The first settled pastor in the region of the Triple Forks, which included Mossy Creek, was the Rev. John Craig, born August, 1709, in the Parish of Dunagor, county Antrim, Ireland. He was under religious impressions at the age of five or six years; united with the Church at fourteen; graduated in 1732; and after much perplexity of mind as to what calling to choose for life, decided to study medicine. While a student of medicine he was brought very low by severe sickness; but, to the surprise of all, he recovered, and then turned his attention to the ministry. About that time he had a dream, setting before him what was to occur in his subsequent life. He thought but little of it at the time; but when he came to America, and accepted an invitation to visit the Valley of Virginia, in 1739, this portion of the Valley appeared as familiar to him as if he had seen it before. The place he knew at first sight he selected for his home, the place pointed out to him in a dream, in Ireland, six or seven years before.

He was ordained in September, 1740. The ordination sermon was preached from these words, by the Rev. Mr. Sankey, "And I will give you pastors according to mine heart, which shall feed you with knowledge and understanding" (Jer. iii, 15). A prophecy most remarkably fulfilled down to the present day.

At some time previous to the year 1768 Mossy Creek Church was organized. John Davies, the grandfather of James Davies, Esq., a highly esteemed ruling elder of the church at this time, and a Mr. MaKemie united in a request to Presbytery for an organization at Mossy Creek. Mr. Davies lived on North River, opposite the mouth of Mossy Creek; Mr. MaKemie resided near Stridling Springs. They were stoutly opposed by Mr. Craig, their pastor, on the ground that he could do all the preaching that was needed between the mountains. The Presbytery reluctantly complied with their request.

The earliest recorded mention of Mossy Creek known, occurs in connection with the ministry of the Rev. Thomas Jackson, who was received from New York Presbytery, October 6th, 1768, during a meeting of Hanover Presbytery at Buffalo, Prince Edward county, Va. He preached his trial sermon April 12th, 1769, and was ordained near Dayton, first Wednesday of the May following. Cooke's Creek, Linville's Creek, Peaked Mountain and Mossy Creek, each wanted a Sabbath in every month. He boarded at the house of Mr. John Davies. Mr. Davies was a native of North Ireland, and for years had attended preaching at the Stone Church, twelve miles away. There were two services a day, and it was a matter of frequent occurrence that the last hymn was read and sung by candle-light. It is not strange that he should desire to have preaching a little nearer home, and was so willing to board the new minister.

Pastor Jackson was a man of strong prejudices, and very candid in his speech. Coming home one evening from preaching, he found that a person whom he did not fancy was at Mr. Davies'. "You are here, are you? then I cannot stop; I must go on."

Still he was a popular preacher, and there was complaint that Cooke's Creek received more than a due share, from her central location. God interposed and quieted all by taking the loved preacher to Himself. He died 10th of May, 1773. He was buried at the old Cooke's Creek Church, and his grave, along with many others, is now submerged by the waters of the Dayton mill pond.

The vacancy thus brought about was filled in October following by the Rev. Samuel Edmondson. He was received on trial, October 15th, 1772, and licensed October 14th, 1773. In a few years he emigrated to South Carolina.

The next minister was the Rev. Benjamin Erwin, who graduated at Princeton, 1776; received as candidate April 30th, 1778, and was heard on his trial pieces given him previously by the Rev. William Graham, as Mr. Erwin had been prevented by illness from attending the former meeting of Presbytery. On the 20th of June, 1780, he was ordained at Mossy Creek, as pastor of the united churches of Mossy Creek and Cooke's Creek. Under his ministry the Rev. Dr. George A. Baxter was received into the church.

During his pastorate the Presbytery of Lexington was formed by the Synod at Philadelphia, May, 1786. The new Presbytery was directed to meet at Timber Ridge, on the last Tuesday of the following September. The first meeting was a small one, only two ruling elders present. It being so soon after the close of the war, church affairs were sadly disordered. A preamble to some resolutions read thus: "The Presbytery taking into consideration the present alarming state of religion in the churches under our care, and the difficulties to which ministers are reduced in the discharge of their office and the support of their families, unanimously come to the following resolutions."

By these resolutions a committee was to be appointed annually, consisting of two ministers and two elders, to visit each church, to ascertain the state of religion, and how the pastor and people have met their reciprocal duties. The committee that visited Mossy Creek and Cooke's Creek churches reported at Augusta Church, April 1787, where the second meeting of Presbytery convened. In that report they state: "These societies furnished them with an account of their salary, and it appears they do not consider themselves bound collectively, but only as individuals, for Mr. Erwin's support; that Mossy Creek complained Mr. Erwin didn't catechise as often as they could wish." The Presbytery finding Mr. Erwin's situation very unpleasant, admonished the church to meet all arrearages, or the relation must be dissolved, and directed Mossy Creek to inform them particularly at the next meeting respecting Mr. Erwin's "catechising." The people held tenaciously to the position that they were bound as individuals, not as collective bodies, and having paid what was individually subscribed, Mr. Erwin had no just claim for arrearages. The result was, the arrearages were not met, and on April 14th, 1789, Presbytery proceeded to enforce the threat previously made, but left it to the parties to renew the pastoral relation on a new basis, binding the church as a collective body to meet the pastor's salary in future. Messrs. Archibald Scott and William Wilson were appointed a committee to adjust difficulties, but were not successful. Another committee, consisting of Messrs. Montgomery and McCue, also failed to accomplish their object, and at the meeting in Lexington, April 23d, 1793, Mr. Erwin tendered his final resignation, by letter, which was agreed to.

On the 8th of October following, Mr. Erwin informed the Presbytery, by letter, that difficulties were adjusted, and he and his congregations desired to resume their former relations, which was cordially approved of by Presbytery.

At New Monmouth, April 19th, 1796, Mr. Erwin applied for a dissolution of the pastoral relation, on the plea of ill health. The commissioners from his churches reluctantly gave their consent.

"For five years these congregations sent up applications for supplies, and specially for some one to visit them and administer the sacraments. During this period Mr. Erwin resided among them, preached when he could, was rarely absent from a meeting of Presbytery, and was a working member."

At Rocky Spring, June 9th, 1801, Mr. Erwin is appointed stated supply for his former congregations, and at Timber Ridge, April 23d, 1805, the congregations make special application for his services as stated supply. At the next meeting Mr. Clemens Erwine, elder from Mossy Creek, appeared and took his seat, the second time Mossy Creek appears to be represented by an elder. Mr. James Hogshead the first, September 18th, 1792. On the 23d of April, 1808, Mr. Erwin was permitted to travel beyond the bounds of Presbytery, and "recommended affectionately to the churches among which he may travel." November 14th, 1809, he was dismissed to the Presbytery of Transylvania.

"No Sessional records have come down, but it is evident the churches increased under his care, and assumed more definite and independent proportions as bodies of Christians, and so far as there are any intimations of salary, it was distressingly meagre." At a meeting of Presbytery, at Lexington, September 29th, 1808, verbal application was made for preaching by the united congregations of Mossy Creek, Cooke's Creek and Harrisonburg. The Rev. A. B. Davidson was licensed the 1st of October, 1808, and in response to this verbal application he was directed to spend two Sabbaths in Rockingham, and the rest of his time at discretion, "with leave to ride out of our bounds."

A call was placed in his hands at the next meeting of Presbytery, at Hebron Church, April 22d, 1809, and on November 11th, 1809, he was ordained and installed pastor over the congregations that called him. Rev. Samuel Brown preached the sermon, Mark xvi, 15; Rev. William Calhoun presided and gave the charge. Mr. Davidson was an active and successful pastor, and his fervid eloquence is remembered to this day.

He was chiefly instrumental in the organization of the Virginia Tract Society, in 1812. By this Society thousands of tracts and hundreds of volumes were published. In selling books a slight percentage was realized, so as not to exhaust funds in hand, and allow a margin for gratuitous distribution where needed. In his politics Mr. Davidson was a Democrat, and in his preaching he threw out some hints of a political character that were highly offensive to Walter Davies, James Davies, Captain Samuel Miller and Judge Smith, who were strong Federalists. This resulted in such an unpleasant state of feeling as to lead Mr. Davidson to offer his resignation. November 11th, 1814, the representatives of the united congregations met at Mossy Creek and declared their assent. Thereupon the relation was dissolved, and the united churches declared vacant, five years, to a day, from the time the relation was first entered upon.

For about three years the church was occasionally supplied by visiting ministers. Rev. John Hendren, D. D., a native of Lexington, Va., commenced his ministerial labors in the bounds of Union and Mossy Creek congregations, about the 1st of May, 1817. In Staunton, November 20th, 1817, he was received from the Presbytery of Hanover, and the same day accepted a call to be the pastor of these churches, and on the 2d day of January, 1818, he was installed. There were ninety communicants on the Mossy Creek register when his ministry commenced. On the 1st of October, 1818, he reported 13 additions on examination and 4 on certificate, 1 suspension and 3 deaths, total communicants, 102. The following particulars concerning the eldership, during his pastorate, have been preserved. At this period the Mossy Creek Session consisted of the following members: Jacob C. Irvine, Andrew Irvine, Andrew Barry, John Black, John M. Estill, Robert Jones, William Cunningham, father of the Rev. D. H. Cunningham. On the 3d of August, 1834, Robert Black and John Irvine were ordained additional elders.

Andrew Barry served as clerk of Session a few years previous to 1825. Upon his resignation, John Black was clerk of Session until 1838, when he was succeeded by John Irvine. Upon Mr. Irvine's resignation, Robert Black was appointed clerk, in 1843.

Dr. Hendren's pastorate was prosperous for many years; a steady increase of numbers resulted and great good was accomplished by his pastoral labors, and his school became one of the most noted classical schools of its day.

It was during his ministry the Rev. Mr. Jones, a distinguished revivalist, held a series of meetings at Mossy Creek. He began early in December, 1833, and continued about eighteen days. Dr. Hendren entered heartily into the work, but afterwards regretted the encouragement he gave Mr. Jones. On the 22d of December, fifty persons were received on profession, and on the 29th forty more were admitted. Of this large number, fifteen only were to be baptized. Dr. Hendren's relation ceased with Mossy Creek, June 26th, 1835, at a meeting of Presbytery in Lexington, Va. The spirit he evinced in tendering his resignation is worthy of high commendation. The last Sessional report shows the number of communicants to have been 224. The last report on reciprocal duties, signed by John Black, speaks highly of Dr. Hendren's faithful and successful pastoral labors, up to the last.

About the middle of November, 1835, the Rev. Isaac Paul, of West Hanover, visited Mossy Creek, and was retained four months as stated supply. At the expiration of this time he was employed for one year, commencing March 21st, 1836. His health was delicate, and he labored very assiduously. On a cold, damp day about the first of May he rode up to Rawley Springs, thereby contracting a violent cold, of which he soon died, at the home of James Davies, Esq. He was to have been buried on Friday, but the interment had to be deferred until Saturday, on account of the inclement weather. The next afternoon the bereaved congregation heard the Rev. Dr. Brown, editor of the Central Presbyterian, preach his first sermon at Mossy Creek. Mr. Paul was one of the three ministers that attended Dr. Speece's funeral, on the 15th of February before.

In a few months the church made out a call for the Rev. John A. Van Lear, of Locust Bottom; and when Presbytery met at Union Church, April 27th, 1837, the call was accepted. On Saturday, the 24th of June, 1837, he was installed. Rev. James C.

Wilson preached the sermon; the Rev. John A. Steel gave the charge.

Mossy Creek had now grown to be an independent, self-sustaining church. With but few exceptions the pastoral labors of Mr. Van Lear were highly acceptable. He was a distinguished member of Presbytery, and for fourteen years served as Stated Clerk. During his pastorate the present house of worship was erected. The old building was near the northeast corner of the cemetery, just across the road. The new house was completed about the year 1849. A short time after it was occupied a large portion of the west end fell in, one Sabbath, a few hours after the congregation had dispersed.

For two years Mr. Van Lear was laid aside most of the time, by ill health. He preached but seldom, yet presided at most of the Sessional meetings. The Rev. P. T. Penick was his assistant the last year of his life. The last meeting of Session attended by this faithful pastor met at 10 o'clock, June 9th, 1850. Elders present were John Bell, James Davies, James Bell, Bethuel Herring and Robert Black. Four persons were received on profession of their faith: David A. Bell, Catharine Rebecca Bell, Frances Catharine Bell, and Margaret Rebecca Bell.

Four days before his death, August 11th, 1850, he wrote the following letter to his brethren of Lexington Presbytery:—

"DEAR BRETHREN:—I have indeed greatly desired that it might be permitted me to meet once more upon earth a body of which I have been for so many years a member, in whose society I have enjoyed so much happiness, and for which I cherish the strongest affection. But such is not the will of God, and I am content. My days are nearly numbered, and my last remove is directly before me. I record it to the praise of the glory of His grace that God 'hath counted me faithful, putting me into the ministry.' I have loved the work. I have preached, as I believe, in sincerity and truth, His gospel of salvation. I have tried to bring others to a like precious faith. I rejoice that I have been enabled to do this. But this is not the foundation of my hope. I trust in no labor of my hands. I fly to the cross and the covenant. There is my only hope. There I rest my soul, and my heart has peace. This is my testimony.

"It would give me pleasure to send kind messages to you all by name, but I have not strength. I have come down now quite to the banks of the Jordan of death; but He who has passed through it for sinners has met me on this side of its dark waves, and all is well. My flesh and my heart faileth me, but God is the strength of my heart, and my portion forever. I leave you, hoping for a happy and eternal reunion in that heaven to which we have pointed so many of our fellow men.

"It is my parting prayer, that our faithful, covenant-keeping God may ever be with you, bless you, keep you in peace and love among one another, and send down His Holy Spirit upon all our churches, and fill the earth with His glory.

"Accept, dear brethren, my final farewell.

"Yours in the gospel of Christ, our Saviour."

JOHN A. VAN LEAR.

He died on the 18th of August, four days after writing his farewell words, in great peace of mind. On the 22d of August, at Goshen Church, nestled away among the hills of Highland county, this letter was read. Many were the tears its sweet and loving words called forth. His memory was duly honored by Session and Presbytery, with resolutions of respect well befitting the memory of this good man, who was a model character in all the relations of life.

In October, 1852, the Rev. John Pinkerton began his ministerial labors here, and was ordained pastor, November 5th, 1853. The call was put into his hands at the meeting at Bethel, 18th of August, 1853. He preached his trial sermon from this text, "Now if Christ be preached, that he rose from the dead, how say some among you that there is no resurrection of the dead?" 1 Cor. xv, 12. His ministry was blessed, and under his wise administration, aided and sustained by the elders and deacons, Mossy Creek took a high position as a faithful, working church. His last official act as pastor was to Moderate the Session, February 5th, 1871. On the 31st of May, 1871, it pleased the Great Head of the Church to dissolve this pastoral relation, and take His servant home to rest. The present pastor of the Mossy Creek Church is the Rev. J. W. Rosebro.

Mott, George Scudder, D. D., is the son of Lawrence S. and Christiana (Vail) Mott, and was born in the city of New York, November 25th, 1829. He graduated, with the fourth honor, at the University of New York, in 1850, and at the Theological Seminary in Princeton, N. J., in May, 1853. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of the city of New York, April, 1853, and in October of the same year was ordained pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church, Rahway, N. J. Here he labored with great success for five years, and then accepted a call to the church in Newton, N. J., where he remained for nine years. While pastor at Newton, his labors were greatly blessed, not less than one hundred and twenty persons having been added to the church on confession of their faith, at a great revival in 1865. Similar results have attended his ministry in Flemington, N. J., his present charge.

Dr. Mott began writing for the press at an early date in his ministry, his articles appearing in the religious journals and in the Presbyterian Magazine. In the Princeton Review there appeared from his pen, in 1863, "Paul's Thorn in the Flesh;" 1871, "Retribution;" 1872, "Annihilation;" 1873, "The Sunday School, Past, Present and Future." He has written a number of Tracts, both for the Presbyterian Board of Publication and for the American Tract Society.

More than 300,000 copies of the tract, "Holding on to Christ," have been published. His books, "The Prodigal Son," "The Resurrection of the Body," and "The Perfect Law," have had an extensive publication. This last work has been translated into Spanish and Portuguese. Besides occasional sermons and addresses he has published a "History of the Presbyterian Church in Flemington, N. J.," and "The First Century of Hunterdon County, N. J." Dr. Mott has always taken an active part in the Church courts, especially in matters relating to the general welfare of the Church. In 1873 he was elected Professor of Sacred Rhetoric in Lincoln University, but declined the appointment. His degree of Doctor of Divinity was received from the College of New Jersey, in 1876.

Moulinars, John Joseph Brumauld, a French Reformed or Huguenot minister, called from Edinburgh to be assistant pastor of the French Church in New York, as colleague of Louis Rou, in 1718. Moulinars was the son of a French pastor who fled, at the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, to Holland. Compelled by Rou to give up his position as assistant, he went to New Rochelle, Westchester county, N. Y., and became pastor of that portion of the French colony that had remained faithful to the order and discipline of the Reformed or Calvinistic churches, when a part were influenced to form an Episcopal congregation. He continued to minister to them until his death, October, 1741. The historian Smith speaks of him as "most distinguished for his pacific spirit, dull parts and unblamable life and conversation."

Mount Paran Church, near Baltimore, Md. The Maryland correspondent of the Presbyterian, in the issue of that paper, January 12th, 1881, gives the following items of the history of this church: "Before 1717 the church seems to have been organized and a church edifice to have been built, so that prior to 1715, it may have been several years earlier, the history of this church began. The part of Baltimore county in which the church is located was settled several years before this date. The Puritan colony that came up from Virginia, in 1649, received thousands of acres of land, and from the number of families, and from the number of acres received by each, they must have extended many miles beyond Annapolis, where they first landed. We read of one who had twenty thousand acres, and of others who received hundreds and thousands of acres. Durand, the leader of the colony, an elder in the Church, had eight hundred and fifty acres in one place, and nine hundred acres on the Patapsco. The name of the man, Lawson, from whom the land of the church was bought, and the name of Towson, found on so many tombstones in the graveyard, correspond with names found in this Puritan colony. Though called Puritans in the early records, they bore also the name Presbyterian, and many of their descendants have been the most devoted and prominent defenders the Presbyterian Church has had in Maryland."

Mowry, Philip Henry, D. D., son of Dr. R. B. and Ariana Rebekah (Riddle) Mowry, was born in Allegheny, Pa., March 6th, 1837. He graduated at Jefferson College in 1858, and at the Western Theological Seminary in 1861. He was licensed to preach in the Spring of 1860. In July, after leaving the Seminary, he was called to the Fourth Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, and was ordained and installed pastor of that church, October 8th, 1861. In December, 1863, he took charge of Big Spring Church, Newville, Pa. In December, 1868, he became pastor of the Second Church, Springfield, Ohio. In December, 1873, he was installed pastor of the First Church, Chester, Pa., in which relation he still continues. Dr. Mowry is a gentleman of finely developed character. His spirit is peaceful, his judgment sound, his bearing modest, and his knowledge of human nature thorough. Though somewhat reserved in manner, his social qualities are very attractive. He is a popular, impressive, and effective preacher, being unusually gifted with the graces of elocution. He is highly esteemed, and his ministry, in all his fields of labor, has been crowned with success. He has been Moderator of the Synod of Philadelphia.

Mowry, Robert B., M. D., was born in Pittsburgh, Pa., December 23d, 1813. He graduated at the Western University of Pennsylvania, in 1834. In the Spring of 1836, having graduated at the Jefferson Medical College of Philadelphia, he began the practice of his profession in Allegheny, where he has resided ever since. Dr. Mowry was one of the original members of the First Reformed Presbyterian Church (N. S.), and for many years a member of the Session. In January, 1861, he transferred his membership to the First Presbyterian Church, Allegheny. In this Church he has been a ruling elder for more than twenty years. For a number of years he has been a member of the Board of Directors of the Western Theological Seminary, in the prosperity of which he takes a deep and active interest; a member of the Board of Trustees of the Western Pennsylvania University; President of the Allegheny county Medical Society; President of the Pennsylvania State Medical Society in 1876-77, and is now one of the chief promoters of the new Allegheny Hospital.

Dr. Mowry holds a high position in his profession. His large experience, clear perception, profound judgment and wide research, still continued with advancing years, are largely drawn upon by his professional brethren, with whom he is frequently called on to consult. He is still active in all the walks of life, and widely known and greatly esteemed in a great and growing community, as a true type of the profession which he honors, and a fair example of the sterling and devoted Presbyterian elder.

Muir, James, D. D., was a native of Scotland; a graduate of Glasgow University, and was licensed by the Scotch Presbytery, in London, in 1779. Two years later he was ordained as an evangelist to Bermuda, where he remained, engaged in teaching and preaching, for nearly eight years. For some months after his arrival in this country he preached in New York, as a candidate for the post of colleague with Dr. Rodgers, but as the congregation were divided between him and (Dr.) Jediah Morse, both withdrew, and shortly after (1789), Mr. Muir was called to Alexandria, Va.

A severe student, systematic in the discharge of pastoral duty, deeply impressed with the momentous responsibility of his charge, he might have sat for Cowper's well-drawn portrait of a "preacher like Paul." A United States Senator described him as "a short man, of short sermons and short sentences." This was strictly true. His discourses were carefully and elaborately prepared, and everything redundant was expunged. He preached with his manuscript in his pocket and his sermon in his memory, while from a small Bible open before him he read the frequent passages of Scripture, which were as familiar to him as the alphabet. Although with a marked Scotch accent, and a defect in his utterance which interfered with his oratory, his discourses were clear, logical, concise, and rich with divine truth. Dr. Muir continued pastor of the church at Alexandria until his death, in 1820, the Rev. Dr. Elias Harrison having been co-pastor from March, 1818.

Munroe, Rev. C. A., the second oldest child of Peter and Isabella Jane (née Cameron) Munroe, was born in Troy, Montgomery county, N. C., October 11th, 1844. He was graduated at Davidson College, in June, 1872. Completed the theological course at Union Seminary, Va., April, 1876. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Fayetteville, April, 1876. After supplying the churches of Lumberton and Rockingham for eight months, he was called to Crystal Springs, Miss., and was ordained by Presbytery of Mississippi, and installed pastor of Crystal Springs Church, October 1877. In October, 1882, he accepted an invitation to the Western evangelistic field of Concord Presbytery, where he is at this date, August 1st, 1883, laboring. Mr. Munroe graduated with second honors of his class. His mind is clear and logical. His piety is of the purest type. His whole character is that of a noble Christian minister. His charity is that of the Bible, "suffereth long and is kind." His prime object in living is to win souls for his Master."

Murphy, Rev. Murdock, of the Presbytery of Georgia, was among the first ministers who emigrated to Alabama. As early as 1823 he took an active part in the proceedings of the Presbytery, though he did not become a member until November 10th, 1826. He was the third Presbyterian minister who labored in Mobile, and organized the first Presbyterian Church in that place, now Government Street Church. He was a beautiful writer, and one of his sermons, on Female Benevolence, was printed by the order of Presbytery. He died February 8th, 1833, and Presbytery at its following meeting recorded his decease on its minutes, as that of "one of the earliest, most esteemed and beloved" of its members. He was held in the highest regard for his amiable and exemplary life, the simplicity and fervor of his piety, and the uniform gentleness, consistency and excellence of his ministerial and Christian character.

Murphy, Thomas, D. D., son of William and Mary (Rollins) Murphy, was born in Antrim county, Ireland, February 6th, 1823, not far from the Duncane Church. His father became an elder of that church under the pastorate of the celebrated Dr. Henry Cooke. William Murphy came, in 1831, to the United States, and settled in New Hartford, New York. Dr. Murphy entered the College of New Jersey, in 1841, and graduated, with the second honor, in 1845. He completed a three years' course in the Theological Seminary of the Presbyterian Church, Princeton, New Jersey, in 1848; was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, February 2d, 1848, and on the 11th of October, 1849, was ordained by the Second Presbytery of Philadelphia, and installed pastor of the Frankford Church, where he still continues. The honorary degree of Doctor of Divinity was conferred upon him by the College of New Jersey, in 1872. He has been a member of the Presbyterian Board of Publication fourteen years, for some time Chairman of its Missionary Committee; and he had a leading agency in originating the Sabbath-school work of that Board. In 1873, as delegate to the General Assembly of the Church of Ireland, he addressed that body on the subject of "One Federate Council for all the Presbyterian Churches of the World." The resolution then adopted by that Assembly was the first in the series of public movements which resulted in organizing this Grand Council.

Dr. Murphy is the author of fifteen published sermons, of a "History of the Frankford Presbyterian Church," of a work on "Pastoral Theology," of a tract on the "Duties of Church Members," which has had a wide circulation; and of "Sketches of Pastoral Experience," in the Presbyterian. Having a weighty influence in Presbytery, he has been among the foremost in important movements, and has taken the lead in the organization of seventeen churches, all, with one exception, successful enterprises. Under his ministry of thirty-five years, the Frankford Church has grown steadily, and has been greatly prospered. An instructive preacher and a diligent pastor, neglecting no part of a minister's duty, he has been "a workman that needeth not to be ashamed."

Murphy, Rev. Thomas Grier, was born in Kent county, Del., March 26th, 1817, and graduated at Anherst College in 1840, studying theology at Princeton Seminary. He was ordained by the Presbytery of New Castle, July 24th, 1844; stated supply at Dover, Del., 1843, and pastor there 1844-61. From 1866 to 1877 he was missionary to the Freedmen at Amelia C. H., Va., where his labors were greatly blessed. He died near Dover, Del., January 9th, 1878. He was a devoted, self-sacrificing minister of the gospel, and had no greater joy than in seeing the work of God prospering through his instrumentality.

Murray, Rev. John W., was born in Beaver county, Pa., January 29th, 1801, and entered Jefferson College, in 1827. After a year or two he turned aside to the study of law in his native county, where he was commissioned as major of a battalion of volunteers, which title clung to him ever afterwards. Having felt the power of renewing grace, he returned and resumed his college course, probably in the Sophomore year, graduating in 1835. From that time his manly bearing, social disposition, well-balanced mind and godly life and influence, were held in glad remembrance by his classmates. He spent two years in the Western Theological Seminary, then, for two years, had charge of the Lebanon Male Seminary, in Kentucky, after which, completing his course in Allegheny, he was licensed to preach the gospel, October 5th, 1840. The following Spring he was called to the Church at Sharpsburg, Allegheny county, Pa. (with which Pine Creek was some time associated in the charge), and was ordained just a year from his licensure. On Sabbath, September 12th, 1852, in what proved to be his last sermon, he dwelt upon the uncertainty of human life. The next day he started on a hasty visit to the Falls of Niagara, and returning, stopped with a friend at Salem, Ohio, on Friday night, and on Saturday morning, September 18th, he was seized with cholera so violently as, in ten short hours, to stop the current of his holy life.

Murray, Joseph Alexander, D. D., is the youngest son of George and Mary (Demmy) Murray, and was born in Carlisle, Pa., October 2d, 1815. He graduated at the Western University of Pennsylvania, August 4th, 1837; at the Western Theological Seminary in the Autumn of 1840, and was licensed to preach the gospel, by the Presbytery of Ohio, on October 7th of the same year. He supplied the Church at Marion, Ohio, for six months, but finally declined a unanimous call to become its pastor. April 13th, 1842, he was ordained and installed, by the Presbytery of Carlisle, pastor of the united congregations of Monaghan (Dillsburg) and Petersburg. This relation happily and usefully subsisted for about eighteen years. During the pastorate the present church edifice at Dillsburg was erected. In 1858, in consequence of impaired health, he resigned the charge, and took up his residence in his native place.

Dr. Murray's health has never since permitted him to become a settled pastor, but he has supplied several churches, often fills vacant pulpits, and assists his brethren as he is able. He has represented his Presbytery four times in the General Assembly. In 1876 he was chosen by acclamation Moderator of the Synod of Harrisburg. He has also been honored with membership in the Numismatic and Antiquarian Society, Philadelphia, in the Historical Society of Pennsylvania, and in the American Philosophical Society. He is Secretary of the Hamilton Library Association, Carlisle, and fills the position with great efficiency and acceptableness. Several of his discourses and addresses have been published. He has frequently contributed to some of the literary, historical, and religious periodicals of our country, and continues to do so. Dr. Murray is a gentleman of public spirit, taking a commendable interest in enterprises for the general good. He is kind, modest, courteous, and highly esteemed by his brethren in the community in which he lives. As a writer, he is graceful and interesting, and as a preacher, able, earnest, and impressive. In all his movements he is guided by conscientious conviction of duty.

Murray, Dr. Nicholas, was born in Armagh county, Ireland, December 25th, 1802. At the age of sixteen he resolved to come to the Western world to seek his fortune, and found a situation in the publishing establishment of the well-known Harper Brothers, New York. He had been brought up a Roman Catholic, but having his attention arrested by the preaching of Dr. John M. Mason, he began to examine for himself, and the result was his conversion to Protestantism. He was now persuaded to study for the ministry, and graduated at Williams College, Massachusetts, under Dr. Griffin. After spending some time in the service of the American Tract Society, he graduated at Princeton Theological Seminary in 1829, when he was licensed by the Presbytery of Philadelphia. He was ordained and installed pastor of the Wilkesbarre Church, November, 1829, by the Presbytery of Susquehanna. July 23d, 1833, he was installed pastor of the First Church, Elizabethtown, N. J., where "his profiting appeared to all," and where in the midst of his usefulness he was smitten with rheumatism of the heart, and expired, after a brief illness, February 11th, 1861.

Dr. Murray's merits were familiar to the Church at large. He was chosen Moderator of the General Assembly in 1849. Besides numerous calls to churches, he was appointed to two theological professorships, the Secretaryship of the Board of Foreign Missions, and general agency of the American Tract Society for the Valley of the Mississippi.

DR. NICHOLAS MURRAY.

Dr. Murray had a strong, clear, practical mind, and his style of preaching was more instructive than imaginative. He was endowed with a native, racy, ready wit, savoring of his mother country, which sometimes in controversy dashed up in scathing irony and sarcasm.

His published works are the celebrated "Kirwan Letters on Popery," in two series, originally published in the New York Observer, "Travels in Europe," "Home," "Driftwood," "Thoughts on Preaching and Preachers," and a posthumous set of discourses on "Things Unseen and Eternal."

Murray, Thomas Chalmers, was born at Elizabeth, N. J., February 18th, 1850; graduated at Williams College, Mass., in 1869, and studied theology at Union Seminary, New York City, and Princeton Seminary, at which latter Institution he graduated in 1872. From Princeton he went to Germany, where he studied three years, 1872-5, at the Universities of Göttingen and Halle. He was received April 19th, 1870, under the care of the Presbytery of Elizabeth, as a candidate for the ministry, but was never licensed or ordained to that work. Not long after his return from Germany, he was chosen to be Associate Professor of Shemitic Languages in the Johns Hopkins University, then just established in the city of Baltimore, and in that position he continued to labor with success and growing distinction until his death, which occurred March 20th, 1879. His last words were: "I know that my name is written in the Lamb's Book of Life."

Mr. Murray was a thorough gentleman, of most pleasing manners, amiable, kind and affectionate in disposition, energetic in the pursuit of knowledge, and an humble, consistent and devout Christian. His abilities were extraordinary. He was devoted to the study of the Oriental languages, especially the Hebrew, Arabic and Aramaic, and he bade fair to achieve the highest distinction in his chosen department. At the time of his death he was Secretary of the American Philological Society. He left a wide circle of friends to lament his departure.

Musgrave, George W., D. D., LL. D., was born in Philadelphia, October 19th, 1804. He was fitted at the Classical Academy of the Rev. Samuel B. Wylie, D. D., to enter the Junior Class of the College of New Jersey, when his health failed, and he continued his studies at home. He studied for the ministry at Princeton Theological Seminary; was licensed by the Presbytery of Baltimore, in 1828, and ordained and installed over the Third Presbyterian Church of Baltimore, in July, 1830. Here he labored for twenty-two years, with remarkable success. Three times his church was enlarged to accommodate the ever-growing congregations attracted by his piety and power. His influence extended beyond his congregation, and in all the Presbyteries and Synods he came to be recognized as a leader of orthodoxy and Presbyterianism. His denominational sermons were mixed with history, argument and philosophy, and were not only published, at the request of those who heard them, but also re-published by the Presbyterian Board.

Dr. Musgrave was elected a Director of the Princeton Theological Seminary in 1836, and uninterruptedly re-elected during his life. He was made a Trustee of the College of New Jersey in 1859, and retained the office until his decease. He accepted the post of Corresponding Secretary of the Presbyterian Board of Publication in 1852, and left Baltimore. The next year he was chosen Corresponding Secretary of the Board of Domestic Missions, and retained it until failing vision compelled him to resign, in 1864. Recovering from the worst symptoms, he became pastor of the North Tenth Street Church, Philadelphia, and though burdened by increasing infirmities, labored with his usual energy and success, to the Fall of 1868. He was again made Corresponding Secretary of Domestic Missions, and during his tenure of office $1,048,237 was received into the treasury, and very many more missionaries were aided. He showed great administrative abilities, as well as much zeal and energy.

The first movements to heal the rupture of 1837, between the Old and New School branches of the Church, were vigorously seconded by Dr. Musgrave. In the remarkable gathering of representatives of various branches of the Presbyterian Church, convened in Philadelphia, in the Presbyterian National Union Convention, of November, 1867, he was a leading spirit, and director and counsellor. He first proposed the basis of reunion, in the precise form adopted—"the doctrinal and ecclesiastical basis of our common standards," accompanied by the "Concurrent Declarations." This plan was issued in a circular to the Presbyterians of the Central Presbytery of Philadelphia, chosen Moderator of the General Assembly, at Albany, N. Y., May, 1868, and member and Chairman of its Committee on Reunion, the next November, the basis having been approved by more than the necessary two-thirds of the Presbyteries, he saw the great Union perfected at Pittsburg, at the adjourned meeting. He was at once made Chairman of the Joint Committee on Reconstruction, and the plan he reported to the first re-united General Assembly, in Philadelphia, May, 1870, was adopted. Subsequently he was engaged upon business of Assemblies, Synods, and Presbyteries, Boards and Committees, and known and esteemed everywhere. In Philadelphia, the city of his residence, he was active and useful in the Church. He was chosen President of the Philadelphia Presbyterian Alliance, for evangelistic work in the city, that was formed in 1869, and retained the post until his demise. That organization originated the Presbyterian Hospital, chartered in 1871 and opened July 1st, 1872. He was President of its Board of Trustees while he lived, and in that capacity helped to secure the princely donation of $300,000 from John A. Brown, that assured its success.

Dr. Musgrave's commanding influence was found in his sincere piety, power in conversation, preaching and prayer, devotion to pure Calvinism, thorough, yet catholic Presbyterianism, full knowledge of ecclesiastical law and practice, faultless logical processes, mastery of parliamentary law and usage, indomitable energy, that for years enabled him to triumph over partial blindness and other infirmities, and, more than all, powers of debate rarely equaled and more rarely excelled, of which Dr. John Hall said, in the Assembly at Chicago, "we are all proud of them." Dr. Musgrave's counsel was sought by the lowest and the highest in the Presbyterian denomination. He was eminently a man of mark, with a range of influence seldom attained, and his great powers were all consecrated to the service of his Redeemer. He entered into rest, August 24th, 1882.

N

Name. As the name by which an object is designated becomes that by which it is known, and so gradually comes to represent or stand for the object, the word Name, in Scripture is often used, where not a mere designation is intended, but the object itself as so designated, and thereby made known to us. It is in this sense that the word is used of God so frequently in the Bible, in such phrases as—the Name of Jehovah, My Name, the Name of the Lord Jesus Christ, etc. By such phrases is to be understood, not any appellation by which the Divine Being, in any of His manifestations, is designated, nor, as is often said, The Divine Being Himself, as a Personal existence, but properly, the Divine Being as revealed or made known to men. The Name of God is God as revealed. Hence the earnest desire of men to know God's name (Gen. xxxix, 29; Ex. iii, 13). Hence God is said to put his Name in a person or place (Ex. xxiii, 21; comp. xxxiii, 11, and xl, 34; Deut. xii, 5; xiv, 23), by which is meant that God is revealed in that person or place. Men are commanded to put their trust in God's name—i. e., in God Himself, as revealed. The name of God is said to be "excellent in all the earth" (Ps. viii, 2)—i. e., God is revealed to us gloriously in his works. Men are said to be called by God's name (Jer. xiv, 9), because Jehovah is revealed to them, is in the midst of them. God saves men by his name (Ps. liv, 1)—i. e., by the manifestation of Himself on their behalf; and many other similar usages in the Old Testament. In the New Testament the phrase name of Christ is similarly employed. Men believe on his name (John i, 12; 1 John v, 13); are baptized for his name (Acts xix, 5); have life through his name (John xx, 31); are saved by his name (Acts iv, 12); are justified by his name (1 Cor. vi, 11); assemble in his name (Matt. xviii, 20); do miracles by his name (Mark xvi, 17; Acts xvi, 18), etc.; where the due meaning of the statement can be obtained only by regarding the phrase as indicating the Saviour as manifested for the help and benefit of men. In the same way are we to understand the baptismal formula, we are baptized in, or for, the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, inasmuch as we are baptized with a view to obtaining the blessings which God, as the revealed Triune God, is ready to bestow.

Nash, Hon. Frederick, LL. D., was the son of the Hon. Abner Nash, who was a member of the Provincial Congress of 1775, from the borough of New Berne; second Republican Governor of North Carolina, and a member of the Federal Congress in Philadelphia, in 1784 or 1785. He was born February 9th, 1781. At the age of eighteen he graduated, with distinction, from the College of New Jersey. After the study of law he was admitted to the Bar in 1801, among such associates as Francis Xavier Martin, John Stanly and William Gaston, and was early recognized as the compeer of these eminent men. Soon after entering upon his profession, he removed to Hillsboro, N. C., where he continued to reside, to the end of his life.

Mr. Nash had many offices of honor and trust conferred upon him by his fellow citizens. From both New Berne and Hillsboro he was sent to the State Legislature, where he did his duty faithfully. In 1815 he introduced into the Legislature a bill for the suppression of duelling, and supported it with an eloquent speech. He became Circuit Judge in 1818, and served until 1826, when he resigned in order to secure the more lucrative rewards of his profession as a lawyer, as demanded by the wants of his growing family. In 1836 he was again elected Circuit Judge, and served until 1844, when he was elevated to the Supreme Court Bench, and in 1852 to the office of Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, where he continued till life closed. His judicial character was marked by great purity and ability, and by courtesy and kindness, yet also, when duty required, by all the sternness and inflexibility of the judge.

In 1807 Judge Nash became a Trustee of the University of North Carolina, and was, through life, its friend and supporter. At the organization of the Hillsboro Church, in 1816, he became a ruling elder in it, and continued to serve in that capacity as long as he lived. He loved the little church, and for over forty years he sustained it by his contributions, his prayers, and his godly walk and conversation. His last public act was attendance upon the sessions of the Synod of North Carolina, in 1858, in his native city of New Berne. He died December 4th, 1858, and in his last hours exhibited such calmness and courage as can be inspired alone by Christian faith. Chief Justice Nash was one of North Carolina's noblest sons. Born in the midst of the Revolutionary war, and connected with the most distinguished men of the State, he was familiar with all the prominent jurists, educators and statesmen for the first half century of our national existence. In Orange Presbytery he co-operated with the leading ministers of that period, entertaining many of them at his own hospitable abode.

Nash, Rev. Frederick K., was born in Hillsboro, N. C., February 14th, 1813; pursued his college course at the University of North Carolina, and was admitted to the Bar. Yielding to what he considered the claims of the ministry, he became a student in the Union Theological Seminary, at Prince Edward, Va., in 1835; was licensed by Orange Presbytery, April 22d, 1837; on April 13th, 1838, joined Morganton Presbytery, and was installed pastor of Unity Church, November 17th, 1838. This relation existed until October 28th, 1842. During the year 1843 he was without any regular charge. The two following years he labored as stated supply for Rutherford and Little Britain churches, in the bounds of Concord Presbytery, and in the Spring of 1846 he began preaching in Centre Church, in the bounds of Fayetteville Presbytery. Here he labored until April 24th, 1847, when he was installed by Fayetteville Presbytery. In this charge he labored until his death, which occurred December 31st, 1861. Mr. Nash, as a pastor, was kind and faithful. His preaching was clear, practical and pungent. He was an active member of Presbytery and Synod, and a friend to every good cause. To the colored portion of the church he paid particular attention, and labored very successfully among them.

Nassau, Charles William, D. D., was born in Philadelphia, April 12th, 1804. He graduated at the University of Pennsylvania, July 26th, 1821; entered Princeton Seminary in 1822, but, on account of failing health, left the Institution at the end of one year, and pursued his theological studies another year under the guidance of his pastor, Dr. E. S. Ely. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, April 23d, 1824, and was ordained by the same body, November 16th, 1825.

Dr. Nassau's successive fields of labor were as follows: 1. Pastor of the churches of Norristown, Norriton and Providence, from November 16th, 1825, until October 21st, 1828, when, on account of throat complaint, he was released from the charge. 2. The charge of a family school for boys, at Montgomery Square, Pa., from 1829 to 1833. 3. Supply (his throat having recovered sufficiently) of the three churches of which he had formerly been pastor, for nine months, in 1832 to 1833. 4. Professor of Latin and Greek in Marion College, Mo., from 1836 to June 24th, 1838. 5. Professor of Latin and Greek in Lafayette College, Pa., from April, 1841, to March, 1849. 6. President of Lafayette College, from March, 1849, to September 18th, 1850. 7. Proprietor and Principal of the Female Seminary at Lawrenceville, N. J., from October, 1850, to December, 1871. He died at Trenton, August 6th, 1878.

Dr. Nassau was a man of quiet and retiring manners, very studious, and of great equanimity of temper. Yet he was earnest, energetic, and persevering. He worked steadily at his chosen pursuits, caring little whether the world thought of him or not. He was always useful, and respected by everybody. He was also an eminently devout and godly man. He died serenely, in the faith of Christ, willing to remain, yet desiring rather to depart and be with Christ. He was the father of the Rev. Jos. E. Nassau, D. D., pastor of Warsaw Church, N. Y., and the Rev. R. Hamill Nassau, M. D., and his sister, Miss Isabella Ann Nassau, so well known as active missionaries in Western Africa.

Nassau, Rev. Joseph Eastburn, D.D., oldest son of Rev. Dr. Charles W. and Hannah (Hamill) Nassau, was born in Norristown, Pa., March 12th, 1827. He graduated with honor at Lafayette College, Easton, Pa., in 1846, and was at once chosen Tutor in that Institution. Resigning this position two years later, he became Classical Professor in the High School and Female Seminary at Lawrenceville, New Jersey. He entered the Theological Seminary at Princeton, N. J., in the Fall of 1849; was licensed by the Presbytery of Newton, October 8th, 1851, and taking the full course, graduated in the Spring of 1852.

In 1853 and 1854 he was Principal of a female institute in Wilkesbarre, Pa. This position he resigned early in 1855, and during the Summer of that year supplied, successively, the Presbyterian churches in Fagg's Manor, Pa., and Warsaw, N. Y. While supplying the latter church he was unanimously chosen pastor, and October 24th, 1855, was ordained and installed by the Presbytery of Genesee River. Dr. Nassau's pastorate at Warsaw has remained unbroken to the present (1883), and been much blessed. Under his ministry the church has enjoyed several revivals, and has steadily grown in numbers, zeal and influence. He received the honorary degree of Doctor of Divinity, in 1872, from his Alma Mater, Lafayette College. Dr. Nassau is an easy speaker, and his scholarly tastes appear in his preaching, which is clear, logical and earnest. He is a diligent pastor, and has always taken an active part in ecclesiastical affairs, as well as in the causes of Temperance and Education. He has been a trustee in several literary institutions; for many years the Stated Clerk of his Presbytery; often Moderator of Presbytery; twice Moderator of Synod, and several times Commissioner to the General Assembly.

Nassau, Presbytery of. The Presbytery of Nassau, as at present constituted, occupies the central part of Long Island, including within its jurisdiction the whole of Queens county and the township of Huntington, in Suffolk county. It was organized by the Synod of Long Island, after the Reunion, and held its first meeting in Jamaica, July 6th, 1870, the Moderator being the Rev. Dr. Stead. Of its original members but five still continue connected with it—Rev. Messrs. P. D. Oakey, Benjamin L. Swan, J. H. Hopkins, Marcus Burr and Samuel J. Carter. Its growth has been slow, but steady. For the year ending March 31st, 1883, it reported as follows: Ministers, 26; churches, 23; church membership, 2458; Sunday-school membership, 2954; amount contributed for all purposes, $32,318.

This Presbytery enjoys the distinction of containing within its bounds what are undoubtedly the oldest Presbyterian churches in America. Francis Makemie has generally been considered the father of Presbyterianism in this country, but before he was born there existed a Presbyterian Church at Hempstead, while for nearly a generation previous to his landing in America, there were similar organizations, with regular pastors, at Jamaica and Newtown. The Church of Hempstead was first organized in 1644, possibly, at a date even earlier. In the year named its first regular pastor, Rev. Richard Denton, entered upon his duties, continuing until 1658. Four years later the earliest pastor was settled at Jamaica, the Rev. Zachariah Walker. Rev. John Moore, the first minister of Newtown, commenced his labors about the same time. Amongst the subsequent pastors of these churches were some who had been driven from their parishes, in England, by the Act of Uniformity, in 1662. The Newtown Church, in common with the other Presbyterian churches of the vicinity, suffered much during the troublous times of the Revolution. From 1775 to 1783 it remained closed, the church edifice being first used as a stable by the British forces, and then demolished. The building now in use was erected in 1787. The First Church of Huntington is another of the very old churches of this Presbytery, dating back to pre-Revolutionary times. The most important and largest churches in the Presbytery are those of Jamaica, Huntington (First), Hempstead and Babylon.

Natchez, Miss., First Presbyterian Church of. The first Protestant denomination who assumed an organized form in Natchez were the Methodists. The Roman Catholics had preceded them, having been introduced and protected by the French and Spanish governments. Previously to 1810, the Presbyterians constituted a feeble body, composed of individuals who had immigrated from Scotland and the north of Ireland, and from the Middle and Eastern States of the Union. The earliest missionaries who visited Natchez were the Rev. William Montgomery and the Rev. James Hall, D.D., who were sent out by the Synod of North Carolina to explore the destitution of the Southwest. During their visit to Natchez, they preached in what, under the Spanish jurisdiction, was known as the Old Government House, on the site of which the Court House was afterwards erected. Mr. Montgomery subsequently returned and settled in Mississippi, in the neighborhood of Natchez. He was a man of a gentle and benevolent spirit, a sound theologian, and a useful and laborious preacher. He died in 1818, venerated and beloved by all who knew him, and endeared by a long course of services to the churches of Ebenezer and Union, of which he was for many years pastor. On his second visit, Mr. Montgomery was accompanied by the Rev. James Smylie, also from North Carolina, who settled permanently in Mississippi, and was closely identified with the history of the Presbyterian Church in the Southwest.

In 1808 the Rev. Jacob Riekhov, a native of Staten Island, arrived in Natchez, and in the Fall of that year commenced preaching, under a temporary engagement, in the building belonging to the Methodists. This venerable pioneer of Presbyterianism in the Southwest continued, for nearly half a century, to labor in the field which he had aided in occupying. When about eighty years of age, he held a commission from the Board of Missions. The Mississippi Presbytery felt it their privilege to provide for his comfort during his remaining years, and solicited him to devote himself to the preparation of a history of the Presbyterian Church in the Southwest.

When not enjoying the labors of missionaries, and until the establishment of a church of their own, many of the Presbyterian families were accustomed to worship at the Pine Ridge Church, eight miles north of Natchez. This church was the second that was organized in Mississippi.

In 1810 a subscription was opened with a view to the erection of a Presbyterian Church in Natchez. At the head of the enterprise was John Henderson, a man to whose influence, perhaps, more than that of any other, the church in that city owes its origin and its subsequent prosperity. It was not until 1814 that the building was completed, and the dedication took place in February, 1815. In the meantime a congregation was collected, in 1811, and the Rev. William Montgomery engaged to preach to them, in connection with the congregation at Pine Ridge. In the early part of the year 1813 the Rev. Samuel J. Mills, acting under a commission from the General Association of Massachusetts, and the Rev. John F. Schermerhorn, of the Dutch Reformed Church, paid a visit to Natchez, and, amongst other pious labors, established a "Bible Society for the Benefit of the Destitute in the Mississippi Territory." On a subsequent tour through the Southern country, in 1815, Mr. Mills was accompanied by the Rev. Daniel Smith (spoken of in the biography of Mills, as "a man of fervent zeal in the missionary cause"), who visited Natchez, and consented to act as a stated supply to the church for a year, from April 1st, 1816. About this time, also, the church enjoyed for a while the presence and labors of the Rev. Elias Cornelius, D. D., then on his way to New Orleans, who had called at Natchez, in order to see and aid "his friend and fellow laborer," as Mr. Smith is called in Dr. C's Memoirs. Mr. Smith continued to serve the church, as stated supply, till 1819, when, on account of the difficulty of obtaining for him a requisite support, his engagement was suffered to expire.

In 1817 the church was duly organized by enrolling eight persons as members, and electing three ruling elders, to whom John Henderson was soon added as a fourth. The successor of Mr. Smith was the Rev. William Weir, who, in May, 1820, received and accepted a call to become the pastor of the Natchez Church. Mr. Weir was a native of Ireland, and at the time of his call was residing at Nashville, Tenn. He preached his first sermon on the 24th of December, 1820; was installed by the Mississippi Presbytery on the 31st of March, 1821; and died on the 25th of November, 1822. He was a pious and devoted minister, and his early departure was a severe affliction to the infant church, which had just begun to flourish under his labors. Up to the time of Mr. Weir's death thirty-two members had been admitted to the church. It deserves to be mentioned to the credit of the congregation, that immediately upon the settlement of Mr. Weir as their pastor, they made arrangements for the comfort of himself and family by the purchase of a parsonage.

On the 17th of May, 1823, the Rev. George Potts (subsequently Dr. Potts, of the church in University Place, New York), visited Natchez by invitation, and, on the 16th of June following, was unanimously elected pastor. The call was accepted, and in December, 1823, Mr. Potts commenced his labors regularly as pastor. The number of members reported to Presbytery about this date was forty-nine. During the period of Mr. Potts' incumbency of the pastoral office, nearly thirteen years, the Natchez Church attained to a vigorous degree of maturity. Its communion list increased from forty-nine to one hundred and thirty-five. The old church edifice having become inconvenient it was removed, and a new and larger one was erected. No special revival of religion had occurred, but the membership grew with a steady and cheering increase. To Mr. Potts' judicious and faithful exertions much of the subsequent prosperity of the Natchez Church is to be attributed. He probably laid the foundation of those habits of systematic benevolence and decorum in worship for which the congregation over which he so long presided have ever been honorably distinguished.

It was during Mr. Potts' pastorate of the Church at Natchez, that Samuel Postlethwaite, Esq., whose name at this point deserves special notice, became connected with it as an elder, serving in this capacity until his lamented death, in 1825, and contributing very powerfully to the church's prosperity. Mr. Postlethwaite's long residence in that country, the position he held in society, the universal respect and confidence which his virtues had secured, his dignified simplicity and gentlemanly courtesy, his firmness and modesty, the thoroughness with which he entered upon the religious life and duties at a time when there were but few to countenance him, all these made him an invaluable ally to the few steadfast supporters of our Denomination, and exerted the most powerful influence upon a very intelligent community, many of whom were, at that period, contemptuously indifferent, not to say hostile, to serious views of religion.

Constrained by ill health, in November, 1835, Mr. Potts announced his intention of resigning his charge, and removing to a northern latitude. The congregation acquiesced in his wish with deep regret, and in the Spring of 1836 the church was again left without a pastor.

In August, 1837, the Rev. Samuel G. Winchester, formerly of the Sixth Church, Spruce street, Philadelphia, was presented with a call, which was accepted, and at the close of the year his installation took place. Under Mr. Winchester's ministry the church continued to flourish. In 1838 the church building was enlarged, by the addition of galleries, and assumed the form in which it stood until the Summer of 1851, when it underwent another very considerable enlargement. In the same year (1838) a very neat and commodious parsonage was purchased, at a cost of sixteen thousand dollars.

In June, 1840, the church was called to part with its venerable elder, Mr. John Henderson, a name which cannot be separated from its history. (See his sketch.) A still sorer loss befell the church in the following year, in the death of Mr. Winchester, its pastor. He had attended the meeting of the General Assembly in May, 1841, as a commissioner from the Presbytery of Mississippi, and subsequently traveled for his health. On the 31st of August, after an illness which had excited no particular apprehension, he departed this life, at the house of a friend in New York. A painful shock was communicated by this event to the whole population of Natchez, to whom Mr. Winchester's talents, social virtues and mild demeanor had strongly endeared him. As a preacher, writer, and advocate of Presbyterian order and orthodoxy, he stood in the front rank. During his ministry, the number of communicants in the Natchez Church was increased to two hundred and three. It was during the latter part of Mr. Winchester's pastorship that Natchez was visited and almost destroyed by a tornado. His own residence sustained considerable damage, as well as the church. This awful visitation of Providence he made the subject of an appropriate and solemn discourse on the Sabbath.

From the death of Mr. Winchester, in 1841, to 1843, the church remained without a pastor, the pulpit being supplied by different clergymen from the neighborhood and abroad. In June, 1843, a call was presented to the Rev. Joseph B. Stratton, then a licentiate of the Presbytery of Philadelphia, which was subsequently accepted, and Mr. Stratton ordained and installed in December of the same year, by the Presbytery of Mississippi. Dr. Stratton has ever since been in charge of the congregation, growing in their esteem, and in his usefulness, as time has advanced (see his sketch). Under his able ministry and watchful care the church has continued in a healthy and thriving condition, and now occupies a prominent place for strength, influence and importance. Its present number of communicants is about three hundred.

Nature. This word variously implies the regular course of things, according to God's ordinance (Rom. i, 26, 27); habit, feeling of propriety, common sense or general custom (ii, 14; 1 Cor. xi, 14); birth or natural descent (Gal. ii, 15); essence (Gal. iv, 8); qualities or dispositions of the mind, whether good (2 Pet. i, 4), or evil (Eph. ii, 3).

Necessity, Moral, is "that without which the effect cannot well be, although, absolutely speaking, it may. A man who is lame is under a moral necessity to use some help, but absolutely he may not. The phrase 'moral necessity' is used variously. Sometimes it is used for necessity of moral obligation. Sometimes, by moral necessity is meant that sure connection of things that is a foundation for infallible certainty. In this sense it signifies much the same as that high degree of probability which is ordinarily sufficient to satisfy mankind in their conduct and behavior in the world. Sometimes, by moral necessity is meant that necessity of connection and consequence which arises from such moral causes as the strength of inclination or motives, and the connection which there is in many cases between them and such certain volitions and actions."

Neil, Rev. William, son of William and Elizabeth (Tracy) Neil, was born in Jones county, N. C., in the year 1800; graduated at the College of New Jersey, in 1823; at Princeton Seminary in 1826, and was licensed by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, May 25th, 1826. Mr. Neil was stated supply at Murfreesboro, N. C., from the date of his ordination (April 28th, 1827), until April 25th, 1835; then at Portsmouth, Va., from 1835-40; at Chesterfield, Va., 1840-45; at Jamoia, near Tallahassee, Fla., 1845-53; then was pastor of the Church at Pittsylvania C. H., Va., where he labored faithfully and successfully, from December 4th, 1853 to October 25th, 1855. After being stated supply at Gallatin, Miss., from 1856 to 1866, he removed to Mobile, Ala., where, until 1869, he did much useful missionary work, not only in that city, but also along the line of the Mobile and Ohio Railroad. From 1869-76 he resided at Franklin, Tenn., supplying the church in that town, and, at the same time, doing much labor under the direction of the Missionary Committee of the Presbytery of Nashville. He died January 26th, 1881. Mr. Neil was a man of mild and genial temperament, of singular modesty, humility and manliness, a steady, industrious laborer in the Master's vineyard, esteemed and honored by all who knew him.

Neill, William, D.D., was born in Western Pennsylvania, in 1778, amid the hardships of frontier life, both his parents being massacred by the Indians. He graduated at Nassau Hall in 1803. He was ordained over the Church in Cooperstown, N. Y., in 1805. In 1809 he was called to the First Church of Albany; in 1816 to the Sixth Church of Philadelphia, the seceding portion from Dr. Ely's Church. In 1815 he was chosen Moderator of the General Assembly. In 1821 he was made President of Dickinson College, Carlisle, Pa. That position did not prove a bed of roses, and he became, in 1829, Secretary of the Board of Education. In 1831 he took charge of the Germantown Church, and raised it to a flourishing condition. In 1842 he retired from all active labors. In 1860 he departed this life, aged eighty-two years.

Dr. Neill was tall, dignified and very courteous in manner. As a writer, his style was perspicuous, and even elegant. Dr. D. X. Junkin styled him "the venerable and lovely Dr. William Neill." His piety was of a high order. As a college functionary, he was conscientious and faithful, and won the respect of the students. Besides occasional discourses, he published an exposition of the Epistle to the Ephesians.

Nelson, Rev. David, was born near Jonesborough, in East Tennessee, September 24th, 1793, and graduated at Washington College in that State. He studied medicine, and had just entered on the practice of his profession, when, the war with Great Britain having commenced, he joined a Kentucky regiment as a surgeon, and proceeded to Canada. On his return from this expedition, he settled as a medical practitioner in Jonesborough, with very promising prospects. Though he had in very early life made a profession of religion, his serious impressions gradually wore away, and he became at length an open advocate of infidelity. But, though he was avowedly infidel in his opinions, he had not been able to escape from all the influences of an early Christian education and profession. One day he took up Doddridge's "Rise and Progress;" some word arrested his mind. He read the work, and like the look of Christ on Peter, that word led Nelson to go out and weep bitterly, and in a very short time he re-entered the Church.

Dr. Nelson was licensed by the Abingdon Presbytery, Va., to preach the gospel, in April, 1825. He preached for nearly three years in different places in Tennessee, and at the same time was associated with one or two other ministers in conducting a periodical work, published at Rogersville, entitled "The Calvinistic Magazine." In 1828 he became pastor of the Church in Danville, Ky., and about this time traveled somewhat extensively in Kentucky, as agent of the American Education Society. In 1830 he was chiefly instrumental in establishing a college in Marion county, Mo., to which was given the name of Marion College. In 1836 he established, in the neighborhood of Quincy, Ill., an Institute for the education of young men, especially for missionary life. In the latter part of his life a fearful malady fastened itself upon him, and proved an overmatch for medical skill. He died, October 17th, 1844, after uttering, as his last words, "It is well."

Dr. Nelson's highest and most enduring fame, no doubt, is connected with his work entitled, "Cause and Cure of Infidelity," which has passed through many editions, and has taken a high place in the standard religious literature of the country. "I have no hesitation," says Dr. W. S. Potts, "in assigning to Dr. Nelson a place among the remarkable men of the age. With as much of native intellectual and moral ability as is often seen in connection with our fallen humanity, and with a desire to serve God in promoting the spiritual welfare of men that everybody saw had all the strength of a ruling passion, he combined strongly marked eccentricities, which the essential grandeur of his character served only to render more conspicuous. But however these eccentricities might blind some to his substantial excellence, and even interfere, to some extent, with his usefulness, it was impossible but that persons of intelligence and discernment should very quickly discover his remarkable piety and power, and it was equally impossible for any to be long in contact with him and be insensible to his influence. Hence his career as a Christian minister was signalized in an unusual degree by the triumphs of Divine grace, and wherever he went he seemed to be constantly gathering jewels to his immortal crown."

Nelson, Henry Addison, D. D., was born in Amherst, Mass., October 31st, 1820. He united with the Congregational Church in Homer, N. Y., May 1st, 1831, and graduated from Hamilton College in 1840. He was ordained and installed at Auburn First Presbyterian Church, by the Presbytery of Cayuga, July 29th, 1846, where he remained until 1856. He was pastor in St. Louis, Mo., 1856-68; Professor of Theology in Lane Seminary, 1868-71; and from 1874 has been pastor of the First Church, Geneva, N. Y. Dr. Nelson has published "Seeing Jesus," 1869; "Sin and Salvation," 1881. He was Moderator of the General Assembly at Rochester in 1867. Dr. Nelson was blessed with a pious ancestry. His great grandfather, Nathanael Nelson, his grandfather, Seth Nelson, and his father, Seth Nelson second, held the office of deacon in the Congregational Church in Millford, Mass., from A. D. 1748 to A. D. 1815. Seth Nelson second, having removed to New York, was a Presbyterian ruling elder during the later years of his life, in Cortland, N. Y.

Nelson, Rev. Samuel Kelsey, the eldest child of Henry and Anna (Kelsey) Nelson, was born near Jonesborough, East Tennessee, October 9th, 1787. He graduated at Washington College, then under the care of the venerable Dr. Doak; studied theology under his direction; was licensed, in 1807, by the Holston Presbytery, and then was engaged for some time in preaching in South Carolina, and also at different places in Tennessee. He was installed pastor of the Church at Danville, Ky., in 1809. To Mr. Nelson, it is understood, belongs the honor of having been the principal founder of Centre College, Danville. For this he labored with consummate skill and untiring assiduity. His public spirit was strikingly evinced in the interest he took in founding and fostering the Kentucky Asylum for the Deaf and Dumb, which also was situated within the bounds of his congregation, and it was while fulfilling an appointment by its Board of Trustees, in the Spring of 1827, to Tallahassee, Fla., to negotiate some matters in which the Institution was specially interested, that he died. This event occurred, May 7th, and the tidings of it were mournfully responded to in every circle in which he had been known. Mr. Nelson was an interesting and edifying preacher. He drew his illustrations chiefly from within the range of ordinary observation, and he never uttered a sentence that was not level to the comprehension of the humblest of his hearers. His manner was earnest and affectionate, but was accompanied with very little action. He left behind him a highly honored name.

Nevin, Alfred, D. D., LL. D., was born in Shippensburg, Cumberland county, Pa., March 14th, 1816. His parents, Major David Nevin and Mary Peirce, were of English and Scotch origin, and descended from families among the first to settle in Cumberland Valley. His father, a nephew of Hugh Williamson, LL. D., was a merchant; served in the defence of Baltimore in the war of 1812, and was a representative from Cumberland county in the Reform Convention, 1837-8, for remodeling the State Constitution. He commenced his collegiate education at Dickinson College, completing it at Jefferson College, where he graduated in 1834. As a student of Judge Reed's Law School, at Carlisle, he received the degree of L. B., and was admitted to the Bar in 1837. Entering at once the Western Theological Seminary, he graduated there in 1840, and in April of the same year was licensed by the Presbytery of Carlisle. Declining invitations to several churches in Western cities, he took charge, in May, 1840, of Cedar Grove Presbyterian Church, Lancaster county, Pa., where he continued five years. He subsequently was pastor of the G. R. Church, Chambersburg, Pa., seven years, and for five years, of the then Second Presbyterian Church of Lancaster, Pa. During his residence in Lancaster he was chosen Moderator of the Synod of Philadelphia, at its meeting in Hollidaysburg. In 1857 he organized the Alexander Church, Philadelphia. Resigning this charge in 1861, he began the publication of The Standard, which, in 1866, on account of his impaired health, was merged in the Northwestern Presbyterian, at Chicago. After a rest, he published the Presbyterian Weekly (now the Baltimore Presbyterian), and he was the editor-in-chief of the Presbyterian Journal, which was published by the Rev. J. Ford Sutton, from its initial number, for three years.

Dr. Nevin, in 1855, was chosen to address the Alumni of his Alma Mater, and rendered that service, taking for his theme, "The Responsibility of American Citizenship." He was, for years, a member of the Presbyterian Historical Society, a member of the Presbyterian Board of Publication, a Trustee of Lafayette College, and a Director of the Presbyterian Hospital, in Philadelphia. He has a number of times been a commissioner to the General Assembly, and by its appointment has represented the Presbyterian Church in the Massachusetts Congregational Association, the Synod of the Reformed Dutch Church, and the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church of Canada. He has been honored with election to membership in the Historical Societies of Pennsylvania and Wisconsin, and in literary societies of several of the prominent colleges of our country. He is the author of some twenty volumes. Our Board has published from his pen, "Notes on the Shorter Catechism," "Parables of Jesus," etc. Among those issued by other publishing houses are, "Churches of the Valley," "Guide to the Oracles," "The Voice of God," "Popular Commentary on the Gospels and Acts," "Men of Mark of Cumberland Valley, Pa.," "Notes on Exodus," "The Age Question," and "Infidelity Rebuked—Letters to Col. Robert G. Ingersoll."

Nevin, Edwin Henry, D.D., was born in Shippensburg, Cumberland county, Pa., May 9th, 1811. He graduated at Jefferson College; studied theology at Princeton Seminary, and was licensed to preach by the First Presbytery of Philadelphia, in 1836. His first pastoral charge was at Portsmouth, Ohio, where he had a successful ministry for several years. In 1839 he accepted the pastorate of the Church at Poland, Ohio, and continued in this relation, with the Divine blessing upon his labors, until 1841, when he was called to the Presidency of Franklin College, New Athens, Harrison county, Ohio. While in this position he raised funds and secured the erection of a new college building, and the Institution gained a wide repute under his administration. He was subsequently pastor, at Mt. Vernon, O., and Cleveland, O., and of several Congregational churches in New England. After an interval of rest, necessitated by ill health, he was called to the pastorate of St. Paul's Reformed Church in Lancaster, Pa., and from thence to the First Reformed Church of Philadelphia, where he remained several years. After relinquishing this position, he connected himself with the Central Presbytery of Philadelphia, and has not since accepted a pastoral charge.

Dr. Nevin is an eloquent and impressive preacher. He is an apt and ready debater, and has in several instances combated error in public discussion. He has recently been elected to membership in the "Victoria Institute or Philosophical Society of Great Britain," of which the Earl of Shaftesbury, is the President. He is the author of "The Minister's Handbook," "The Man of Faith," "The City of God," and "Thoughts about Christ," which have been prepared with care, and received with much favor. As a poet, he has attained considerable recognition, and some of his devotional poems have a place in many of the hymnals of the land, as well as in England and Ireland.

Nevin, Theodore Hugh, fourth son of John Nevin, Esq., was born in Franklin county, Pa., in the year 1815. His father was a gentleman of piety and of more than ordinary intelligence, a graduate of Dickinson College, of which for a time he served as trustee, and fond of books, but, in harmony with his tastes, he spent his life in the noble occupation of a farmer, living for many years on his beautiful place near Shippensburg, Pa., during which he frequently contributed articles to some of the public journals of his day. The first score years of the son's life were spent on his father's farm. He then removed to Pittsburg, Pa., where his education was completed, mainly under the private tuition of his brother, the Rev. John W. Nevin, D.D. In 1842 he established the firm of T. H. Nevin & Co., for the manufacture of white lead, which firm still exists. In 1842 he was appointed Treasurer of the Western Theological Seminary at Allegheny, Pa., and still retains this position, in which he has rendered very valuable service to that Institution. In 1844 he was elected and ordained a ruling elder in the First Presbyterian Church, Allegheny, and for many years he has filled the same office in the Presbyterian Church at Sewickley. In 1864 he was elected, and still continues to be, President of the First National Bank, Allegheny, Pa., which, under his judicious and safe direction, has had a successful history. In 1861 he was appointed an Inspector of the Western State Penitentiary, and has been the President of its Board of Managers until the present time, devoting to it an amount of time and care which has largely contributed to the very satisfactory condition of its affairs. Mr. Nevin has for many years resided at Sewickley, of which he was one of the early settlers, and where he is held in the highest esteem by the community. He is a gentleman of great energy, of unimpeachable integrity, of active public spirit, and of admirable administrative ability. His business career has been a success. He has filled the secular offices to which he has been called with a fidelity which is universally acknowledged, and the duties of all his relations to the Church have been discharged with a consistency, zeal and efficiency which have won him public confidence and regard.

Nevins, William, D. D., was born in Norwich, Conn., October 13th, 1797. Although designed for commercial life, such was his unquenchable thirst for learning that he was allowed to enter Yale College, where he graduated in 1816. His theological studies were conducted at Princeton Seminary. He was settled over the First Church, Baltimore, October 19th, 1820. Dr. Nevins continued in this charge till his death, September 14th, 1835, being just in the prime of his life, thirty-eight years of age.

Though in his early years thought volatile in his manners and too imaginative in his pulpit efforts, he gradually sobered down, and his "profiting appeared to all." He became a serious, faithful, earnest, deep-toned gospel preacher, and his labors were crowned with abundant fruits. He was a favorite of William Wirt, who said "he loved this heart-preaching." His whole life was beautifully consistent, and exhibited the traits of a lovely, winning and saintly character. He attained to a wonderful self-restraint. Once, when assailed in Presbytery, having been provoked to make a tart reply, he acknowledged to a friend his deep compunction and humiliation, "for he had not yielded to anger before for seventeen years."

Dr. Nevins left behind him a few published works and several useful tracts. He had said that it was his highest ambition to write a good tract. Besides "Occasional Sermons," there was a posthumous volume of sermons and another of "Select Remains." His articles in the New York Observer, which gained him great reputation, signed M. S., the final letters of his name, were afterwards collected in two well-known volumes, "Thoughts on Popery," and "Practical Thoughts."

Nevius, John Livingston, D. D., was born in Ovid, N. Y., March 4th, 1829. He graduated at Union College, in 1848; studied theology at Princeton Seminary, and, after teaching for a time, was ordained an evangelist by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, in May, 1853. He was missionary in China, at Ningpo, 1854; pastor, 1856-60; missionary in Japan, 1861; missionary at Tungechow, North China, 1861-64; United States, 1865-71, and since 1871 has been missionary at Chefoo. Dr. Nevius, during his visit to this country, presented the claims of the missionary cause to the churches, frequently and forcibly. He is earnestly devoted to his work, admirably qualified for it, and has the pleasure of seeing it prosper in his hands.

New Bethel Presbyterian Church, Sullivan County, Tennessee. Amongst the earliest names associated with the origin of this church is that of the Rev. Joseph Rhea. He was a native of Ireland, and arrived in this country in 1769, landing at Philadelphia. To the Synod meeting in that city, May, 1771, the Presbytery of Donegal reported that he had been received as a member of that body. In 1772 he removed his family to Taneytown, Md., and became preacher of the Piney Creek Church, which was on the waters of the Monocacy river. He visited the settlements on the Holston river, Tennessee, in 1775, and, it would seem, again in 1776, when he bought the lands on Beaver Creek, now owned by some of his descendants. During these visits he must have embraced every opportunity of preaching to the settlers in their wilderness homes. Having bought the lands just mentioned, and pleased with the inviting prospect which the country presented, he decided to bring his family and settle in this region. He returned to Maryland, sold his property there, and while preparing to move, died, in 1777. His widow and family, however, carried out his purpose of removing to Holston, and reached their new home in February, 1779. In this latter year, or about this time, from the Piney Creek congregation, in Maryland, and from the contiguous portions of Pennsylvania, from what is now Adams county, then York, came many who had been members of Mr. Rhea's congregation, or who had been his acquaintances, and made their homes on the Holston and on the Watauga, or passed on further as settlements advanced.

The tradition is, that in the year 1782 the Presbyterian families brought here through the influence of the Rev. Mr. Rhea were, by the Rev. Samuel Doak (elsewhere noticed in this volume), organized into a church, and the name New Bethel was probably suggested by him as a memorial of the Bethel Church in Virginia, in the bounds of which he had passed many of his early years. It is believed that James Gregg, Sr., Francis Hodge, Sr., First; and John Alison, Sr., First; were the first ruling elders. It is not known how many members constituted the new organization.

In the year in which New Bethel was organized (1782) Adam Rankin, of Scotch-Irish parentage, and born near Greencastle, Pa., was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Hanover, and he immediately visited the churches of Holston and Nolachucky. He was a zealot on the subject of Psalmody. His opposition to singing any other than Rouse's version of the Psalms seems to have become a sort of monomania. He received, it is said, three calls from churches in the surrounding neighborhoods, but declined them on account of disputes on the subject of Psalmody. He may have visited and received a call from New Bethel. Whether this was the case or not, it is known that his agitation of this subject left the impression of his visit behind him for many years.

During many years after its organization the church was reported for much of the time vacant. The Rev. Jacob Lake, it is said, began to supply the church in 1797, and continued about three years. The Rev. John Cosson was the next minister, and preached in charge of New Bethel, as is supposed, for some time, about the year 1800 and thereafter. About the year 1811-12 the Rev. James Black became probably the next minister. During the interval between Mr. Black's resignation of the pastorate and 1820, the Rev. Samuel Doak, his son, the Rev. John W. Doak, the Rev. James Callahan, and the Rev. Robert Glenn, who were missionaries under the appointment of the General Assembly, also the Rev. Stephen Boyell and the Rev. Alexander McEwen, are remembered as having occasionally preached in the church.

From September, 1821 to July, 1823, the Rev. Andrew Campbell, a minister from Ireland, was pastor of the Blountville Presbyterian Church, having been supply for the year previous to 1821, and some part of his time served as supply of New Bethel Church. He also taught school in the old church building. In April, 1821, Rev. Andrew S. Morrison became stated supply of the Blountville Church, and continued until 1830, some part of this time supplying the New Bethel Church.

In the year 1830 the Rev. L. G. Bell (see his sketch) was pastor of Hebron Church, Jonesborough, and supply of New Bethel. In 1831 the Rev. Theophilus G. Potts preached to the Blountville Church for one year, and was also the supply of New Bethel Church during that time. The pulpit subsequently was filled as follows: Rev. Daniel Rogan, pastor of Blountville Church in 1830, was stated supply of New Bethel; in 1840 the Rev. P. Wood supplied the church and continued to do so at this time about two years; in 1842-3 the Rev. James Melin served the church in connection with the Church at Elizabethton; the Rev. P. Wood again supplied the church for more than a year in 1844 and 1845; the Rev. Daniel Rogan succeeded in the early part of 1846, thus having charge of the church a second time in connection with the Blountville Church, and retaining this charge up to near the close of 1853.

About the time of the first period of Mr. Wood's ministry the first enlargement of the church building was made. In the early history of the church the first building of logs was erected. This was used for many years as a school-house. The building was of contracted dimensions, and had a stone chimney at the east end. The pulpit was in the west end, around which the male portion of the congregation gathered. The women and children occupied the end near the chimney corner.

Soon after the revival of 1838 the increase of membership and of attendance required enlarged accommodation. An addition of hewn logs was joined to the west end, and the building was thus enlarged perhaps to twice its former capacity. The pulpit was now in the middle of the north side of the church. In the new part of the building, what would now be considered a very old-fashioned stove began to do service in the cold winty days. For about forty years the building just described answered the needs and served the purpose of the congregation in its public worship. The present commodious structure, an attractive country church, was completed but two or three years ago.

The Rev. Daniel Rogan was succeeded as pastor of New Bethel, January 1st, 1855, by the Rev. John B. Logan, who continued in this relation until June 30th, 1861. From 1862 to 1873 the Rev. J. P. Briscoe supplied the church, in connection with the Blountville Church. Since that time the church was supplied, successively, by the Rev. John R. King, the Rev. A. S. Doak, the Rev. J. K. Kingagain, the Rev. R. F. King, and the Rev. James C. Carson, until, in 1881, the Rev. James B. Converse became pastor-elect. On August 23-26 the church celebrated its "centennial," on which occasion the Rev. Samuel Hodge, D. D., preached a very interesting "historical sermon," from which we have gleaned the details here presented.

In concluding his sermon Dr. Hodge thus eloquently referred to death's doings during the period he had reviewed:—

But what multitudes have these hundred years consigned to tenancy in that silent city of the dead! "The fathers, where are they?" From the silent sepulchres echo answers, "Here are they"—all that remains of their material forms. Here the aged grandsire and matron, bending under the weight of years, having laid down their burdens, have sunk into the last dreamless sleep. The father and the mother in middle age, or but little past, in the ripeness of their powers, have gone to the long home and rest from their labors. But the aged do not lie there alone. In that cemetery, and it may be in distant and perhaps unmarked graves, lie many, very many, of younger years, who were once familiarly known in the homes of this neighborhood. The young man in the strength of early manhood, with life's inviting prospect all spread before him, has yielded to the power of the destroyer and been early gathered to the fathers. The maiden, in her virgin purity; the young bride, soon, alas, exchanging the nuptial wreath for the cypress branch; the young mother, in the freshness of exultation over her first born, or her newly born, have each been called, when life seemed so attractive, from the homes of which they were respectively the light, to the darkness and silence of the narrow house, leaving behind them desolating bereavement and chilling loneliness. Little children and infants, in crowds, after the sharp suffering of the sudden or more protracted fatal illness, have, year after year, contributed to the constantly increasing population of that silent city. Of many who lie there it may be said:—

"Far from the maddening crowd's ignoble strife
Their sober wishes never learned to stray;
Along the cool, sequestered vale of life
They kept the noiseless tenor of their way."

"Their name, their years, spelled by the unlettered muse,
The place of fame and elegy supply,
And many a holy text around she strews,
To teach the rustic moralist to die."

Yes, the "glorious gospel of the blessed God" has laid many to rest here, in the sure and certain hope of eternal life; many whose highest ambition was to leave behind them names that should be synonyms of honesty and uprightness, and who were sustained in the arduous toil of their lowly walks of duty by the conviction that their record was on high. These mothers, sisters, daughters, wives, have but exchanged the fading rose of earthly loves, with its thorns, for the immortelle and the amaranth of undying bliss. These fathers, brothers, sons, husbands, instead of the sword of conflict, bear now in their hands palms of victory. The days of their mourning are ended. "Henceforth the Lamb which is in the midst of the throne shall feed them and lead them unto living fountains of waters, and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes."

Newell, William W., D.D., was born at Natick, Mass., September 17th, 1807. He graduated at Yale College in 1830, and took his theological course at Andover. He was pastor of a Congregational Church at Brighton, Mass., three years; of the Maverick Congregational Church, Boston, four years, and of the Presbyterian Church, Montgomery, Orange county, N. Y., thirteen years. In February, 1860, he was installed pastor of the Allen Street Presbyterian Church, New York, in which relation he continued for a number of years, having a most successful ministry. Dr. Newell is a gentleman of gentle heart, a clear, comprehensive mind, and thorough devotion to principles and duty. His style of preaching is fatherly, tender and devout to the utmost degree. His ministry has been eminently characterized by energy, talents and faith. He passed some time in Europe in 1858, and on his return published a volume of travels, entitled "Continental Sketches." He has also published various occasional sermons.

Newkirk, Matthew, was of a Huguenot family, from the South of Holland, the ancient form of the name being Van Nieukierck. The family emigrated to this country about the middle of the seventeenth century, and settled in New Jersey. His birth took place, May 31st, 1791, in Pittsgrove, Salem county, in that State. At the age of sixteen he came to Philadelphia, where he became clerk and salesman in a dry goods house. When the city was threatened by an English fleet, and the "Washington guards" were enrolled for its defence, he attached himself to them, and went into camp near Wilmington, Del. (1815). After the restoration of peace he entered into mercantile business and soon succeeded in building up a considerable wholesale trade. Various business connections were formed from time to time until his retirement from active mercantile life, in 1839. Mr. Newkirk was a Director of the United States Bank, with his friend, the Hon. Nicholas Biddle, and entered with the most earnest zeal into the construction of the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad, the first President of which he was, and which may almost be said to owe to him its very existence, certainly its completion at that early day.

A marble monument, erected in testimony to his success in this work, may still be seen on the line of the road at Gray's Ferry, on the west bank of the Schuylkill, below Philadelphia. The Little Schuylkill Navigation Railroad and Coal Company owes much of its present prosperous condition to his energy and perseverance. The same may be said of the Cambria Iron Works, at Johnstown, Pa., in which he became interested about 1854.

Mr. Newkirk's interest in projects of social and religious improvement equaled that in plans of industrial progress. Throughout life he was an earnest friend of the Temperance cause. For years he acted as President of the Female Medical College of Pennsylvania. The Polytechnic College of the State of Pennsylvania almost owes its existence to his liberality and energy. For thirty-four years he was an active Trustee of the College of New Jersey. In 1832 he united himself with the Central Presbyterian Church, of which he was for many years a deacon, trustee, and ruling elder, as well as General Superintendent of the Sabbath school. He was also a Trustee of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, and for twelve years its treasurer. Official trusts in the Boards of Publication, Education and Domestic Missions were also confided to him, and the Pennsylvania State Sabbath Association elected him its President. Mr. Newkirk was a gentleman of pleasing address and affable spirit, generous, hospitable and useful. He was greatly respected by the community in which his life was mainly spent, and by the church which he so long and faithfully served. His death occurred May 31st, 1868.

New Orleans, La., First Presbyterian Church. The first successful effort to plant Presbyterianism in the city of New Orleans originated with the Congregationalists of New England. Near the beginning of the year 1817 the Rev. Elias Cornelius was appointed, by the Connecticut Missionary Society, to engage in a missionary tour through the southwestern States, more especially to visit New Orleans, then containing a population of thirty to thirty-four thousand, and with but one Protestant minister, the Rev. Dr. Hull, to examine into its moral condition, and, while preaching the gospel to many who seldom heard it, to invite the friends of the Congregational or Presbyterian Communion to establish a church, and secure an able and faithful pastor. Mr. Cornelius arrived in New Orleans December 30th, 1817. On his journey southward he formed the acquaintance of Mr. Sylvester Larned, then finishing his theological studies at Princeton, N. J., with brilliant promise of a successful career as a preacher, and it was arranged that Mr. Larned should follow him to New Orleans, after his admission to the ministry. Mr. Larned was licensed and ordained, July 15th, 1817, as an evangelist, by the Presbytery of New York, and we find him, after a brief visit to his native home, leaving on the 26th of September, and journeying alone to the field where he was to gather the laurels of an unfolding reputation, and then to sanctify it by an early death. He reached his destination, after innumerable delays, on the 23d of January, 1818. (See Larned, Sylvestre.)

On the 8th of January, 1819, the corner-stone of the new edifice was laid, with imposing ceremonies (and in the presence of an immense throng), on the selected site, on St. Charles Street, between Gravier and Union, and on the 4th July following it was solemnly dedicated to the worship of Almighty God, with a discourse from Ps. xlviii, 9, "We have thought of thy loving kindness, oh, God, in the midst of thy temple," which will be found the fourth in the series of sermons published in connection with Mr. Larned's Memoirs.

There are no records from which to learn the spiritual growth of the church during this early period, except that in one of his letters Mr. Larned speaks of a communion season, about the middle of July, 1820, in which there were forty-two at the table of the Lord, part of whom were, however, Methodists. Mr. Larned's labors were those exclusively of an evangelist; and his brief life was spent in gathering a congregation and building a house of worship. There is no record of his having organized a church according to our ecclesiastical canons, by the election and ordination of ruling elders; and he himself was never installed into the pastoral relation by ecclesiastical authority. It pleased the Great Head of the Church to arrest his labors before they reached this point of consummation. During the month of August, 1820, the scourge which has so often desolated that city made its appearance. On Sabbath, August 27th, he preached from Phil. i, 21, "For me to live is Christ, and to die is gain;" words, alas! prophetic of his speedy call to those mansions where all is "gain" forever, to the believer. On the following Thursday, August 21st, the very day on which he completed the twenty-fourth year of his age, he fell asleep in Jesus, or rather awoke to the glory and joy of his Lord. His remains were consigned to the tomb, in Girod Cemetery, with the Episcopal service for the dead, rendered by the Rev. Dr. Hull.

Mr. Larned's successor, after an interval of eighteen months, was the Rev. Theodore Clapp, a native of Massachusetts, and a graduate of Yale College and of the Theological Seminary at Andover. He was licensed by a Congregational Association, October, 1817, and was led provisionally to Kentucky, by an engagement as private Tutor in a family residing near Lexington, in that State. During the Summer of 1821 he spent a few weeks at a watering place in Kentucky, and on the Sabbath preached in one of the public rooms of the hotel, to the assembled guests. This apparently casual circumstance led to his settlement in New Orleans. Among his hearers on that occasion were two gentlemen from that city, trustees of Mr. Larned's church, who, upon their return home, caused a letter to be written, inviting him to New Orleans. This invitation, at first declined, led to a visit to this city, near the close of February, 1822.

The first notice of the organization of this church as a spiritual body, is in the record of a meeting held for this purpose on the 23d of November, 1823. Prior to this, the labors of Mr. Larned, extending over a period of two years and seven months, from January 23d, 1818, to August 31st, 1820, and those of Mr. Clapp, over a period of one year and nine months, from March, 1822, to November, 1823, were simply evangelistic. A congregation had been gathered, a house of worship built, the Word and sacraments administered, and the materials collected for the spiritual church in the admission of persons to sealing ordinances: all in the exercise of that power which the Scriptures and our Presbyterian Standards assign to the evangelist.

On the evening of November 23d, 1823, just sixty years ago, at a meeting Moderated by Rev. Mr. Clapp, nine males and fifteen females presented credentials of having been admitted to the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, by Mr. Larned, as follows: Alfred Hennen, James Robinson, William Ross, Robert H. McNair, Moses Cox, Hugh Farrie, Richard Pearse, John Spittal, John Rollins, Phebe Farrie, Catherine Hearsey, Celeste Hearsey, Dora A. Hearsey, Margaret Agur, Ann Ross, Eliza Hill, Margaret McNair, Sarah Ann Harper, Ann Davison, Stella Mercere, Jane Robinson, Eliza Baldwin, Mary Porter, Eliza Davidson.

These persons, twenty-four in all, were formed into a church by the adoption of the Presbyterian Standards in doctrine, government, discipline and worship; and by a petition to the Presbytery of Mississippi to be enrolled among the churches under its care, with the style and title of "The First Presbyterian Church in the city and parish of New Orleans." The organization was completed by the election on the same evening of four persons to be ruling elders, viz: William Ross, Moses Cox, James Robinson, and Robert H. McNair, who were accordingly ordained and installed on the following Sabbath, November 30th, 1823.

Mr. Clapp's ministry was a troubled one, from suspicions entertained of his doctrinal soundness. From his own statements, as early as 1824, his faith was shaken as to the doctrine of the eternity of future punishment. He pushed his investigations, doubts darkening upon him, through years, until at length he was forced to plant himself in open hostility to the whole Calvinistic theology. In March, 1825, five new elders were elected—Alfred Hennen, Joseph A. Maybin, William W. Caldwell, Josiah Crocker, and Fabricius Reynolds.

On the 5th of March, 1830, Mr. Clapp, on the ground that he had not found, and despaired of finding any text of Holy Writ to prove unanswerably the distinguishing tenets of Calvinism, solicited a dis-mission from Presbytery to the Hampshire County Association of Congregational Ministers, Mass. This dismissal was refused by the Presbytery, because they deemed it inconsistent to dismiss, in good standing, to another body, one whom they could no longer recognize in their own, and they proceeded to declare Mr. Clapp no longer a member of their body, or a minister in the Presbyterian Church. They also declared the pulpit vacant. Exception was taken to this action, and the case, by common consent, was carried over the intermediate court immediately to the General Assembly, which sustained the exception, declaring "that as Mr. Clapp had neither been dismissed nor suspended by the Presbytery, he ought to be regarded as a member of that body, and that in the opinion of the Assembly, they have sufficient reasons for proceeding to try him upon the charge of error in doctrine."

The case being thus remanded to the Presbytery, had to be taken up anew. Meanwhile the agitation in the bosom of the church could not be allayed. On the 13th of January, 1832, fifteen members, including Elders McNair and Caldwell, were dismissed, at their request, for the purpose of forming another church, upon the principles of the doctrine and discipline of the Presbyterian Church. This seceding body worshiped in a warehouse of Mr. Cornelius Paulding, opposite Lafayette Square, on the site covered by the building in which the congregation now worships. It enjoyed the services of the Rev. Mr. Harris; but the references to it are scant, and after a brief and flickering existence its elements were reabsorbed into the First Church. Meanwhile the Presbytery concluded its proceedings in the trial of Mr. Clapp, on the 10th of January, 1833, when he was deposed from the office of the ministry, and his relations to the church, which had only been those of a stated supply, and not of an installed pastor, were finally canceled. The roll of communicants, just before the secession in 1832, numbered eighty-nine.

Presbyterianism had now to start anew, from a beginning quite as small as at first. The social and amiable qualities of Mr. Clapp endeared him greatly as a man; the large majority of his hearers could not appreciate this clamor about doctrine; and many of the truly pious were slow to credit the extent of his departure from the faith, and were disposed to sympathize with him as one unkindly persecuted. The few therefore, who came forth, exactly nine, with the two elders Hennen and Maybin, found themselves in the condition of seeders who were homeless in the streets. Fortunately a spiritual guide was immediately provided. The Rev. Dr. Joel Parker, in the service of the American Home Mission Society, being in the city, was at once solicited to become their stated supply. His connection began January 12th, 1833, and the little band worshiped, alternately with the organization formed a year before under Mr. Harris, in the ware-room on Lafayette Square. These two wings finally coalesced in 1835. In March, 1834, Dr. Parker was unanimously chosen pastor, and on the 27th of April was duly installed by the Presbytery of Mississippi. During this Summer he was absent at the North, collecting funds for building a new house of worship. Upon his return in the Autumn, worship was resumed in a room on Julia street, until March 15th, 1835, when the basement of the new building on Lafayette Square was first occupied. This edifice was erected at an original cost, including the site, of $57,616. Subsequent improvements and enlargements in 1841, with an additional purchase of ground, amounted to over $17,000 more, making the whole cost of the church, which was destroyed by fire in 1854, $75,000.

Dr. Parker's connection with the church extended over a period of five years and six months, from January 12th, 1833, to June 14th, 1838, at which date he left, never to return. The pastoral relation was not, however, dissolved till the Spring of 1839. During his pastorship the church was greatly prospered, having secured a commodious sanctuary, and showing, as early as 1836, a church-roll numbering one hundred and forty-two communicants. There were two elections of elders: In 1834, Dr. John R. Moore, Frederick R. Southmayd and Truman Parmele being chosen to that office, and, in 1838, Stephen Franklin, John S. Walton and James Beattie

The next incumbent of the pulpit was the Rev. Dr. John Breckinridge, with whom the church opened negotiations in February, 1839. This gentleman was at the time the Secretary of the Assembly's Board of Foreign Missions. In his letter to the church, dated May, 1839, he consents to serve it in conjunction with his secretaryship, from which his brethren were unwilling to release him, the Board giving him a dispensation for six or seven months, for this purpose. These conditions being accepted, Dr. Breckinridge spent the Winter of 1839 in New Orleans, and still again the Winter of 1840, till April of 1841. He was called to the eternal rest in August of 1841, retaining in his hand the call of this church, as pastor-elect. His labors were fragmentary, but efficient; and the church was left to mourn over hopes disappointed in his death.

The attention of the church was soon turned to the Rev. Dr. W. A. Scott, of Tuscaloosa, Ala., who was installed as pastor on the 19th of March, 1843, and whose pastoral relation was formally dissolved in September, 1855. His active connection with the church, however, began and closed earlier than these dates. His term of service as pastor-elect began in the Fall of 1842, and his active labors ceased in November, 1854, covering a period of twelve years. Dr. Scott's ministry was exceedingly productive, during which vigorous and constant efforts were made to build up the interests of Presbyterianism in the city.

The church edifice was burned on the 29th of October, 1851; and it is to the last degree creditable to the congregation that, amidst all the discouragements of a vacant bishopric and a congregation scattered, it should have proceeded at once to build another, of larger proportions and more finished in style. In 1855 the house of worship now occupied was finished and dedicated to the worship of God. Its cost, with all its appointments, was about $57,000.

On the 21st of September, 1854, a call was made out to the Rev. B. M. Palmer, D. D., of South Carolina, which upon being presented before his Presbytery and Synod was defeated by the refusal of those bodies to place it in his hands. The call was renewed on the 16th of March, 1856, and prevailed. Dr. Palmer's labors began early in December of that year, and on the 25th of the same month he was installed by the Presbytery of New Orleans. After the lapse of twenty-seven years, he remains the popular and efficient pastor of this important church, in which his labors have been signally blessed, and from which have sprung, in the course of its history, in the city of New Orleans, ten other Presbyterian churches, with a total membership of about twenty-three hundred.

New Testament. The first printed edition of the Greek New Testament was that of Erasmus, which appeared in 1516. He afterwards published other editions with various corrections; the fifth, in 1535, is the basis of those still in common use. The Complutensian edition was not published till after the first of Erasmus; but it was printed previously; it bears the date January 10th, 1514. Robert Stephen printed his first edition in 1516. His earlier editions blend the Complutensian and Erasmusian texts; the later ones adhere more to that of Erasmus, with some various readings from manuscripts. In 1624 the Elzevirs, printers at Leyden, put forth the first of their editions. These generally follow Stephen, sometimes adopting alterations from Beza, who had published a Greek Testament first in 1565. In the preface to the second Elzevir edition in 1633, it was said, Textum ego habes nunc ab omnibus receptum; whence the common phrase, textus receptus—"received text." This was, till of late years, professedly in general use on the continent; but readings from Stephen were not unfrequently introduced. It was in England that the collection of materials for the thorough revision of the sacred text began, Bishop Walton and Dr. John Mill being among the earlier laborers in the field. Many eminent critics have since spared no amount of pains for the same object. Among these may be named Wetstein, Griesbach, Luchmann and Tischendorf, to whom biblical students are deeply indebted.

Newton, Ephraim Holland, D.D., was born in Newfane, Vermont, June 13th, 1787; graduated at Middlebury College, August 16th, 1810, and at Andover Theological Seminary in September, 1813. He was installed pastor of the Church in Marlboro', Vt., March 16th, 1811, where he continued, for nearly twenty years, a successful ministry. He became pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Glens Falls, New York, February 25th, 1833, where his labors were also greatly blessed. He was pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Cambridge, N. Y., from 1836 until 1843, where, again, under his preaching, many were added to the church. In July, 1843, he took charge of Cambridge Washington Academy, which post he occupied with great efficiency and success until August, 1848. In 1860 he returned to Marlboro', and preached, as he was able, to the people of his first charge. In 1862 he was elected a member of the Legislature of Vermont. In 1863-4, he was the acting pastor at Wilmington, Vt. He died, October 26th, 1864. As a preacher, Dr. Newton was plain, earnest, Scriptural. As a Christian, he was humble and trustful, always living near his Saviour. He was especially active in all that concerned the welfare of his people, in things both religious and secular, and a zealous and successful worker in benevolent associations of the day.

Newton Presbytery, N. J., was constituted by the Synod of New York and New Jersey, in October, 1817, out of the Presbytery of New Brunswick. The geographical line by which it was to be separated from the latter Presbytery, started on the Delaware river, a short distance above Lambertsville, and held an irregular course to the northeast, through the counties of Hunterdon, Morris and Sussex, till it reached the State line between New York and New Jersey. All the territory in New Jersey north and west of this line, and a part of Northampton and Monroe counties, Pa., were included in the bounds of the Presbytery. The churches under its care within these limits were: Smithfield, in Monroe county, and Upper Mount Bethel, Lower Mount Bethel and Easton, in Northampton county, Pa. In New Jersey, Amwell First, Amwell Second, Flemington, Pleasant Grove, Alexandria, Kingwood, Bethlehem, Baskingridge, Lamington, Fox Hill, German Valley, Hackettstown, Newton, Hardwick (Tellow Frame), Marksboro, Knowlton, Oxford, Mansfield, Harmony and Greenwich. The first meeting was held in the Mansfield (Washington) Church, on the third Tuesday of November, 1817, and was Moderated by Rev. John Boyd, by appointment of Synod. The ministers present were: David Barclay, David Bishop, John Boyd, Joseph Campbell, Jacob R. Castner, Horace Galpin, Halloway W. Hunt, Jacob Kirkpatrick (elected Clerk) and Joseph L. Shafer; absent, Garnett A. Hunt, William B. Sloane and Jehiel Talmage. Elders present, James Dunham, from Bethlehem; Thomas Kennedy, from Greenwich; Alexander Finley, from Baskingridge; Ebenezer Stilson, from Mansfield; John Stinson, from Marksboro, and James Thompson, from Hackettstown.

In 1821 the Allen Township Church, Northampton county, Pa., was transferred from the Presbytery of Philadelphia to Newton. The Presbytery extended its jurisdiction westward, over the unoccupied coal region of Pennsylvania. In 1832, the churches of Baskingridge and Lamington were transferred to the Presbytery of Elizabethtown. By operation of the excising Act of 1837, the churches of Moscow and Caledonia, in Western New York, became attached to the Presbytery. In 1839, by the organization of Raritan Presbytery, the churches of Durham, in Pennsylvania, and all south of the Musconetcong river, in N. J., were cut off, viz.: Amwell First, Amwell Second, Flemington, Alexandria, Kingwood, Bethlehem, Pleasant Grove, Fox Hill, German Valley, and such other churches as had sprung up in this original territory. In 1840 the churches of Durham, German Valley and Fox Hill were restored to the Presbytery. Under missionary efforts in the coal regions there had sprung up the churches of Conyngham, Summit Hill, Beaver Meadow and Mauch Chunk, which, in 1843, were set off to constitute the Presbytery of Luzerne. All the remaining churches in Pennsylvania, west of the Delaware, and south of Martin's Creek, were set off to the Second Presbytery of Philadelphia in 1851. By the union of 1870, the bounds of the Presbytery were made to conform to those of the counties of Sussex and Warren, in N. J., including the churches of Musconetcong Valley and Bloomsburg, in Hunterdon, but which, being north of the Musconetcong mountains, geographically, belonged to Warren. For history, prior to the formation of Newton Presbytery (see Presbyterianism in Northern New Jersey; see also "Fiftieth Anniversary of the Presbytery of Newton, by Rev. D. X. Junkin, D. D., pp. 106, 1-68, Charles Scribner & Co.).

New York Avenue Presbyterian Church, Washington, D. C. In October, 1859, the F Street Presbyterian Church and the Second Presbyterian Church were practically united. The name of "The New York Avenue Presbyterian Church" was substituted for the two preceding, and enrolled by the Presbytery. The Rev. Phineas D. Gurley, D. D., who had been pastor of the F Street Church since 1853, was cordially continued pastor of the new church. He was instrumental in procuring the building of the present edifice.

The pastorate of Dr. Gurley closed only with his death, which occurred September, 1868, after a faithful and successful ministry. The Rev. Samuel S. Mitchell, D. D., entered upon his duties as pastor, March 14th, 1869, and resigned May 2d, 1878, to accept a call to Brooklyn, N. Y.

In June, 1878, Rev. John R. Paxton, D. D., succeeded to the pastorate, and the relation was dissolved February 19th, 1882, to enable him to accept a call to New York city.

The Rev. William Alvin Bartlett, D. D., the present pastor, was chosen April 17th, 1882, and was duly installed October 24th of the same year. (See illustration on next page.)

New York Observer, was founded in May, 1823, by Sidney E. and Richard C. Morse, sons of Rev. Jedediah Morse, D. D. Sidney E., with his father, was the founder of the Boston Recorder, which he believed to be the first religious and secular newspaper ever established. Believing that New York was the place for a national newspaper, he came to that city and set up the Observer. Its prospectus pledged the paper to be unsectarian in religion and politics, and it had, and still has, its supporters in various denominations and in all parties. Its circulation being chiefly among Presbyterians, it devotes more space to the news of those churches than any others, but it is sought for by intelligent persons of every Christian name. The paper was conducted by the Morses until 1840, when the Rev. Samuel Irenæus Prime, D. D., was employed by them as an assistant, and the chief labor was devolved upon him. He was joined by his brother, the Rev. Edward Dorr Griffin Prime, D. D., in the year 1853. In 1873 the Rev. Charles A. Stoddard, D. D., and in 1880, the Rev. Wendell Prime, D. D., became connected with it, and these four last named are now its editors and proprietors, constituting the New York Observer Company. The paper is earnest in the defence of evangelical truth; conservative on all questions of moral reform; strong in its opposition to the doctrines and purposes of Romanism; zealous in the promotion of Temperance, education, religious liberty, and wholesome, pure and intelligent civil government. Its circulation has been uniformly larger than any religious paper owned by private parties, and its influence for good is not bounded by the limits of the United States, but extends throughout the English reading world. Its correspondence, foreign and domestic, includes every department of religious and secular intelligence, and the most eminent persons in the Church and the State, in science, art and letters, are among its contributors. No paper in the world has a more steadfast body of devoted readers and friends, and in moral influence and usefulness, it aims at being in the foremost place.

Niagara, Presbytery of. In the year 1800 the Presbytery of Albany embraced all of New York State except New York city and vicinity. At that time there were less than fifty families west of the Genesee River. In 1802 the Presbytery of Columbia was set off on the south, and the Presbytery of Oneida on the west. In 1805 Geneva Presbytery was set off, embracing all the territory west of the west line of Oneida and Chenango counties, with four ministers and eight churches. The churches of Lima and Lakeville, organized by the Rev. Daniel Thatcher in 1795, were two of that number. In 1810 Onondaga and Chenango Presbyteries were erected, leaving to Geneva Presbytery all the territory west of Cayuga Lake, with eleven ministers and twelve churches. The only one west of Genesee River at that time was the Caledonia Church, situated in the "Genesee" or "Pleasant" Valley. The Rev. Joel Chapman, of

NEW YORK AVENUE CHURCH, WASHINGTON, D. C.

Geneva, from 1800 to 1813, was the first minister settled in Western New York.

In 1804, the Rev. William Allen, afterwards President of Bowdoin College, labored as a missionary in Western New York. He says that at that time, "West of the Genesee River to Lake Erie, and from Lake Ontario to the Pennsylvania line, there was no meeting-house, nor any known minister, except himself." The early missionaries of this Genesee country were chiefly supported by the Connecticut Missionary Society and the General Assembly's Board of Domestic Missions. The War of 1812, in which Buffalo, Tuscarora, Lewistown and Youngstown were burned, drove many emigrants eastward, but they returned again, and population rapidly increased. In 1813 there were but thirteen churches on the Holland Purchase. In February, 1817, the Synod of Geneva set off from the Presbytery of Geneva, the Presbyteries of Ontario, Bath and Niagara. Niagara Presbytery then embraced all its present territory, and also that of the Presbyteries of Buffalo, Rochester and Genesee. In two years more it embraced twenty ministers and twenty-three churches. In 1819 the Presbyteries of Rochester and Genesee were set off from Niagara. September 18th, 1823, the Synod set off the Presbytery of Buffalo and left the Presbytery of Niagara as it now exists.

The first meeting of Niagara Presbytery, as now constituted, was held at Gasport, January 27th, 1821. The roll of this meeting was as follows: Ministers, David M. Smith, of Lewiston, George Colton, of Gasport. Elders, Titus Fern, Gasport; Abel Tracy, Gaines; Daniel Holmes, Wilson; Luther Crocker, Cambria; Asahel Munger, Lockport; Lovel Lewis, Lewiston. The Rev. D. M. Smith was elected Moderator, and his opening sermon was from Nehemiah ii, 20: "The God of Heaven he will prosper us, therefore we, his servants, will arise and build." At this time the Presbytery had within its bounds eleven churches, exclusive of the Church at Tuscarora, and four ordained ministers, two of whom had charges. Owing to the newness of the country and the multiplicity of religious sects, no one of these churches was able alone to support the gospel.

The first church organized within the bounds of the Presbytery of Niagara is the Indian Church, at Tuscarora. Rev. Mr. Holmes was sent there as a teacher and a missionary, in 1805, and we first find a church there in 1806, consisting of seven members. Between this date and 1835 all the other churches were organized, except the one at Wright's Corners. Albion was organized July 22d, 1821; Barre Centre, about the year 1820; Carlton, about the year 1831; Halley, January 5th, 1819; Knowlesville, August 27th, 1817; Lewiston, about the year 1817; Lockport First, in 1822; Lockport, Second Ward, in 1832; Lyndonville, about the year 1834; Medina, about the year 1831; Millville, about the year 1821; Niagara Falls, about the year 1824; Porter, about the year 1824; Pendleton and Wheatfield in 1816; Somerset, about the year 1824; Tuscarora, about the year 1805; Wilson, about the year 1819; Wright's Corners, in 1872. Gaines, Gasport and Cambria, once connected with the Presbytery, belong now to the Congregational Association. The old churches of Chalmers and Pendleton were united to form the Church of Pendleton and Wheatfield, in 1846. The churches of Kendall, Middleport, Pe-kin, and Suspension Bridge, are deceased. Since 1874, when a Semi-centenary Sketch was read before the Presbytery by the Rev. E. P. Marvin, of Lockport, Millville Church has ceased to exist, and Calvary Church has been organized.

"At the beginning of the half century," says Mr. Marvin, "there were but few church buildings, and those were of small value. Now our church buildings are worth about $200,000, and our parsonages about $33,000. All our churches have sanctuaries, and all but five have parsonages, and this property is nearly all free from debt.

"The early pioneers were, of course, compelled to 'endure hardness as good soldiers.' They leave many evidences of ardent devotion and extraordinary missionary zeal. They were men of tough skins and tender hearts. They organized at an early day, Missionary and Tract Societies, and obtained more money from the churches for foreign missions than for any other cause.

"The Presbytery from the first has been found to the core, and duly cautious against all errors in doctrine and practice. Members received from other bodies are carefully examined, as to their conformity to the Standards of the Presbyterian Church, and especially in the earlier times, members were watched over and brought to trial if there was any just ground to suspect heresy. Private members were solemnly warned by the voice of Presbytery against such works as those of 'Paine, Volney, Byron, and Bulwer.'

"The first revival reported in Presbytery occurred at Lewiston in 1818. Since that time every church has been visited repeatedly with 'times of refreshing from the presence of the Lord.' The most extensive and powerful work of grace occurred in the years of 1840 and 1841. In the year 1840, Rev. W. C. Wisner, then pastor of the Second Ward Church, Lockport, and Rev. E. B. Sherwood, pastor at Wilson, visited the churches of Niagara county, by request of a Presbyterian Convention, held at Lyndonville, in which the sentiment prevailed, that it is better to call in neighboring pastors to assist each other, than to employ traveling evangelists. The most extensive and powerful revival since that time occurred in the year 1869. Although in these works, as in all where man has a hand, the vile has mingled with the precious, still our churches have been increased in numbers and improved in graces, by revivals of religion."

Niccolls, Samuel J., D. D., was born August 3d, 1838, in Westmoreland county, Pa. He was the only child of William Todd and Elizabeth (Jack)

Nicolls. His academic education commenced at Eldersridge Academy, and was completed at Jefferson College, from which Institution he was graduated in 1857. In the Fall of the same year he entered the Western Theological Seminary, where he completed his theological course of study in 1860. He was licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of Redstone in 1859, and in July, 1860, was called to the pastorate of the Falling Spring Church, Chambersburg, Pa. He continued in the pastorate of this church for four years, during which he was highly esteemed by his people as an able preacher and faithful pastor, and the church greatly prospered under his ministry. In November, 1864, he was called to the pastorate of the Second Church of St. Louis, Mo.,

SAMUEL J. NICCOLLS, D. D.

and entered upon his ministry there in January, 1865. Here he still continues, abundantly blessed in his labors and beloved by his congregation.

Dr. Nicolls is an earnest, agreeable and judicious man. He stands in the front rank of the ministers of his day. He grasps a subject with vigor, expounds it logically, lucidly and thoroughly, and presents it in an attractive style, and with a graceful and impressive delivery. He is an active and influential member of Presbytery and Synod. He has been very useful in connection with several of the Boards of the Church, and in preparing some of its Sabbath-school lessons. He has been prominent in the negotiation between the Northern and Southern General Assemblies for the restoration of amicable relations, and as one of the delegates of the former body to the latter, in 1853, delivered an address to it, as the representative of his colleagues, of great wisdom, beauty and force. Dr. Nicolls was elected Moderator of the General Assembly (O. S.), at its meeting in Detroit, in 1872, and presided over its deliberations with great dignity, ability and acceptableness. Whilst devotedly attached to his own church, he is of a liberal spirit, and no good cause that claims his aid is denied his sympathy and co-operation.

Nicholas, Rev. Walter Douglas, was born at Mendham, N. J., December 12th, 1852. He graduated at New Jersey College in 1874, and at the Union Theological Seminary, New York city. He was ordained by the Central Presbytery of Philadelphia, May 10th, 1877, was pastor of the Temple Church, Philadelphia, 1877-80, and since that time has been pastor of the First Church, Albany, N. Y. Mr. Nicholas is a faithful and forcible preacher, and devoted to his pastoral work. He was successful in Philadelphia, and his labors in Albany are attended with marked evidences of the Divine blessing.

Niles, Henry Edward, D. D., second son of William and Sophia (Goodrich) Niles, was born at South Hadley, Mass., August 15th, 1823. He graduated at Union College and at the Princeton Theological Seminary; was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick; ordained by the Presbytery of Columbia; and installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Valatie (Kinderhook), New York, October 24th, 1848. After a course of arduous and very successful labor, in 1855, he was obliged, by broken health, to cease from pastoral duties, and spent about a year in traveling and recreation. In the Spring of 1856 he undertook partial service, as supply for the Church at Angelica, where he continued for about three years, the church being blessed with much prosperity under his ministry. From 1859 to 1861 he acted as pastorelect of the North Church, at St. Louis, Mo. Returning to New York, he was called to the Church at Albion, from whence, in 1864, he was called to the First Church, at York, Pa., and installed its pastor by the Presbytery of Harrisburg, April 16th, 1865. Here he found a wide field of usefulness, which he has cultivated with great diligence and success. Under his ministry, that church has steadily increased in numbers, activity and Christian liberality, until it stands among the foremost of the State.

Dr. Niles is an able and earnest preacher, and a devoted pastor. He is well and favorably known in the Councils of our Denomination. He was elected Moderator of the Synod of Philadelphia in 1874. He was an Associate member of the First Presbyterian Ecumenical Council at Edinburgh, in 1877. He has for years been a useful member of several Ecclesiastical and Educational Boards, and is the author of various pamphlets, and published sermons and addresses. He is justly esteemed by his brethren for his Christian spirit and zeal.

Niles, William Allen, D. D., the only son of Rev. Benjamin and Mahlah (Dunning) Niles, was born in Binghamton, N. Y., May 29th, 1823. He graduated at Williams College, in the class of 1847, and at Auburn Seminary in 1850, and was ordained by the Presbytery of Ithaca, June 23d, 1850. He preached at Beaver Dam, Wis., as a Home Missionary, 1850-53; at Watertown, Wis., 1853-59; at Corning, N. Y., 1859-72; and at Hornersville, N. Y., 1872. His son, William Henry Niles, is a Home Missionary in Jacksboro, Texas; and his daughter, Mary West Niles, M. D., is a Missionary Physician in Nanking, China. Dr. Niles is an able sermonizer and a popular preacher, much sought for on public occasions, both secular and religious. He is a ready platform speaker, abounding in sparkling wit and humor. He is also well known as a leader of Sunday-school Institutes, and as a writer on kindred topics, and has published notes on the Catechism and a series of graded lessons on Bible study. He is a frequent contributor to the secular and religious press, and for a time edited a Temperance paper. He is fertile in expedients for doing Christian work, and his ministry has been attended with numerous revivals. He is a public-spirited citizen, a wise counsellor, and a faithful presbyter, as well as an earnest Christian.

Nimmo, Rev. Gershom Hatton, youngest son of Rev. Joseph and Hannah Nimmo, was born in Huntington, Long Island, March 23d, 1834; pursued his preparatory studies with his father; entered Princeton College, August, 1854; graduated in 1858; entered the Theological Seminary in Princeton, September, of the same year, and graduated in April, 1861. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Long Island; ordained and installed pastor of the Church of Lewes, Delaware, by the Presbytery of Lewes, September 26th, 1861; was called from Lewes to Hartsville, Pa., and installed pastor of the Church of Neshaunoy, in Warminster, by the Second Presbytery of Philadelphia, May 26th, 1870, to which church he still ministers, beloved by his people and successful in his work. Mr. Nimmo is a gentleman of excellent spirit, a good preacher, and faithful in pastoral and presbyterial duties.

Nisbet, Dr. Charles, was born in Haddington, Scotland, January 21st, 1736. At the age of eighteen he graduated at the University of Edinburgh, and studied divinity for six years more, when he was licensed to preach, in 1760. In early life he was employed as Tutor in the family of Lord Leven. After an engagement in Glasgow he was settled as pastor of the large congregation of Montrose, May 17th, 1764. Like his friend, Witherspoon, he was bitterly opposed to the Moderate party in the Kirk, and lampooned them without mercy. He became no less noted as a friend of the American colonies, and being strongly recommended by Dr. Witherspoon, he accepted an invitation from John Dickinson and Dr. Rush, to become President of Dickinson College, Carlisle, Pa. Here he remained from July 4th, 1785, till his death, January 18th, 1804, in the sixty-eighth year of his age.

Dr. Nisbet was a man of strong natural abilities, but these were so overshadowed by his extensive reading and prodigious memory, that it is by traditions respecting the latter he is now best known. He was called a walking library. He could recite copious passages, if not whole books, from the Greek, Latin and British classics. A gentleman once made a quotation from the Æneid, and paused. Dr. Nisbet exclaimed, "Why don't you go on, man! The rest is as good as what you have given." But the other being unable to do so, Dr. Nisbet completed the passage at length. He was acquainted, more or less familiarly, with nine languages, Hebrew, Greek, Latin, French, Spanish, Italian, German and Low Dutch.

His wit and sarcasm were not less remarkable than his memory. He preached Memoriter, and for a time served as co-pastor of the Carlisle Church, and his discourses were lengthy. When the people complained, he said, that a long sermon was a long affliction to the ungodly, but consented to an agreed limit. As soon as the limit was reached he would stop short, though in the middle of a sentence, and say, "But your hoor being oot, we insist no further." A lady who had imbibed the fashionable infidel sentiments which prevailed during the French Revolution was scoffing, in his hearing at preaching, and at preachers as lazy and good for nothing. "Why," said she, "I could preach a sermon myself." "Suppose ye try it," said Dr. Nisbet, "and I'll give ye a text: 'It is better to dwell in a corner of the house-top than with a brawling woman in a wide house.'" The lady was incensed, and reproached him with want of courtesy. "Do you mean me?" said she, "Oh, madam," rejoined the doctor, "you must try it again; you've come to the application too soon."

Dr. Nisbet was a man of vast learning, united with the simplicity of a child in worldly affairs. But his proneness to express his opinions without reserve, his satirical turn, his fixed European habits, and his want of flexibility to accommodate himself to the requirements of his new position, undoubtedly proved impediments to the wide and beneficial influence fondly expected from his transference to America.

Nixon, J. Howard, D. D., was born November 27th, 1829, in Kent county, Del.; graduated with honor at the College of New Jersey, in 1851, and three years later at the Princeton Theological Seminary; was ordained pastor of the Church of Cambridge, N. Y., in June, 1856, and four years later installed the pastor of the First Church of Indianapolis, Ind. His ministry was acceptable, prosperous and faithful in both places, but failing health compelled him to resign these charges, the last in 1868. The next year he accepted the superintendency of the public schools of Springfield, Mo., and in 1871, the presidency of the Female College at St. Charles, in that State. He raised the Institution from decline to vigor and usefulness, but as soon as he was able to resume pastoral work, he resigned his place as its head, and accepted (1876) the pastorate of the Central Church, of Wilmington, Delaware, which continues to flourish under his wise, active and faithful ministry.

Nixon, Hon. John Thompson, was born in Fairton, N. J., August 31st, 1820; prepared for college in Bridgeton; graduated with distinguished honors at the College of New Jersey, in 1841; studied law two years under ex-Governor Elias P. Seeley, then a year with the Hon. J. S. Pennybaker, of Virginia, and was admitted to the Bar of Virginia, in May, 1844. The next Summer he returned to his native State and received his license to practice in New Jersey, at the October Term of the Supreme Court, in 1845. He was elected a member of the Legislature in 1848 and again the next year, and was chosen Speaker of the House when he was twenty-nine years of age. In 1858 the First District of New Jersey elected him a member of the Thirty-sixth Congress of the United States, and re-elected him to the Thirty-seventh Congress in 1860. He was a prominent member of the Committee of Commerce throughout the four years. He declined to serve a third term, though his course had been brilliant, effective, and eminently satisfactory to the great majority of the District. In 1863 he delivered the annual address before the two Literary Societies of the College of New Jersey, on the theme: "Endurance, Individual and National," and his oration was both scholarly and eloquent. In 1864 he became one of the trustees of the college, and has ever since devoted much time and attention to the Institution. In 1870 President Grant appointed him the United States Judge for the District of New Jersey, and he continues to fill this high and responsible office, with great ability, learning and rectitude.

Judge Nixon prepared the second, third and fourth editions of the late Judge L. Q. C. Elmer's Digest of the Statute Laws of the State, with copious indexes and a complete body of notes. He also prepared a "Book of Forms" for popular use, admirably adapted for their purpose. He has given much attention to Sabbath-school work, having been eighteen years a superintendent of a Sabbath school. In the General Assembly of the Church, as a ruling elder, he has been repeatedly a prominent member. He was especially active in the Old School Assembly of 1869, in promoting the reunion. He is a member of the General Assembly's committee of seven ministers and five elders, engaged in revising the Form of Government and Book of Discipline. He is one of four residuary legatees to whom the late John C. Green entrusted for distribution to religious and charitable objects an estate of more than seven millions of dollars.

Noble, Mason, D. D., was born March 18th, 1809, at Williamstown, Mass. He was graduated from Williams College in 1827; studied theology in Princeton Seminary in 1828; became a Tutor in Williams College, continuing his theological studies under Rev. Drs. Gridley, Griffin and Beman; was licensed June 14th, 1831, by Berkshire Congregational Association, Mass., and was ordained by the same Association, February 15th, 1832. He was pastor of the Fourth Presbyterian Church in Washington, D. C., from December 17th, 1832, until July 21st, 1839; pastor of the Eleventh Church in New York city from October 11th, 1839, until June 9th, 1850; associate pastor with Rev. Dr. Duncan, of the Independent Presbyterian Church of Baltimore, Md., from June 10th, 1850, until February 1st, 1851; Principal of a Young Ladies' Seminary in Washington, D. C., from April 1st, 1851, to June 1st, 1853; Chaplain in the Navy from 1853 until 1871, when he was placed on the retired list. During this period of eighteen years, being located in Washington much of the time, he, as far as possible, served the Sixth Church, as pastor-elect. He also supplied the First Congregational Church of Williamstown, Mass., from October 1st, 1865, until October 21st, 1866. In 1870 the Sixth Church of Washington again elected him to be its pastor, and, without being installed, he thenceforward, as pastor-elect, served it zealously, faithfully and successfully, until his death, which occurred October 21th, 1881. He passed away submissively and most peacefully. Dr. Noble's nature was in accord with his name. He was a noble man in truth; courageous, kind, gentle, firm, true and loving. His preaching was scriptural, evangelical and unctuous.

Noel, Rev. E. P., was born in North Carolina, in 1804. His parents removed to Anderson county, Tenn., and gave their son such an education as that portion of our country afforded. He studied theology in the Union Theological Seminary at Marysville, Tenn., and was licensed and ordained by Holston Presbytery. He began his ministry in Jasper county, Tenn., in 1833; in 1835 moved to Knoxville, Ill., where for two years he labored with acceptance, and then removed to Columbia, Mo., then to Rocheport, then to Bolivar, Polk county, Mo.

He was the first Presbyterian minister who preached south of the Osage. He organized a church near Bolivar, and one twenty-five miles distant, in Green county, near Springfield, and preached on these charges and in other places. The next year he found two other ministers, viz., Messrs. Dodge and Jones, formerly of the Harmony Indian Mission, who united with him and formed a Presbytery. He continued here for more than two years longer, suffering all the privations incident to a life of poverty in a new settlement. A man with less energy, suffering as he did, from an ulcer on his leg, would have shrunk back from the toil he endured. He now walked on crutches, and his limb had become so painful that, for months at a time, he could not obtain a single night's rest. Yet nothing kept him from his appointments, not even sickness in his family. He would start out in a storm to cross a prairie, where the only landmark was a distant point of timber, and that frequently hidden from view by the driving snow.

Mr. Noel next moved to Ball's Mills, near Fort Scott, where he occasionally preached, and his efforts were blessed with an abundant outpouring of the Holy Spirit. Similar results followed his labors at Plum Grove Church, in Ray county. In 1850 he removed to Troy, Lincoln county, and continued here in the faithful discharge of his ministerial duties, growing in usefulness and the esteem of the community, and in the affections of the people of his charge, till the day of his death, which occurred March 22d, 1864.

Norcross, George, D. D., was born at Erie, Pa., and was consecrated from his birth to the work of the gospel ministry, by the prayers and vows of his godly mother. In 1811 he removed with his parents to Monmouth, Illinois. After a careful preparatory course, he graduated at Monmouth College. The Winter of 1861-2 he spent in the Northwestern Theological Seminary at Chicago. In the Spring of 1862 he was engaged as a Tutor in Monmouth College, and soon afterwards was elected to a professorship in that Institution. This position he accepted, and studied theology in the U. P. Seminary, then located near the college. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Warren, April 16th, 1863, and immediately commenced preaching at North Henderson, Ill., while still teaching in the college. After preaching about seventeen months, he spent the Winter of 1864-5 at Princeton Theological Seminary. June 6th, 1865, he was installed pastor of the Church of North Henderson, Ill. In April, 1866, he accepted a call to the Presbyterian Church in Galesburg, Ill. Here he labored for nearly three years, when he accepted a call to the Second Presbyterian Church, Carlisle, Pa., over which he was installed pastor, May 27th, 1869, and in which his acceptable and successful ministry still continues.

Dr. Norcross was a member of the General Assembly of 1871, in Chicago, and of the Assembly of 1874, in St. Louis. He was also an Associate Member of the First General Presbyterian Council, convened at Edinburgh, Scotland, July, 1877. He is now in the prime of life, a minister of popular address and eminently instructive. His church is large and influential.

"North Carolina Presbyterian." This journal was started in 1858, in Fayetteville, by a joint stock company, which had previously obtained the endorsement of the Presbyteries and the Synod. The enterprise was, from the beginning, a financial success, and paid a good dividend every year. It was managed by an Executive Committee, in which each Presbytery was represented, and its editors received regular salaries. Its tone, from the start, reflected the aims of its founders, and has been characteristic of the region of its birth and influence. It has been solid and conservative in its utterances, meeting all current issues with ability. It has been able, without pedantry, or philosophical or literary assumption; sound and firm in doctrine, without controversial aims, and thoroughly Presbyterian in woof and web. Its courteous bearing has commanded the respect of the organs of other denominations, and, aiming to be a means of drawing out, and systematizing and stimulating the energies of the domestic field, it has been a religious journal of general interest, and suited to families in all localities.

The first editors of the North Carolina Presbyterian were the Rev. George McNeill and Bartholomew Fuller, an elder, both of Fayetteville. The first number was issued in January, 1858. In May of that year Mr. Fuller retired, and Rev. Willis L. Miller, then of Orange Presbytery, was selected to fill his place. He resigned it in December, 1859. Mr. McNeill then remained in sole charge until his failing health made it necessary to relinquish part of his labor, and in July, 1861, his brother, Rev. James McNeill, was elected co-editor. Rev. George McNeill died in August, 1861, and his brother conducted the paper until March, 1865, at which time his death occurred.

After a temporary suspension, the paper was revived by William L. McKay, as an individual enterprise, the stockholders assigning to him their interest in the property, on condition that the publication of the paper in North Carolina was to be continued and they to receive it for life. Mr. Fuller again became its editor, and afterwards Rev. John M. Sherwood, then pastor of the Church in Fayetteville, bought the paper, and became its editor and manager till his death. After this the property was sold to a stock company, in October, 1872, and Rev. T. L. DeVeaux, of Florida, was elected to the editorial chair, and continued in charge till his death in 1876. The paper was then under charge of Rev. Joseph R. Wilson, D.D., pastor of the First Church in Wilmington, until March, 1877, when he retired, and Mr. John McLaurin, an elder in his church, was elected, and has remained sole editor, manager and proprietor. In November, 1874, the paper was moved to Wilmington, where it is now published.

Northwest, Theological Seminary of. The first attempt to establish a theological seminary for the Northwestern States was made by the Synod of Indiana in 1830, in connection with a college at Hanover, Indiana, on the Ohio river. Rev. John Matthews, D.D., of Virginia, was elected Professor of Didactic and Polemic Theology, and removed to that place in the Spring of that year. Here for the next ten years he taught successive classes of theological students, assisted by Rev. George Bishop, A.M., and other instructors chosen from time to time. At this place forty-five young men were thus trained for the ministry. In the year 1840 the seminary was removed to New Albany, Indiana. Its Board of Directors, acting under the direction of the Synods of Indiana and Cincinnati, then associated in the care of the Institution, were induced to make this removal, in consideration of a donation of fifteen thousand dollars, offered by Elias Ayers, Esq., of New Albany, on condition of this change of locality. For the next seventeen years the seminary was taught at New Albany, by a Faculty consisting of the following: Dr. Matthews, till his death in 1848, Dr. James Wood, Dr. Daniel Stewart, Dr. Erasmus D. MacMaster, Dr. Thomas E. Thomas, and Dr. Philip Lindsley. At this point, one hundred and forty-seven students received instruction.

In 1857 the seven Northwestern Synods that had now become associated in the control of the seminary, partly induced by the opening of the new Seminary at Danville, Ky., and the nearness of Lane Seminary, at Cincinnati, and partly by the desire to have a seminary in some locality more central to the great Northwestern field, took measures for the transfer of their Institution to the General Assembly, leaving the Assembly free to choose the new location. The Assembly of May, 1859, which met in the city of Indianapolis, accepted this offer of the Synods, and after a full discussion, fixed upon Chicago, Ill., as the proper place. It was known to the Assembly that a large and valuable donation in land, suitable for a site, could be obtained at that place, and the Hon. Cyrus H. McCormick, who attended the meeting in person, offered a permanent endowment, in cash, of one hundred thousand dollars, in case the seminary should be established at Chicago. The Assembly accordingly appointed a Board of Directors, chose a Faculty of Instruction, and ordered the opening of the Institution at Chicago in the Autumn following. Rev. Nathan L. Rice, D. D., Rev. Willis Lord, D. D., Rev. Leroy J. Halsey, D. D., and Rev. William M. Scott, D. D., were elected Professors in the several chairs, and were inaugurated soon after the opening of the first session at Chicago. The session opened in September, 1859, with fifteen students. Since that time the Institution has graduated a class every year, the average of regular graduates being between eight and twelve per year.

In 1863 a substantial brick and stone building was erected on the seminary ground, at a cost of $16,000, chiefly from funds obtained in New York city. The grounds lying near the northern limits of the city, and consisting of twenty-five acres, were donated, in two adjacent lots, one of twenty acres, the gift of Hon. William B. Ogden and his partner Mr. Sheffield, of New Haven, Conn., the other, of five acres, donated by Messrs. William Sill and Diviney, of Chicago. At the time of the donation this land was valued at $1000 per acre. At the time of the great fire it was valued at ten times that amount. It is already, or soon will be worth double this last estimate. In 1875 another building, costing $15,000, was erected, containing chapel, library and recitation rooms, the funds being contributed by C. H. McCormick and C. B. Nelson, of Chicago, and Jesse L. Williams, of Fort Wayne, Ind.

Since the inauguration of the first Professors at Chicago the chairs of instruction have been filled, for varying periods, by the following Professors: Rev. Charles Elliott, D. D., Hebrew Language and New Testament Exegesis; Rev. William M. Blackburn, D. D., Biblical and Ecclesiastical History; Rev. E. D. MacMaster, D. D., Didactic and Polemic Theology; Rev. Francis L. Patton, D. D., LL. D., Didactic and Polemic Theology, and Rev. Robert W. Patterson, D. D., Christian Ethics and Apologetics.

Mr. McCormick, the original donor of the Institution has at several times added other large donations in cash, as the seminary needed funds, probably by this time doubling his first gift. During the present year three elegant brick and stone dwellings, for the accommodation of the Professors, have been erected on the seminary grounds, costing about $30,000, most of it the gift of Mr. McCormick. The present Faculty consists of Dr. L. J. Halsey, Emeritus Professor of Church Government and the Sacraments; Dr. Thomas H. Skinner, Didactic and Polemic Theology; Dr. Willis G. Craig, Biblical and Ecclesiastical History; Dr. Herriek Johnson, Homiletics and Pastoral Theology; Dr. David C. Marquis, Greek Exegesis and New Testament Literature, and Rev. Edward S. Curtis, Instructor in Hebrew Language and Old Testament Literature.

The library of the seminary consists of about ten thousand volumes of choice theological and miscellaneous literature. It includes the old New Albany Library, which came to the Institution as a part of its assets as the legitimate successor. It was decided both by the courts and by vote of the General Assembly, that the Seminary at Chicago is the true successor of all the past, and as such, the true Alma Mater of all the Hanover and New Albany Alumni, making one and the same Institution, through all its changes.

Norton, Augustus, Theodore, D. D., son of Theodore Norton and Mary (Judd) Norton, was born in Cornwall, Conn., March 28th, 1808. He graduated at Yale College, August 15th, 1832, with one of the highest honors of the class. He taught for some time in an academy at Catskill, N. Y., at the same time reading theology with Rev. Thomas M. Smith. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Columbia, September 17th, 1834, and at once commenced his ministerial labors with the Presbyterian Church of Windham, N. Y. Removing to Illinois, he arrived at Naples, October 25th, 1835, and remained for one year, preaching at Naples and Meredosia. In 1836 he removed to Griggsville, and labored there, at Pittsfield and Atlas, till April, 1838. At Pittsfield he organized a Presbyterian Church, in January, 1838, being the first of a large number of churches which he afterwards gathered. He then accepted an invitation to St.

Louis, where, under his labors, the Second Presbyterian Church was organized, in the Fall of 1838, and where he continued for one year. In February, 1839, he was called to the pastorate of the First Presbyterian Church, Alton, Ill., and installed May 9th. This position he retained for more than nineteen years, during all of which period his relations with his own flock and with all his evangelical fellow-laborers were of the most endearing and harmonious character. The church flourished greatly under his leadership, and became, in its character and influence, one of the leading Presbyterian churches in the State.

In September, 1859, Dr. Norton was appointed "District Secretary of Church Extension and Home Missions," for the West, and served in this capacity a number of years. In May, 1845, he originated, and for twenty-three years edited and published, the Presbytery Reporter, a monthly magazine, the list of which he transferred to the Cincinnati Herald in 1868. He is a corporate member of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, a member of the Board of Trustees of Monticello Female Academy, and of Blackburn University. He is a gentleman of decided ability, thoroughly evangelical in his religious views, fearless in the discharge of duty, and zealous in doing good. His "History of the Presbyterian Church in the State of Illinois" is thoroughly prepared, and entitles him to lasting gratitude. Dr. Norton's home is in Alton.

Norton, Rev. Herman, was born in New Hartford, N. Y., July 24, 1799; graduated from Hamilton College in 1823, and was ordained by the Presbytery of Oneida, February 9th, 1826. He labored as an evangelist in revivals, 1826-30; was pastor of the Presbyterian Church corner of Prince and Crosby Streets, New York, 1830-35; pastor at Cincinnati, O., 1836-38; and supply and evangelist, 1838-43. He was Secretary of the American Protestant Society, and of the American and Foreign Christian Union, 1843-50, residing in New York. He died in that city, November 20th, 1850. Mr. Norton published "The Christian and Deist in Contrast," "Record of Facts Concerning the Persecutions at Madeira," "Signs of Danger and Promise," "Startling Facts for American Protestants," and some tracts.

Nott, Charles DeKay, D. D., is the son of Benjamin and Elizabeth Cooper Nott, and the grandson of Eliphalet Nott, D. D., LL. D., the distinguished President of Union College for more than half a century. He was born near Albany, N. Y., September 12th, 1833; attended the Albany Academy; entered Union College in 1852 and graduated in 1854. He studied theology in Union Theological Seminary, New York city, in 1856, completing the usual course two years later (1857-59) at New Brunswick, N. J.; was ordained and became pastor of the First Reformed Dutch Church, Mohawk, N. Y., in 1859; the Presbyterian Church, Urbana, Ill., in 1866; the Second Presbyterian Church, Kansas City, Mo., in 1869; the Choteau Avenue Presbyterian Church, St. Louis, Mo., in 1871; the First Presbyterian Church, Davenport, Iowa, in 1873, and the First Presbyterian Church, Washington, N. J., in 1881.

Dr. Nott has a genial, sympathetic temperament, is a fluent speaker, talking rapidly, in a pleasing, conversational style. His sermons are of a practical, rather than a doctrinal character, more after the method of James than of Paul. His ministry, especially in Kansas City, was very successful, enlisting the young in church work, and attracting crowded houses, particularly at the night services. The warmth and earnestness of his manner have contributed largely to the usefulness of his labors, and he has had the respect and affection of his brethren. He received the degree of D. D. from Union College, in 1876. He has not published any work of special prominence, but has been an occasional and acceptable contributor to the leading religious periodicals.

Nott, Eliphalet, D. D., LL. D., was born at Ashford, Windham county, Conn., June 25th, 1773. At sixteen he taught a school at Pautapang, Lord's Bridge, and was there for two successive winters. At eighteen he took charge of the Plainfield Academy, and at the same time pursued his classical and mathematical studies, under the Rev. Dr. Benedict. On leaving Plainfield, he became a member of Brown University, and remained there about a year. He did not, however, graduate in course, but received the degree of Master of Arts in 1795. He was licensed to preach by the New London Congregational Association, June 25th, 1796, and after laboring about two months as a missionary near Otsego Lake, accepted an invitation to return to Cherry Valley, N. Y., in the double capacity of a preacher and a teacher. Here he established a flourishing academy, and had charge of it as long as he remained in the place. After leaving Cherry Valley, he accepted a call to the Presbyterian Church in Albany, N. Y. When the news of the duel between Hamilton and Burr reached Albany, Dr. Nott preached a sermon on Hamilton, which gave him a wide and lasting fame as a pulpit orator, and made a profound impression on the public mind, assisting greatly to bring odium on the bloody practice of duelling. Soon after, he was elected President of Union College, and under his wise and energetic administration it rose from its depressed condition to great prosperity. During his long and successful incumbency upwards of four thousand young men graduated, among whom were many who subsequently occupied distinguished positions in the State and the Church. In 1862 he presided for the last time at the annual commencement. He died January 29th, 1866.

Intellectually, Dr. Nott was a remarkable man, many-sided, and superior on most sides. In this respect he commanded the admiration of all who knew him. He was a great financier, and enriched himself and Union College by his masterly skill and enterprise. As a preacher he was pre-eminent. He was oratorical, without being declamatory, and a more finished or perfect oratory was never heard in the American pulpit. The moral impression of his sermons was always profound. Being a truly devout man, he was charitable and catholic. He was remarkably superior to all the littlenesses of human selfishness. As a crowning glory of his character and life, he was pre-eminently and unreservedly a peacemaker, the chief element in this excellence being his own forgiving spirit.

Nott, Captain Richard T., was born at Saybrook, Conn., in June, 1798; graduated at Yale College in 1818; removed to Virginia in 1820; to South Carolina in 1822, where he began the practice of law. He removed to Alabama in 1831, engaged in planting in Greene county, and resided there until his death, in 1869. He had gifts and influence which would, if he had desired, have raised him to very high positions in the State. But he declined all these, except taking command of a company in the Florida War; and yet such was his intelligence, high character and public spirit, that his advice was widely sought and followed.

In 1830, in the vigor of early manhood, and in the midst of earthly success, he became a subject of grace, and consecrated his life to the Saviour. For twenty-nine years he was a ruling elder of Bethsalem Church, in the Presbytery of Tuscaloosa, which he served cheerfully and faithfully, with his best powers, time, substance and open and decided influence. He was a power for good in his whole region.

He frequently served as a member of Presbytery and Synod, and several times of the General Assembly, in which capacity he was eminently useful, by means of his singularly wise counsels, his strong conservatism, his impartiality in judgment, his conciliatory spirit, his active labors and his devotion to the interests of the Church. He was no sectarian, but the Presbyterian Church in Alabama is largely indebted to his zeal and wisdom through an important period of its history. His character and services are deserving of an honorable and lasting record.

Nundy, Rev. Gopeenath, was born of respectable parents belonging to the Kayath caste, in Calcutta, India, in 1807. At an early age he received, at home, instruction in the Bengalee, his own vernacular language, and when perfected in this, he was sent to the School Society's Institution (then recently established under the auspices of David Hare, Esq.), to study the English language, which was considered the sure road to wealth and distinction. He had long been convinced of the falsehood of Hinduism. A lecture delivered by Dr. Duff, on the gospel method of salvation, roused his spiritual being, and he determined to become a Christian. Early one morning, in December, 1832, he entered Dr. Duff's study, and after silence for a quarter of an hour, during which his countenance expressed some great mental conflict, bursting into tears, he said: "Can I be saved? Shall I have the privilege of being called a son of God, and a servant of Jesus Christ? Shall I be admitted into his holy family?" He soon after made a profession of religion, and was admitted by Dr. Duff into the visible Church of Christ, by the rite of baptism. In the year 1833 he accompanied Archdeacon Corrie, afterwards Bishop of Madras, to the Northwest, and took charge of an English school at Futtehpore, largely supported by Dr. Madden, the civil surgeon of that station.

During the years 1837-8 a fearful famine prevailed in the northwest provinces of India, and a large number of orphans were collected by Dr. Madden. Gopeenath was very active in procuring orphan children, and afterwards diligent in training them for future usefulness. Dr. Madden, in consequence of the ill health and death of Mrs. Madden, was unable to continue the orphan institution under their care, and divided them between the Church of England's Mission, at Benares, and the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions, at Futtehgurh. The orphans for the latter place were sent on under the care of Gopeenath, who was employed by the Mission as an assistant. His services at this time were invaluable to the Mission, not only in consequence of his previous employment and training, but also as he was enabled to act as interpreter to the Rev. Mr. Wilson, in preaching and distributing books among the natives. From November, 1838, to the time of his death, he was in the employment of the Mission, with the exception of about a year, in 1848 or 1849.

In 1844 he was ordained by Furrukhabad Presbytery, and was stationed at the cantonment of Futtelgurh, where he opened a school for boys, and also established a flourishing school for girls. The superintendence of these schools, with almost daily preaching, gave him constant employment, and made his labors very useful.

Futtelgurh having become vacant, he was, at the request of the Allahabad Mission, transferred to that station in 1853, where he remained until his death. Gopeenath was never so happy, or developed his character so fully, as when placed in charge of this station at Futtelgurh. He was abundant in labors, and established schools for boys and girls in the city and the jail, besides giving instruction for a time to fifty Patwarrees, or village record keepers. In June of 1857 his labors were interrupted by the mutiny, and he was obliged to fly to Allahabad. In that trying period he evinced a spirit not unlike that which animated the martyrs and confessors of the primitive Christians.

Gopeenath, in the prospect of his death, which occurred March 11th, 1861, said to the Rev. J. J. Walsh, of Futtelgurh, "I am not afraid to die; I can trust that Jesus whom I have so often preached to others." Dr. Duff, in a letter referring to the stunning intelligence he had received, of the decease of "his greatly beloved son in the Lord," the Rev. Gopeenath Nundy, says, "Oh, he was a dear one indeed; so simple, so docile, so humble, so affectionate, so grateful, so earnest, so disinterested, so intensely devoted, so single-eyed, so single-minded, so wholly absorbed in labors of faith and love, so instant in season and out of season."

O

Oakey, Rev. Peter D., was born in New Brunswick, N. J., in 1816; graduated at Rutgers College in 1841, and at the Theological Seminary of the Reformed (Dutch) Church in 1841. The same year he accepted a call to the Reformed Church of Oyster Bay, Long Island. In 1847 he took charge of the Middle Reformed Church, Brooklyn. In 1850 he accepted a call to the Presbyterian Church, Jamaica, where he continued, much beloved by his people, till 1870, when, owing to ill-health, he resigned his charge and opened a classical boarding school at Neshanic, N. J., where he continued until 1876. The last three years of his residence there he served the Reformed Church at Three Bridges, which owes its organization mainly to his labors and influence. While preaching at Jamaica he organized a church at Springfield, from a part of his congregation. Having recovered his voice, he accepted a call from this church, where he is now laboring acceptably. Mr. Oakey is remarkably gifted as an off-hand speaker. In the history of Somerset county, N. J., he is described as "a clear-headed thinker and skilled conversationalist." By his integrity he has gained the confidence and respect of the whole community in which he lives. By his moderation, courtesy and genial manners he has avoided those causes of offence so incident to a faithful pastor's life. His ministry has been much blessed. He has published a number of interesting addresses and sermons, among which are, "Thales, the First Ionian School-teacher," "The Anti-Scriptural Doctrines of Elias Hicks," "Rome an Enemy to the Free Circulation of the Bible," "Congregationalism and Presbyterianism Compared," and "The History of the Presbyterian Church of Springfield, Long Island."

Oakland College. In 1829, the want of an educational institution, of the highest grade, became so apparent to the leading members of the Presbytery of Mississippi, that, at an interlocautory session of Presbytery, held in Baton Rouge, La., in April of that year, it was resolved that an effort should be made to establish such an Institution within the bounds and under the care of Presbytery. This effort led to the founding, in 1830, of "Oakland College," originally called, in the act of incorporation, "The Institution of Learning under the care of the Mississippi Presbytery." The site of the college was fixed at a rural spot in the vicinity of Bethel Church, Claiborne county, about four miles distant from the town of Rodney, on the Mississippi river. The Rev. Jeremiah Chamberlain, D.D., was appointed the first President. From his installation, in 1830, to his death, in 1851, Dr. Chamberlain devoted the whole force of his energetic and many-sided nature to the upbuilding of this Institution; and he was gratified by seeing it, at several periods in the course of his administration, attain a high degree of success. At the time of his death one hundred and twenty young men had been graduated from its halls, and hundreds more had received, in a partial degree, the benefit of its instructions. In accordance with the original plan, a theological chair was introduced in 1837, under the direction of Rev. Samuel Beach Jones, D.D., which continued in existence till 1841. During its existence a small class of students was educated for the ministry, some of whom subsequently filled important posts as members of the Presbytery of Mississippi.

In the year 1839 the college was transferred to the care of the Synod of Mississippi, and remained thus, a Synodical Institution, till the year 1871, when, in consequence of the failure of its resources through the disastrous effect of the recent war and under the overwhelming pressure of debt, the Synod resolved to sell the college buildings to the State of Mississippi for the purpose of founding the Alcorn University for colored young men. The funds of all sorts remaining in the hands of the trustees, after the payment of all the debts of the Institution, were conveyed by Synod to the Presbytery of Mississippi, in 1876, upon condition that the Presbytery would establish at some eligible point within its bounds an "Institution of liberal Christian learning." The gift was accepted, and in pursuance of the terms upon which it was made, a charter was obtained for the Chamberlain-Hunt Academy, and Port Gibson was selected as the seat of the Institution. Under this form the germ of the enterprise inaugurated fifty-three years ago by the Presbytery of Mississippi, has returned to its care, and in this second stage of its history is giving evidence of a vitality which promises to realize in part, if not completely, all the ends projected by the founders of Oakland College.

Oath. A solemn appeal to the Deity or some superior being, expressed or implied, in token of the good faith of him who declares or promises anything. We find oaths taken in patriarchal times (Gen. xiv, 22, 23; xvi, 23, 31); regulated by the Mosaic law; forbidden when unnecessary in the New Testament, but used by God Himself to seal His promise as most trustworthy, and thereby to end all disputation (xxii, 16-18; Heb. vi, 13-18).

Oaths were usual on occasions of contracts, covenants, agreements, or stipulations (Gen. xxiv, 2, 8, 9; xxxi, 53; Josh. ix, 15, 19, 20; 2 Sam. xix, 23); in making vows (Lev. v, 4; Acts xxiii, 12, 21); as confirming promises (2 Kings xxv, 21; Matt. xiv, 7, 9); and in denouncing imprecations (Josh. vi, 26; 1 Sam. xiv, 21, 26, 28). These were voluntary, as also were those more common asseverations when God was called to witness the firm purpose of him that expressed it (Ruth i, 17; 1 Sam. xxv, 22; 1 Kings ii, 23). But sometimes oaths were exacted, as by a sovereign from his subjects, or by a superior from a vassal (xviii, 19; 2 Chron. xxxvi, 13; Eccles. viii, 2; Ezek. xvii, 16); akin to which were the oaths laid upon a people to obey the laws of God or of the land (Ezra x, 5; Neh. v, 12; x, 29; xiii, 29). Of the same nature were judicial oaths; persons on trial were obliged to clear themselves by an oath, and the whole people, or all present, could be taken in oath for the purpose of discovering the secret perpetrator of some crime (Exod. xxii, 2; Lev. v, 1; Numb. v, 19). Such an oath could, of course, be taken only in the name of the true God, the God of Israel; if taken in the name of any other god, it at once became open idolatry, as it, ipso facto, was an acknowledgment of that god (Jer. v, 7; xii, 16; Amos viii, 14).

Perjury and the non-fulfillment of an oath were regarded as great crimes. According to the law he who had given false witness was to suffer the same penalties to which his injustice had exposed the man against whom he testified (Deut. xix, 16-21). Even if any one had sworn to his own detriment, he must perform his oath (Psalm xv, 4). This could not, however, be held to justify a sin. Herod was not excused by his rash oath for the Baptist's murder (Matt. xiv, 9).

We find in the New Testament prohibitions against swearing (v, 34-37; James v, 12). It cannot be supposed that it was intended by these to censure every kind of oath. For our Lord Himself made solemn asseverations equivalent to an oath; and St. Paul repeatedly, in his inspired epistles, calls God to witness the truth of what he was saying. The intention was, as Dr. Alford well notes upon Matt. iv, 34-37, to show "that the proper state of Christians is to require no oaths; that, when evil is expelled from among them, every yea and nay will be as decisive as an oath, every promise as binding as a vow."

"The forms of oaths," says Dr. Paley, "like other religious ceremonies, have in all ages been various, consisting, however, for the most part, of some bodily action, and of a prescribed form of words. Among the Jews, the juror held up his right hand towards heaven (Ps. cxliv, 8; Rev. x, 5). The same form is retained in Scotland still. Among the Jews, also, an oath of fidelity was taken by the servant's putting his hand under the thigh of his lord (Gen. xxiv, 2). Among the Greeks and Romans, the form varied with the subject and occasion of the oath; in private contracts, the parties took hold of each other's hands, while they swore to the performance, or they touched the altar of the God by whose divinity they swore; upon more solemn occasions, it was the custom to slay a victim, and the beast being struck down, with certain ceremonies and invocations, gave birth to the expression, ferire pactum, and to our English phrase, translated from this, of "striking a bargain." The form of oaths in Christian countries is also very different. In our country, the magistrate, after repeating to the witness or juror the promise or affirmation which the oath is intended to confirm, adds, "So help you God." The energy of this sentence resides in the particle so. So, that is hæc lege, upon condition of your speaking the truth, or performing this promise, and not otherwise, may God help you! The witness or juror, whilst he hears the words of the oath, holds up his right hand, or places it upon a Bible, and at the conclusion kisses the book. This obscure and elliptical form, together with the levity and frequency of them, has brought about a general inadvertency to the obligation of oaths, which, both in a religious and political view, is much to be lamented; and it merits public consideration, whether the requiring of oaths upon so many frivolous occasions, has any other effect than to make such sanctions cheap in the minds of the people. Historians have justly remarked, that when the reverence for an oath began to diminish among the Romans, and the loose Epicurean system, which discarded the belief of Providence, was introduced, the Roman honor and prosperity from that period began to decline.

The administration of oaths supposes that God will punish false swearing with more severity than a simple lie or breach of promise, for which belief there are the following reasons: 1. Perjury is a sin of greater deliberation. 2. It violates a superior confidence. 3. God directed the Israelites to swear by His name (Deut. vi, 13; x, 20), and was pleased to confirm His covenant with that people by an oath, neither of which, it is probable, He would have done had He not intended to represent oaths as having some meaning and effect beyond the obligation of a bare promise.

Obedience. Compliance with the requirements of law. Even inanimate things and irrational creatures may be said to pay obedience when they fulfill the purpose for which they were created, and are subservient to divine authority (Psa. cxlviii, 6-8; Matt. viii, 27; James iii, 3, 4). But this is not the moral obedience which reasonable beings are to render to those who have the just control of them. The pure angels do exactly God's commandments (Psa. ciii, 20), and men ought to show an equal obedience, as their paramount duty, to their Creator (1 Sam. xv, 22). Obedience is often due also from one person to another, as from children to parents (Eph. vi, 1); from wives to husbands (v, 22; 1 Pet. iii, 1, 6); from servants to masters (Eph. vi, 5); from subjects to rulers, civil and others (Rom. xiii, 1; Heb. xiii, 17; 1 Pet. ii, 13, 14). Our blessed Lord, having become man, paid obedience to the law of God which was laid on man. Christ's obedience was perfect; He entirely fulfilled His Father's commandments, becoming "obedient unto death" (Phil. ii, 8); His death being, so to speak, the acme of His willing compliance and entire performance of the work given Him to do. It is this, the fulfillment of the law in His life, which, together with the endurance of its penalty in His death, completes that work for the virtue of which those who believe in Him are saved. His obedience unto death, then, while it by no means abates the claims of God's law on men as a moral rule of life, is yet a moral equivalent for the world's sin, and becomes available to all who plead it as the ground of their acceptance with God. This is forcibly argued by St. Paul (Rom. v, 12-19).

Offence. The original word (skandalizo) in our version usually rendered affraid, literally signifies to cause to stumble, and by an easy metaphor, to occasion a fall into sin (Matt. v, 29). It may, therefore, apply to ourselves as well as to others (Matt. xviii, 6-14). Hence the noun, skandalon, signifies not only an offence, in our common use of that word, but also a stumbling-stone, a trap, a snare, or whatever impedes our path to heaven (Matt. xviii, 17; Rom. xiv, 13;

1 Cor. x, 32). Sometimes offence is taken unreasonably. Men, as Peter says, stumble at the word, being disobedient. Hence we read of the offence of the Cross (Gal. v, 11; vi, 12). To positive truth or duty we must adhere, even at the hazard of giving offence, but a woe is on us, if we give it without necessity of this holy nature (Rom. xiv, 13-21; 1 Cor. viii, 9-13).

Offence may be either active or passive. We may give offence by our conduct, or we may receive offence from the conduct of others. We should be very careful to avoid giving just cause of offence, that we may not prove impediments to others in their reception of the truth, in their progress in sanctification, in their peace of mind, or in their general course toward heaven. We should abridge or deny ourselves in some things, rather than, by exercising our liberty to the utmost give uneasiness to Christians weaker in mind, or weaker in the faith, than ourselves (1 Cor. x, 32). On the other hand, we should not take offence without ample cause, but endeavor, by our exercise of charity, and, perhaps, by our increase of knowledge, to think favorably of what is dubious, as well as honorably of what is laudable.

It was foretold of the Messiah, that he should be "a stone of stumbling, and a rock of offence." Perhaps predictions of this kind are among the most valuable which Providence has preserved to us, as we see by them, that we ought not to be discouraged because the Jews, the natural people of the Messiah, rejected him, and still reject him, since the very offence they take at his humiliation, death, etc., is in perfect conformity to, and fulfilment of, those prophecies which foretold that, however they might profess to wish for the great Deliverer, yet when he came they would overlook him, and stumble at him.

Our Saviour on one occasion said, "Woe unto the world because of offences; for it must needs be that offences come, but woe to that man by whom the offence cometh" (Matt. xviii, 7). Of course He here speaks, not of an absolute, but of a relative necessity, proceeding from the sinful state of the world. The two facts of Divine prescience and human responsibility, which are here stated, all philosophy is bound to accept as verities, whatever difficulty may attend every effort that is made logically to reconcile them. As it consists with Divine goodness to create free agents, so, consequently, to permit offences, and the justice of God in punishing them, cannot reasonably be questioned, because He is no further concerned than in the creation of the powers He bestows; the agents themselves only are chargeable with the abuse of them, the necessity under which offences lie being only voluntary and moral. There is no necessary connection between liberty and sin; the one, indeed, is the gift of God, the other, the free act of man.

Ogden, Rev. Benjamin, was the son of John Ogden, an elder in the church at Fairfield, N. J., for thirty years, until his death, in 1832. He was born in the township of Fairfield, October 4th, 1797. He graduated at Princeton College, in the class of 1817; became a Tutor of the college; studied theology in the Seminary at Princeton for two years; and was licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, in April, 1821. He was ordained in June, 1822, at Bensalem, Bucks county, Pa., where he ministered for more than a year. In 1823 he became pastor at Lewes, Del., where he faithfully performed his pastoral duties more than three years. On the 8th of December, 1826, he was installed pastor of the large and important Church of Pennington, N. J. Here he pursued his ministry for twelve years, with great fidelity and usefulness. In 1837-8 there was a remarkable work of grace in the congregation. During the pastorate large accessions were made to the membership of the church, and the edifice was greatly enlarged and improved. Steps were also taken to erect a church edifice in the western part of the charge, at Titusville, in which public worship might be held on Sabbath afternoons. This house was built soon after Mr. Ogden's pastorate ceased. After leaving Penningtonville he removed to Michigan, and preached there, in Three Rivers, Niles, and elsewhere, for some years. He subsequently removed to Valparaiso, Ind., and became the pastor of the Presbyterian Church in that place, where he died, January 11th, 1853, in the sixty-sixth year of his age.

Ogden, Rev. John W., was born December 24th, 1793, near Bardstown, Ky. His father was the Rev. Benjamin Ogden, a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, who superintended the early education of his son. During the war with Great Britain, of 1812, he was in the army under General Harrison. On leaving the army he was licensed by the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, and ordained, in 1817, as an evangelist. In 1841 he changed his church relation, by joining the Presbytery of Nashville. He soon after entered upon the work of a missionary, under a commission from the Board of Domestic Missions, and as such labored faithfully and zealously. Blessed with a large frame and vigorous constitution, he traveled continually, preaching, from place to place in the destitution of Presbytery. He was thus employed when called to his rest, dying at Nashville, Tenn., April 5th, 1859.

Ogden, Jonathan, Esq., was born in Fairton, N. J., December 10th, 1809. The family afterwards removed to Bridgeton, where his father was postmaster more than twenty years. The son located himself in Philadelphia in 1831. In 1852 he moved to New York for business and Brooklyn for a residence, and became a member of the firm of Deylin & Co., then and for several years thereafter the largest clothing house in the United States. In 1871 Mr. Ogden retired with a competence, having built on Brooklyn Heights such a residence as he desired. His fellow-citizens of this part of Brooklyn, the head of its wealth, intelligence and refinement, have repeatedly chosen him to represent them in the State Legislature. He has done it with eminent ability and honor. He is the Vice President of the Long Island Fire Insurance Company, which has prospered through fifty years. He served the Church for several years in the Board of Domestic Missions, for eight years in the Board of Church Erection, being its Treasurer for years. He was elected, in 1854, an elder of the Second Church, under the pastoral care of the Rev. Dr. Ichabod S. Spencer. In 1863 he entered the Session of the First Church, Henry street, and for the last twenty years has been a most efficient officer of this First Church.

Ogden, Rev. Thomas Spencer, son of the Rev. Benjamin Ogden, was born in Pennington, N. J., in 1832. He graduated at the University of Michigan, in 1853; at Princeton Theological Seminary in April, 1857, and was licensed by New Brunswick Presbytery. Having offered himself as a foreign missionary, he was accepted. He was ordained August 18th, 1857, as a missionary to Africa, by New Brunswick Presbytery. He married Miss Phoebe E. Combs, of Millstone, N. J., and they sailed from New York, October 6th, 1857, and arrived at Corisco Island, January 11th, 1858. From his first arrival on the Island, he omitted no opportunity for preaching to pass unimproved. In the churches, in the towns, by the wayside, often at Ilobi, he urged assemblies and individuals to repentance. At his death (May 12th, 1861), he was pastor of the church, and superintendent of the Sabbath school at Evangasimba. To rear up an efficient native ministry, and to give to them the Word of God in their own native language, were the objects which called forth Mr. Ogden's most earnest efforts. He cheerfully struggled on against a hostile climate, happy, both to toil and to suffer in God's work. He continued these labors when he should have been confined to his sick-bed. He fell, as he believed, at the post of duty, with the harness on. His dying words were: "Who will go? Can you go? Who will go to preach in Africa?"

Ohio, Synod of. By act of the General Assembly of 1881, the four Synods of Cincinnati, Cleveland, Columbus and Toledo, were consolidated to form the Synod of Ohio, having its bounds co-terminous with those of the State. These Synods reported to the Assembly, in 1881, an aggregate of five hundred ministers, six hundred and seven churches, and sixty-eight thousand three hundred and twenty-six communicants.

The original Synod of Ohio was erected by the Assembly in 1811. It consisted then of three Presbyteries: Lancaster, which had been connected with the Synod of Pittsburg; Washington and Miami, which had formed part of the Synod of Kentucky. It had thirty-two ministers and seventy-eight churches. It embraced the whole State, with the exception of the Presbytery of Hartford, which had the churches in the northeastern part of the State, and from which the Presbytery of Grand River was formed, in 1814. Part of the Presbytery of Washington lay in Kentucky, but in 1815 the Ohio river was made the Southern boundary of the Synod.

The first report of the Synod of Ohio to the Assembly, 1814, gave 2515 communicants, of whom 269 had been added during the year. In 1817 the Presbytery of Lancaster was divided, and Richmond formed, with seven ministers.

The leading ministers when the Synod was formed, were Stephen Lindley, at Marietta, Jacob Lindsley, at Athens, John Wright, at Bush Creek, James Calbertson, at Zanesville, Robert G. Wilson, at Chillicothe, James Hoge, at Franklinton, and Joshua L. Wilson, at Cincinnati.

In 1821 the Presbytery of Cincinnati was formed by the division of the Presbytery of Miami, and the Presbyteries of Columbus, Chillicothe and Athens were erected.

By 1825 the Synod, now consisting of seven Presbyteries, reported a total of 61 ministers, 161 churches, and 6494 communicants. This same year the Synod of the Western Reserve was erected, with three Presbyteries, viz.: Grand River, Portage and Huron, having 32 ministers, 84 churches, and 2791 communicants.

The Synod of Cincinnati was erected by the Assembly in 1829. It took from the Synod of Ohio the Presbyteries of Chillicothe, Cincinnati and Miami, and also that part of the Presbytery of Columbus lying in the counties of Clark, Champagne and Logan, and west of a line running due north from the northeast corner of Logan county to the border of the Synod of the Western Reserve.

The Presbytery of Wooster was erected by the Synod of Ohio in 1834, and the Presbytery of Marion in 1835; the former with 9 ministers and 28 churches, the latter of 8 ministers and 13 churches.

In 1837, the year of the excising acts, the Synod of Ohio had 6 Presbyteries, 69 ministers, 138 churches, and 9483 communicants. Within the State besides, were: The Synod of the Western Reserve, having 8 Presbyteries, 123 ministers, 112 churches, and 8423 communicants; the Synod of Cincinnati, with 5 Presbyteries, 86 ministers, 118 churches, and 8426 communicants; and the Presbytery of Steubenville, connected with the Synod of Pittsburg, having 17 ministers, 33 churches, and 2750 communicants. There were, therefore, at the date of the excision acts in 1837, in the territory now covered by the Synod of Ohio, 3 Synods, 29 Presbyteries, 295 ministers, 431 churches, and 29,082 communicants.

The result of the disruption may be best seen, say five years later, in 1843, when the elements had adjusted themselves in their chosen connections.

In 1833 the Synod of Ohio divided into two, each bearing the name of the original Synod. In 1843 the Old School Synod had 5 Presbyteries, 69 ministers, 132 churches, and 9443 communicants. The New School Synod had 3 Presbyteries, 42 ministers, 64 churches and 4113 communicants.

In like manner, as the result of the disruption, the Synod of Cincinnati was divided into two Synods, bearing the same name, and having in 1843, respectively, 6 Presbyteries, 67 ministers, 123 churches, and 8651 communicants; and 3 Presbyteries, 37 ministers, 49 churches and 4258 communicants. In the State there were in 1843, of the Old School, the Synod of Ohio, the Synod of Cincinnati, and 3 Presbyteries; of the Synod of Wheeling—viz.: Steubenville, St. Clairsville and New Lisbon, with an aggregate in the 3 Presbyteries, of 41 ministers, 71 churches, and 5278 communicants.

Of the New School there were, the Synod of the Western Reserve, with 7 Presbyteries, 126 ministers, 131 churches and 9125 communicants; the Synod of Ohio, with 3 Presbyteries, 42 ministers, 61 churches and 4113 communicants, and the Synod of Cincinnati, with 3 Presbyteries, 37 ministers, 49 churches and 4258 communicants. The aggregate of both was: Presbyteries, 27; ministers, 382; churches, 573; communicants, 40,868.

In 1860 the Synod of Sandusky was formed by the Old School Assembly. No further changes occurred until the reunion, in 1870, when the four Synods of Cincinnati, Cleveland, Columbus and Toledo were formed, embracing all the ministers and churches in the State.

In 1871 these reported to the Assembly respectively:—

	Presbyteries.	Ministers.	Churches.	Communicants.
Cincinnati.....	4	162	155	19,146
Cleveland.....	4	137	165	17,564
Columbus.....	5	129	169	14,624
Toledo.....	4	74	106	7,198
Total.....	17	502	595	58,532

In 1881 these four Synods were consolidated into the Synod of Ohio. In 1883 its report to the Assembly shows: Presbyteries, 17; ministers, 489; churches, 615; communicants, 68,926.

Oldest Christian Hymn. [In Paed., Lib. III, of Clement of Alexandria, is given (in Greek) the most ancient hymn in the Primitive Church. It is then (one hundred and fifty years after the Apostles) asserted to be of much earlier origin. The following version will give some imperfect idea of its spirit.]

Shepherd of tender youth!
Guiding, in love and truth,
Through devious ways:
Christ our triumphant King,
We come Thy name to sing,
And here our children bring,
To shout Thy praise.

Thou art our holy Lord!
The all-subduing Word!
Healer of strife!
Thou didst Thyself abase,
That from sin's deep disgrace,
Thou mightest save our race,
And give us life!

Thou art Wisdom's High Priest!
Thou hast prepared the feast Of holy love
And in our mortal pain,
None call on Thee in vain,
Help thou dost not disdain,
Help from above

Ever be thus our guide!
Our Shepherd and our pride,
Our staff and song!
Jesus! Thou Christ and God,
By Thy perennial Word,
Lead us where Thou hast trod,
Make our faith strong.

So now, and till we die,
Sound we Thy praises high,
And joyfully sing,
Infants, and the glad throng,
Who to Thy Church belong;
Unte and swell the song,
To Christ our King.

Old Letters of Francis Makemie. Through the antiquarian researches of the late Rev. Richard Webster, of Mauch Chunk, Pa., the two following letters, in the library of the Historical Society of Massachusetts, were brought to the knowledge of Presbyterians. They were addressed to Increase Mather, of Boston, "clarum et venerabile nomen," and from the light which they throw upon our Church history, will be read with interest by all who appreciate the rays of antiquity.

ELIZABETH RIVER, Va., July 25th, 1684.

REVEREND AND DEAR BROTHER:—I wrote to you, though unacquainted, by Mr. Lamb, from North Carolina, of my designs for Ashley river, South Carolina, which I was forward in attempting, that I engaged in a voyage and went to sea in the month of May, but God in his providence saw fit I should not see it at the time, for we were tossed upon the coast by contrary winds, and to the North as far as Delaware Bay, so that, falling short in our provisions, we were necessitated, after several essays to the South, to Virginia; and in the meanwhile Colonel Anthony Lawson, and other inhabitants of the parish of Lynnhaven, in Lower Norfolk county (who had a dissenting minister from Ireland, until the Lord was pleased to remove him by death, in August last, among whom I preached before I went to the South, in coming from Maryland against their earnest importunity, coming so pertinently in the place of our landing for water, prevailed with me to stay this season, which the more easily overcame me, considering the season of the year, and the little encouragement from Carolina, from the sure information I have had. But for the satisfaction of my friends in Ireland, whom I design to be very cautious in inviting to any place in America I have yet seen, I have sent one of our number to acquaint me further concerning the place. I am here assured of liberty and other encouragements, resolving to submit myself to the sovereign providence of God, who has been pleased so unexpectedly to drive me back to this poor desolate people, among whom I design to continue till God in his providence determines otherwise concerning me.

I have presumed a second before I can hear how acceptable my first has been. I hope this will prevent your writing to Ashley river, and determine your resolution to direct your letters to Col. Anthony Lawson, at the eastern branch of Elizabeth river. I expect if you have an opportunity of writing to Mr. John Hart,* you will acquaint him concerning me, which, with your prayers, will oblige him who is your dear and affectionate brother in the gospel of our Lord Jesus.

FRANCIS MAKEMIE.

ELIZABETH RIVER, 28th July, 1685.

HONORED SIR:—Yours I received by Mr. Ballet, with three books, and am not a little concerned that those sent to Ashley river were miscarried, for which I hope it will give no offence to declare my willingness to satisfy, for there is no reason they should be lost to you, and far less that the gift should be . . . * for which I own myself your debtor, and assure yourself, if you have any friend in Virginia, to find me ready to receive your commands. I have wrote to Mr. Wandlope, and beg you would be pleased to order the safe conveyance thereof unto his hands. I have also wrote to Mr. Thomas Barret, a minister who lived in South Carolina, who, when he wrote to me from Ashley river, was to take shipping for New England; so that I conclude he is with you. But if there be no such man in the country, let my letter be returned.

I am yours in the Lord Jesus,
FRANCIS MAKEMIE.

"These letters," says the Rev. Dr. Van Rensselaer (in whose Presbyterian Magazine they were published), "incidentally prove, or illustrate the following positions:—

1. They assist in fixing the date of Francis Makemie's arrival in America. Hitherto the records of Accomac county, Va., furnished evidence of the earliest period in which he was certainly known to be in America. A record in the Accomac County Court shows that he was on the Eastern Shore of Virginia in 1690. It was surmised that he was in the country before, but how long before was left wholly to conjecture. Mr. Reed, in his history of the Presbyterian Church of Ireland, informs us that Mr. Makemie was from the neighborhood of Ramelton, in the north of Ireland; that he was introduced to the Presbytery of Lagan as a candidate in 1680, and that he was licensed in 1681. The Presbyterian Minutes being deficient for several years, the precise time of his ordination is unknown. In December, 1680, the records state that Col. Stevens, from Maryland, "near Virginia," made application for a minister to settle in that part of the world. The probability is that Francis Makemie came to the Eastern Shore of Maryland in 1682. His letter of 1684 shows that he had been in the country some time, and had obtained considerable knowledge of it, as well as performed considerable ministerial work.

2. These letters show that Presbyterian ministers had preceded Francis Makemie in evangelical labors in this country, or at least were contemporaneous with him. "A dissenting minister from Ireland" was laboring near Norfolk, Va., in 1683, and another minister on Ashley river, near Charleston, S. C., the former of whom was certainly a Presbyterian, and in all probability preceded Makemie.

3. In the third place, the letters afford evidence of Makemie's missionary spirit. He labored in 1683 on Elizabeth river, before he "went to the South." The "South" was doubtless in North Carolina, from whence he first wrote to Increase Mather, by "Mr. Lamb, from North Carolina." After laboring for a time in North Carolina, he returned to Elizabeth river, near Norfolk, and thence set sail for Ashley river, but was driven back by a storm. His great aim seems to have been to preach the gospel to the destitute, and to search out localities to which he could invite ministers from Ireland. There is internal evidence that, with all his zeal, he was a prudent man."

The foregoing letters were published in the May number of the Magazine (1852), and the following one (presumably from the late and lamented Dr. Hatfield), appeared in the November number of the same monthly:—

NEW YORK, September 4th, 1852.

MR. EDITOR:—In your remarks on Makemie's Letters, published in your May number, you observe that "these Letters show that Presbyterian ministers had preceded Francis Makemie in evangelical labors in this country, or at least were contemporaneous with him."

Allow me to call your attention to a fact recorded by Rev. Dr. Calamy in his "Non-Conformists' Memorial," relative to the Rev. Matthew Hill, a native of the city of York. He graduated M.A., at Magdalen College, Cambridge, and was settled in the ministry at Thirsk, a market town about twenty miles northwest of York. He was ejected for non-conformity by the Bartholomew Act, in 1662, and was afterwards employed as a chaplain at Gatton, about eighteen miles south of London. No temptations, though freely offered, could induce him to conform. "Though he had a tender constitution," it is said, "he determined upon a voyage to the West Indies. He embarked with little besides a few clothes, a Bible, a Concordance, and a small parcel of MSS. He fixed at Charles county, Maryland, in 1669, where a brighter scene began to open, and he had a prospect of considerable usefulness in the ministry, and of a good advantage by his labors in temporal respects. But new truths afterwards arose, which greatly disappointed his hopes." No other particulars are given of his American experience. He is described as "a man of ready abilities, a good scholar, a serious, warm and lively preacher, and of a free and generous spirit."

Mr. Hill was, in all probability, a Presbyterian. Dr. Calamy had a copy of his testimonials, but does not state what they were. Is there any record of Mr. Hill's labors in Charles county, Md., or its neighborhood? Is there any mode by which the matter may be investigated? If some of your readers in that section of the country would make the needful inquiries, it is not improbable that some information respecting this pioneer of non-conformity in that region may be elicited.

Old Paxtang Church. Paxtang Church, Dauphin county, Pa., was organized in 1729, and Rev. James Anderson, of Donegal, preached there. On the 11th of October, 1732, Rev. William Bertram accepted a call, and was installed in November following, pastor of Derry and Paxtang. The Rev. John Elder, a graduate of the University of Edinburgh, accepted a call in 1738, and came with the promise of a stipend of sixty pounds in money. The Rev. Mr. Bertram was paid "one-half in money, the other half in hemp, linen yarn, or linen cloth, at market price." The present church building was erected about 1740. It is a plain, unpretending, limestone fabric, erected on the site of the original log house. The building is not large, and is entered by two doors. Formerly the pulpit stood in the middle of the house, fronting the southerly door. It became a receptacle for squirrels and hornets before it was removed. It is now remodeled, and the entire room neatly furnished. Formerly, at the southeast corner of the church building was a log house, about fourteen feet square, long used by Mr. Elder as his study, and subsequently as a school-house. From this building Mr. Elder, on Sundays, would march to his pulpit, his crowd of hearers parting for him to pass, without his speaking a word to them, so dignified was the sacred office esteemed. Into this building trusty firearms were taken for some years, by those who worshipped there, and on more than one occasion the pastor himself, who was a Colonel in the Provincial service during the French and Indian war, had his own musket within reach. To the southeast of the church is the burial-ground, surrounded by a firm stone wall. There lie, in calm repose, men who were prominent in the State before and during the Revolution. Rev. John Elder, William

Olmstead, James Munson, D. D., was born at Stillwater, N. Y., February 17th, 1794. Entered Union College, 1816; graduated 1819; in Princeton Theological Seminary, 1819-22; licensed by Presbytery of Troy, 1822; served as an itinerant missionary in New York and Pennsylvania, and in the Winter of 1824 in Virginia, to improve his health; June, 1825, was ordained and installed over the Presbyterian Churches of Landisburg and Centre, Pa.; 1831 accepted a call to Middle Tuscarora Church, Pa.; April 19th, 1837, to November 1st, 1849, pastor of Presbyterian Church, Flemington, N. J., resigning because his health was not adequate to the work of the charge. Then he removed to Snow Hill, Md., where he preached several years. In 1854 removed to Philadelphia, where he remained in comparative retirement, although taking an active interest in all the movements within the Church. Died Sabbath, October 16th, 1870, aged seventy-six. Mr. Olmstead was a man of decision and independence. He expressed his views boldly. As a preacher he was able, instructive, and often pungent, and a devout man. Besides sermons and essays, he was the author of several religious books which received very favorable commendations.

Olmstead, Rev. Lemuel Gregory, LL. D., was born at Maltaville, Saratoga county, N. Y., July 5th, 1808. In 1831 he was Lecturer on Chemistry and Mineralogy in Dickinson College, Pa. He graduated at Union College, N. Y., in 1834; studied theology at Princeton Seminary in the Fall and Winter of 1834; then three years and a half at the Western Seminary, Allegheny, Pa. He was licensed by Ohio Presbytery in 1837, after which he was Principal, in succession, of Beaver Academy, Brighton Institute, and Erie Academy, all in Pennsylvania. He was ordained an evangelist by the Presbytery of Erie, April 20th, 1848, but was never settled as a pastor, and devoted himself mainly to teaching, to scientific studies, and to lecturing. He spent one year in Ohio, as agent for the American Colonization Society; gave several courses of instruction in chemistry, and spent about five years in Europe, as a student, at two different times. He died, March 18th, 1880, at his farm, on the bank of the Hudson, near Fort Edward, New York, where he passed the last years of his life in his favorite studies. Though a great sufferer in his last illness, he expressed his firm faith in God and submission to His will. Dr. Olmstead was a genial gentleman, an humble and sincere Christian, and attained considerable eminence as a scientific scholar and antiquarian.

Opecquon Church, Augusta County, Virginia. About three miles from Winchester, on the paved road to Staunton, on the western side of the road, near a little village, is a stone building, surrounded by a few venerable oaks. That is Opecquon meeting-house, and between it and the village is the graveyard, in which lie the remains of some of the oldest settlers of the valley. This house is the third built upon this site for the worshippers of the Opecquon congregation. The old grove in which it stands has witnessed the coming and going of generations, and could these trees speak, they could tell of remarkable scenes of crowded assemblies, of tears, and groans, and outcries, and joyful songs of faith, and hope, and love, under the faithful preaching of the gospel. The parcel of land for the burying-ground, and for the site of a church and a school-house, which always went hand in hand with the Scotch-Irish emigrants, was given by Mr. William Hoge, whose residence was in the immediate neighborhood.

By the time of Braddock's war, the congregation assembling at this place for worship was large, and composed of families of great moral worth, whose descendants have been thought worthy of any posts of trust, honor or profit in the gift of their fellow-citizens. They came from the gap in the North Mountain; from the neighborhood of the White Posts; from the neighborhoods east of Winchester; from Cedar Creek and from beyond Newtown. While Washington was encamped in Winchester, this was the only place of religious worship in the vicinity of the fort. Congregations assembled here when Winchester could scarce show a cluster of houses. After Braddock's war, many families were added to the congregation.

The first minister of the Presbyterian order that visited this region is supposed to have been a Mr. Gelston, who was appointed to this mission by Donegal Presbytery, in 1736. In 1739 the same Presbytery took measures to send Mr. John Thompson as an evangelist through the new settlements on the frontiers of Virginia. The missionaries sent out by Donegal and New Castle Presbyteries to the frontiers, and those under the direction of the Synod, found Opecquon on their journeys going and returning. The Rev. William Robinson, on his long-to-be-remembered tour through Virginia and Carolina, repeatedly preached here. On the division of the Synod, which began in 1742, and continued till 1758, the people of Opecquon generally went with the New Side, and had the visits of missionaries from the Presbytery of New Castle and other parts of the Synod of New York.

The first pastor of this church was the Rev. John Hoge, a relative of him who gave this land for the place of worship and the burial of the dead. He was graduated at Nassau Hall in 1748, and prepared for the ministry under the care of New Castle Presbytery. Under Mr. Hoge, the churches of Cedar Creek and Opecquon were regularly organized. Tradition says he was an amiable and pious man. Becoming infirm the latter part of his life, he gave up his charge. Subsequently he became a member of the Presbytery of Donegal, and continued so until 1786; then of the Presbytery of Carlisle at its formation, without charge, and in 1795 a member of the Presbytery of Huntingdon, without charge.

The next minister was the Rev. John Montgomery, from Augusta county, a graduate of Nassau Hall, who was ordained in 1780, and in 1781 accepted a call from Winchester, Opecquon and Cedar Creek. A young gentleman of fine manners and pleasant address, and esteemed as a preacher. He remained with the congregation till 1789, and then removed to the Calf Pasture.

The third minister was the Rev. Nash Legrand, who accepted a call to the churches in 1790. His ministry was eminently successful; under his care Opecquon saw her best days. This stone house was built. A continued revival filled the church with devoted worshippers. Being bereaved of his wife, and suffering in health, Mr. Legrand resigned the charge in 1809. Since that time the church has been served by a succession of ministers, and has been blessed with revivals.

Within the stone enclosure of the graveyard of Opecequon are buried the remains of many of the ancient settlers, and those who have followed them. One of the graves which especially attracts the eye of the visitor is marked by a rough, time-worn stone in the very centre of the graves, the first with an inscription reared in the Valley of Virginia to mark the resting-place of an immigrant. The stone crumbled under the unskillful hands of the husband, who brought it from a neighboring eminence, and, in the absence of a proper artist, inscribed the letters himself, to be a memorial of his young and lovely wife. Tradition says he was the schoolmaster.

On the side on which Ireland is chiseled, the pebbles in the stone, or his unsteady hand, made large indentures, and rendered the inscription almost illegible. Here the stone has stood, a monument of affection, and marked the grave of the early departed, while the days of a century and nearly a half have passed away.

In referring to this cemetery, Dr. Foote, in his "Sketches of Virginia" (second series), from which this sketch is drawn, after naming many who sleep there, says: "This whole yard is strewed with the ancient dead. The new-looking monuments mark the beginning of a second century among the graves. Excellence and beauty lie here. How gladly would we stop at the very grave of William Hoge, from whom have descended so many honorable families, and so many ministers of the gospel? And 'the beauty of Opecequon,' who shall tell us where she laid down, heart-broken, to rest? To this yard hundreds and hundreds in Virginia and the far west will come to seek the sepulchres of their emigrating ancestors. At the Resurrection there will be joyous meetings."

Oracle. This word is sometimes used to denote the sanctuary of the tabernacle and of the temple, where the special presence of Jehovah dwelt (1 Kings vi, 16; viii, 6; 2 Chron. iv, 20; Psal. xxviii, 2). Divine communications were made to persons inquiring of the Lord: hence 'the counsel of Ahithophel' was accounted so judicious, 'as if a man had inquired at the oracle (or word) of God' (2 Sam. xvi, 23). In the New Testament the revelations of God in His Holy Word are denominated 'oracles' (Acts vii, 38; Rom. iii, 2; 1 Pet. iv, 11). They were the true testimony of Him who cannot lie.

But by oracle ordinarily is understood that power of utterance ascribed to heathen deities when interrogated by their worshippers, the word being loosely applied sometimes to the response itself, and sometimes to the place where the response was delivered. The Greek oracles were of chief note. The mind of the Greeks was specially inquisitive into futurity; and the multiplicity of the gods they worshiped would furnish facilities for communications with them. The most celebrated oracle was that of Apollo at Delphi. Here the Pythia—in early times a young maiden, later a woman of fifty, of low origin and uneducated, but of unsullied moral character—was supposed to have the divine inspiration. She prepared herself by chewing laurel leaves, and drinking from the Castalian fountain. She then mounted a tripod, placed over a chasm, from which ascended an intoxicating vapor, which she received and under its influence uttered incoherent words. These were arranged and interpreted by a prophet and five assistants, and formed the oracular response. Other noted oracles were three, also of Apollo, in Asia Minor, at Didyma, Claros, and Patara; that of Zeus or Jupiter at Dodona; and that of Ammon in Libya. Unquestionably imposture was practiced; dubious replies were given, which the superstition of inquirers disposed them to accept, when the result did not agree with the anticipation; and it is likely that oracles were not always inaccessible to bribery. But after every allowance of this kind the whole mystery of them is not solved. Some have imagined that they kept up a system of wide espionage for the sake of obtaining information. If in certain cases this were so, it could not have been effectively carried out for several generations. Is it too much to suppose, when adoration was paid to demons instead of to the living God, that the dark power of evil was permitted to exercise some mysterious influence over his votaries? The Greek oracles decayed or were extinguished in the last days of the Roman republic, and those of the early emperors. In the time of Adrian, indeed, and of the Antonines, with the convulsive struggle of paganism, oracles in some measure revived, ere long entirely to pass away. The fact of their gradual extinction is puzzling. May we suppose that he who had winked at earlier ignorance (see Acts xvii, 30) was now resolved, on the promulgation of Christ's gospel, that the vanity of all opposing power should be manifested, when he 'commanded all men everywhere to repent'?

Orbison, Rev. James Henry, was born at Huntingdon, Pa., March 23d, 1826. He graduated at Jefferson College in 1846, and was ordained an evangelist by the Presbytery of Huntingdon, June 12th, 1850. He was a missionary in India, at Ambala and Rawal Pindi, 1859-69, and after these years of faithful service to the Saviour whom he loved, he died, at Bellefonte, Pa., April 19th, 1869, passing from labor to rest, and from toil to triumph.

Ordination. The General Assembly has made the following deliverances on this subject:—

ORDINATION sine titulo.

"The question, ought ministers to be ordained sine titulo, i. e. without relation or probable view had to a particular charge, resumed, and after further deliberation, we judge as follows:—

"That in ordinary cases, where churches are properly regulated and organized, it is a practice highly inexpedient and of dangerous consequences, not to be allowed in our body, except in some special cases, as missions to the Indians, and some distant places, that regularly apply for ministers. But as the honor and reputation of the Synod is much interested in the conduct of Presbyteries in such special cases, it is judged that they should previously apply to the Synod and take their advice therein, unless the cases require such haste as would necessarily prevent the benefit of such a mission if delayed to the next session of Synod, in which cases the Presbyteries shall report to the next Synod the state of the cases and the reasons of their conduct."—Minutes, 1764, p. 337.

ORDINATIONS ON THE SABBATH.

"The General Assembly think it would not be for edification to adopt a uniform rule on the subject. In general, they think it not expedient that ordinations should take place on the Sabbath, yet there may be cases in which urgent or peculiar circumstances may demand them. The Assembly, therefore, judge it best to leave it to the Presbyteries to act in this concern as they may judge that their duty requires."—Minutes, 1821, p. 7.

ORDINATION OF THE BAPTIST AND OTHER CHURCHES.

"It is not among the principles or usages of the Presbyterian Church to consider the ordination of ministers by other Protestant Churches as invalid; on the contrary, the Presbyterian Church has always considered the ordinations of most other Protestant Churches as valid in themselves, and not to be repeated, when those who have received them become members of the Presbyterian Church. Nor is it perceived that there is any sufficient reason why the ordinations in the Baptist Church should not be considered as valid, and be sustained as such.

"But while the Presbyterian Church can act as has now been stated in regard to ordinations, it is among those principles and usages which she regards as most sacred and important, to secure for her churches both a pious and a learned ministry; and she cannot admit of any usage or exercise any apparent liberality inconsistent with security in this essential particular. On the whole therefore, Resolved, That when applications are made by ministers of the Baptist, or any other Protestant Denomination, to be connected with the Presbyterian Church, the Presbytery to which the applications are made shall require all the qualifications, both in regard to piety and learning, which are required of candidates for licensure or ordination of those who have originally belonged to the Presbyterian Church, and shall require the applicants from other denominations to continue their study and preparation till they are found, on trial and examination, to be qualified, in learning and ability, to teach in the manner required by our Standards; but that when found thus to be qualified, it shall not be necessary to reordain the said applicants, but only to install them when they are called to settle in Presbyterian congregations."—Minutes, 1821, pp. 15, 16.

Origin of Early Presbyterian Churches.

"American Presbyterianism, like American civilization," says Dr. Gillett, "has derived its distinctive character from many and diverse influences. As we trace the course of its history we find it receiving tributaries from distant and varied sources, yet all blending in a current that flows in a channel of its own, and marked at every step by features peculiar to itself. Commingled in it, and made more or less homogeneous by it, we find the elements of English

'dissent,' Irish fervor, Scotch persistence and Huguenot devotion. There is scarce a memorable event in the history of Protestantism in the Old World that does not assist to elucidate the character of its founders. It inherits alike the memories of the noble men who fell victims to the bigotry of Alva or Laud, or endured the brutal cruelty of Lauderdale or Jeffries. In the annals of the Genevan Republic, the heroism of the Netherlands, the sufferings of the Huguenots, culminating in the bloody St. Bartholomew, the sterling conscientiousness of the Puritans, and the unswerving loyalty to Christ's crown and covenant evinced by the countrymen of John Knox, may be discerned the elements of that training which shaped the views and characters of its founders.

"Thus, without taking any other church on earth as its model, it was built up out of materials drawn from sources the most diverse, and into a structure that constitutes its own type. Even here it was modified by local influences; sometimes constrained in the New World to renew the struggle which had become too familiar in the Old, and to protest against an intolerance which could not but revive memories of Acts of Conformity, bigoted proscription, or Claverhouse's Dragoons. Yet ere long it was left unmolested, and in a field broad enough to tax its utmost energies, was called to the task of competing with other denominations in the noble work of evangelizing a young and growing empire."

Presbyterian churches were formed in various parts of our country nearly contemporaneously. In a letter written by the Presbytery of Philadelphia to that of Dublin, and dated 1710, it is said: "In all Virginia we have one small congregation on Elizabeth river, and some few families favoring our way in Rappahannock and York; in Maryland four; in Pennsylvania five; in the Jerseys two; which bounds, with some places in New York, make up all the bounds from which we have any members from; and at present some of these are vacant."

CHURCH ON ELIZABETH RIVER.

Of this church (says Dr. Charles Hodge, in his "History of the Presbyterian Church," from which we quote at length), little is known. It seems, from Commissary Blair's report on the state of the Church in Virginia, that it existed before the commencement of the last century. From the fact of Mr. Makemie's directing, in his will, that his dwelling-house and lot on Elizabeth river should be sold, it has been inferred that he resided there before he moved to the opposite side of the Chesapeake, and that the church in question was gathered by him. If so, it must have been formed before 1690, for at that time Mr. Makemie was residing on the eastern shore. Others have supposed that the congregation was composed of a small company of Scotch emigrants, whose descendants are still to be found in the neighborhood of Norfolk. Though reported by the Presbytery, they seem to have had little connection with that body. The name of their pastor, the Rev. Mr. Macky, never appears on the minutes as a member.

UPPER MARLBOROUGH, SNOW HILL, REHOBOTH, MONOKEN AND WICOMICO CHURCHES.

It is not easy to reconcile altogether the statements given in the Presbyterian letter quoted above, with the facts recorded on the minutes. For example, it is said there were four churches in Maryland in connection with the Presbytery in 1710, whereas the minutes mention at least five. It is probable, however, that when two congregations were under the care of the same pastor, they were not counted separately. These congregations were Upper Marlborough, Snow Hill, Rehoboth, Monoken and Wicomico. The first of these was formed by a company of Scotch emigrants, who came to this country with their pastor, Rev. Nathaniel Taylor, about the year 1690. The other four churches were in Somerset county, on the eastern shore, and were the fruits of Mr. Makemie's labors. Of this there can be no reasonable doubt, as his memory is still cherished among them, and as there is neither tradition nor record of any other Presbyterian minister in that district at the date of their formation. Of Snow Hill, Mr. Spence gives the following account: "A town, to be called Snow Hill, was established in Somerset, now Worcester county, by an act of the provincial legislature, passed in 1684, and I believe," he adds, "that the Presbyterian Church in that place is nearly or quite as old as the town. Snow Hill was settled by English Episcopadians and Scotch and Irish Presbyterians, and it is certain that persons resided there at the time, or soon after the time in which the town was laid out, who were afterwards members of the Presbyterian Church. My ancestor, to whom I have already alluded, was a ruling elder in that church." Of this family of churches Rehoboth is commonly considered to be the eldest.* Their first pastor was the Rev. Mr. Makemie, who, in his will, directs his Executrix "to make over and alienate the lot on which the meeting-house is built, in as ample manner, to all intents and purposes, as shall be required for the ends and uses of a Presbyterian congregation, as if I were personally present, and to their successors forever, and to none else but to such as are of the same persuasion in matters of religion." It may be inferred, from the terms of this bequest, and from the character of its founder, that this church was strictly Presbyterian, a point which, it is believed, has never been disputed. The congregations of Monoken and Wicomico were under the pastoral care of Mr. McNish, and were organized before 1705, the date of his application to the Court for permission to preach. It can hardly be presumed that these five Presbyterian congregations with distinct church edifices, some of them within fifteen miles of each other, could, at so early a period, and in so thinly settled a part of the country, have been formed in a few years. And as they all existed prior to 1705, and as Mr. Makemie had resided and labored in that district for near twenty years before that date, it is altogether probable that several of them were formed before the commencement of the last century. That they were all Presbyterian churches never has been questioned. As early as 1723, as appears from a recorded deed, the church at Monoken had eight elders.

CHURCHES AT PHILADELPHIA, NESHAMINY, WELSH TRACT, NEW CASTLE, WHITE CLAY, APO-QUINIMI AND LEWES.

The Presbytery state in their letter that they had five congregations in Pennsylvania in 1710. The minutes, however, furnish the names of the places above named. Welsh Tract is first mentioned in the following minute, 1710. "Upon information that David Evans, a lay-person, had taken upon himself publicly to teach or preach among the Welsh in the Great Valley, Chester county, it was unanimously agreed that the said Evans had done very ill, and acted irregularly, in thus invading the work of the ministry, and was thereupon censured." It may be inferred, from this, that Mr. Evans was in some way connected with the Presbytery, but not that there was a church already organized among the Welsh. White Clay Creek, New Castle and Apoquinimi were associated, as appears from the following record, made in 1709: "Ordered, that Mr. Wilson (pastor of New Castle) preach at Apoquinimi once a month upon a week day, and one Sabbath in a quarter, till the aforesaid meeting, provided, always, that the Sabbath day's sermon be taken from the White Clay Creek people their time." These three places of preaching, therefore, were probably numbered as one congregation in the Presbytery's letter.

The first church in Philadelphia is noticed under the heading, Presbyterianism in Philadelphia.

CHURCH AT NESHAMINY.

The congregation at Neshaminy was a Dutch Presbyterian Church. Their pastor was the Rev. Mr. Van Cleeck, from Holland, and the letter addressed to them by the Presbytery is directed to the "Dutch people." That they were regularly organized is evident from a minute, recorded in 1711, which states that Mr. Van Cleeck's absence from Presbytery was accounted for "by one of his elders, sent for that purpose."‡

* Macdonald's "History of the Presbyterian Church of Jamaica, L. I." labors to show that the Jamaica Church is the oldest existing church of the Presbyterian name in America. He certainly renders this highly probable. And yet the church is spoken of by Vesey and others as one of Scotch Independents, and the fact that it stood in connection with no Presbytery until after Macnish commenced his pastorate, forces us to regard it as Independent Presbyterian, and not an integral portion of "The Presbyterian Church in the United States" as already organized by the Presbytery of Philadelphia. (Gillett's History of the Presbyterian Church, Vol. 1, p. iv, note 2.)

‡ The Rev. D. K. Turner, in his "History of the Neshaminy Presbyterian Church of Warwick, Hartsville, Bucks County," Pa., maintains that it was not this church Mr. Van Cleeck or Van Vloek, as he names him, was the first pastor. He says, "From the fact

CHURCHES AT NEW CASTLE AND LEWES.

In the manuscript history of the Church in New Castle, it is stated that the first account of a Presbyterian congregation in that town is about 1701, at which time the Rev. Mr. Wilson was the pastor. August 15th, 1707, a deed for a lot of land was made to certain persons, in trust, "for the use of the Presbyterian congregation in New Castle, on which they were to build a house for public worship." The Church at Lewes was organized about the same time, though no record goes further back than 1708.

CHURCHES AT FREEHOLD AND WOODBRIDGE.

The two congregations in Jersey were Freehold and Woodbridge. The former was constituted principally by emigrants from Scotland, about 1692. Their place of worship was long known as the "Scotch Meeting-house." Woodbridge was settled partly by the Scotch and partly by emigrants from New England. The congregation is first mentioned as in connection with the Presbytery, in a letter dated May, 1708. In that letter, which is addressed to several New England clergymen, the Presbytery say: "We find by diverse letters which have passed between you and sundry persons in Woodbridge, that you are not unacquainted with the confusions and distractions arising from the accession of Mr. Wade to be the minister of that town, and the aversion of a considerable part of the people to the accepting of him as such." It is probable that it was the Scottish portion of the congregation that was opposed to Mr. Wade, as the first healing measure proposed by the Presbytery was that Mr. Boyd, the Scotch clergyman of Freehold, should preach every third Sabbath in Woodbridge; and Mr. Wade's accession to the Presbytery in 1710 was with the view of reconciling the disaffected portion of his people. Whatever may have been the ground of the opposition, it came from the majority of the congregation.

OTHER CHURCHES IN VARIOUS PARTS OF THE COUNTRY.

Besides the churches in connection with the Presbytery of Philadelphia, there were several others organized at an early date in various parts of the country. In his history of South Carolina, Dr. Ramsay says, "the Presbyterians formed congregations, not only in Charleston, but in three of the maritime islands, and at Wilton, Jacksonborough, Indian land, Port Royal, and Williamsburg." And again, "the Presbyterians were among the first settlers, and were always numerous, in South Carolina. Their ministers in the maritime districts were mostly from Scotland and Ireland, men of good education, orderly in their conduct, and devoted to the systems of doctrine and government established in Scotland. In conjunction with them the Independents or Congregationalists were formed into a church in Charleston about the year 1690, and after being about forty years united, they separated and formed different churches. Rev. Archibald Stobs took charge of the church in the Autumn of 1700, and the Rev. William Livingston in 1704." The Presbytery of Charleston, he says, "was constituted at an early period of the eighteenth century, agreeably to the principles and practice of the church of Scotland." The distance of these southern churches from those about Philadelphia, and the difficulty of communication, sufficiently accounts for there being no connection between them. A union did not take place until the year 1800, when the Presbytery of Charleston connected itself with the Synod of Carolina.

that the vicinity was almost entirely unsettled in 1709, and that even as late as 1720 the inhabitants were few and scattered, it is almost certain that there could have been no church here at as early a date as that (1710) in which Mr. Van Vleck was received into the Presbytery; besides, he came from Holland (Records of Presbyterian Church, page 31), and his people were "Dutch people." But from the deeds given for land sold by William Penn to English people, as early as 1700, the claims under warrants extending back to 1684, we gather that the Dutch or Holland people could not have resided here. Mr. Van Vleck must have been pastor of another church, called by the name of "Neshaminy," in some other locality. The church of which he was the minister appears, through researches made by General W. W. H. Davis, of Doylestown, to have been in Southampton Township, at the village formerly called "The Buck," now Feasterville, which had the name of "Neshaminy Church," in early times, as it was but two or three miles from the "Neshaminy Creek." That congregation was composed of Hollanders, and is at present, and has been many years, worshipping at Churchville, where a new meeting-house was erected in 1814, for the united congregations of "the Buck" and "the Bear," which are associated with the "Reformed Church of America," lately the "Reformed Dutch Church."

In relation to the fact that an elder, Leonard Van Degriit, is said, in the "Records of the Presbytery of Philadelphia," page 17, to have come to the Presbytery of Philadelphia with Mr. Van Vleck in 1719, and to have been admitted at the same time with him into that body, Mr. Turner adds, "Leonard Van Degriit was a resident of Bensalem township, and connected with the Presbyterian Church of Bensalem, which in its early history seems to have been under the same pastoral charge with the church at 'the Buck,' as they were but five or six miles apart, and he might naturally have appeared at Presbytery with Mr. Van Vleck, as the latter had both churches under his care."

What "the some places in New York" were, whence the Presbytery had members, as stated in their letter of 1710, does not appear from the minutes. No minister, congregation or elder is there spoken of as belonging to that province. There were, indeed, Presbyterians in the city of New York as early as 1707, who had principally emigrated from Great Britain and Ireland, but they were so few that they had neither a church to worship in, nor a minister to lead their worship. The congregation was organized, and Mr. Anderson called as their pastor, in 1717. The Church in Jamaica appears to have become connected with the Presbytery in 1712, that of Newtown in 1715, that of Southampton in 1716.

Several of the churches mentioned as belonging to the Presbytery in 1710 were not in connection with that body at the time of its organization. This was the case in regard to Neshaminy, the Welsh Tract and Woodbridge. Of the remainder, it appears, from the preceding account, that the four or five in Maryland were strictly Presbyterian. Those in Pennsylvania were all composed predominantly of Scotch and Irish Presbyterians, except the first church in Philadelphia. This appears from the statement of Rev. Samuel Blair, in his "Account of the Revival in New Londonderry," that "all our congregations in Pennsylvania, except two or three, chiefly are made up of people from that kingdom," i. e., Ireland. This was written in 1744, when the Dutch congregation of Neshaminy, two Welsh congregations in the Valley, besides the mixed church in Philadelphia, had long been connected with the Presbytery. The two or three exceptions, therefore, are accounted for; the remainder, which includes all the original churches except that of Philadelphia, were, according to Mr. Blair, composed principally of Irish Presbyterians. There were doubtless a good many Dutch and Swedes included in the congregations in the lower counties on the Delaware, as they were the earliest and principal settlers of those counties, and as the names of church members occurring on the minutes would also seem to intimate. In Jersey, the church in Freehold was the only one at first belonging to the Presbytery. As far as can be ascertained, therefore, the congregations connected with the Presbytery at the time of its formation were all strictly Presbyterian, unless the first church in Philadelphia be considered an exception. Up to 1710 the only Presbyterian Church in which there was an appreciable number of New England men was Woodbridge, and that, unfortunately, gave the Presbytery more trouble than all the rest put together. This, however, appears to have arisen quite as much, to say the least, from the character of the minister as from that of the people. As far, then, as the character of the original congregations is concerned, it would be difficult to find any Church more homogeneous in its materials than our own; certainly not the Church of Scotland, and certainly not the churches of New England. The former contained, proportionably, more members inclined to Episcopacy, and the latter more inclined to Presbyterianism, than were to be found in our Church inclined to Congregationalism.

Orphanage, Presbyterian, Philadelphia. On the 12th of December, 1877, a charter was obtained by a few Christian men and women, to establish a home for orphan children in Philadelphia, under the care of the Presbyterian Church, to be called "The Presbyterian Orphanage in the State of Pennsylvania." It was formally opened on the 18th of April, 1878, in a private dwelling, No. 1319 South Broad Street, receiving as its first inmates the children of the Orphanage established by the members of Bethany Presbyterian Church, in 1876, as a thank-offering to God's great goodness to them.

Mrs. Ann Gray Thomas, who had so generously contributed towards the establishing of the Presbyterian Home for Widows and Single Women, with equal generosity gave nine acres of ground adjoining that Institution at Kingessing Avenue and Fifty-eighth street, as a site for the erection of Orphanage buildings. The plan known as the "Cottage system," which is common in Germany, was adopted, and in 1881 four cottages were erected of which we give a specimen, and dedicated to the use of the fatherless little ones September 28th, 1882. Each of the three cottages is complete in itself, with accommodations for a patriarchal family of twenty children, all under the care of a "House Mother." The three families, numbering in all sixty children, attend school at the fourth cottage, which is fitted up with kindergarten appliances for the younger scholars; but it is hoped that this temporary arrangement will before long give place to the Father Martin Memorial School-house, the promised gift of the Sunday-school children. The Orphanage contains at present 1883, sixty children, all between the ages of three and thirteen.

This Institution although entirely dependent on the charity of the Church (having no endowment fund) is entirely free from debt. In 1882 the receipts for maintenance were $6735.36, expenses $6272.10. There were also received towards the Building and Furnishing Funds, in the same period, $15,800.19 of which amounts $15,547.43 were expended for these purposes.

The Orphanage owns and has in conjunction with it a neat and commodious "Seaside Home," located at Cape May Point, N. J., which was opened July 6th, 1883. More than four hundred women and children enjoyed the sea air during the past summer, a moderate charge being made each boarder. The management consists of a Board of gentlemen advisers and fifty-five lady managers. The officers of the last named are: First Directress, Mrs. Daniel Haddock, Jr.; Second Directress, Mrs. Samuel Field; Third Directress, Mrs. Alexander Whilldin; Corresponding Secretary, Mrs. J. R. Miller; Recording Secretary, Miss Josephine Atmore; Treasurer, Mr. Crawford Spear; Assistant Treasurer, Miss E. L. Tenbrook. "The Young Ladies' Aid of the Presbyterian Orphanage" consists of twenty-nine lady members, with the following officers: President, Mrs. J. S. Malone; Vice President, Mrs. Henry S. Cattell; Secretary, Miss Mary N. Baggs; Treasurer, Miss Anna M. Porter. In addition to the contributions mentioned above, the Seaside Home, Father Martin Fund and the Young Ladies' Aid of the Orphanage received generous donations during 1882, from the Presbyterian public. As the name of the Orphanage implies, it is devoted to the interest of orphans in the State of Pennsylvania, and there is a State Auxiliary Society, which promotes the interest of the Institution outside of Philadelphia.

Orphanage, Thornwell, located at Clinton, South Carolina, is one of the three Orphan Institutions under the care of the Southern Presbyterian Church. It was first conceived by the Session of the Clinton Church, under the leadership of its pastor Rev. William P. Jacobs, in 1872. With only a fifty cent piece, and that the gift of an orphan, they began work. A farm of one hundred and twenty-five acres was purchased, and on May 28th, 1871, the corner-stone of the first building (of stone), a house of seventeen rooms, and known as the "Home of Peace," was laid, in the presence of a thousand people. By accomplishing a great deal, and the girls had taken most cheerfully the charge of all the household duties, including cooking, washing and ironing. God's Spirit also seemed to be with them. They have always been thoroughly indoctrinated in Presbyterian matters, attending regularly the church of our order in Clinton; and uniformly, from the beginning, every inmate has sought an early connection with the Church.

In 1882 the school-room in the Home of Peace was filled to overflowing, and it was resolved to ask the people of God to enable us to erect a central building for educational purposes. On May 12th the corner-stone of the "Orphans' Seminary" was laid, and on July 28th of the year following the chapel of the new building was dedicated by Rev. James H. Thornwell, son of the distinguished Divine whose name the Institution bears. The house is a handsome three-story structure, with commodious chapel, mu-the 1st of October of the next year the house was finished and opened for the reception of orphans, sixteen of whom were present. Mr. and Mrs. Jacobs took charge. The first teacher was Miss Witherspoon, a lineal descendant of Rev. Dr. Witherspoon, signer of the Declaration of Independence. Two of the great John Knox's descendants are among the inmates of this Orphanage.

The plan of the Thornwell Orphanage is that of separate households, which was found to work so well by Immanuel Wichem, of Hamburg, Germany. In pursuance of it, on the 18th of July, 1880, the corner-stone of a new building, "Faith Cottage," for boys, was laid, and the house, a concrete structure, in the Queen Anne style of architecture, was opened nine months thereafter. Thus, ten thousand dollars, worth of property had been acquired, largely augmented in value by local circumstances, and this had been the result of numberless very small gifts.

In the meanwhile a farm, workshop and printing office had been established, in which the boys were seam, library and a number of class-rooms, and cost, including all donations, $6000, the supervisor of the work giving his services without charge. The school was transferred to this building October 1st, 1883, when it was formally opened by an address from Gov. Hugh S. Thompson. There are now nearly fifty inmates of the Orphanage. A small endowment of $5000 has been collected, and with the exception of this fund, the support of the family is entirely dependent upon the gifts of God's people. Presbyterians North and South have united in supporting it, for the Institution is not a local one, children being received into it from any section. Selections are made, not only with an eye to the need of the orphans, but also of those who are best and brightest, and afford the hope that, after years of careful training, they will become highly useful members of society. Thus far the graduates have not disappointed the hopes cherished for them.

The future plans of the Thornwell Orphanage include the enlargement of the number of family-houses,

Orr, Rev. Robert Wilberforce, was born at Chesham, Pa., January 14th, 1783; graduated at Jefferson College in 1803; studied theology at the Western Theological Seminary, and was ordained an evangelist by the Presbytery of Bedford, November 22d, 1807. He resided in rural situations, 1807-41; then spent at Chesham, Pa., 1841-54; studied supply at the Seminary, 1854-56; then the Indian Centre, 1844; in 1856 he was elected to the office of Elder, and in 1857 he was elected to the office of Pastor of the Indian Centre. He died at Chesham, Pa., March 14th, 1877. Mr. Orr was a member of the General Assembly of the Western Theological Seminary, 1807-1877. Osborn, Rev. Ethan, was born in Litchfield, Conn., August 1st, 1778. While at College, at Dartmouth, he was admitted to full communion with the Congregational Church there. At the age of eighteen he enlisted in the second year of the Revolutionary War, and was with the forces under the command of Washington, in the retreat through New Jersey. After the study of theology in his native State, he was licensed to preach in 1796, and installed December 3d, 1799, by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, pastor of the Old Stone Church of Fairfield, N. J. At this time the congregation was scattered through the whole of Fairfield township, and parts of the adjoining townships of Downe and Deerfield, including a portion of the people of Bridgetown, where, as yet, there was no church of any denomination.

The pastorate of Mr. Osborn was like his general life, tranquil and marked chiefly by revivals. His preaching was plain, practical, solemn and earnest. In pastoral visitation he was very faithful. In addition, he was accustomed to visit the public schools, and catechise the children in the Shorter Catechism, as well as the Bible. In the year 1809 his congregation was visited with a revival of great power and blessed influence. In 1810 there was a second revival. Again in 1820 another extensive work of grace was manifested to this large and widely-scattered congregation. The good-hearted pastor continued to discharge his duties until 1836, then in the seventyeighth year of his age. At this time the Rev. David McKee, from Kentucky, was his co-pastor, and continued so until 1838, when, during his co-pastorate, there was another powerful revival.

Mr. Osborn continued to preside over the church until 1844—fifty-four years—when he offered his resignation, and it was only accepted because "it was felt by all concerned a mournful necessity." The Presbytery, in dissolving the pastoral relation, "commended the church for providing that their worthy and venerable pastor might continue to lean upon their arm while he lived and recline on their bosom when he died." Dr. Whitaker, in his Address at the Bi-Centennial Celebration of the Old Stone Church, September, 1880, said: "It is as unnecessary here to-day, as it is impossible, to rehearse the story of Father Osborn's honorable and saintly course through the hundred years that he lived, from 1758 to 1858. The singular goodness, beauty, wisdom, uprightness, fruitfulness and continuance of his career has no parallel, perhaps, in the annals of the American pulpit. The future will take care of his fame; and of him we may safely say, 'the righteous shall be in everlasting remembrance.'"

Osborn, Rev. Henry Stafford, LL.D., was born in Philadelphia, Pa., August 17th, 1823. He graduated at the University of Pennsylvania, and studied theology in Union Theological Seminary. His fields of labor have been, stated supply, Coventry, R. I., 1845-6; pastor, Hanover Court House, Va., 1846-9; pastor, Richmond, Va., 1849-53; pastor, Liberty, Va., 1853-8; stated supply, Salem, Va., 1858-9; pastor, Belvidere, N. J., 1859-66; Professor in Lafayette College, Easton, Pa., 1866-70; stated supply, Oxford, Ohio, 1870-1; Professor in Oxford, 1871-3; stated supply, Oxford, 1873. Dr. Osborn is a genial gentleman, an interesting and impressive preacher, and a scholar of large attainments. He has traveled in foreign countries, and given to the public some valuable productions of his pen.

Osborn, Rev. Robert, was born August 27th, 1813, at Cedarville, N. J.; graduated at Jefferson College in 1834, and at Princeton Theological Seminary in 1839. After being licensed by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, April 17th, 1839, he went to Virginia, where he supplied the Church at Point Pleasant, from October, 1839, until he was installed as its pastor, December 9th, 1843. This was his only pastorate, and here he labored assiduously, faithfully and successfully, as pastor and supply, nearly nineteen years. His parish included four churches and two other preaching stations; his circuit was nearly fifteen miles, and he was the only Presbyterian preacher in the county. His churches enjoyed frequent revivals, and were largely increased under his ministrations. The work proving too great for his strength, he was released from his charge October 18th, 1855, and after teaching for some time, he returned to his native place, where he was long a patient invalid, and died, July 13th, 1878. Mr. Osborn was a truly pious man, a good preacher, a faithful pastor, of uncommonly pleasing manners, and gained the affections of all whom he met.

Osmond, Samuel McClurg, D.D., was born at Lower Oxford, Pa., August 18th, 1825. He graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1850; studied theology at Princeton Seminary, and was ordained by the Presbytery of Raritan, June 22d, 1853. He was co-pastor of the First and Second churches, Amwell, N. J., 1853-57; stated supply at Perry and Pittsfield, Ill., 1857-62; stated supply at Iowa City, Ia., 1862, pastor, 1863-78; and pastor at Lawrence, Kas., 1878. Dr. Osmond is a faithful and forcible preacher, a valuable Presbyter, and his ministry, under the divine blessing, has been crowned with success.

Otsego Presbytery, N. Y. The Presbytery of Otsego, as it now exists, was constituted by the Synod of Utica, June 21st, 1870, embracing Otsego, Delaware and Chenango counties, exclusive of the towns of Tompkins and Masonville, in Delaware county; and the towns of Smithville, Greene, Coventry, Aiton and Bainbridge, in Chenango county; and it was declared the successor of the Presbyteries of Otsego, Delaware and Chenango. The history, therefore, of the Presbytery now bearing the name Otsego, is the history of these three separate Presbyteries before and since their union into one body.

The oldest of these Presbyteries is Otsego. It was formed by the Synod of Albany, October 6th, 1819, by a division of the Presbytery of Oneida, and consisted of the following ministers: Andrew Oliver, Eli F. Cooley, John Smith, John R. St. John, John Ternair, Jesse Miner and Silas Parsons; together with the churches of Springfield, Cherry Valley, Cooperstown, Milford and Eaton, lying on and south of the great Western Turnpike through Springfield. Its first meeting was held in Cooperstown, November 2d, 1819, at which Rev. John Ternair preached the opening sermon and Rev. Andrew Oliver officiated as Moderator.

Next in order of time is the Presbytery of Chenango. This was constituted May 29th, 1826, by General Assembly the ministers composing it belonging to three different Synods, and consisted of the following ministers: Edward Andrews and Asa Donaldson, of the Presbytery of Otsego; Elijah D. Wells, of the Presbytery of Cayuga; Egbert Roosa, of the Presbytery of Columbia; and Ambrose Eggleston, of the Presbytery of Susquehanna. Its boundary lines were the Presbytery of Oneida on the north, the Presbyteries of Otsego and Columbia on the east, the Presbytery of Susquehanna on the south, and the Presbyteries of Cayuga and Onondaga on the west. Its territory was the counties of Chenango and Delaware, with a part of Broome. It was attached to the Synod of Geneva, and held its first meeting at Oxford, June 29th, 1826. Rev. Asa Donaldson preached the opening sermon, and was afterwards chosen Moderator. At the time of its organization it had no church under its care.

Last in order is the Presbytery of Delaware. This was constituted by the Synod of Geneva, October 6th, 1831, and was composed of those ministers and churches of the Presbytery of Chenango east of the Unadilla river, and east of the Susquehanna river below its junction with the Unadilla, excepting the Church of South Bainbridge. It held its first meeting in Franklin, April, 10th, 1832, at which Rev. William Fisher preached the opening sermon, and presided as Moderator. The ministers forming the body were William Fisher, Samuel G. Orton, Daniel Waterbury, Augustus L. Chapin, and John B. Fish. The churches under its care were First, Second and Third, Tompkins, Franklin, Sidney, Delhi, Andes, Hancock and Sandford, to which were added, at its first meeting, Harperfield, Meredith, Franklin, Second, Jefferson and Colchester.

These Presbyteries thus organized maintained a varying existence. That of Otsego, drawing to itself a large preponderance of Presbyterian churches, was the most uniform and stable in its life. Beginning with five churches, it increased slowly and steadily to twenty in 1845, which number, continuing for about a decade, gradually dropped down to sixteen, and this number was on its roll in 1870, and merged into the united body, and, with one exception, is still connected with it. Altogether, it had under its care twenty-five different churches.

The Presbytery of Chenango, being on ground occupied almost exclusively by Congregational churches, formed a nucleus about which these churches gathered, and to which, on the plan of union, they somewhat loosely attached themselves, and as a result, had a much more irregular and fluctuating life. Without a single church when it came together at its first meeting, it had in the short period of five years twenty-six on its roll. After the division of the Presbytery, which occurred in the following year, and by which nine of its churches were transferred to the new Presbytery of Delaware, there still remained twenty. This figure, continuing with slight variations for several years, was in 1849 reduced to eleven. This number, though afterward increased by a little, was all that its roll contained in 1870. Of these eleven churches six came into the united body, and four of them still have a place in it, two of them nearly extinct. It has had on its roll, in all, thirty-seven separate churches.

The Presbytery of Delaware, a much larger body at the outset than either of the others, and being about evenly divided in the elements of Presbyterianism and Congregationalism, made comparatively but little growth; and, in point of uniformity and stability in the character of its life, was about a mean between the two other Presbyteries. Starting with nine churches, and enlarged to fourteen at its first meeting; in the course of ten years it reached its highest figure of twenty, from which it slowly receded, until it dropped to eleven, at the time it became a part of the present organization. Of these eleven churches, eight came into the new organization (three of them however, only in name), four of which are still under its care. Its whole list of churches is twenty-three. Not a few of the churches of which these Presbyteries were composed were of recent and feeble origin at the time they were received, and having little more than a nominal existence, soon became extinct and were stricken from the roll. Of the remainder less than one-half were strong in numbers, and a spirit of restlessness pervaded many of these. As a result of the comparative weakness of the larger portion, and the restlessness of the smaller but stronger portion, there were frequent changes among the ministers. Pastoral relations were formed, to be dissolved in the course of three or four years, as often terminating at the expiration of one and two years, and enduring five years. The instances were rare when they continued ten, or even eight years. In almost all cases, the reasons assigned by pastors for the dissolution of the relation were either insufficiency of support or dissatisfaction of the people. Notwithstanding this restless condition of the churches and this frequent change of the ministers, revivals of religion were abundant, especially in the earlier history of these Presbyteries. The first narrative of the Presbytery of Otsego, 1819, makes mention of an extensive work of grace in the churches within its bounds, as the result of which 107 persons were added to the Church of Cooperstown; 50 to Cherry Valley; 92 to Sherburne, and 12 to Milford. For the next three years, 1819-1822, the work continued with almost unabated interest in the churches of Cherry Valley and Cooperstown, in the latter year reaching and most powerfully affecting the Church of Springfield, at which place 150 persons were hopefully converted. The membership of the Church in Cherry Valley rose from 130, in 1819, to 339, in 1822; that of Cooperstown from 124 to 260 in the same period; and that of Springfield from 83, in 1821, to 200 the following year. The year 1831 was one of signal blessing to the churches covering the entire field of these Presbyteries. The narrative of Otsego Presbytery, 1832, says: "In these refreshing seasons 94 have been added to the Church in Butternuts, 86 to Cooperstown, 40 to Bowman's Creek, 36 to Springfield, 32 to Fly and Oak's Creek, 32 to Maryland, 20 to Worcester, 12 to West Hartwick, 25 to Westford, and 25 to Milford." The Presbytery of Chenango, in its report to Synod, September, 1832, relates as follows: "In some of our congregations powerful revivals have been enjoyed, and in a few are still going on. In others there have been more gentle distillations of the Spirit, and we know of none in which there have not been more or less hopeful conversions." The following Spring it reports 322 additions to its 23 churches, 104 of which were to the Church of Guilford. The Presbytery of Delaware, in its first report to General Assembly, April, 1832, gives this glowing account: "The past year has been one of unparalleled interest to the churches in this region.

Never before since the first settlement of the country has so general a refreshing been experienced from the presence of the Lord. The additions made to different churches within our bounds during the year have varied from 20 up to 140. The aggregate number amounts to 820, an average of nearly fifty to each of its seventeen churches. In the following year the work continued in some of its churches, and there were 290 more additions. In that same year, the feeble churches of Middlefield, Milford and Oneonta, in the Presbytery of Otsego, were more than doubled; the work in the latter place was in the most busy season of the year, in the months of May and June. Other revivals were enjoyed by various churches in these Presbyteries, in the years 1834, 1836, 1843, 1855, 1858 and 1863. The times of these refreshings were the times when candidates for the ministry came forward in the largest numbers. Of the 92 candidates connected with these Presbyteries, and with the united body, 65 were received between the years 1819 and 1849, the remaining 27 between 1849 and the present time (1883). Of these candidates 18 were received by the Presbytery of Otsego alone in the first ten years of its history, whereas the united body has received only 6 since its organization in 1870. Of the 34 candidates received, but not licensed, a small fraction discontinued their studies and were dropped; the remainder were dismissed to other bodies. The whole number of licentiates taken under the care of these Presbyteries is 71, of whom 68 were ordained. In addition to these the united body has received 12, of whom it has ordained eleven. In 1829 the Presbytery of Otsego, hitherto connected with the Synod of Albany, was set off to the new Synod of Utica. In 1840 the Presbytery of Delaware, which, with that of Chenango, had been attached to the Synod of Geneva, was at its own request transferred to the Synod of Albany. In 1853 these Presbyteries were taken from the Synods of Utica, Albany and Geneva, with which they were respectively connected, and formed into the Synod of Susquehanna, which held its first meeting in Franklin, in October of the same year. Associated together as a Synod from that time forward, and being in entire harmony upon all the moral questions of the day, in regard to which they expressed themselves with no uncertain sound, these three bodies maintained the most pleasant relations with each other, when they came, at last, in 1870, to be more intimately and closely united by being merged into one Presbytery, receiving the name of its oldest and largest body, Otsego. Its first meeting was held in Gilbertsville, September 13th, 1870, and was opened with a sermon by the Rev. Samuel N. Robinson, who was afterwards chosen Moderator. The body as then constituted consisted of 29 ministers and 33 churches. Of these—

15 ministers and 16 churches were from Otsego Presbytery.
4 " " 6 " " " Chenango "
6 " " 8 " " " Delaware "

Of the remaining four ministers and three churches, resident and located in the bounds of the Presbytery, one minister was from the Presbytery of Montrose, one from the Presbytery of Wellsboro, the other two, together with the three churches, from the second Presbytery of New York, O. S. One church has since been organized and received, making thirty-four churches in all that have been on the roll. Of these, five have become extinct, and three have withdrawn and joined the Oneida, Chenango and Delaware Association, leaving at present twenty-six churches, with the same number of ministers, in connection with the Presbytery. In 1871, by a bequest of Miss Sarah Downs of Downsville, the Presbytery became the recipient of $150, which money, according to the terms of the grant, was to be used in educating candidates for the ministry, the greater part of which was afterward lost by the financial failure of the trustee to whom it was committed. In the same year the Presbytery also came into possession of some $800, the proceeds of the sale of the Andes Church property. This sum has been largely expended in aid of feeble churches within its bounds. In 1876, by an Act of Legislature, the Presbytery became an incorporated body, under the official title of "The Trustees of the Presbytery of Otsego."

With the exception of four or five feeble churches, one of which is virtually extinct, all of its churches are steadily supplied with the preaching of the Word; and at no time in the history of the Presbytery, from 1819, have the relations existing between the ministers and the churches been more enduring than in the last score of years. Rev. George Browne has supplied the church of Hamden twenty-eight years. Rev. James H. Robinson that of Delhi First, twenty years. Rev. Leonard E. Richards that of Stamford, nineteen years. Rev. Henry U. Swinnerton that of Cherry Valley, fifteen years. Rev. Pliny F. Sanborne and Rev. Horace H. Allen respectively those of Springfield and Oneonta, fourteen years. Rev. Frank W. Townsend that of New Berlin, eight years. Rev. Frederick A. M. Brown and Rev. Frank H. Seeley had been sixteen years respectively at Delhi Second and Richfield Springs, when their connection with these churches ceased, last year, and Rev. Hiram W. Lee had been ten years at Laurens, at the time of his death, in 1882.

Ottersen, Rev. James, was born in New York city, October 11th, 1791. He was brought up in the Associate Reformed Church. He graduated at Columbia College, New York; studied theology with Dr. Mason, and was ordained by the Associate Presbytery of New York. His fields of labor were in the Associate Reformed Church and the Reformed Dutch Church, until 1845, when he became pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Johnstown, N. Y. His last charge was in Wilmington, Del., which he relinquished in 1863. He died September 17th, 1867, at the house of his son, James Otterson, Jr., a prominent member of the Bar at Philadelphia, Pa.

Mr. Otterson possessed a clear, analytical mind, which showed the effect of early culture. He was a good scholar, a sound and able theologian, and a very instructive and edifying preacher. In the ecclesiastical assemblies of the Church he had few superiors. It was not merely as a parliamentarian, as one skillful in debate, that he excelled, but as possessing a strong, practical mind, that could lead the way through difficult and perplexing questions; that could see the end to be reached and how to reach it.

Ottis, John M. P., D. D., was born in Union, S. C., in 1838. He graduated at Davidson College, N. C., in 1859; at the Theological Seminary, Columbia, S. C., in 1862; and was licensed by Bethel Presbytery in the same year. He took charge of the Presbyterian Church in Greensboro, Ala., in May, 1862, and was ordained by Tuscaloosa Presbytery in the Spring of 1863. He was called to the First Presbyterian Church of Columbia, Tenn., in May, 1866, and to the West Presbyterian Church in Wilmington, Del., in May, 1873. In 1878 he was installed over the Chambers Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, the pastorate of which he resigned to return to his native South. In all his pastoral charges he has enjoyed the high regard of his people, and has labored with great fidelity and with evidence of the Divine blessing on his ministry.

Dr. Ottis is a writer of ability. He has been a constant and copious contributor to the religious and literary journals and magazines, from his college days, and has written several articles for the Southern Presbyterian and Princeton Review, which were well received. His only book, "Nicodemus with Jesus," published in 1867, met with a rapid and ready sale, but is now out of print. He has now three books in preparation, to which he has devoted ten years of study, and which, it is expected, will soon be ready for the press.

Owen, Rev. Griffith, was born in South Wales, G. B., March 1st, 1810. He graduated at Jefferson College in 1836; studied theology at Princeton Seminary, and was ordained by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, April 22d, 1840. He was pastor of Cohocksink Church, Philadelphia, 1840-41; of the Church at Uniontown, Pa., 1845-7; of South Church, Philadelphia, 1851-55, and of the Third Church, Baltimore, Md., 1855-60. Subsequently he was Missionary Secretary of the Maryland Sabbath-school Union, 1860-71. He died in Baltimore, January 14th, 1871. Mr. Owen was an earnest, faithful minister of the gospel, and labored with great diligence to advance the Redeemer's kingdom.

Owen, Roger, D. D., was born in South Wales, G. B., October 15th, 1813. He graduated at Jefferson College, Pa., in 1839; studied theology at Princeton Seminary, and was ordained by the Presbytery of Madison, September 24th, 1843. He was pastor of the First Church, Madison, Indiana, 1843-4; pastor at Columbia, Pa., 1844-50; Principal of the Academy at Chestnut Hill, Philadelphia, Pa., 1851-6; stated supply at Chestnut Hill, 1851-4; since which time he has been pastor of the church at that place. Dr. Owen is a gentleman of admirable Christian spirit, a close student, an instructive preacher, an excellent pastor, and an influential presbyter.

P

Page, Joseph R., D. D., was born in New Brunswick, N. J., August 1st, 1817. He united with the Methodist Church when about sixteen years of age; studied at Friends' School, New York city; studied with a view to the ministry with Rev. Alonzo Welton; was in Auburn Seminary, 1841-3, and received the honorary degree of D. D. from Hamilton College in 1876. He was ordained at Plymouth, N. Y., by the Oneida Association, February 6th, 1839; labored at Plymouth, 1838-9; was pastor in Perry, N. Y., 1839-41, 1843-57, 1859-68, and had charge of the Congregational Church of Stratford, 1857-9. He was Financial Agent of Ingham University, Le Roy, N. Y.; located at East Avon, N. Y., five years, and has been pastor of the church at Brighton, N. Y., since 1875. He was a Commissioner of Auburn Theological Seminary many years; has published several pamphlets, and is correspondent ("Wyoming") of the New York Evangelist.

Page, William Noble, D. D., is a native of Vermont. He was born in Chelsea, April 4th, 1837; graduated from Hamilton College in 1863, and received the degree of D. D. from Highland University in 1878. He was ordained and installed pastor of the Church at Trumansburg, N. Y., by the Presbytery of Ithaca, in June, 1866. This pastorate continued until 1869. His next charges were, Jacksonville, Fla., 1869-70; Amenia, N. Y., 1870-73. From this date he has been the popular, zealous and useful pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, Leavenworth, Kansas. As a presbyter he is faithful in the discharge of his duty.

Palmer, Benjamin M., D. D., LL. D., is the third son of the Rev. Edward Palmer, noticed below. He was graduated with excellent class distinctions, by the University of Georgia, at Athens, August, 1838, after which came his divinity course of three years in the Theological Seminary, Columbia, S. C. He was licensed to preach the gospel in April, 1841, by the Presbytery of Charleston, and was ordained in the Autumn of the same year, when he was installed pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Savannah, Georgia.

In January, 1843, Dr. Palmer was transferred to the pastorate of the Presbyterian Church of Columbia, S. C. This relation was continued through fourteen years, and in connection with it he was from 1853 to 1857 Professor of Church History and Polity in the Theological Seminary in that city. He was one of several distinguished ministers who, in 1847, projected the Southern Presbyterian Review, published at Columbia, an able theological and philosophical quarterly, which has held its steady course ever since, and still exists with unabated vigor, having experienced only a brief suspension during the late civil war. The articles contributed to its pages by Dr. Palmer, if collected, would fill a large octavo.

Dr. Palmer became Pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, New Orleans, in December, 1856, which relation has continued with marked success to the present time, with every prospect of indefinite duration. He was the first Moderator of the Southern General Assembly, organized in 1861, and has served as a commissioner in ten General Assemblies, three of them being of the Old School Presbyterian Church.

In 1846 he was selected anniversary orator of the American Sunday-school Union, and acquitted himself on its platform with great credit and satisfaction. In 1853 he was chosen to the chair of Hebrew in the Theological Seminary, then just organized at Danville, Ky. In 1860 he was elected to the chair of Pastoral Theology, in the Theological Seminary at Princeton, N. J. In 1874 was called to the Chancellorship of the Southwestern Presbyterian University, Clarksville, Tenn., and in 1881 was appointed Professor of Pastoral Theology in the Seminary at Columbia, S. C. All these elections were declined.

Dr. Palmer justly stands in the front rank of preachers. He has every element of intellect, heart, taste and attainment, that is calculated to give the pulpit dignity, power, and usefulness. He is an able theologian, a graceful and vigorous writer, and an impressive speaker. He is extensively and favorably known as an educator, and an advocate of all Scriptural plans for public reforms and ameliorations, as well as for his catholic readiness to co-operate personally in all proper measures to restrain vice, reclaim the degraded, and relieve the destitute. His labors among the sick, the suffering, the dying, in the city of his residence, in times of epidemic, contagious and infectious diseases, have exhibited manly self-denial and unflinching courage, and greatly endeared him to the community. The physicians of New Orleans will cheerfully testify that Dr. Palmer holds a high rank as one of their sympathetic, wise, and active collaborators, in their endeavors to relieve the horrors of combined pestilence, destitution and ignorance, and is always ready in the application of his great resources while combating these evils. (See illustration of Dr. Palmer's church on next page.)

Palmer, Rev. David Henry, was born in Phelps, N. Y., October 15th, 1839. He united with the Brick Presbyterian Church in Rochester, in 1858, and graduated from the University of Rochester in 1860. His theological studies were pursued at Auburn Seminary. He was ordained at Buffalo, N. Y., by the Presbytery of Buffalo, May 20th, 1863. His fields of labor have been, Aurelius, 1862-63; Virginia City, Nev., 1863-64; Columbia, Cal., 1861-66; Prattsburgh, N. Y., 1867-71; Caledonia, four months; Brockport, 1872-75; Penn Yan, from 1875 to the present date. Mr. Palmer is a faithful pastor and acceptable preacher, and has had success in his ministry. He covets not prominence in his profession, but is content to labor with diligence and fidelity in the congregations to the charge of which he is called by the Master.

Palmer, Rev. Edward, was born in the city of Charleston, S. C., December 25th, 1788, and died at Barnwell, S. C., September 30th, 1882, in the ninety-fourth year of his age. At the time of his decease, he was doubtless the oldest minister of the Southern Presbyterian Church. His father, Mr. Job Palmer, of Charleston, S. C., died in 1845, at the still more advanced age of ninety-eight years, the acknowledged patriarch of that city—a “man that was perfect and upright, and one that feared God and eschewed evil.” The subject of this sketch received an excellent English education, which was not entirely arrested when, at the age of fifteen years, he was taken into his father's office and business. When thirty-two years old, he acquired, at Phillips' Academy, Andover, Mass., in eighteen months, the classical knowledge necessary for entrance upon theological studies. In September, 1821, he matriculated in the Seminary at Andover, where he accomplished the three years' curriculum of study. Such was his proficiency after these five years of connected study, that, without his knowledge, the Faculty of Andover obtained for him, from Yale College, the degree of Master of Arts.

Mr. Palmer was licensed in July, 1824, by a Congregational Association, and in October of the same year, was ordained, as an evangelist, by an ex parte council. In the Autumn of 1824 he was installed pastor of the Dorchester Church, about twenty-four miles from Charleston, by the Congregational Association which then existed on the seaboard of South Carolina, but which, with a portion of Harmony Presbytery, was formed, in 1827, into the Charleston Union Presbytery. He remained in this pastorate until June, 1827, a period of two years and a half, when he removed to a wider sphere of labor, at Walterboro, S. C. In the Autumn of 1831 he was induced to accept a call from a Presbyterian Church at Stony Creek, in Beaufort District. Here he remained until the year 1844, the latter part of the time being divided between that and the Church at Walterboro. In 1844 he returned to his former charge at Walterboro, which he served until 1855, inclusive, then returned to Stony Creek, which he served until 1861, and then again to Walterboro, which he served until 1874, when, being in his eighty-sixth year, he was led, through a severe domestic bereavement, to resign his pastoral office entirely, that he might be cared for by his children. He continued, however, to preach the gospel as opportunity offered, and there were few Sabbaths in which he did not minister from the pulpit to some congregation.

Mr. Palmer preached faithfully to three generations. The catholicity of his feeling in religion was chief among his many Christian virtues. As a preacher he was clear, fervent, evangelical and impressive. At a time when the African race, in their condition of bondage, were dependent upon the ministry of the Southern Church for the knowledge of the gospel, he was untiring in his labors among them. As a pastor, he was a model to his brethren. He was greatly venerated and beloved in every community in which he lived. At his decease, the Charleston Presbytery, being in session at Walterboro, held a memorial service “with reference to the death of their lamented Father.” Mr. Palmer was the father of the two distinguished ministers of the Southern Presbyterian Church, Rev. Dr. Benjamin M. Palmer, and Rev. Dr. Edward P. Palmer.

Palmer, William Albee, son of Daniel and Mary Albee Palmer, was born May 24th, 1802, in Machias, Me. He became converted at twenty-two, and was deacon of the Congregational Church, Whitesville, Me., from 1826 to 1853. In 1850, during a visit to San Francisco, he helped to organize the Howard Presbyterian Church. April 10th, 1853, he joined that Church, and became an elder, December 14th, 1853, which position he held until his death, September 29th, 1870. Of a hopeful, cheery, humorous, active temperament, a man of much prayer and strong faith, he lived a radical Temperance and an unstained Christian life of nearly half a century, “as seeing Him who is invisible.” In youth a sailor, he often, when disaster threatened the Church, encouraged his associates by saying, “I have seen it blow harder than this.” He constantly relied on the Holy Spirit's direction and power, and was never at rest in soul unless in some revival work. For seventeen years, in the early and reckless days of California, he stood a pillar and leader in Howard Church, and did much to give it its aggressive power for good. Dying from a cancer of the lip, one of his last expressions was, “I shall yet praise God for every pain I bear.”

Pantheism, a theory which denies the existence of a personal God above the world, of God as the Creator and Ruler of the world. It makes God one with the world. It says, God is the “Universal,” lying at the basis of all the manifoldness of the world and of its individual phenomena; the universal essence which is in all; he exists not independently for himself as self-conscious being; he is only in the world as its inner ground of life, from which everything proceeds and to which everything returns, but not outside of and above the world, as its Lord and Creator. All the phenomena of the universe, of every kind, Pantheism regards as merely the various modes of one universal, absolute substance. The substance is one, the modes many; the substance abides, the modes rapidly succeed each other; the substance is God, the modes we call things.

“Some true Christian theologians,” says Dr. A. A. Hodge, “have taken a view of the relation of God to the world which comes perilously near, if it does not coincide with, this great pantheistic heresy. This view is that God's power is constantly exerted in continually creating every individual thing again and again, every fraction of duration; that created things have no real being of their own, and exist only as thus they are, each moment, the product of creative energy; and hence that the immediate cause of the state or action of any creature one moment of time is not its state or action the previous moment, but the direct act of divine creative power.

“If this be so, it is plain that God is the only real agent in the universe; that He is the immediate cause of all things, including all evil passions and wicked thoughts and acts; that consciousness is a thorough delusion, and the free agency and moral accountability of man vain imaginations."

Park, James, Jr., was born in Pittsburg, Pa., January 11th, 1820. In 1825 his parents removed to Allegheny, and here he continued to reside until his death. In 1837 he entered on his business career. In 1862 he turned his attention to the production of steel, in which he obtained great celebrity. He was the pioneer in this department, and his boldness of purpose, firmness of resolution, and superiority to reverses, long since won for him a high distinction. The steel industries of the United States are more indebted to him than to any other man, and European manufacturers have become quite familiar with his name. The firm of Park, Brother & Co., was among the first in America to manufacture crucible cast steel of the best quality. His instrumentality, however, in the introduction into the United States of the Bessemer process for converting pig iron into steel, was that in which his services have told most powerfully on the manufacturing interests of America. He was also the first to introduce into this country the Siemens gas furnace.

Mr. Park was a man of great public spirit, taking a deep interest in the prosperity of the city of his residence. He was a Trustee of the University of Western Pennsylvania; Chairman of the Executive Committee of one of the first Law and Order Associations established in our country; also Chairman of the Constitutional Temperance Amendment Association of Pennsylvania, and did much towards giving the movement the prominence and promise which it has recently had. And to all these various organizations he gave his personal attention, and contributed generously.

In 1858 Mr. Park was ordained and installed an elder of the First Presbyterian Church, Allegheny, and continued so until his death, which occurred April 21st, 1883. For many years he was a teacher in the Sabbath school, also a most faithful trustee. He was a man of great tenderness, and yet he discovered much self-possession and good judgment in treating the subjects of terrible accidents while waiting for the arrival of the surgeon. He also possessed great courage, as his facing the rioters at the Union Depot, in July, 1877, and his appeal to them, clearly showed. He was punctual to all appointments for meetings, rigid in the construction and application of rules, and fearless in the maintenance of his principles.

Parke, Rev. Nathan Grier, son of the Rev. Samuel Parke, of York County, Pa., was born at Slate Ridge, Pa., December 16th, 1820, and graduated at Jefferson College, in 1840, after which he studied theology at Princeton Seminary. He was ordained an evangelist by the Presbytery of Luzerne, July 7th, 1846. He was stated supply at Scranton, Pa.; stated supply at Pittston, 1844, and became pastor in 1847, in which relation he still continues. Mr. Parke is a faithful and earnest preacher, and has been blessed in his ministry. As a presbyter, he is active and useful. He has been Moderator of the Synod of Philadelphia, and discharged the duties of the position with much acceptance.

Parker, Francis, was born in Windsor, Vermont, in 1797. Having obtained a common business education, he went, at the age of twenty, to the West, and after a short residence in Illinois, fixed his home in Lincoln County, Mo., where he continued to reside until his death, in 1868. He was an honored ruling elder for forty years, principally of the Troy Church, having been ordained about 1828. The public esteem in which he was held is shown in the fact that he held the office of County Clerk thirty-two years, and that of Circuit Clerk, at the same time, for a period of twenty-six years. The last fourteen years of his life were passed in retirement from business and devotion to the cause of Christ. Mr. Parker publicly confessed Christ in 1824, and united with the Dardenne Church, in St. Charles county, the year following. He immediately put into employment his talent for usefulness. Having procured a supply of religious books, tracts, and papers, he organized the first Sabbath-school in North Missouri, north of St. Charles. To this sphere of labor he devoted his energies for thirty-seven years, serving as superintendent and assistant thirty-six years. His diligence in Bible study was unabating. Besides much special reading of it, in private and family devotion, he read it from beginning to end thirty-five times. Nor was he less devoted to prayer. Through more than forty years he lived in the observance of family and secret prayer, both morning and night. Neither business nor social claims were allowed to interfere with his prompt attention to every Christian duty; and a tenth of his income was given to the Lord.

Parker, Joel, D. D., was born in Bethel, Vt., August 27th, 1799. He graduated at Hamilton College, in 1824, and studied theology at Auburn Seminary. He was ordained pastor of the Third Presbyterian Church, Rochester, N. Y., February, 1827. His first fields of labor were, Rochester, 1826-30; Dey Street Presbyterian Church in New York, 1830-33; First Church, New Orleans, 1833-8; Broadway Tabernacle in New York, 1838-40. He was also President and Professor of Sacred Rhetoric in Union Theological than six hundred profess faith in Christ, of whom thirteen studied for the ministry. Mr. Parker having removed to Michigan in 1836, his son, when nineteen years of age, learned telegraphy and the printing business, then took a regular classical course in the University of Michigan, and after spending five years in teaching in Indiana and Illinois, studied theology in the Chicago Theological Seminary. After preaching two years in Illinois, he was elected to the Chair of Natural Science in Lincoln College, Topeka, Kansas. In a few years he resigned this position, and spent two years as an editor and preacher. Subsequently he was appointed Superintendent of the Kansas Institution for the Blind, and during his administration the Institution was greatly prospered. After his withdrawal from this position he moved over to Kansas City, where he spent seven years as a teacher, proof-reader and editor, and as City Missionary for all the Protestant churches. In 1882 he was appointed Post Chaplain in the United States Army, and he was detailed for duty to Fort McKavett, Texas. Professor Parker is the founder of the Kansas Academy of Science, and of the Kansas City Academy of Science. For fourteen years he has labored diligently in the establishment of these academies, which have already accomplished much for science in Kansas and Missouri, and give promise of a larger measure of usefulness. He inherits the faculty of invention from his father, and has already given some proofs of his gifts. He possesses those qualities which, under proper cultivation, would give him a reputation as an author.

Parks, Rev. Calvin Miller, was a son of a merchant in the city of New York, and was born in that city May 29th, 1827. At his father's death he was adopted by an uncle, a teacher of a select school in New York city, and was educated for a teacher. He followed this profession for thirteen years, when circumstances threw him in connection with the law, and he graduated at law at the National University, and was admitted to the Bar. The legal profession not being congenial with his motive of life, he studied theology, and was licensed to preach by the Washington City Presbytery, and was sent as a missionary to Utah. He was ordained by the Presbytery of Utah, and continues to labor in that field, devoted to his work, and successful in it.

Parsons, Calvin, was born in the township of Wilkesbarre, Pa., April 2d, 1815. He descended from the first settlers of the Valley of Wyoming. Both his grandfather and great grandfather were killed in the battle of Wyoming, July 3d, 1778. Mr. Parsons experienced conversion, with many others, under the preaching of the Rev. Daniel Baker, in Wilkesbarre, in 1839. He was elected an elder in the First Presbyterian Church of that place in 1847, and has continued to serve until the present time. For many years he was the leader of its choir, and a teacher of its Sabbath-school. The church has al-

He died in New York, May 2d, 1873. Dr. Parker was a forcible and faithful preacher, a writer of much ability, and very successful in his ministry. He received the degree of Doctor of Divinity from Princeton College, in 1839.

Parker, Rev. John Dempster, Ph.D., B.D., was born in Homer, N. Y., September 8th, 1831. He is the son of the Rev. Roswell Parker, who was a man of great force of character, of rare gifts and strong faith, a pioneer minister amidst the wilds of Western New York and Michigan; who preached over five thousand sermons; passed through many revivals of religion, and saw under his ministry more ways had his hearty support, and his influence as a Christian man has tended to strengthen the cause of religion in the community where, for so long a period, he has dwelt. His intelligent and expressive face has long been familiar in the courts of our Church.

As an educator, and advocate and supporter of the Temperance cause, Mr. Parsons has for years been prominent. He was elected a school director in 1846, and has served in an active capacity on the Board, with the exception of a year or two, since that time. He has been known for years, all over the State, as an earnest opponent of the use of and traffic in intoxicating beverages. A number of times his name has appeared on the State ticket, as a prominent candidate of the Prohibition party. He believes the liquor interest a great curse to the land. Attention to 1798, and was the fourth son of Captain Charles Parsons, who was for six years an officer in the Revolutionary War. He died while visiting a son at Detroit, Michigan, December 21st, 1855. He was a merchant, and a man of most marked character. Almost from his boyhood he was a decided Christian, and a great advocate of all educational enterprises. Being deeply impressed with the importance of education under Christian influence in this new State, he invested largely in government lands in Iowa; and in his will directed his sons and executors, General Lewis B. Parsons, Jr., Charles Parsons and George Parsons, to found a college, to be under the control of the Presbyterians of Iowa, and to endow it with this property.

business and prudence in the conducting of it, have placed Mr. Parsons among the wealthy capitalists of the Northern coal field. His integrity and trustworthiness finds ample testimony in the number of large estates confided to him as administrator, from time to time, and the large number of children for whom he has been appointed guardian in his native city and county. He has always been able to account for every cent of the many thousands of dollars passing through his hands.

Parsons College. This Institution is located at Fairfield, Iowa, in the southeastern part of the State, a very pleasant town, of active business enterprise, and noted over the State for the culture of its society. The college owes its origin to the late Lewis B. Parsons, Sr., a citizen of Buffalo, N. Y. He was born at Williamstown, Mass., April 30th, Parsons, Jr., and his co-executors, in accordance with the provisions of the will, and acting in co-operation with a committee of the Synod of Iowa South, founded the college at Fairfield, and transferred to a Board of Trustees, whom they selected, the legacy. This constitutes the Parsons Fund, the income only of which can be used.

The citizens of Fairfield have also contributed about twenty-four thousand dollars, which has been expended in the purchase of a site and the erection of suitable buildings.

By the terms of the college charter the Synod of Iowa has the right to veto the election of any trustee, and also to appoint, annually, a committee of visitors.

The college was opened for students, and organized, on the 8th of September, 1875, with three professors and thirty-six students. It has been regarded from the beginning as the especial charge of the Iowa Synod, and the hearty good wishes and helping hands of the Church have been extended to it; while so broad and free is its atmosphere, so free from any petty sectarianism, that about one-half of all its students have been from other denominations, including Jews and Catholics. The history of the college has been one of steady, healthful growth, in spite of great business depressions in the early years of its existence. The number of students has increased, and the faculty has been enlarged from year to year, and a new building and other facilities for instruction provided, although the funds for these increased expenses have been contributed in moderate amounts rather than by any great donations. A still more marked growth in the future seems evident.

During the year ending June 20th, 1883, the eighth year of the college, there were, in all the departments 182 students enrolled, of whom 85 were young ladies, who are admitted to all the classes on the same terms as young men. The graduating class numbered fifteen, of whom five were young ladies. Of the ten young men of this class, five expect to enter the ministry, as nine graduates of former classes have already done.

The college includes a preparatory department, and provides also instruction in music and art. The college instruction comprises two regular courses, classical and scientific. The requirements for admission are high, and the instruction given is very thorough and complete.

The first President of Parsons College was the Rev. John Armstrong, D.D., a native of Oxford, Pa., and for many years pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Muscatine, Iowa. He was removed by death in August, 1879. The other members of the original Faculty were Rev. A. G. Wilson, Professor of Greek and Latin, and Rector of the Preparatory Department, and Rev. Albert McCalla, Professor of Mathematics and Science. C. L. Sturns became Assistant Professor in Natural Sciences at the beginning of the second year. Professor Wilson resigned in 1878, to accept a situation elsewhere, and Tutor Sturns to go as a medical missionary to Turkey. Professor McCalla still remains in the college, as Professor of Physical Sciences. The Rev. E. J. Gillette, D.D., served as President for a year after the death of Dr. Armstrong, when Rev. T. D. Ewing, D.D., of Kittanning, Pa., was elected President. Dr. Ewing still occupies this position, and is sustained in the great educational work of the College by a large and able Faculty.

Patillo, Rev. Henry, was born in Scotland, in 1726. For a time he was clerk in a counting-house, in Virginia. While on his way to Pennsylvania, in 1751, with a view to study for the ministry, he met the Rev. Samuel Davies at Roanoke, went with him to his house, and pursued a course of instruction under his care. He was licensed by Hanover Presbytery, September 29th, 1757.

Mr. Patillo was ordained at Cumberland, July 12th, 1758. On the 27th of September, following, he was installed pastor of the churches of Willis Creek, Byrd, and Buck Island. Resigning this charge in October, 1762, he spent two years in Cumberland, Harris Creek, and Deep Creek. He then removed to North Carolina, and was installed, October 2d, 1765, at Hawfields, Eno, and Little River. He was a delegate, in 1775, to the Provincial Congress. In 1780 he became the minister of Grassy Creek and Ntubush congregations, largely made up of converts under the ministry of Mr. Davies. He was one of the first members of Orange Presbytery, and presided at the organization of the Synod of the Carolinas. He published a small volume, containing, among other things, his letter "On Predestination," to Francis Asbury, dated Granville, June 14th, 1787, and a defence of his conduct in admitting to the Lord's table persons holding Arminian sentiments. He died in Dinwiddie county, Va., in 1801, aged seventy-five. To his originality of genius and superior powers Mr. Patillo added piety, public spirit, and faithfulness in his ministry. He paid much attention to the colored people, and was successful in doing much good among them.

Patterson, Robert, D. D., was born in Letterkenny, County Donegal. He received his classical education there and at Londonderry, and his theological training in the Theological Seminary of the Reformed Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia, Pa. He was licensed by the Reformed Presbytery of Philadelphia, May 16th, 1851, traveled and preached to destitute congregations for a year; was ordained by the same Presbytery, June 17th, 1852, and sent to visit the churches under the care of Synod, to excite a greater interest in missions. In 1851 he was installed pastor of the First Reformed Presbyterian Church of Cincinnati, O. He published, whilst there, a course of lectures on "The Fables of Infidelity and the Facts of Faith." In 1857 he was called to the First Reformed Presbyterian Church of Chicago, Ill., and was one of the half dozen who met to form the business men's noon prayer meeting of that city. After a few years of public service to the country, which required him to be absent from his congregation, he resumed his labors among them. In 1866 he connected himself with the Chicago Presbytery (O. S.), and by that body was installed pastor of the Jefferson Park Church in 1867. In 1873, being unable to bear the rigorous climate of Chicago, he removed to California. In 1874 he became pastor of the First Church of San Francisco. In 1878 he was installed over the Central Presbyterian Church, Cincinnati, Ohio. In 1880 he returned to California, and ministered to the Church of Brooklyn, Alameda county, of which he is now pastor.

Dr. Patterson is an able, earnest and successful preacher, and a vigorous writer. In addition to the work already noticed, he has published "The American Sabbath," "The Sabbath, Scientific, American and Christian," "Christianity the only Republican Religion," "Christ's Testimony to the Scriptures," "Egypt's Place in History," and over seven hundred articles in reviews, magazines and newspapers, secular and religious, in Great Britain and America.

Patterson, Robert, LL.D., the fourth Director of the United States Mint at Philadelphia, was born in the Province of Ulster, Ireland, May 30th, 1743. Although his opportunities for education were very limited, he was enabled, principally by his energies, to acquire a solid foundation of learning, especially in mathematics and physical science. He emigrated to America in 1768, where he found employment as a teacher. He was engaged in that capacity as Principal of the Academy at Wilmington, Del. When the War of the Revolution broke out, Mr. Patterson, while a mere youth, had acquired some knowledge of the military art while acting as a volunteer for the defence of Ireland against a threatened French invasion. Ardently devoted to the cause of the Colonies, he now tendered his services as a military instructor, and afterwards entered the Revolutionary Army, where he acted in the various capacities of Adjutant, Assistant Surgeon, and Brigade Major. He continued in the service until after the evacuation of Philadelphia and New Jersey. In 1779 he was elected Professor of Mathematics in the University of Pennsylvania, which position he occupied until the year 1814. "Arduous as were his duties in the University" (we quote from a memoir by Chief Justice Tilghman), "he found time for other useful employments. Being highly esteemed by his fellow-citizens, he was elected a member of the Select Council of Philadelphia, of which he was chosen President in 1799. In the year 1805 he received from President Jefferson, with whom he had been in habits of friendship, the appointment of Director of the Mint. This office he filled with great reputation, until his last illness, when he resigned." He died soon after, in Philadelphia, on the 23d of July, 1821, in his eighty-second year.

Mr. Patterson occupied a high position in his adopted country, and was on terms of intimacy and correspondence with many of its leading men in learning and science. He took an active part in the proceedings of the American Philosophical Society, of which he finally became President, and communicated several scientific papers to its Transactions. He was the author of a Treatise on Arithmetic, and edited several works on science. In manners, Mr. Patterson was dignified, but affable. His religious convictions were sincere, and bore fruit in his daily life. He was long an elder in the Presbyterian Church. In his bodily frame, he was of middling height, strongly built, and of a venerable and dignified appearance. The portrait of him in the Mint Cabinet is copied from the excellent original by Rembrandt Peale.

Patterson, Robert Maskell, M.D., the sixth Director of the United States Mint, Philadelphia, was born in that city, March 23d, 1787. His father was Professor Robert Patterson, noticed above. He graduated at the University of Pennsylvania, as a Bachelor of Arts, in 1801, and as a Doctor of Medicine, a few years later.

In the year 1809 he visited Europe, and there pursued his studies in medicine and in the physical and natural sciences. He resided two years in Paris, then in the zenith of its fame, in science as well as in political power. In 1811 he visited London, and completed his education as a chemist under Sir Humphrey Davy. He returned to the United States in the following year. His reputation had preceded him. In a few months after his arrival he found himself Professor in the University of Pennsylvania, and in 1814 its Vice-Provost. He filled the chairs of Natural Philosophy, Chemistry, and Mathematics in this Institution until 1828, when he was persuaded to transfer his usefulness and fame to the University of Virginia. He retained this position for several years, adding greatly to his reputation. Mr. Madison, and the other distinguished men who were associated with him in the Board of Visitors, gave Dr. Patterson their unreserved confidence, and cherished for him the most intimate relations of personal regard. But his affections looked back upon his native city, and in 1835, on the resignation of Dr. Moore, he accepted the appointment of Director of the Mint. In this station he continued, discharging its duties most efficiently, until declining health admonished him to seek relief from the toils of office. He resigned the Directorship in July, 1851. He died in Philadelphia, Sept. 5th, 1854, in his sixty-eighth year.

Dr. Patterson was elected a member of the American Philosophical Society in 1809, at the age of twenty-two, the youngest man ever admitted. In its proceedings he ever took an active and leading part. In 1843 he delivered the discourse at its centennial celebration. In 1849 he was elected its President. His reputation was gained as a lecturer on science, for which his education and fullness of learning eminently qualified him. In the different organizations, scientific, artistic and religious, that make up for Philadelphia her proudest characteristics, Dr. Patterson was a leading man. He was a member of the Presbyterian Church. In private life he was greatly beloved, a true gentleman, gentle in manners, and in expressing his opinions.

Patterson Robert Mayne, D. D., was born July 17th, 1832, in Philadelphia, Pa. Graduating at the High School in his seventeenth year, he became an official reporter in the United States Senate and in Law Courts. After studying law, he entered Princeton Theological Seminary, graduating in 1859. He was pastor of Great Valley Church, Pa., 1859-1867; of South Church, Philadelphia, 1867-80 (during which pastorate five hundred and twenty-five communicants were added to the church), and has been editor of the Presbyterian Journal since November, 1880, uniting with it again the pastoral care of his first charge.

His publications are: "Life and Character of Abraham Lincoln," "History of the Great Valley Presbyterian Church," "Our Nation, a Centennial Discourse," "Revival Counsels," "Counsels to a Young Convert," "Total Abstinence," "Presbyterianism in Philadelphia," "History of the Synod of Philadelphia," "Paradise: the Place and State of Saved Souls between Death and the Resurrection," "Visions of Heaven for the Life on Earth," and "Elijah, the Favored Man." He has also written a number of valuable articles for Magazines and Reviews.

In 1871 he was appointed a member of the committee to examine, approve, and publish the new Digest of Deliverances of the Assembly. He was a member of the committee of seven appointed in 1879 to prepare a plan for the consolidation of Synods and enlargement of their powers. He was a delegate to the Conference in London, in 1875, which agreed upon the Constitution of the Ecumenical Presbyterian Alliance. He read a paper on "Church Extension in Large Cities" before the Philadelphia Council of 1880, and by appointment of that Council, was also editor of the volume containing the full reports of its proceedings. He was appointed by the Assembly a delegate to the Council in Belfast, in 1881.

By appointment of the Philadelphia Ministerial Association, Dr. Patterson prepared, for the Ter-Centenary Meeting, in 1872, a sketch of Presbyterianism in Philadelphia; by appointment of the Synod of Philadelphia, a history of that body for the Centennial year, 1876; and by the consolidated Synod of Pennsylvania he has been appointed to prepare a sketch of Presbyterianism in Pennsylvania, for the first meeting of the body under its new rules of delegation, in 1884. He is an instructive and impressive preacher, a vigorous writer, a valuable member of Church courts, and highly esteemed by his brethren.

Patterson, Robert Wilson, D.D., was born in Blount County, Tenn., January 21st, 1811. He graduated at Illinois College in 1837, and studied theology at Lane Seminary, 1837-41. He was ordained and installed September 14th, 1842, by the Presbytery of Ottawa, pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church, Chicago, Ill., and continued in this relation, honored and useful, until 1873, when he resigned the charge. He was Professor of Christian Evidences and Ethics, in the Theological Seminary of the Northwest, 1873-81, and President of Lake Forest University, 1876-8. He was Moderator of the General Assembly (N. S.) at Wilmington, Del. Dr. Patterson is a gentleman of large and varied attainments; of indomitable energy, and has served the Church faithfully in the important positions he has occupied.

Patton, Francis Landey, D.D., LL.D., born in Warwick, Bermuda, January 22d, 1843, educated classically at University College, Toronto, theologically at Knox College, Toronto and Princeton Theological Seminary, N.J., graduating in 1865; ordained by the Presbytery of New York, June 1st, 1865, pastor of Eighty-fourth Street Presbyterian Church, N. Y., 1865-67; of Nyack Presbyterian Church, 1867-71; South Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn, 1871-72; pastor-elect and pastor of Jefferson Park Presbyterian Church, Chicago, 1874-81; editor of The Interior, from 1873-76; Professor of Didactic and Polemic Theology in the Presbyterian Theological Seminary of the Northwest, Chicago, from 1874-81; chosen Moderator of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, 1878; elected Stuart Professor of the Relation of Philosophy and Science to the Christian Religion in Princeton Theological Seminary, 1881, which position he now holds (1883).

Only talents of an exceptionally high order, tempered by grace and controlled by sound common sense could justify such rapid advancement to posts of large responsibility. Professor Patton's power of continued mental work is noteworthy, as during his public life of less than a score of years he has not only performed double work from pulpit, platform and Professor's chair, but in addition has furnished for the press a large amount of well considered writing, among which are found: "Inspiration of the Scriptures" (Presbyterian Board of Publication); "Summary of Christian Doctrine" (Presbyterian Board of Publication). Of Review Articles, "Newman's Grammar of Assent," "Divine Retribution," "The Philosophy of Punishment," "Shield's Final Philosophy," "The Place of Philosophy in the Theological Curriculum," "The Dogmatic Aspect of Pentateuchal Criticism," and "The Education of the Ministry: a Reply to President Eliot;" besides a still larger number of editorial and other anonymous articles in our best periodicals, here and in Europe.

While Professor Patton as an acute thinker, a skillful dialectician, a polished writer and an effective speaker, has few equals, his gentleness of spirit, personal dignity and unflinching courtesy fit him for exerting a happy influence upon the young men under his care.

His largest and best work, it is to be hoped, is yet to be done, in a chair of his own choice and in the seminary where he received his final training.

Patton, John, D.D., was born at Nottingham, Cecil county, Md., May 18th, 1808. He graduated at Jefferson College, Pa., with honor, in 1826, in a class of twenty-four, and studied theology at Union Seminary, Va. In October, 1831, he was licensed to preach by West Hamover Presbytery, and was ordained by the Presbytery of New Castle, December 25th, 1832, and installed the same day over Chestnut Level and Little Britain churches, in Lancaster county, Pa. One year was spent by him at Dover, Del., in resuscitating the church at that place, which was formerly under the charge of Samuel Miller, D.D., called to Princeton. He labored as pastor of the Western Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, from December 1835 to July, 1838; then became pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Northumberland, Pa., and continued so till October, 1847. This pastorate he resigned to take charge of the Philadelphia Education Society, of which he was Secretary for some ten years, acting at the same time as stated supply of the Logan Square Presbyterian Church.

April 1st, 1865, Dr. Patton accepted a call to the First Presbyterian Church, Middletown, Del., and remained their pastor with great pleasure and success for fifteen years, when he felt it incumbent on him to resign the labors and cares of the pastoral office. He now resides in Philadelphia. Dr. Patton is a gentleman of amiable spirit, pleasing address, admirably balanced character, and greatly esteemed by all who appreciate true intellectual, social and religious worth. In the fifty-one years of his useful ministry, he has preached 6266 sermons, made 10,305 pastoral visits, conducted 3111 prayer meetings, addressed 529 funeral assemblies, administered 565 baptisms, performed 333 marriages, and rejoiced over 554 hopeful conversions, in his several charges.

Paul, Rev. John, was received by the Standing Committee of Donegal Presbytery as a licentiate from Ireland, December 10th, 1735; was soon after called to Nottingham, and was installed there on the second Wednesday of October, 1736. He was one of the first supplies sent to Deer Creek, Md. He died in 1739, and his tomb remains in the old graveyard, near the Rising Sun; the inscription, nearly obliterated, tells that he died at the age of thirty-three.

Paul, Rev. Alfred, was born at St. Clairsville, Ohio, January 17th, 1815, and graduated at Washington College, Pa., in 1838. He was a missionary in the Presbytery of Washington, 1843-4; stated supply at Captina and Pipe Creek, O., 1844-9; ordained an evangelist by the Presbytery of Washington, April 17th, 1850; stated supply of the Third Church of Wheeling, Va., 1849-51; stated supply of the Fourth Church, Wheeling, 1852, and pastor of it 1853-65. From 1867 to 1871 he was pastor of the Hestonville (now West Park) Church, Philadelphia, Pa. He died, November 18th, 1872. Mr. Paull was an eminently pious man, loved by his brethren, and earnestly devoted to the Master's work. It was his delight to preach the gospel, and he recommended the truth he proclaimed, by his example. His end was peace.

Paxton, William Miller, D.D., was born in Adams county, Pa., June 7th, 1824. He graduated at Pennsylvania College, Gettysburg, in 1843, and afterwards studied law. On the eve of his admission to the Bar he determined to study for the ministry, and entered the Theological Seminary at Princeton, graduating in 1848. In the Spring of the preceding year he had been licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of Carlisle, and October 4th, 1848, he was ordained and installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Greencastle, Franklin county, Pa., where he remained two years, greatly blessed in his labors and beloved by his people. In the Autumn of 1850 he was called to the pastorate of the First Presbyterian Church of Pittsburg, as successor of the Rev. Dr. Francis Herron, and was installed early in January, 1851. In this important position the divine blessing signally accompanied his ministry. During his connection with this church he associated with his duties as pastor those of Professor of Sacred Rhetoric in the Western Theological Seminary, Allegheny, from 1860 to 1867, which he discharged with credit to himself and advantage to the Institution. In 1866 he was installed pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of New York city, where he ministered to a cultivated and appreciative congregation until he was unanimously elected, in 1883, as successor of the Rev. A. T. McGill, D.D., LL.D., in the Chair of Ecclesiastical, Homiletic and Pastoral Theology, in Princeton Theological Seminary. During his residence in New York, in addition to his pastoral labors, he filled the post of Lecturer on Sacred Rhetoric in the Union Theological Seminary.

Dr. Paxton is a gentleman of peculiar blandness of manner, and without the slightest sacrifice of a most becoming dignity, places himself on pleasant and familiar terms with all into intercourse with whom he is brought. He is a most agreeable companion. As a preacher he stands in the front rank. His delivery is graceful, his style pure and polished, and he grasps and presents with great force any subject which he undertakes to expound. His eloquence is universally acknowledged, and of his eminent qualifications for the work of training young men for the ministry, to which he has been called, no one entertains a doubt. Dr. Paxton has published a "Memorial of Rev. Francis Herron, D. D." He was Moderator of the General Assembly in its meeting in Madison, Wis., in 1880. On the 23d of September, 1880, he preached the opening sermon of the Second General Council of the Presbyterian Alliance, which met in the Academy of Music, Philadelphia. This admirable sermon was received with great satisfaction, and the insertion of a part of it elsewhere in our columns we have deemed both appropriate and deserved. (See Presbyterian Alliance.)

Payne, Rev. Charles Montgomery, A. M., M. D., son of Ruling Elder Dr. C. L. Payne, was born at Lexington, N. C., October 19th, 1812. He graduated, with first honors, at Davidson College, N. C.; studied medicine in the New York and Washington Universities; became an M. D. in 1839, and practiced medicine some time in the States of North Carolina and Georgia. His theological course was taken in Union Theological Seminary, Virginia. He was licensed by Orange Presbytery, 6th of April, 1872, and ordained to the full work of the ministry by the same Presbytery, 15th of April, 1873; served as stated supply and pastor to Mt. Airy, Madison, Leaksville and Wentworth churches, N. C.; was called to the pastorate of Second Presbyterian Church, Wilmington, N. C., in 1874, and commenced his labors in that relation in November of that year. This connection has now reached its ninth year under his ministrations.

Dr. Payne is endowed with those elements of character and talents which make up and give him a fitness for the gospel ministry, through his untiring zeal and consecration to the Master's work. The cause of Presbyterianism has, in his field, enlarged considerably. His preaching is earnest and logical; he is a close and diligent student, and has written a very exhaustive pamphlet on the "Faith and Order of the Presbyterian Church." He is also synodical agent for evangelistic labor in the Synod of North Carolina. He has the full confidence of his own church and congregation and his brethren in the ministry.

Peck, Edwin J., elder of Second Presbyterian Church, Indianapolis, Ind., was born October 16th, 1806, near New Haven, Ct. He superintended the erection of the State House at Indianapolis in 1831. Erected buildings for Branch Bank at Madison, Terre Haute, Lafayette and South Bend. He filled many positions of trust and responsibility, all of them with great fidelity and skill. Was director of the Indianapolis and Madison R.R.; aided in starting the Terre Haute R.R., in which he was a large stockholder, and its President for many years. Was President, also, of the Union Railway Company. He happily combined valuable New England traits, economy, industry, and method. These he exhibited both in his private and official acts. To his convictions of right he held with great firmness. Soon after its formation he united with the Second Presbyterian Church, serving as trustee, sabbath-school superintendent, teacher and ruling elder; one of its most trusted advisers and most generous helpers. He loved his church and was ever alive to its temporal and spiritual interests. The abundant means with which God had blessed him he used with wise discrimination. His acts of private charity were numerous. While he was a constant and liberal giver to his own church, he contributed generously to support weak congregations during his life. His active and useful life closed November 6th, 1876. His good deeds survive, and their influence will be perpetuated to coming generations. It may in truth be said that no citizen of Indianapolis has left a nobler record of public benefactions. For a pastor's library, in his own church, he gave $25,000; an equal sum to the Board of Home Missions; the same to support missions in Indiana. He liberally remembered the orphan asylums, both white and colored, the Home of the Friendless, and to the various departments of Wabash College he gave $115,000.

Peck, Rev. Simeon, son of Ebbu and Margaret (Taggart) Peck, was born October 16th, 1799, in Lebanon Township, N. H. His preparatory education was received, first, at Middlebury Academy, N. Y., second, at Bloomfield Academy, N. Y., and third, for three years studying by himself, and a part of that time teaching school. He united, on profession of his faith, with the Presbyterian Church at Alden, N. Y., at about nineteen years of age. In the Fall of 1823 he entered Hamilton College, N. Y., but left because of poor health, in the Spring of 1826, without graduation, and spent the Summer of 1827 on the coast of Labrador, engaged in the business of fishing, while seeking health. He entered Princeton Seminary in the Fall of 1827, and remained nearly three years, but left without graduating; was licensed by Oneida Presbytery, at Utica, N. Y., June 15th, 1830; and was ordained an evangelist by Buffalo Presbytery, at Carroll, N. Y., September 21th, 1834.

Mr. Peck never was an installed pastor. His successive fields of labor, as stated supply, were as follows:—1, at Alden, N. Y., 1830-31; 2, at Penfield, N. Y., 1831-32; 3, at Big Flat, N. Y., 1832-33; 4, at Carroll, N. Y., 1834-35; 5, at Harbor Creek, Pa., 1835-36; 6, at Ebensburg, Pa., 1836-7; 7, at Millville, N. J., 1839-40; 8, at Eden, Caroline and Waynesburg churches, Ohio, 1842-46. After this time, in infirm health and with a large family, he devoted himself to farming, residing near Findlay, Ohio. In July, 1857, he settled at Florence, near Omaha, Nebraska, where he continued to reside until his death, which occurred at that place, March 20th, 1881. His last hours were full of bright hopes of enjoying the heavenly rest. His life was full of labor and of self-denial. He was a thorough Presbyterian. His preaching was strong and pungent, yet persuasive. His life was eminently pure and upright, yet he was modest, even diffident. His piety was calm, regular, steady and self-consistent.

Peeples, J. McKee, Esq., was born at Shaw-

J. MCKEE PEEPLES, 1852.

nectown, Ill., April 11th, 1826, and died in the same room, December 23d, 1879. His ancestry were Scotch-Irish. Beginning life as a clerk, he attained great success as a merchant and banker. He was converted and joined the church of his native place under Father Spilman's ministry, in 1858. Twenty-one years of steady growth made it evident that his conversion was genuine. He was ordained a ruling elder in 1862. His special characteristics were a sound judgment and a fervent spirit. During his brief pauses in public worship his face would wear the reverence and form of prayer. A careful and constant study of the Scriptures gave him great power of exposition and exhortation. His chief work was in the Sabbath school. In connection with this, he and his "true yoke-fellows" conducted gospel meetings, year by year, in his own and surrounding counties, in which many souls were converted and a great work was organized. In the future he will be remembered as one who helped to win Southern Illinois to Christ. His zeal and ability were recognized by his election as "President of the Illinois State Sabbath-school Association," at Galesburg, in 1871. He was a generous contributor to all the Boards of the Church and to the Bible Society. He also made many special donations, among which was $5000 contributed by himself and his partner in business, the Hon. T. S. Ridgway, to the endowment of the Presbyterian Theological Seminary of the Northwest. But his hand and heart were ever open wherever money or work promised to glorify God.

Peirce, Hon. William S., was born at New Castle, Del., September 3d, 1815. He belongs to one of the oldest families in that State, his ancestors having settled there about 1680, at which early day they removed from New England, where the family names are found among the promoters of the Plymouth settlement, and patentees of Bridgewater, Massachusetts, in the years 1620-23. He received his preliminary education in New Castle, where, besides the ordinary branches of an English education, he commenced the study of Latin and Greek. When he came to Philadelphia he entered the High School of the Franklin Institute, where he completed his educational course. He then engaged in mercantile pursuits, but found time to gratify an ardent taste for books, by hoarding up his leisure moments, and devoting them to reading and self-culture.

After an honorable mercantile career of a few years, he abandoned it in favor of the legal profession. He was admitted to the Bar in 1845, and at once evinced more than ordinary ability, energy and perseverance. In February, 1866, he was appointed Judge of the Court of Common Pleas for the City and County of Philadelphia, to fill a vacancy; in October of that year, was elected to fill the same office for a term of ten years, and in 1876, as additional evidence of the confidence of the people in his ability and integrity, he was re-elected. Judge Peirce is a very courteous and affable gentleman. His mind is well stored with information on literature, arts and sciences. Benevolence is a very prominent trait of his character. He is fearless in the discharge of duty. He is active in movements which look to the relief and elevation of suffering humanity, and is popular as a speaker in their behalf. For many years he has been a member of the Presbyterian Church.

Peiret, Peter, a French Reformed, or Huguenot minister, pastor of the French Church in New York from 1688 to 1704. He was a native of the Comté de Foix, in the south of France. Like Dailli, whom he succeeded, he was highly esteemed by the community, and greatly beloved of his own flock. He died September 1st, 1704, aged sixty years. The inscription upon his grave, in Trinity Churchyard, New York, commemorates his excellence: "Qui ex Gallia Religionis causâ expulsus verbum Dei in hujus civitatis Ecclesiâ Gallicanâ per annos 17 cum generale approbatione prædicavit quique cum vitam prædicationibus suis conformem duxerit."

Peppard, Rev. Francis, received ordination about 1764, from the Presbytery of New York, and was installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Mendham, N. J. In 1766 he removed to Orange county, N. Y., and succeeded Enos Ayres as pastor of the church at Bethlehem, having also charge of a church at New Windsor. A few years later Mr. Peppard became pastor of the churches at Allen Township (now Allentown), Pa., and Hardwick, N. J. He died while in this charge, in 1797.

Perkins, Samuel C., son of Samuel H. Perkins, was born in Philadelphia, November 14th, 1828. He graduated at Yale College in the class of 1848; three years later he received his A. M. degree, and in the following year that of LL. B., from the University of Pennsylvania. He was admitted to the Bar in July, 1851, has continued in practice ever since, and his ability and attention to the interests of his clients have won him a high position and reputation. In 1857 he was elected to Common Council from the Seventh Ward, and served one term. He was named as one of the commissioners for the erection of new public buildings in Philadelphia, by the act of the Legislature, approved August 5th, 1870, and was elected president of the Commissioners April 17th, 1872. This responsible office, the duties of which he has discharged with signal ability and fidelity, he still occupies.

Mr. Perkins, at an early age, became a member of the Presbyterian Church, and as such has been honored with many marks of confidence and esteem. From May, 1856, to May, 1870, he was trustee of the First Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia. He has been elder of the same church from March 21st, 1870, until the present time. He served as a member of the Presbyterian Publication Committee from September 20th, 1858, until June 30th, 1870. From May, 1870, he has been a member of the Presbyterian Board of Publication, and from June of the same year President of the trustees of the same body. He has several times represented his Presbytery as a commissioner in the General Assembly. In May, 1873, he was elected Manager of the American Sunday-school Union. Learned and reliable as a lawyer, upright and public-spirited as a citizen, a kindly and courteous gentleman, he is deservedly a prominent man in his native city.

Perseverance of the Saints. The doctrine of our Church, that true believers cannot fall totally or finally from grace, is supported by the following arguments:—

1. The decree of God concerning them. They were predestinated to life, and shall infallibly obtain it, if the purposes of God are not changeable, like those of men, and liable to be frustrated by opposition which He did not foresee and could not prevent. But the counsel of the Lord shall stand, and He will do all His pleasure. "He worketh all things according to the counsel of his will;" and the design of the economy of Providence and Grace is to carry His purposes into effect. Accordingly, the Scriptures exhibit a chain of events stretching from eternity to eternity, not one of the links of which can be broken. "Moreover, whom he did predestinate, them he also called, and whom he called, them he also justified, and whom he justified, them he also glorified" (Rom. viii, 30).

2. The nature of the covenant which God has made with His people. It is not transitory, like the first covenant, but is everlasting, and hence its blessings are promised, not for a time, but forever. "And I will make an everlasting covenant with them, that I will not turn away from them, to do them good, but I will put my fear in their hearts, that they shall not depart from me" (Jer. xxxii, 40). To the same purport are the following words of our Saviour. "And I will give unto them eternal life, and they shall never perish, neither shall any man pluck them out of my hand. My Father, which gave them me, is greater than all; and no man is able to pluck them out of my Father's hand" (John x, 28, 29).

3. The teaching of Paul in Romans viii, 35, 37. "Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword? Nay, in all these things we are more than conquerors, through him that loved us."

4. The death of Christ. If Jesus, as the Scriptures teach, made satisfaction on the cross for the sins of his people, not for some of them only, but for them all, it would be contrary to justice to subject them also to the punishment. But if the saints may fall from a state of grace, and perish in their sins, satisfaction will be twice exacted, first, from the surety, and secondly, from them.

5. The intercession of Christ. The prayer in the seventeenth chapter of John was evidently offered by Christ in the character of the High Priest and Intercessor of the Church, who, for the sake of His people, had sanctified or dedicated Himself to this office. Shall our Saviour intercede in vain? Shall any of those for whom He shed His blood fall away and perish, although He has requested that their faith should not fail? No; it is impossible. "Because I live," saith He, "ye shall live also." "Who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died, yea, rather, that is risen again, who is even at the right hand of God, who also maketh intercession for us." John xiv, 19; Rom. viii, 31.

6. The inhabitation of the Spirit. "And I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another Comforter, that he may abide with you forever, even the Spirit of Truth, whom the world cannot receive, because it seeth him not, neither knoweth him, but ye know him, for he dwelleth with you and shall be in you" (John xiv, 16-17). Again, the Spirit is represented as an earnest of our inheritance: "Who hath also sealed us and given us the earnest of the Spirit in our hearts" (2 Cor. 1-22). "Ye were sealed with that Holy Spirit of promise, which is the earnest of our inheritance until the redemption of the purchased possession" (Eph i, 13-14; compare also 2 Cor. v, 5). Now an earnest means nothing more nor less than a pledge. The Holy Spirit is given to believers as a first-fruits and pledge of their ultimate beatitude. If we owe a man a thousand dollars, and pay him fifty in pledge of the remainder, that fifty is an earnest, according to the Scripture phraseology. Now God, by the gift of his Spirit, has solemnly pledged Himself to save all believers, and will He violate this solemn and self-imposed obligation? "God is not a man, that he should lie; neither the son of man, that he should repent; hath he said and shall he not do it, or hath he spoken and shall he not make it good?"

To the objections which are often brought against the doctrine of the perseverance of the saints, it may be replied, (1) It is absurd to say that it is inconsistent with man's free will. As God does not make a man come to Christ, so He does not constrain him to continue in Christ irrespective of his will. God graciously causes a man to persevere in willing. That is the whole truth. It is a precious truth, clearly revealed, which the Arminian Christian can no more afford to give up than the Calvinist, that God can and does control the free wills of His people without limiting their liberty, making them "willing in the day of his power," and "working in them both to will and to do of his good pleasure." (Ps. cx, 3; Phil. ii, 13). The Arminians themselves believe that the saints will be rendered secure from falling from grace when they go to heaven, and yet that they will be none the less perfectly free as to their wills. If the two are consistent conditions in heaven, they can be none the less so on earth. (2) This doctrine is not liable to the charge of fostering a spirit of carnal security, on the ground that if we are once in grace we cannot lose grace or be lost, do what we please. Let it be observed (a) that the true doctrine is not that salvation is certain if we have once believed, but that perseverance in holiness is certain if we have truly believed. (b) The certainty, nay, the probability, of an individual's salvation is known to him only through the fact of his perseverance in holiness. A tendency to relax watchful effort to grow in grace, because true Christians will not be allowed to fall away totally, is a direct evidence that we are not in a gracious state, and hence that the threatenings of the law and the invitations of the gospel, and not the perseverance of the saints, is the special truth applicable to our case. (c) This doctrine teaches not that persistent effort on our part is not necessary in order to secure perseverance in grace to the end, but that in this effort we are certain of success, "for it is God that worketh in us, both to will and to do of his good pleasure" (Phil. ii, 13).

Pershing, Hon. Cyrus L., was born in Youngstown, Westmoreland county, Pa., February 3d, 1825. He removed to Johnstown, Pa., in 1830, where his father died in 1836. After this, while attending to a grocery store, he studied Latin, under the tuition of Rev. S. H. Terry, pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Johnstown, till his death, in 1841. Mr. Pershing was graduated from Jefferson College, Pa., in 1845. He read law with Hon. Jeremiah S. Black, in Somerset, Pa., and after his admission to the Bar practiced his profession at his home, Cambria county, Pa. In 1856 and 1858 he was the Democratic candidate for Congress in his district. He was a member of the Legislature in 1861, 1862, 1863, 1864 and 1865. During the whole of his service at Harrisburg he was a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, the Judiciary, and others of equal importance. At the session of 1863, the only one in which the Democrats had a majority, Mr. Pershing was Chairman of the Committee on Federal Relations, and at the succeeding session was the Democratic nominee for Speaker of the House. In the Legislature he was an acknowledged leader, and enjoyed to a rare degree the confidence and personal esteem of his fellow members, without distinction of party.

In 1867 Mr. Pershing represented his Presbytery (Blairsville) in the Union Presbyterian Convention, which met in November, in Dr. Wylie's Church, on Broad Street, Philadelphia. In 1868 he was placed on the Democratic electoral ticket. In 1869 he was nominated for Judge of the Supreme Court. In 1872 he was elected President Judge of the 21st Judicial District (Schuylkill county), which necessitated his removal to Pottsville. On September 19th, 1875, Judge Pershing was nominated by the Democratic State Convention as its candidate for Governor. In November, 1882, he was re-elected President Judge of the Courts of Schuylkill county, this time, as before, by a vote which represented the best citizens of all parties. During his service upon the Bench the trials were had of the Molly Maguire conspirators, which attracted the attention of the whole country.

Judge Pershing was for many years an elder in the Presbyterian Church of Johnstown. He was chosen to the same office in the Second Presbyterian Church of Pottsville. He often appears in the courts of the Church. He is one of the most correct, conscientious and Christian gentlemen in the State, high-minded, and the very soul of honor. No man enjoys the confidence and esteem of his fellow citizens, independent of either politics or religion, to a greater degree than he, and none have been more assiduous or untiring in their efforts to establish and systematize educational institutions in his county. In the management of the schools of the county, he has for a number of years taken a leading and active part. His wisdom, judgment, legal and literary attainments, none will question; while he holds in his own community, and, in fact, wherever known, an enviable position for moral worth and incorruptible honesty and integrity.

Petrie, George H. W., D. D., was born in Charleston, S. C., May 5th, 1812; received his academic and collegiate education in that city, and was graduated in April, 1831. He studied theology in the Seminary at Columbia, and in 1834 was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Charleston Union. He was ordained, in April, 1835, by the Harmony Presbytery, S. C. For the first twenty-two years after his ordination he was pastor of the Presbyterian churches at Williamsburg, Cheraw, and Darlington, S. C., and at Marietta, Ga., and of the Huguenot Church at Charleston, S. C. In all these places he greatly endeared himself to his people. For the last twenty-six years he has been, and is at this time, pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Montgomery, Alabama. Here, through his long pastorate, he has continued to maintain a high place in the hearts of those to whom he ministers.

Dr. Petrie is distinguished for his urbanity and refinement of manners, and a pleasantness that ever marks his conversation, making him a most agreeable companion, and is a man beloved in all the walks of life, and by every class of society. His public ministrations are marked by much ability, and an earnest zeal for the spiritual welfare of his charge. He is both attractive and impressive as a reader, and in his pulpit services the Scriptures are read with unusual fullness, and selected with great appropriateness to when he resigned the pastorate to assume the Presidency of Coe College, at Cedar Rapids, Iowa. The degree of Doctor of Divinity was conferred on Mr. Phelps, in 1882, by Lenox Collegiate Institute, and by Washington and Jefferson College.

Dr. Phelps is a highly acceptable preacher, and has been a beloved and useful pastor. His sermons abound in illustrations. His preaching is characterized by unusual vivacity and earnestness. His pastorate in Vinton was peculiarly successful. The union of the First and Second churches, which was effected in 1872, was followed by a remarkable revival, in which about one hundred and fifty persons were gathered into the church in a single year. Soon after that a costly and elegant house of worship was erected. His success in the administration of the affairs of the college is already showing him to be well suited to his present position.

Phillips, James, D. D., was born at Nevendon, Essex, England, April 22d, 1792, and was the son of Rev. Richard Phillips, a minister of the Church of England. He came to America in 1818, and opened a school in Harlem, N. Y., where his learning and talents soon secured a lucrative patronage. He soon became a member of a New York mathematical club, a correspondent of a mathematical journal, and the associate of the distinguished mathematicians of the day. From this position he was invited to the Chair of Mathematics in the University of North Carolina, whither he went in 1826. Here he began his course of forty-one years' labors, with President Caldwell, Dr. Mitchell, Dr. Hooper, Prof. Andrews, the lexicographer, and Prof. Hentz, as co-laborers. These early years were years of close study and singular devotion to duty with the young Professor. He was an inexorable mathematical reasoner, requiring every step to be fairly made and supported by indubitable proof. He projected a complete course of mathematical studies, and prepared treatises on Algebra, Geometry, Trigonometry, Differential and Integral Calculus, Conic Sections, and Natural Philosophy. The treatise on Conic Sections alone was published, the others remain in manuscript. He trained some of the most distinguished mathematicians of the South.

Dr. Phillips was a decided Presbyterian, not by inheritance, but by intelligent choice. Becoming seriously impressed under the preaching of Dr. Asa Nettleton, he professed Christ, and at once began an active Christian life. He devoted much time to the study of theology, and began holding religious meetings and lecturing. Dr. McPheeters, of Raleigh, one day told him that the Presbytery must either license him or discipline him. He preferred the former alternative, and was licensed by Orange Presbytery in September, 1833, and ordained in April, 1835. For thirty years after this he preached regularly at New Hope Church, a few miles from the University. In his latter days his sermons were mines of the the subjects of his discourses. In his private intercourse with his people he never fails to prove a Christian and friend.

Phelps, Stephen, D. D., son of Myron and Adeline Phelps, was born at Lewistown, Ill., February 6th, 1839. He graduated at Jefferson College, Canonsburg, Pa., in 1859, and at the Western Theological Seminary, Allegheny, Pa., in 1862. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Ohio in 1861, and ordained by the Presbytery of Missouri River in 1863. He was in charge of the Church in Sioux City, Iowa, from June, 1862, till October, 1861. From November, 1864, till April, 1869, he was pastor at Waterloo, Iowa. After about a year's labor at Cedar Valley, and a little interruption of work, on account of impaired health, he became pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Vinton, Iowa, in October, 1871. He remained there till June 1st, 1881, most precious truth, complete structures, close logic, coupled with the softest, richest, most tremulous pathos. In prayer he was copious, fervent, elevated and unutterably solemn.

Dr. Phillips read much in theology, to the end of his life. He read large books through. At the end of Neander's History, Augustine de Civitate, Ambrose, Tholuck, Haldane, Alexander, and many others may be found his characteristic entry, "Hoc volumen perlegi." He read Henry's Commentary through.

On the morning of March 16th, 1867, he went to the chapel to conduct morning prayers, and there, behind the desk where he had officiated for forty years, he breathed out his spirit, in a painless death. "Secret of God, well done!"

Phillips, William Wirt, D.D., was born in Florida, Montgomery county, N. Y., September 23d, 1796. He graduated at Union College in 1813. He studied theology in the Associate Reformed Theological Seminary in New York, and in the Theological Seminary of the Reformed Dutch Church at New Brunswick, N. J. He was licensed to preach by the Classis of New Brunswick, but shortly after transferred his relation to the Presbyterian Church. In April, 1818, he was ordained and installed pastor of the Pearl Street Presbyterian Church in New York. Here he continued a most useful and acceptable pastor for eight years, when he was translated to the First Presbyterian Church, then worshipping in Wall street. This church was, in due time, removed to what was then the upper part of the city, and after the new edifice was built he continued to occupy it till near the close of his life. Though he had been for several years the subject of a painful chronic disease, he still continued actively engaged in the duties of the ministry, until within about four weeks of his death, which occurred March, 20th, 1865.

The degree of Doctor of Divinity was conferred upon Mr. Phillips by Columbia College in 1836, when he was only thirty years of age. He was a Trustee of the College of New Jersey, and also a member of the Council of the New York University. He was both a Trustee and a director of the Theological Seminary at Princeton, and of the Board of Directors he was President. He was Chairman of the Executive Committee of the Board of Foreign Missions, and, during several of his last years was President of that Board, also. He was often a member of the General Assembly, and in 1835 was its Moderator. The services devolved upon him by these various offices were numerous and onerous, but he adapted himself to each with apparently as deep an interest as if it had been the sole work to which he was designated.

Among the more prominent of the faculties of Dr. Phillips' mind was a calm and sound judgment, that rarely mistook in respect to any matter on which it was called to exercise itself. He was naturally of a quiet and retiring habit, and never obtruded himself in any circumstances, while yet he was always prompt to obey the call of duty, even at the expense of placing himself in an attitude of antagonism towards others. His religion moulded his whole character and diffused itself over his whole life. In his family his presence was constant sunshine. Among the people of his charge he moved about as a good angel, intent on carrying blessings in his train; and whether they were in sorrow or in joy, the fitting words of counsel were always upon his lips. In the pulpit there was nothing about him of a sensational or startling character, but he was a model of simplicity and fervor, and brought out the great truths of the gospel in a luminous and impressive manner. His good influence was felt, not only in every circle in which he moved, but throughout the whole Church, for Providence placed him in various responsible stations, and few of his contemporaries had more to do in moulding the destinies of the Denomination with which he was connected than himself.

Phraner, Wilson, D. D., was born in Jamaica, Queen's county, N. Y., 22d of August, 1822. At the age of fifteen he went to the city of New York, to enter upon a business career, but soon determined to seek an education, and at the age of eighteen entered the Grammar School of the University of the City of New York. He was graduated at the University in 1847, and entering the Union Theological Seminary completed the course of study pursued in that Institution in 1850. In June, 1851, Mr. Phraner was called to the pastorate of the Presbyterian Church of Sing Sing, Westchester county, N. Y., a pastorate that has continued to the present time (1883). In 1878 Mr. Phraner received the honorary degree of Doctor of Divinity from his Alma Mater, New York University. During a long and laborious ministry, the congregation which he has served for more than thirty-two years has been built up, and provided with a large and commodious house of worship; it is now one of the most active and influential churches in the vicinity of the city of New York. While thus faithful to his pastoral charge, Dr. Phraner has been indefatigable as a presbyter in the service of the Church at large, and has taken a prominent part, especially since the reunion, in the councils of Presbytery, Synod and General Assembly, where his earnest spirit and excellent judgment are recognized and highly valued. Our Church has few ministers more devoted, efficient, and successful.

Pierce, Rev. John J., was born in Vermont, in 1791. He graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1820, and at Princeton Seminary in 1823. He was licensed by New Brunswick Presbytery, and entered upon the service of his Master at Portsmouth, Va., where he remained until 1824, when he left for Clarksville, Tenn. In 1825 he was elected President of an Academy in Elkton, Ky., and became a member of Mecklenberg Presbytery. This position he held until 1837. Soon afterward he occupied temporarily the place of one of the Professors in Centre College, his design being to return to Elkton, Ky. He left Elkton and spent two years in teaching in Illinois and Missouri. On his return he took charge of a large Methodist church, where he continued to labor until his death, March 18th, 1861. Mr. Pierson was one of the Church's highest ministers; a practical, high-spirited, God-trusting man, for whom it could be said, "to live was Christ, and to die was gain." He did not care for riches, but they did not distress him. While on the journey he had his perfect work. As the key to all this contentment, he remarked to a friend that in his early ministry he heard a discourse from Dr. Archibald Alexander, on the text, "Seek ye first the great things for the self; seek them not." It changed the whole course of his views of the ministry and the great object of labor; extinguished ambition and he determined just to serve God in his appointed work, never seeking to gratify his own wishes in self-promotion or interest, calmly receiving his allotment from God.

Pierson, Arthur Tappan, D.D., son of Stephen H. and Sally Ann Pierson, was born in the city of New York, March 6th, 1837; received his preparatory education in New York city and in schools of Tarrytown and Sing Sing, N. Y.; was graduated from Hamilton College in 1857; was received to the full communion of the Thirteenth Street Presbyterian Church, New York city, at the age of fifteen years; pursued his theological studies at Union Theological Seminary, N. Y.; was licensed by the Third Presbytery of New York, April 16th, 1860; was ordained as an evangelist by the same Presbytery May 14th, 1860; was installed pastor of the Congregational Church at Binghamton, N. Y., September, 1860; was dismissed from that charge, April, 1860; was installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Waterford, N. Y., October 6th, 1860; was dismissed from pastoral charge, March 14th, 1860; was installed pastor of the Fort Street Presbyterian Church, Detroit, Mich., May 5th, 1860; was dismissed September 11th, 1860; installed pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church of Indianapolis, Ind., November 1st, 1860, and dismissed from that charge, June 27th, 1861. From Indianapolis he removed to Philadelphia to take the pastoral charge of Bethany Presbyterian Church, after which he was installed November 25th, 1861. In all his pastoral charges Dr. Pierson has regarded himself as an able minister of Christ, and as a devout preacher, a faithful, kind and sympathetic pastor. During his pastorate in Detroit his church was burned, in 1876. Services were held for seven months in the Opera House, God blessing them by the unobscured presence of His Spirit, in converting power. Dr. Pierson preaches extempore, without manuscript, and his preparation for the pulpit was only a skimming of outlines. He has followed this method exclusively since the burning of his church in 1876, from conviction that in this manner the gospel is likely to be preached more effectively, even if with less rhetorical elaboration and elegance. Dr. Pierson has published no books, but several pamphlets on Foreign Missions and kindred topics, besides numerous articles in reviews, magazines, religious and secular papers, on various topics pertaining to science, art, literature, history and religious life. He received the degree of D.D. from Knox College in 1874.

Pierson, Hamilton Wilcox, D.D., was born in Berren, N. Y., the son of a Presbyterian minister, September 29d, 1817. He was graduated from Union College in 1840, and from Union Theological Seminary, New York City, in 1848. His purpose was to go upon a foreign mission, Africa being his chosen field. But at this juncture he was attacked by severe hemorrhages from the lungs, which broke up his plans. He took an agency for the American Bible Society to the West Indies, during 1849 and 1850, and then represented the A. B. C. F. M. as its agent in New York. From 1853 to 1858 he labored with zeal and success in the Bible cause in Kentucky, and in 1858 accepted the Presidency of Cumberland College, Princeton, Ky. After 1861, he again resumed a more open-air life, serving the American Tract Society, and the Christian Commission, and lecturing as his health permitted.

Dr. Pierson's life has been a constant struggle with pain and physical weakness, the flight of a bird with crippled wing, yet it has been full of useful labors. It has never been sad or despondent. His face has ever been towards the bright and joyous, as he cheerfully toiled for God and his fellow-men. He compiled and edited the "American Missionary Memorial," wrote "Jefferson at Monticello, or the Private Life of Thomas Jefferson," and, "In the Brush, or Old-Time School, Political, and Religious Life in the Southwest." He received the degree of Doctor of Divinity from Union College, in 1869.

Pierson, Rev. John, was born in 1689, and graduated at Yale, in 1711. He was ordained pastor of the Church at Woodbridge, April 29th, 1717. In 1753 he resigned his pastoral charge, and settled at Mendham, N. J., and was the minister there for ten years. Mr. Pierson published a treatise on the "Intercession of Christ," and a sermon, preached before the Presbytery of New York, May 8th, 1751, on "Christ, the Son of God, is God, Man, Mediator." He died, August 29d, 1770.

Pillsbury, Rev. Ithamar, was born in Dracont, Mass., August 2d, 1791; graduated at Yale College in 1820; studied theology in the city of New York, under the direction of Rev. Drs. Spring and Baldwin, and was licensed to the Presbytery of New York, June 19th, 1825. At the same time he labored as a city missionary in New York and Boston. He was supply of the Church of Southtown, Long Island, from September, 1827, to April, 1830, when he became his pastor, and continued to be so until 1833. His labors in this field were greatly blessed. He was a traveling agent for the American Sunday-school Union until May 1st, 1834, and then supplied the Church at Sag Harbor, N. Y., for one year. From this point, Mr. Pillsbury became identified with the West, where he organized fourteen churches and assisted at the organization of several others, some of them from fifty to one hundred miles distant. He was installed pastor of the Church at Andover, Ill., April 17th, 1841, to which he ministered with diligence and a good measure of success, until 1849. From May 22d, 1850, he labored with the same diligence and success until 1854, when his pastoral relation was dissolved, that he might take charge of McDonough College, at Macomb. He died, April 20th, 1862. Mr. Pillsbury was a prudent and wise counsellor, a sincere and constant friend, and an able and faithful minister of the New Testament.

Pinkerton, Rev. John, was born near Sadsburyville, Chester county, Pa., in November, 1811. When he was about six years of age, the family changed their residence, and located in the bounds of the Brandywine Manor congregation, of which the Rev. J. N. C. Grier was pastor. After graduating at college and studying theology, he went to Eastern Virginia. In 1849 he went to Union, Maroe county, to aid the Rev. Samuel R. Houston in teaching and preaching. He was licensed by the Greenbrier Presbytery, in October, 1849, from which time he preached regularly every Sabbath at some one of the points belonging to Mr. Houston's charge, until called to Mossy Creek Church, of which he was installed pastor, November 5th, 1853, retaining this relation until his death, which occurred May 31st, 1871.

As a companion, no one was more courteous, kind, and accommodating, than Mr. Pinkerton. As a preacher, his labors were very acceptable wherever he went. His sermons were wisely constructed, logical, earnest, and faithful. He evidently had no other purpose or desire but to declare the whole counsel of God. As a speaker, he was attractive, persuasive, and often very impressive. As a pastor, he magnified his office. When on his death-bed, a ministerial friend having asked him if he had any message for his congregation, his response was, "Tell them to live near the Lord."

Pinney, John Brooke, LL.D., son of Elijah and Margaret (Langford) Pinney, was born in Baltimore, Md., December 25th, 1806; was graduated from the University of Georgia, August, 1828; studied law while pursuing his college course, and was admitted to practice in the Supreme Court of Georgia, in 1828; taught one year in Waterboro, S. C.; entered Princeton Seminary in 1829, and having completed the full course, was regularly graduated in 1832. He was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, April 25th, 1832; was ordained as an evangelist by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, October 12th, 1832, having been appointed a Missionary to Africa by the Western Foreign Missionary Society; was appointed by the American Colonization Society "to act as Agent" of the American Colony at Liberia until the arrival of a permanent Agent, October 24th, 1833; and was appointed Agent, April 17th, 1834.

Mr. Pinney remained in Liberia until 1837. After his return, he was Corresponding Secretary of the Pennsylvania Colonization Society, residing in Pittsburgh and Philadelphia, from 1837 to 1847; was installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Washington, Pa., by the Presbytery of Washington, June 1st, 1847, and released, April 20th, 1848; was Corresponding Secretary of the New York State Colonization Society, from 1848 to 1863. In 1866 he went to Nevada, where he remained until 1869, engaged in mining and agricultural operations. A few years later, on the reorganization of the New York State Colonization Society, he was again appointed its Corresponding Secretary, and continued in that office until his death. He was a man of almost singular devotion to his work, of indomitable energy of character, and indefatigable in labor. He had worn himself out long before his end came; but in the intervals of his struggles with disease and infirmity, he continued to do his utmost to the last. His whole life was devoted to the Negro race, and especially to African colonization. Seven times he crossed the ocean, to Africa, once or twice after the failure of his health, to promote the interests of Liberia. He died at his residence, near Ocala, Florida, whither he had gone a few months before, on his seventy-seventh birthday, December 25th, 1882. He was buried under the shade of the oaks, near his house, six black men acting as pall-bearers.

Pitzer, Alexander W., D. D., was born September 14th, 1834, in Salem, Roanoke county, Va. He studied at Virginia Collegiate Institute (now Roanoke College); afterwards at Hampden-Sidney College; where he graduated, as Valedictorian of his class, in 1854. He studied theology one year at Union Theological Seminary, Virginia, and two years at Danville, Ky.; was licensed by Montgomery Presbytery, September 5th, 1856; preached in Leavenworth, Kansas, in 1857; was ordained to be pastor of the First Church, Leavenworth, in April, 1858, and remained in this relation until 1861, when he returned to Virginia. Subsequently he supplied the churches of Sparta and Mt. Zion, in Georgia, and then preached at Cave Spring and Liberty, Va., until the end of 1867, when he began to labor as an evangelist in Washington City, D. C. Here he organized the Central Church, May 31st, 1868, of which he continues to be the pastor (1883).

Dr. Pitzer has been Stated Clerk of Chesapeake Presbytery since 1873; President of the Washington Bible Society since 1874, and Professor of Biblical Literature and Moral Science in Howard University since 1876. He has published "Evo Deus Homo."

"Christ the Teacher of Men," and "The New Life, not the Higher Life." He has also contributed articles to the Southern Presbyterian, Southern and North American Reviews, to the Catholic Presbyterian, and frequently to the Church papers. He was a member of the Prophetic Conference in New York in 1878, and assisted in drafting and reported the doctrinal testimony adopted by the conference. He has twice sat in the General Assembly, and bore a prominent part in the establishment of fraternal relations between the Northern and Southern Assemblies. His published works indicate the character of his preaching, which is that of clear, full, strong and simple statement of gospel truth.

Plumer, William Swan, D. D., LL.D., justly ranks among the great and good men of the Church to which the labors of his life were devoted. He was born July 26th, 1802, at Griersburg (now Darlington), Beaver county, Pa. After graduating at Washington College, Va., he entered Princeton Seminary, becoming a member of the class matriculated in 1821-5. He was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, June 14th, 1826, and was ordained an evangelist by the Presbytery of Orange, May 19th, 1827.

From September, 1826, to June, 1829, he was employed as an evangelist, in Southern Virginia and North Carolina. During this time he spent ten months and a half at Danville, and organized the Presbyterian Church there, and eleven months in Warrenton, N. C., where he also organized a Church. In June, 1829, he became stated supply of Briery Church, Va., where he labored sixteen months. He was pastor of the Tabb Street Church, Petersburg, Va., from July 10th, 1831, until September 19th, 1834; pastor of the first Church of Richmond, Va., from October 19th, 1834, until November 3d, 1846; and pastor of the Franklin Street Church, Baltimore, Md., from April 25th, 1847, until September 10th, 1851. His next pastoral charge was that of the Central Church at Allegheny, Pa., which continued from January 17th, 1855, until September 19th, 1862. After an interval of three years he was installed pastor of the Second Church of Pottsville, Pa., November 19th, 1865, and continued in this relation until January 2d, 1867. In January, 1867, he began to reside at Columbia, S. C., preaching, while a Professor in the Seminary, extensively in that and adjacent States.

In 1837 Dr. Plumer founded, and for eight years was sole editor and proprietor of, The Watchman of the South, in Richmond, Va. In 1838 he was largely instrumental in founding the Institution for the Blind and Deaf and Dumb, in Staunton, Va. In 1851 he was elected Professor of Didactic and Pastoral Theology in the Western Theological Seminary, at Allegheny, Pa., which post he filled until 1862. In 1862 he was elected Professor of Didactic and Polemic Theology in the Theological Seminary at Columbia, S. C., and filled that chair until 1875, when, at his own suggestion, he was transferred to the Chair of Historic, Casuistic and Pastoral Theology in the same Institution, and retained that position until 1880, when, a few months before his death, the Seminary was closed, from a lack of funds.

Dr. Plumer was a very voluminous author. His works amounted to over twenty-five volumes, besides a very large number of tracts, sermons, leaflets, etc. In 1838 he was Moderator of the General Assembly (O. S.), and in 1871 Moderator of the General Assembly (Southern). His life was one of great earnestness and usefulness. As a pastor, preacher, professor, author and Christian, he was eminent. His tall and erect form, white hair, beaming eye, expressive countenance, and deep and sonorous voice, added greatly to the impressiveness of his Scriptural, instructive, experimental, searching, and, at times, impassioned preaching. As he advanced in years, his mental powers seemed to brighten and mellow, and he never ceased his varied and active labors until he was called to bid farewell to earth. He died in Baltimore, Md., October 22d, 1880, in the seventy-ninth year of his age. His end was a glorious triumph of faith. His utterances were full of faith in Christ, of love for Him, and of confident and joyful hope.

Pole Green and Samuel Davies Church. In Hanover county, Va., ten miles from the city of Richmond, and a few rods from the main road, more than a hundred years ago, stood Pole Green Church. It was built not later than the year 1756, on a piece of land about three acres in size, given to the church by a Mr. Whitlocke, who resided in the neighborhood. It was one of the first Presbyterian churches planted in the State of Virginia; Makemie Church, in Accomac county, it is said, was the first.

The origin of the name, Pole Green, is not very clear. A small stream, called Pole Green branch or run, is near the spot. Pole Green Spring and Pole Green Hill are known localities near by, but it is uncertain whether the church derived its name from one of these, or gave its name to them. If a stranger, unacquainted with the history of this church and the interesting associations connected with it, had attended preaching there for the first time on a Sabbath in the Summer, fifty years ago, he would, probably, have seen nothing particularly to attract his attention about the exterior of the house, a plain, unpretending building of wood, rather antiquated, but yet showing no marks of decay. He might, it is true, have remarked the cool, pleasant and refreshing shade of the large and venerable oak, and other forest trees, in the churchyard, and a well beaten path leading from near the church door to the rear of the house, along which many of the congregation were passing before the public services commenced. This path led to a bold, clear and cool spring of water, a few yards from the church, Pole Green Spring.

He would have seen, within the house, as was usual in country churches built during the previous century, large, high-backed, family pews, with seats facing, and also with the backs towards the preacher; he would have seen a wide, heavy gallery extending along one broad side and the two ends of the building, a part of which gallery was set apart exclusively for the use of the colored people, and filled to its utmost capacity with that class of the population; a pulpit on the side of the house, with its high and narrow desk for the Bible, and with the sounding board away up over the preacher's head; and his attention would have been drawn and his curiosity excited by seeing on a board at the back of the preacher the large but not very artistically formed letters, S. D., and beneath them the figures 1756, the handiwork, it is said, of the mechanic who built the house. This was the condition of Pole Green Church, and the appearance of things around it, fifty years ago. It may not be uninteresting here to mention, that not more than half a mile from the church in a northwesterly direction, the road crosses Totopotomoy Creek, and a short distance beyond there is a very remarkably steep hill. It was customary for all persons, except the aged and infirm, returning from church, to walk up this hill; and it was said that even the horses acquired the habit of stopping of their own accord at the foot of the hill, to put off a part of their load. This was called Pole Green Hill.

The Rev. Samuel Davies was the first settled pastor of Pole Green Church, and the house there was built for him to preach in. When he came to the county, preaching and religious meetings were held by him, at first, in private houses, Presbyterianism being little known and but lightly thought of, the established church in the country being that of the Church of England. Soon, however, by his great learning and eloquence, and his ardent and devoted piety, a wonderfully deep and marked impression was made upon those who knew and heard him, and it was not long before a Presbyterian church was organized at Pole Green, embracing as members many of the most intelligent and influential individuals in the community. The parents of the Rev. Wm. S. White, D. D., so widely known throughout the Presbyterian church, were members of the congregation, and attended regularly the preaching of Mr. Davies, at Pole Green. The letters S. D. upon the pulpit, which have been mentioned before, were the initials of Samuel Davies' name, and so long as they continued in that conspicuous place, no doubt, served to keep fresh in remembrance the name and character of that eminent and devoted minister of the gospel. Strangers and children in the congregation just old enough to notice such things, would have their attention drawn to them, and be led to inquire their meaning, and who S. D. was. The connection of Mr. Davies with Pole Green Church as pastor, lasted but a few years. He removed to Princeton, N. J., in the year 1759, and died there February 4th, 1761.

It has often been asked who succeeded him as pastor. The probability is, that a Mr. Maccanley was the successor of Mr. Davies. It is much to be regretted that the Sessional records of early years of Pole Green Church cannot be found; much interesting and reliable information as to the condition and history of the church, which they only could supply, is thus lost. About the year 1785 the Rev. John D. Blair "was introduced into the ministry by the Presbytery of Hanover, and inducted to the pastoral charge of Pole Green Church." About thirty years before his death, which took place in 1823, he removed to the city of Richmond, but continued to supply the church in Hanover, until a short time before his death. He was beloved, respected, and looked upon as a good man by all who knew him. Many of his descendants are still living in Richmond, and Professor Blair, of Hampden-Sidney, was one of his grandsons.

In 1829 Pole Green and Salem churches were united, constituting one organization, with the name of Pole Green and Salem Church. Salem, distant five miles from Pole Green, was built by the congregation which worshiped at Hanover Town under the pastoral charge of the Rev. Jesse H. Turner. The names of ministers who have supplied the church thus united are Messrs. Smith, Davis, Osborn, Adams and Hooper, successively, until 1863, when Mr. Hooper resigned his charge. In 1832 there were fifty-four members on the roll of the church; in 1863, one hundred and seven. About thirty years ago the building at Pole Green needed repairs. Many alterations were made in the interior of the house, giving to it a neat, comfortable and modernized appearance. The family pews and the gallery were taken down, and the pulpit, with its sounding board, shared the same fate. Only one part of a plank of the old pulpit in which Samuel Davies had formerly preached with so much earnestness and eloquence was saved, and is now in possession of, and carefully preserved as a highly valued relic by, one of the ruling elders of the church. This is the only piece, the only fragment, of Old Pole Green house now remaining. In 1861, during a sharp and desperate fight between Confederate and Federal forces, the house was set on fire and totally consumed. It has not been rebuilt. The ground remains unoccupied by Presbyterians, and it does seem that it will not be long before the name of Pole Green Church will cease to be known, except as belonging to that which once was. In 1872 the churches of Pole Green, Salem and Bethlehem (which had been supplied since 1865 by Rev. George H. Denny) were united, under the name of Samuel Davies Church, with the Rev. William N. Scott pastor.

Polk, James Knox, Ex-President of the United States, was born in North Carolina, 1795. After an honorable university course he became a member of the Tennessee Bar, in 1820, and pursued his professional career with such success that he was soon marked out by his countrymen for the highest services at their command. In 1825 he was elected to Congress, where he became conspicuous for firmness, regularity and assiduity, and after sitting in Congress fourteen years, two or three of which he was Speaker, he was elected President of the Federal Republic, in 1844. His administration was distinguished by various important events bearing on the fortunes of the country. By the annexation of Texas and California he extended the boundaries of his country; he labored to organize the National Treasury on the principles of the Constitution, and introduced into the government many financial and commercial improvements. He died in 1849. President Polk was a warm friend of the Presbyterian Church, of which his now aged and venerable widow long has been and still is an exemplary and useful member.

Pollock, Hon. James, LL. D., was born at Milton, Northumberland county, Pa., September 11th, 1810. His early education was committed to the care of the Rev. David Kirkpatrick, who had charge of the classical academy at Milton. He graduated at Princeton, N. J., September, 1831; in 1835 he received the degree of A. M. in course, and in 1855 the honorary degree of LL. D. was conferred upon him. Jefferson College conferred a like honor in 1857. In November, 1833, he was admitted to the Bar; in 1835 appointed District Attorney for Northumberland county; from 1843 to 1849 served as a member of Congress, where he acted a conspicuous part; in 1850 was appointed President Judge of the eighth judicial district; and in 1855 was chosen

Governor of Pennsylvania by a large majority. By the Act of the 16th of May, 1857, the main line of the public works of the State was directed to be sold. On the 25th of June, following, Governor Pollock caused the same to be done; and on the 31st day of July the whole line of the public works between Philadelphia and Pittsburg was transferred to the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, at the price of seven millions five hundred thousand dollars. Following this sale, measures were taken for the disposal of the remaining divisions of the public improvements. They had failed to be a source of revenue to the State, and the application of the proceeds to the payment of the debt of the Commonwealth soon led to the removal of taxation by the State.

HON. JAMES POLLOCK, LL. D.

In the Summer of this year (1857) a serious financial revulsion occurred, resulting in the suspension of specie payments by the banks of Pennsylvania and other States of the Union, followed by the failure of many long-established commercial houses and the general prostration of business. In order to release the banks from the penalties and forfeitures incurred by a suspension of specie payments, Governor Pollock convened the Legislature in "extraordinary session" on the 6th of October. On the 13th an act was passed "providing for the resumption of specie payments by the banks, and for the relief of debtors," to go into immediate effect. This law had the desired result, and public confidence being restored, the different branches of industry revived, and the community was saved from bankruptcy and ruin.

In the so-called Compromise Convention, assembled at Washington, in February and March, 1861, Governor Pollock represented Pennsylvania. From 1861 to 1866 he filled the office of Director of the United States Mint, under the appointment of President Lincoln, with great fidelity and ability. In 1869 he was reinstated, by President Grant, in the same position. He was subsequently Naval Officer at Philadelphia, under the appointment of the Government, until July, 1883.

Governor Pollock is a gentleman of genial disposition, vigorous intellect, and unimpeachable character. He is an earnest and exemplary Christian, and has long been a faithful and honored elder in the West Arch Street Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, in which he has a large and flourishing Bible class. He is a popular and forcible speaker, and has frequent calls to take part in literary and religious celebrations, to which he cheerfully responds. He is highly esteemed by the community, and exerts a steady and strong influence, by aiding every charitable and Christian enterprise.

Pomeroy, Charles S., D.D., is a native of Brooklyn, N. Y., the son of an elder in the First Presbyterian Church in that city. At the age of twenty years he graduated at Columbia College, and then entered mercantile life, in partnership with his father. Three years later he was converted to God, and then pursued a theological course in Union Seminary. He was ordained and installed the first pastor of the Ross street Presbyterian Church, in Brooklyn, where he remained for nine years, the church meanwhile having increased its membership from forty to four hundred. In 1873 he accepted a call to the Second Presbyterian Church in Cleveland, where for ten years he has been a beloved and successful pastor. In these years six hundred members have been added to the church, and a new house of worship erected, at an expense of $160,000.

Dr. Pomeroy, now well along in the forties, is, in person, of medium height, strongly built, with a countenance expressive of intelligence, animation and good-will. He is distinguished for high scholarship in the classics, and especially in science and art. As a theologian, he is eminently evangelical, and in full accord with Presbyterian Standards. While he thoroughly studies the important questions which arise in regard to revelation and man's future destiny, his faith is never shaken in regard to the plain teachings of God's Word. As a preacher, he is characterized by thoroughness in preparation and impressive eloquence in delivery. While free from mere sensationalism, there are few preachers who so well draw and hold the attention of hearers. He finds the years spent in business life and his acquaintance with science and art of great value to him in illustrating gospel truths. In social life his manners are attractive and pleasing.

Pomeroy, Rev. John Jay, son of Hon. Thomas Pomeroy, was born in Roxbury, Pa., September 8th, 1831. He graduated at Lafayette College in 1857, and after teaching for a time, studied theology at Princeton Seminary. He was ordained by the Presbytery of Lewes, November 28th, 1861. He was pastor at Dover, Del., 1861-2; stated supply at Mechanicsburg, Pa., 1864; pastor at Upper Octorara, Pa., 1865-75, and since the latter date has been pastor of the first Church, Rahway, N. J. Mr. Pomeroy is an excellent and successful preacher, a faithful pastor, and a wise and judicious Presbyterian. He is a gentleman of winning address, and has enjoyed the confidence and affection of the congregations of which he has had charge. He is the brother of the Rev. Stephen Wilson Pomeroy, who has labored with acceptance and success at Harrisburg, McConnellsburg, Green Hill and Wells Valley, Newton Hamilton and Mt. Union, Pa., and since 1878, has been the popular and efficient pastor of Mt. Union and Shirleysburg, Pa.

Pomeroy, Hon. Joseph, was born in Lurgan Township, Franklin county, Pa., October 18th, 1801. After being clerk in a store at Shippensburg, Pa., in 1826 he commenced business on his own account at Concord, Franklin county, Pa., and continued the same for twenty-five years. In April, 1851, he removed to Academia, Juniata county, where he had previously acquired considerable property, and where he resided until his death, conducting a large business in merchandizing, tanning, milling and farming. In 1867 he was elected President of the Juniata Valley Bank, Mifflintown. In 1881 he was elected to the State Legislature as representative from Franklin county, and in 1881 Associate Judge of Juniata county. Judge Pomeroy was a man of extraordinary enterprise and energy, of firm convictions and great tenacity of purpose, combining with strong common sense good judgment and excellent address. He was a member and a liberal supporter of the Presbyterian Church at Academia.

Poor, Daniel W., D.D., son of the Rev. Daniel Poor, D.D., and Susan B. Poor, was born in Tillipally, Ceylon, August 21st, 1818. He came to America in 1830, fitted for college at Hopkins Academy, Hadley, Mass., and entered Amherst College in 1833, and Andover Theological Seminary in 1837. He was ordained at Faithaven, Mass., March 1st, 1843, and remained pastor until 1849. He went to Newark, N. J., in June, 1849, and organized the High Street Presbyterian Church, over which he continued as pastor until 1869. During this period he was largely instrumental in building up German churches in connection with the Presbytery, and in founding the German Theological School now at Bloomfield. He became one of the editors of Lange's Commentary. In 1869 he was called to the First Presbyterian Church at Oakland, California, and continued pastor until 1872, when he accepted the Professorship of Ecclesiastical History and Church Government in the San Francisco Theological Seminary, and filled the Chair until 1876. That year he was elected Corresponding Secretary of the Board of Education of the Presbyterian Church, stationed at Philadelphia, and has remained such ever since. The degree of D.D. was conferred upon him by Princeton College in 1857.

Dr. Poor is a gentleman of genial disposition and winning address. His pulpit ability is of a high order, his sermons being scriptural, logical, instructive, clothed in pure style and delivered with dignity and force. He is a writer of decided ability, and a scholar of varied and large attainments. His ministry has been eminently blessed. Under his earnest and judicious activity the Board of Education has attained a gratifying degree of prosperity. Throughout the Church he is much esteemed for his character and usefulness.

Porter, Rev. Francis H., of the Presbytery of South Carolina, joined the Presbytery of South Alabama in 1828. It is said, however, that he visited Alabama as early as 1818, and held a two days' meeting and administered the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper under a large oak of the aged William Morrison, and again in 1821, and held a similar meeting near the house of David Russell, Sr., long one of the venerable fathers of the Valley Creek Church. To these meetings parents carried their children, a distance of thirty miles, to have them baptized. It is also stated that during this visit he assisted the Rev. Mr. Brown in organizing the New Hope Church, in Greene county. He labored in various parts of the bounds of Presbytery, both as an instructor of youth and a preacher of the gospel. The Presbytery of Tuskalooosa, in their notice of Mr.

Porter's demise, refer to him "as one with whom they had often taken sweet counsel, on whose sound and enlightened judgment, and in whose orthodox and Scriptural views on all important subjects, they could rely with implicit confidence."

Porter, Hon. Peter Buel, son of Judge Augustus Porter, and nephew of General Peter B. Porter, was born at Canandaigua, N. Y., March 17th, 1806. He graduated at Hamilton College in 1826; studied law and commenced practice in Buffalo. His father was the pioneer citizen of Niagara Falls, and in connection with his uncle, a large land proprietor there. In 1837 Mr. Porter removed his residence to the wondrous scenery of his father's home, and remained there until his death, June 15th, 1871. In 1840, and again in 1841, he represented his district in the Lower House of the State Legislature, and in the latter year was chosen Speaker. Of fine gifts, improved by the best of associations and opportunities, and with intellectual tastes, he was qualified for professional and civil prominence, but preferred the seclusion of private life, and spent most of his days in the labors and deeds of a useful citizen and Christian, surrounded, not by the display of ambitions and pretentious wealth, but with the objects which intelligence, refinement and the love of learning, literature and art gather in the home of a true gentleman. He was not only a church member and a ruling elder, but a true, active and charitable Christian. In the disposal of his estate, he assigned $5000 as a permanent fund for the library of Hamilton College.

Porter, Rev. Samuel, was born in Ireland, June 11th, 1760, of pious parents, belonging to the Reformed Presbyterian Church, commonly called Covenanters. He emigrated to this country in 1783, spending the first winter after his arrival, in the vicinity of Mercersburg, Pa. The next year he removed to Washington county, Pa., and united with the Presbyterian Church. His studies, with a view to preparation for the ministry, were prosecuted under the direction of several ministers, and he was licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of Redstone, November 12th, 1789. On September 22d, 1790, he was installed pastor of the congregations of Poke Run and Congruity, in which he labored till April 11th, 1798, when, on account of ill health, and against the earnest remonstrance of the people, he was released from Poke Run, Congruity agreeing to take the whole of his time. He continued the pastor of this congregation until the time of his death, September 23d, 1825.

Mr. Porter was held in high esteem by his brethren of the ministry, as a man of undoubted piety and vigorous talents. He was a bold, original, and independent thinker, distinguished for his controversial talent and ready wit. He appeared to particular advantage in the judicatories of the Church, in which he exerted a commanding influence. He was a very acceptable preacher, had a clear, musical voice, and had great power over an audience, sometimes exciting in them the most pleasurable emotions, at others melting them to tears.

Posture in Prayer. Standing was the usual posture among the Jews (1 Sam. i, 26; 1 Kings viii, 22; Luke xviii, 11), or kneeling (1 Kings viii, 34; 2 Chron. vi, 13; Ezra ix, 5; Dan. vi, 10; Luke xxii, 41); in both cases with the hands lifted up (Ps. xxviii, 2; cxxxiv, 2; Lam. ii, 19; iii, 41), or spread out towards heaven (Ezra ix, 5; Isai. i, 15). In cases of deep contrition the hands might be employed to smite on the breast (Luke xviii, 13); under the burden of anxiety or grief the head might sink on the breast (Ps. xxxv, 12), or be buried between the knees (1 Kings xviii, 42); and even, under the influence of deep emotion, the whole body might be prostrated on the ground (Gen. xxiv, 26; Ex. xxxiv, 8; Neh. viii, 6). Standing in public prayer is still the practice of the Jews. This posture was adopted from the synagogue by the primitive Christians, and is still maintained by the Oriental churches. It was the custom in the earliest times of Christianity to pray standing, with the hands extended and slightly raised towards heaven, and with the face turned towards the east. Exceptions may no doubt be cited, even from the New Testament, but that this was the most common attitude is evident from the testimony of primitive monuments, frescoes, sarcophagi, sepulchral monuments, ancient glass, mosaics in the earliest basilicas; above all, the Roman catacombs exhibit the faithful, more especially women, praying in this attitude.

Each of the postures named, standing and kneeling, has its own peculiar appropriateness. Either is a seemly and Scriptural method of bringing the position of the body into significant harmony with the desire of the soul. The custom of sitting in prayer, which has come to prevail so extensively in many of the churches of our country, is of comparatively recent origin. Some years ago the Puritan Recorder, of Boston, said: "As far as our observation and recollection serve us, the new custom came in with the new measures" that were introduced into New England by Mr. Finney. We never saw or heard of a New England congregation sitting in prayer till we saw it in Boston, at the time when Mr. Finney was carrying forward his revival measures, in 1831. And then we had and ever since have had the impression that the practice came in with him—whether by his recommendation, we cannot say." Many other persons concur with the Recorder in the opinion expressed.

But whatever may have been the origin or the object of the innovation, it certainly is a matter for regret. It has not any warrant in Scripture. True, in 1 Chron. xvii, 16, we are told that "David, the king, came and sat before the Lord," and in that posture gave utterance to eloquent prayer, or rather thanksgiving, which the sequel of the chapter contains. It must be remembered, however, that there is a mode of sitting in the east very different from ours, which is highly respectful, and even reverential, and in which the person first kneels, and then sits back upon his heels, at the same time crossing, folding or hiding his hands in the opposite sleeves. Besides, the sitting attitude, as practiced in prayer in our day, is far less solemn, impressive and reverential than the other postures already named. "Standing and kneeling," says Burkitt, "are praying postures, but sitting is a rude indecency, except in cases of necessity." "In prayer," says Bishop Hall, "I will either stand as a servant to my Master, or kneel as a subject to my Prince." "The usages of our fathers in the house of God," said the good and wise Dr. Van Rensselaer, in his Presbyterian Magazine, "ought to be retained, for these four reasons, if for no others: They are good usages. They are characteristic of our church. Change leads, we know not where. Many devout people are always annoyed at needless innovations."

Potter, Ludlow Day, D.D., the son of Major Jotham and Phebe Potter, was born at New Providence, N. J., January 3d, 1823. He graduated from the College of New Jersey, Princeton, in 1841, and from the Princeton Theological Seminary in 1846. In 1847 he went to Indiana; was ordained by White Water Presbytery as an evangelist; served the Church at Brookville, Ind., as supply and pastor, from 1847 to 1853, and in the same interval, the churches of Bath and Metamora. In 1853 he took charge, by appointment of his Presbytery, of White Water Presbyterial Academy. In 1856 he joined Rev. J. G. Monfort, D.D., and Rev. S. S. Potter in the charge of Glendale Female College, near Cincinnati, Ohio. In 1865 he became President and sole proprietor of this well-known Institution, which he still continues to control. In 1873 the degree of D.D., was conferred on him by Hanover College, Indiana. The work which Dr. Potter performed, whether as pastor of a church or head of an Institution of learning, was characterized by great fidelity and thoroughness. Quiet and unobtrusive in his manners, he made friends and held them, by the solid worth of character which they discovered in him. As a preacher, his sermons were thoughtful and instructive. The great work of his life has been in connection with the Glendale College for Young Ladies. He has made a full course of Bible History, as well as Latin and Mathematics, indispensable in the securing of a diploma; and has been remarkably successful in awakening a thirst for knowledge in the minds of his pupils. The graduates of the College, scattered through the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Kentucky and Tennessee hold him in affectionate remembrance.

Potts, George, D. D., was born in Philadelphia, March 15th, 1802. He graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1819, the third in his class. After his graduation he spent a year in general studies, preparatory to entering the theological seminary. He joined the Seminary at Princeton, in 1820; was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Philadelphia in 1822, and left the seminary at the close of the regular course, in 1823. He was installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Natchez, Miss., at the close of that year, and continued there twelve years. On account of the enervating influence of the climate upon him, he found it necessary to seek a northern home. Resigning this charge, he accepted a call to the Duane Street Church, New York, and was installed as pastor in May, 1836. In 1845 he resigned the charge of the church in Duane street, and on November 25th, was installed pastor of a newly-gathered church in University Place. He continued in this connection till the close of his life. He died, September 15th, 1861.

Dr. Potts was a Director of the Theological Seminary at Princeton, and a member of the Council of the New York University. He never aspired to anything in the way of authorship, having published only a few occasional sermons and addresses. As a preacher, he was undoubtedly regarded as one of the most attractive of his day. His voice was full and clear; his utterance distinct and impressive; his gestures simple and graceful; and the manifest promptings of nature and his whole manner such as were best fitted to give effect to the momentous truths he proclaimed. There was in his preaching a happy admixture of the doctrinal and the practical. He never felt that he had done with any truth that he presented until he had not only shown its intellectual bearing, but had brought it into contact with the conscience and the heart. Though his sermons were generally written, he accustomed himself, especially during his latter years, to extemporaneous speaking; and he has been heard to say that he had more freedom and comfort in this mode of preaching than any other. The interests of his congregation seemed always uppermost in his thoughts. His pastoral visits were a source of mutual enjoyment to him and his people, and those who were in the morning of life especially shared most largely in his watchful regards. Though his tastes were rather for a life of quietude than bustle, he was by no means destitute of executive ability, nor did he shrink from taking his share in guiding and moulding the destinies of the Church. In every relation he sustained his pure and noble spirit was impressively exemplified.

Potts, William Stephens, D. D., son of William and Mary (Gardner) Potts, was born in Northumberland county, Pa., October 13th, 1802. His father was a Quaker, and his mother of Scotch and Presbyterian descent. When the son was eight years old the family removed to Trenton, N. J. At sixteen he was sent to Philadelphia to learn the printer's trade. He worked at this some three years, during which time he became a professor of religion and determined to embrace the gospel ministry. For this he began his preparatory studies in 1822, under the superintendence of Rev. Dr. Ezra Stiles Ely. In 1825 he entered Princeton Theological Seminary. Intense application to study so impaired his health that he had to leave the seminary in November, 1827.

He was immediately licensed by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, and took a mission to the South, with instruction to make his way to St. Louis, Mo. Traveling on horseback, with all his worldly possessions in his saddle-bags, he passed through parts of Maryland, Virginia, the Carolinas, Georgia, Tennessee, Kentucky and Illinois, till May 11th, 1828, when he reached St. Louis. That was than a town of less than 5000 people, probably four-fifths of whom were of French extraction and Roman Catholic faith. There, however, he found a small Presbyterian church, which had been organized by Rev. Salmon Giddings ten years before, with only nine members; and he immediately began his ministerial work in St. Louis in connection with that church, of which he was installed pastor in October, 1828. In 1832 a powerful revival, lasting for months, visited his charge, resulting in the addition to it of 128 members. In 1835 he became President of Marion College, Mo., which post he held till the Summer of 1839, when he received and accepted a call to the pastorate of the Second Presbyterian Church of St. Louis, then a new enterprise with about sixty members, but which before his death, thirteen years afterward, became a large and powerful body.

Dr. Potts was not what men would call great in intellect, but his clear, cool, logical and well-balanced mind dealt masterfully with whatever came before it, and almost invariably led him to wise and just conclusions. But he was truly great in his unlimited consecration of all he had and all he was to the service of God. He was not a great preacher, but his holy life preached the gospel with steady and growing power. His preparations for the pulpit were conscientiously and prayerfully made, with the single and absorbing desire to win souls to Christ and build up the spiritual character of believers. His discourses were never brilliant, but they frequently blazed with earnestness. Though no orator, he was often eloquent. His constant prayer was for more of the Holy Spirit's presence and power in himself and his people. In the winters of 1842-43 and 1848-49 his church was powerfully revived and largely increased in numbers. In such seasons his whole soul was aroused, and he showed extraordinary wisdom, energy and skill in managing his church. He was eminently a man of prayer. Fearless, uncompromising and unswerving devotion to duty was a great characteristic of his life in all his relations. Always calm, self-possessed and dignified, he never diminished his power with men by exhibitions of temper, weakness, or arrogance. His influence in St. Louis and throughout Missouri grew in potency to the end of his life. In the midst of a series of special meetings of his church, seeking an outpouring of the Holy Spirit, his frail body gave way, and after protracted confinement to his bed he went to be with Jesus, on the morning of Sunday, March 28th, 1852, while the church bell was ringing for the Sabbath school to assemble.

Power, James, D. D., was born in Chester county, Pa., in 1746. He was one of the students of Princeton College who visited President Finley on his death-bed, in Philadelphia, and the affecting scene left a powerful and enduring impression on his mind. He was licensed by the Presbytery of New Castle, June 24th, 1772. The next year he traveled and preached in Virginia. In 1774 he crossed the mountains and spent three months as a missionary in Western Pennsylvania, after which he returned to the East and supplied a church in Maryland. In 1776 he was ordained and removed permanently to Western Pennsylvania, and after supplying various churches, was installed pastor of Mount Pleasant and Sewickley churches in 1779. In 1787 his connection with the Sewickley Church was dissolved, and from that time until April, 1817, he devoted himself to the Mount Pleasant Church, when, on account of age and infirmity, he gave up his charge.

Dr. Power in his conversation and manners was dignified and precise, seldom, if ever, indulging in anything like wit or levity. And yet he was sociable, and far from being morose or censorious. His voice was not loud, but remarkably clear and distinct.

His enunciation was so perfect, that the whole volume of his voice was used in conveying to his hearers the words he uttered. He always preached without notes, but his discourses were clear, methodical and evangelical. During the Revolution he lived in the midst of the Indian wars and alarms. The Church in which he preached was of logs, upon which no plane, hammer, saw nor nail were used. The windows were small openings cut in adjacent logs, and glazed with paper or white linen, oiled with hog's lard or bear's grease.

Such was one of our pioneer preachers in the West. To Dr. Power, with Thaddeus Dod and John McMillan, belongs the honor of firmly establishing the Presbyterian Church in the Western wilderness. Dr. Power died, at an advanced age, in 1830.

Pratt, Eliphaz Perkins, D. D., son of David and Julia Perkins Pratt, was born near Athens, Ohio, February 17th, 1816. He was graduated at the Ohio University, after which he spent two years in teaching at Gallatin, Tenn. Having studied theology under the tuition of Rev. Drs. W. H. McGuffey, John W. Hall, and Professor Elisha Ballantine, he was licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of Dayton, October 6th, 1841. In 1842 he received a call from the Presbyterian Church, Paris, Ky., where he was ordained in 1843, by the Harmony Presbytery, and served as stated supply ten years, with much success. In May, 1852, he was installed pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, Portsmouth, Ohio, in which relation he still continues, faithful to his charge.

A revival of religion has attended Dr. Pratt's ministrations of the gospel in Portsmouth, on an average of once in two years, in which he has been aided by pastors in the neighborhood, once by an evangelist, and chiefly by the officers and members of his own church. He has given special attention to the spiritual interests of the children and youth of his congregation, and the results have been large accessions from their number to the Church and kingdom of Christ. During the thirty years of his pastorate, not only has the membership of the church been greatly increased, but the congregation, besides large contributions for religious and charitable objects, has built a house of worship for a second church, and given it a colony of about two hundred members, now increased to nearly three hundred, under the pastoral care of the Rev. Heber A. Ketchum. Outside of his own congregation, Dr. Pratt's voice and influence have been heard and felt in behalf of Education, Temperance, and whatever is promotive of the public welfare and private good, having been ten years corresponding editor of the Christian Herald, Cincinnati, by the annual appointment of the Synod of Ohio, besides furnishing numerous other contributions to the religious press. He has also been honored with being for thirteen years a Director in Danville Theological Seminary, and twenty years a Trustee of the Western Female Seminary at Oxford, Lane Theological Seminary and Marietta College. His life has been marked by energy and usefulness.

Pratt, Captain Richard H., the oldest child of Richard and Mary (Herrick) Pratt, was born December 6th, 1810, in the town of Rushford, Alleghany county, N. Y. When five years of age his parents moved to Logansport, Ind., where he enjoyed very limited school privileges in the schools and seminary of the town, until April, 1857, when, at his own request, he was apprenticed by his mother, then a widow, to Mr. Nicholas Smith, tinner. When the war broke out, with the consent of his master, he enlisted as a soldier, and served in this capacity several years.

Being offered an appointment in the Regular Army by the Hon. Schuyler Colfax, then Speaker of the House of Representatives, Captain Pratt accepted a Second Lieutenantcy in the 10th Cavalry. He joined his Company at Fort Gibson, in June, 1867; was made First Lieutenant in the same Company July 31st, 1867, and served with his Company against the Indians until the Spring of 1875. During this time he often had command of Indian scouts, and was in charge of tribes and Indian prisoners. In the Spring of 1875 he was selected by General Sheridan and sent in charge of seventy-four Cheyenne, Arapahoe, Kiowa, and Comanche prisoners, to Florida, where they were confined in the old Spanish Fort at St. Augustine for three years. In the Spring of 1878 the prisoners were released, but twenty-two of them, having a desire for more education, were permitted to remain East. Seventeen of them were entered as pupils of Hampton Normal Institute, Va., and Captain Pratt detailed by the Secretary of War, Mr. McCrary, to bring from Dakota fifty Sioux boys and girls, and to remain in charge of them and the released prisoners. This new departure in Indian education attracted the attention of President Hayes, Secretary of Interior, Mr. Schurz, and Secretary of War, Mr. McCrary, and it was determined to enlarge the work. The old U. S. Barracks at Carlisle, Pa., were selected as the place, and Captain Pratt was detailed and authorized by Congress to take charge. The school was opened in October, 1879, with one hundred and fifty-seven pupils from tribes in the Indian Territory and Dakota. It is an industrial as well as a literary school, designed to prepare the young Indians for industrious civilized life. Captain Pratt has remained at the head of it, and it has grown, until at this date (Dec. 1883) it numbers four hundred and thirty-five pupils and represents thirty-six different tribes, and the results have been so gratifying that Congress has been encouraged to give very much more attention to the subject of Indian education everywhere, and has established several other schools of the same kind. Captain Pratt is a member of the Second Presbyterian Church, Carlisle.

Pratt, Rev. Samuel Wheeler, was born at Livonia, N. Y., September 9th, 1838. He was graduated at Williams College, Mass., in 1860, and from Auburn Theological Seminary in 1863. He was ordained at Brasher Falls, N. Y., in July, 1863; preached at that place 1863-7; at Hammonton, N. J., 1867-71; at Prattsburgh, N. Y., 1872-7; and at Campbell, N. Y., 1877-83. Mr. Pratt is painstaking and earnest as a preacher, commending the truth to the intelligence and consciences of his hearers. He has proved himself especially effective as a worker for the young, and as a Normal-class instructor in the training of Sunday-school teachers. He is an easy and graceful writer, and has employed his pen effectively in writing for the periodical press, both secular and religious, and is the author of a volume of special value and interest to parents in the training of their children, entitled "A Summer at Peace Cottage, or Talks on Home Life." Mr. Pratt has published also valuable historical discourses and other sermons. Efficient as a presbyter, he has done long and excellent service as a commissioner to Auburn Theological Seminary.

Prayer has been well defined in our Larger Catechism (Q. 178), as "an offering up of our desires unto God, in the name of Christ, by the help of His Spirit, with confession of our sins, and thankful acknowledgment of His mercies." 1. Prayer is in itself a becoming acknowledgment of the all-sufficiency of God, and of our dependence upon Him. It is His appointed means for the obtaining of both temporal and spiritual blessings. He could bless His creatures in another way, but He will be inquired of to do for them those things of which they stand in need (Ezek. xxxvi, 37). It is the act of an indigent creature, seeking relief from the fountain of mercy. A sense of want excites desire, and desire is the very essence of prayer. "One thing have I desired of the Lord," says David; "that will I seek after." Prayer without desire is like an altar without a sacrifice, or without the fire from heaven to consume it. When all our wants are supplied, prayer will be converted into praise; till then, Christians must live by prayer, and dwell at the mercy seat. God alone is able to hear and to supply their every want. The revelation which He has given of His goodness lays a foundation for our asking with confidence the blessings we need, and His ability encourages us to hope for their bestowment. "O thou that hearest prayer; unto thee shall all flesh come" (Psalm lxx, 2). 2. Prayer is a spiritual exercise, and can only be performed acceptably by the assistance of the Holy Spirit (Rom. viii, 26). "The sacrifice of the wicked is an abomination to the Lord, but the prayer of the upright is his delight." The Holy Spirit is the great agent in the world of grace; and without His special influence there is no acceptable prayer. Hence He is called the Spirit of grace and of supplication; for He it is that enables us to draw nigh unto God, filling our mouth with arguments, and teaching us to order our cause before him (Zech. xii, 10). 3. All acceptable prayer must be offered in faith, or a believing frame of mind. "If any man lack wisdom, let him ask of God, who giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not, and it shall be given him. But let him ask in faith, nothing wavering, for let not the wavering man think that he shall receive anything of the Lord" (James i, 5-7). "He that cometh unto God must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him" (Heb. xi, 6). It must be offered in the name of Christ, believing in Him as revealed in the word of God, placing in Him all our hope of acceptance, and exercising unfeigned confidence in His atoning sacrifice and prevalent intercession. 4. Prayer is to be offered for "things agreeable to the will of God." So the Apostle says: "This is the confidence that we have in him, that, if we ask anything according to his will, he heareth us; and if we know that he hear us whatsoever we ask, we know that we have the petitions that we desired of him" (1 John v, 14, 15). Our prayers must therefore be regulated by the revealed will of God, and come within the compass of the promises. These are to be the matter and the ground of our supplications. What God has not particularly promised He may, nevertheless, possibly bestow; but what He has promised He will assuredly perform. Of the good things promised to Israel of old, not one failed, but all came to pass; and in due time the same shall be said of all the rest. 5. All this must be accompanied with confession of our sins, and thankful acknowledgment of God's mercies. These are two necessary ingredients in acceptable prayer. "I prayed," says the Prophet Daniel, "and made confession." Sin is a burden, of which confession unloads the soul. "Father," said the returning prodigal, "I have sinned against heaven and in thy sight." Thanksgiving is also as necessary as confession; by the one we take shame to ourselves; by the other we give glory to God. By the one we abase the creature; by the other we exalt the Creator. In petitioning favors from God, we act like dependent creatures; in confession, like sinners; but in thanksgiving, like angels.

As to the utility of prayer, there is neither room nor reason for a doubt. It is itself a blessing, for it is the anticipatory will of God, revealing in the mind of man its own fulfillment. It is the infinite mind of the Spirit working in the soul of man to will and to ask what it was the eternal purpose of the Almighty God to grant. It prepares the heart for the reception of blessings, by exciting within it a sense of its need of the expressions of the Divine favor which it implores, and of the value of them. It so regulates and tranquillizes it, and gives it such a balance, self-possession, fortitude and reliance on Divine aid, as to fit it for noble achievements and high conjunctures. The men who in this way are wont to hold converse with the King of kings are men who are prepared for the rapid incidents and sudden emergencies of the day. They are the men who are carried bravely through scenes of affright, dexterously through scenes of difficulty, or triumphantly through scenes of awful alternative. When his friends asked the great physician, Boerhave, how he could possibly go through so much work from day to day, and pass, tranquil, through so many fretting scenes, he told them that his plan was to devote the first hour of every morning to prayer and meditation on the Word of God. And when Paul, on board the foundering ship, played such a gallant part—the prisoner superseding centurion, captain, pilot, and all—the heroic coolness, the veteran sagacity, and sublime composure which made him appear a sort of Deity, were the answer to fasting and prayer.

Besides this, prayer exerts a sanctifying influence upon the soul. It brings our wills into harmony with the will of God. It increases our abhorrence of the evils from which we seek deliverance. It keeps us mindful of our sinfulness, helplessness and dependence on the Divine bounty. It draws all the Christian graces into its focus: Charity, followed by her lovely train, her forbearance with faults, her forgiveness of injuries, her pity for errors, her compassion for wants; repentance, with her holy sorrows, her pious resolutions, her self-distrust; faith, with her elevated eye; hope, with her grasped anchor; benignence, with her open hand; zeal, looking far and wide to serve; and humility, with eyes turned inward, looking at home; each and all of these graces prayer quickens in the heart, warms into life, fits for active service and dismisses to its appropriate practice.

But prayer is not only of this indirect advantage; it also secures the blessings which we need. Beyond all question, it leads God to do for us what we had no right or reason to expect, if we had not earnestly and confidently called upon Him. The speculative difficulty which has been started on this subject, especially in relation to God's unchangeableness, vanishes when examined. We feel no hesitation in believing that God hates sin, and the way of transgressors, and we should feel as little in believing that He is pleased with that which tends to holiness. Blasphemy, for example; we are neither staggered nor confused when it influences the mind of God to punish the offender. But a devotional spirit is as much in harmony with all God's character as a blaspheming spirit is hostile to it, and therefore it is just as natural that He should be pleased with the one as angry with the other. It is, however, the atonement that enables us to reconcile the influence of prayer upon the mind and measures of God with His immutability. This legitimated, not originated, the exercise of God's love and mercy. It is as much a proof of His natural benevolence, as of His moral justice. It did not render Him merciful, but it was the only honorable medium of showing mercy. It had, therefore, a mighty influence on the Eternal Mind, inasmuch as it removed all moral and legal hindrances to the reign of grace. Now all real prayer is both founded on the Cross of Christ and the fruit of that Cross; its influence on the mind of God is just the influence of that atonement itself, for it is that which prayer sues out and depends on. Thus, by appreciating, admiring, loving and pleading the sacrifice of Christ, our prayer falls in with the Divine will, and glory and purposes, just as that sacrifice does. Like it, they effect no change in the Eternal Mind, but they harmonize with the unchangeableness of its purposes; a devotional spirit being the nearest approach to the spirit in which Christ glorified God "in the highest."

In prayer, be it remembered, we do not call upon God to alter the established order of His administration, but to act conformably to it. What that order is He has himself informed us. "Ask, and it shall be given you." Now here is nothing to be changed; no new inclination to be excited in the object of worship. It is already agreeable to His character and purpose to attend to the supplications of men. To give blessings, therefore, when they are asked, which would not have been given if they had not been asked, does not conflict any more with God's immutability than it would to crown with His goodness a cultivated field which would have yielded nothing for the nourishment of men if it had not been ploughed and sown; for God presides over the natural as well as the spiritual world. We must cultivate the soil, if we would have it yield a crop; and we must send up our prayers to God if we would receive the blessings which we desire. These prayers do not work any change in Him with whom "there is no variableness;" and yet, by His own appointment, they must necessarily precede the bestowal of His favors, and thus preceding, they will certainly be followed with these results.

There are those who find a difficulty in relation to prayer in the fixedness of natural law. They will not allow that God's purposes, nay, the machinery of the universe, can be affected by the breath of a human desire. All things occur in orderly sequence; and it is presumptuous, they think, to imagine that this can be broken, as it must be if prayer could prevail to alter results. Such a view has a show of humility; but, if followed out to its ultimate consequences, it would leave the world bound in a miserable fatalism, under which, as creatures would be powerless, moral responsibility would cease, and man must only bear as he might his inevitable destiny. Such a theory implies that the Creator did not foresee, made no provision for, the exercise of those powers and faculties with which He endowed His creatures; in a word, that all the play of thoughts and feelings and desires of human agents was never counted as a part of the machinery which the Almighty will would control, and which He would use in the bringing about of His great designs. It really deposes God from His office of governing.

If it be allowed that God created the visible universe, the finite must stand in a certain relation to the infinite, and there must be some point of contact between the natural and the supernatural. We may track causation for a long distance, but we must come somewhere to a point beyond which we cannot ascend; you must acknowledge at last the touch of the Divine finger. It is just here that the prayer which enters the ears of the Lord of Sabaoth reaches. It neither asks nor expects that the chain of cause and effect be miraculously broken; but it is taught to ask and believe that He who first sets cause in motion and links to it its orderly effect, would so at the beginning, by His gracious influence determine the line of action as that this might be found one of the means by which the end is reached. This is contrary neither to reason nor to sound philosophy. The uniformity of nature is not violated; and yet the influence of God's moral government is felt. Dr. Chalmers admirably discusses this, and has shown how the Deity has, from the first constitution of things, taken account of all the properties of matter and of all the impulses of mind, and made provision for every result. His vast plan, then, may well include answers to prayer, by no violation of, but in exact harmony with, and even by means of, the laws of nature. Dr. Chalmers supposes the prayer of a mother who dreads the storm, for her child upon the ocean: "God might answer the prayer, not by unsettling the order of secondary causes, not by reversing any of the wonted successions that are known to take place in the ever-restless ever-heaving atmosphere; not by sensible miracle among those nearer footsteps which the philosopher has traced, but by the touch of an immediate hand among the deep recesses of materialism, which are beyond the ken of all His instruments. It is thence that the Sovereign of nature might bid the wild uproar of the elements into silence." And again: "Thus . . . is met the cry of a people under famine for a speedy and plenteous harvest; not by the instant appearance of the ripened grain at the bidding of a voice from heaven, not preternaturally cherished into maturity in the midst of storms, but ushered onward, by a grateful succession of shower and sunshine, to a prosperous consummation. An abundant harvest is granted to prayer, yet without violence either to the laws of the vegetable physiology, or to any of the known laws by which the alterations of the weather are determined." It is no "subservient accommodation on the part of the Creator to the creature. It is simply the Creator carrying into effect His own established processes."

The testimony of thousands might be adduced in support of the efficacy of prayer. Such persons have the evidence of personal consciousness, as had John Newton when he wrote in his journal: "About this time I began to know that there is a God who hears and answers prayer." They are prepared to say, from their own experience—perhaps almost every Christian is, as he turns to some point in his history—"Verily God hath heard me; he hath attended to the voice of my petition." The greatness of creation and the littleness of man, therefore, or the decree of God and the immutability of natural laws, do not startle them from their knees or shake their confidence in prayer's efficacy. Superior to all speculative difficulties, because seenre in their experimental knowledge, they pray on, and are happy as they do so. And to see the wisdom of this course, we have only to look at a parallel case. In the infinite variety of this universe, there may be a world where the processes of growth, and decay and reproduction, so familiar to us, are utterly unknown. Suppose that the inhabitant of such a world were transported to our own, and that he witnessed the husbandman's operations in his field. He might marvel what he meant. He might wonder why he cast those grains of corn into the ground; and when told it was with a view to reproduce them a hundred fold, the mysterious process might at once assume the aspect of infatuation, and he might begin to remonstrate with the laborer on this crazy waste of useful corn; and if this visitor from Jupiter or Saturn were as acute a metaphysician as many in our world are, he might adduce many subtile arguments, too subtile perhaps for a farmer to refute. "Is not this a mad notion of yours? Do you really mean to affirm that this particle of corn will grow into a hundred more? Nay, do you pretend to say that you will put into that hole this hard and husky atom, and come back in a few months and find it changed into the glossy stems, the waving leaves and rustling ears of the tall wheat-stalk? What resemblance or what adequacy is there between that seed and a sheaf of corn? Besides, if a buried grain is to grow up a hundred fold, why don't you bury diamonds and guineas, and get them multiplied after the same proportion? Besides, do you not know that all these matters have been fixed and settled from everlasting? It has been foreordained either that you are to have a crop next Autumn, or that you are to have none. In the former case, your present pains are needless, for you will get your harvest without all this ado; in the latter, your pains are useless; for nothing will procure you a crop where it is not the purpose of Omnipotence that you should have one." Did the ploughman listen to all this remonstrance, he might be perplexed with it. He might not be able to show the precise way in which seeds exert an efficacy upon the future crop, and he might not see at once the reason why corn-grains should be reproductive, whilst diamonds and guineas are not; and least of all might he be able to dispose of the fatalist objection. But he would deem it enough to refute all this mystification to say that he had never known a harvest without a seed time, and that he had never sown sufficiently without reaping something. And so, when a man comes in from the prayerless world, and starts his objections, a praying man may not be able to discuss them one by one; he may not even understand them. "But this I know, God is the hearer of prayer, and verily he hath heard myself." And like the farmer who scatters his seed, heedless of all that has ever been said on necessity, and causation, and general laws, a wise believer will, in the face of hypothetical difficulties, proceed on ascertained facts, and amidst objections and cavils will persist to pray, and continue to enjoy the blessings which prayer procures.

Preaching. The preaching of the Word is a divine ordinance, and appointed to continue in the Church to the end of the world (1 Cor. i, 21; Matt. xxviii, 20). That the office of the ministry is of divine institution and a distinct office in the Church, appears from the following considerations: 1. Peculiar titles are in scripture given to the ministers of the gospel. They are called pastors, teachers, stewards of the mysteries of God, bishops or overseers of the flock, and angels of the churches. 2. Peculiar duties are assigned to them. They are to preach the Word; to rebuke and to instruct gainsayers (2 Tim. iv, 2; ii, 25); to administer the sacraments (Matt. xxviii, 19; 1 Cor. xi, 23); to watch over the flock, as those that must give an account (Heb. xiii, 17); to give attendance to reading, to exhortation, to doctrine; to meditate upon these things, and give themselves wholly to them (1 Tim. ii, 13, 15). 3. Peculiar duties are required of the people in reference to their ministers. They are called to know and acknowledge them that labor among them, and are over them in the Lord (1 Thess. v, 12); to esteem them highly in love for their work's sake (1 Thess. v, 13); to obey them that have the rule over them, and submit themselves (Heb. xiii, 17); to provide for their maintenance (Gal. vi, 6); and to pray for them (2 Thess. iii, 1). These things clearly prove that the ministry is a distinct office in the Church.

Though all may and ought to read the Word of God, yet it is to be preached "only by such as are sufficiently gitted, and also duly approved and called to that office" (The Larger Catechism, Quest. 158). Christians should improve their gifts and opportunities in a private way, for mutual admonition and edification; but none, whatever gifts they may possess, are warranted to preach the gospel unless they have the call of Christ for that purpose. The apostles received their call immediately from Christ Himself, and they were empowered to commit that sacred trust to inferior teachers; these, again, were commanded to commit it to faithful men who should be able to teach others; and none have a right to preach the gospel, in ordinary cases, but those who are thus authorized by Christ, through the medium of persons already vested with official power in the Church. In the primitive Church, those who preached the Word were solemnly set apart to their office by "the laying on of the hands of the presbytery" (1 Tim.

iv, 14). A regular call to preach the gospel is necessary, on account of the people; for all the success of a minister's labors depends on the blessing of Christ, and the people have no warrant to expect this blessing upon the labors of those who are not the servants of Christ (Jer. xxiii, 32). This call is no less necessary for the comfort and encouragement of ministers themselves; for as the work of the ministry is a work of peculiar difficulty and danger, so none are warranted to expect Divine support and protection in the discharge of that work but those who act under a Divine commission (Rom. x, 14, 15; Acts xxvi, 16, 17).

Predestination. The word predestinate is of Latin original (predestino), and signifies, in that tongue, to deliberate beforehand with one's self, how one shall act, and, in consequence of such deliberation to form a settled plan, or predetermine where, when, how, and by whom anything shall be done, and to what end it shall be done. So the Greek word prōō-rizo, which exactly answers to the English word predestinate, and is rendered by it (Acts iv, 28; Rom. viii, 29, 30; 1 Cor. ii, 7; Eph. i, 5, 11), signifies to resolve what shall be done, and before the thing resolved on is actually effected, to appoint it to some certain use, and direct it to some determinate end.

The doctrine of predestination is, as our Confession of Faith calls it, a "high mystery. It is one of the deep things of God, which our feeble intellect cannot fully comprehend. But though there are difficulties connected with it which we cannot entirely solve, it is beyond all question to be found in the Scriptures (Matt. xxv, 31; Rom. viii, 29, 30; Eph. i, 3, 6, 11; 2 Tim. i, 9; 2 Thess. ii, 13; 1 Pet. i, 1, 2; John vi, 37; John xvii, 2-24; Rev. xiii, 8; xvii, 8; Dan. iv, 35; 1 Thess. v, 19; Matt. xi, 26; Exod. iv, 21; Prov. xvi, 4; Acts xiii, 4-8). God's Word, and not His secret purpose, is the rule of our conduct. In reference to this subject, Dr. Owen observes: "We must exactly distinguish between man's duty and God's purpose, there being no connection between them. The purpose and decree of God is not the rule of our duty; neither is the performance of our duty, in doing what we are commanded, any declaration of what is God's purpose to do, or his decree that it should be done. Especially is this to be seen and considered in the duty of the ministers of the gospel; in the dispensing of the word, in exhortations, invitations, precepts, and threatenings committed unto them; all which are perpetual declaratives of our duty, and do manifest the approbation of the thing exhorted and invited to, with the truth of the connection between one thing and another; but not of the counsel or purpose of God in respect of individual persons, in the ministry of the word. A minister is not to make inquiry after, nor to trouble himself about, those secrets of the eternal mind of God, viz.: whom He purposeth to save, and whom He hath sent Christ to die for in particular; it is enough for them to search His revealed will, and thence take their directions, from whence they have their commissions. Wherefore there is no conclusion from the universal precepts of the Word, concerning the things, unto God's purpose in Himself concerning persons; they command and invite all to repent and believe; but they know not in particular on whom God will bestow repentance unto salvation, nor in whom He will effect the work of faith with power."

In his note on Romans viii, 28, Dr. Alford remarks: "It may suffice to say, that, on the one hand, scripture bears constant testimony to the fact that all believers are chosen and called by God; their whole spiritual life, in its origin, progress and completion, being from Him; while, on the other hand, its testimony is no less precise that He willeth all to be saved, and that none shall perish except by willful rejection of the truth. So that, on the one side, God's sovereignty, on the other, man's free will, is plainly declared to us. To receive, believe, and act on both these is our duty and our wisdom."

It ought ever to be remembered that no man can know his election prior to his conversion. Wherefore, instead of prying into the secret purpose of God, we ought to attend to His revealed will, that by making sure our vocation, we may ascertain our election. The order and method in which this knowledge may be attained is pointed out by the Apostle Peter, when he exhorts Christians to "give all diligence to make their calling and election sure" (2 Pet. i, 10). Their eternal election must remain a profound secret until it be discovered to them by their effectual calling in time; but when they have ascertained their calling, they may thence infallibly conclude that they were elected from eternity. Election, then, gives no discouragement to any man in reference to obeying the calls and embracing the offers of the gospel. The invitations of the gospel are not addressed to men as dead, but as sinners ready to perish; all are under the same obligation to comply with these invitations, and the encouragement from Christ is the same to all—"Him that cometh to me, I will in no wise cast out." And the doctrine of election must have a sanctifying and consoling influence on all who sincerely obey the gospel. It is calculated to inspire them with sentiments of reverence and gratitude towards God; to humble their souls in the dust before the eternal Sovereign; to excite them to diligence in the discharge of duty; to afford them strong consolation under the temptations and trials of life, and to animate them with a lively hope of eternal glory.

It has been alleged that the election or predestination of some to salvation in preference to others (see Rom. viii, 29; xi, 36; xvi, 13; Eph. i, 6; 2 Thes. ii, 13), is inconsistent with the impartiality of the Supreme Being. But this is a mistaken view of the case. God, who is independent, and owes nothing to His creatures, may give or withhold His favors according to His pleasure. If men have forfeited all claim to His regard, if they have fallen under His wrath, and might have been doomed to hopeless misery, there is not the shadow of injustice in the exercise of His mercy only to a portion of the criminals. When one man is exempted from punishment, no injury is done to his companions in condemnation, who are left to the vengeance of the law because they richly deserve to suffer it and do not become less guilty because he is pardoned. He only is a respecter of persons who confers favors upon some and withholds them from others equally deserving; not he who, where none has a claim upon him, disposes of his gifts in the free exercise of the power over them which naturally belongs to him. May he not do what he will with his own?

It is objected, that the doctrine of predestination supposes men to be under the necessity of sinning, and consequently makes God the author of their sin. To this it may be replied that the purpose of God, with respect to the sinful acts of men is in no degree to cause the evil, nor to approve it, but only to permit the wicked agent to perform it, and then to overrule it for His own most wise and holy ends. The same infinitely perfect and self-consistent decree ordains the moral law which forbids and punishes all sin, and at the same time permits its occurrence, limiting and determining the precise channel to which it shall be confined, the precise end to which it shall be directed, and overruling its consequences for good. "But as for you, ye thought evil against me, but God meant it unto good, to bring to pass as it is this day, to save much people alive" (Gen. 1, 20). We all allow omnipotence to be an attribute of Deity, and that by this attribute He could have prevented sin from entering into the world, had He chosen it; yet we see He did not. Now He is no more the author of sin in one case than in the other. Two propositions are stated in the Scriptures: that God has pre-ordained all things which come to pass, and that He is not the author of sin. These we may not be able fully to reconcile, but this ought not to weaken our conviction of their truth.

It is a perversion of the doctrine of predestination to contend, as some do, that it supersedes the use of means. The doctrine embraces means and ends, fixes the means as surely as the ends, and so connects them that without the former the latter cannot take place. If God has elected some persons to eternal life, He has chosen them to it through faith and holiness as the means of salvation. This is the doctrine of Scripture, and any one who will assert that it renders all means unnecessary, might with equal reason maintain that a man who has been assured that by the use of a certain medicine his life will be prolonged, may justly take occasion from this assurance to neglect the medicine, and, at the same time, expect to live. Paul was assured, by a vision, of the lives of all that were in the ship with him, but still he said to the centurion, "Except the sailors abide in the ship, ye cannot be saved." And why did he say so, but because God had determined that the company should be saved by the skill and activity of the sailors? It is not more necessary that those who were chosen to life should be saved, than it is that they should repent and believe.

Prentiss, Mrs. Elizabeth, was born in Portland, Me., October 26th, 1818. Her father was the gifted and saintly Edward Payson. Her mother and only sister were also remarkable persons. She early showed rare endowments of mind, united with intense affections, sympathies and spiritual longings. At the age of sixteen she wrote for the Youth's Companion, published in Boston, stories and verses which attracted attention from their bright style and import. After a superior education, under the care of her sister, and in seminaries in Portland and Ipswich, Mass., she taught a school in Portland, winning the enthusiastic love of her pupils. From 1840 to 1843 she was a teacher in Richmond, Va. Her letters and diary during these years, show the depth and ardor of her Christian experience. Inheriting her father's sensitive and intense nature, her spiritual life, like his, was marked by unusual conflicts, strength of faith, and fervor of devotion.

In 1845 she was married to Rev. George L. Prentiss, who was just entering upon his ministerial life. After five years in New Bedford, Mass., and a few months in Newark, N. J., her home was permanently in New York city, where her husband has been successively pastor of the Mercer Street Church and the Church of the Covenant, and Professor in the Union Theological Seminary.

In the second year of her life in New York, she lost within a few weeks' time, two lovely children. The traces of this keen sorrow were never effaced. In her desolated misery she wrote "Little Susy's Six Birthdays," the first of a series of books for little children which still hold their supremacy in thousands of homes. These little books were followed, from year to year, by many others, all having the same aim: to show the true Christian life, its nature and progress.

"Stepping Heavenward," published in 1869, has had an extraordinary circulation. Nearly 70,000 copies have been sold in this country. It has been republished by half a dozen English houses, translated into French and German, and placed by Taubnitz in his Leipzig collection of English authors. One English house published a cheap edition expressly for circulation in Canada and Australia. Equally remarkable are the numberless testimonies to its helpfulness to weary and longing souls.

Her other books, "Only a Dandelion," "Henry and Bessie," "The Flower of the Family," "Fred and Maria and Me," "Aunt Jane's Hero," "The Home at Greylock," "Urbane and His Friends," "Golden Hours," etc., were written with the same spirit and aim, and have been very widely read and prized.

She died, after a short illness, in her summer home, at Dorset, Vt., August 13th, 1878.

Not only as a writer of books, but by her letters of counsel and sympathy, her sacred hymns, her Bible readings, her manifold ministries of consolation to the sick and sorrowing, and by the influence of a life of exalted love to Christ and consecration to His service, she has left a beloved and blessed memory.

Her memoir, written by her husband, entitled "Life and Letters of Elizabeth Prentiss," is one of the most beautiful of religious biographies.

Presbyterial Academy—Blair. On April 6th, 1848, at a public meeting held in the Presbyterian Church of Blairstown, a committee was appointed to erect a building, not more than thirty-six by twenty-four feet, two stories high. By subsequent change of plan the structure was raised forty-eight by twenty-four feet, one story high, and was occupied, during the holidays of that year, by the school which had been organized on November 16th, in the public-school house. The lot was deeded August 2d, 1848, to a board of trustees, and the school placed under the care of the session of the Blairstown Presbyterian Church. The first Principal was I. W. Condit, M. D. In 1849 the enterprise was tendered to and accepted by the Presbytery of Newton, thus becoming Blair Presbyterial Academy. In the Autumn of 1849, Rev. James G. Moore succeeded to the Principalship. In the Winter of 1849 the Institution received one hundred dollars in money and a valuable library of one thousand volumes, from interested friends abroad. In 1851 Mr. Blair donated the funds for a building sixty-four by twenty-six feet, for a boarding department and Principals' residence, which was erected contiguous to the school building, and took the name of Blair Hall. Rev. J. Kirby Davis became Principal in 1852, and was succeeded by J. Henry Johnson, A. M., in 1854. In 1855 wings were erected to the original structure, to accommodate the growing necessities of the school. S. S. Stevens succeeded to the Principalship in 1861. In 1862 the boarding department was enlarged by an addition to the ground plan of the building, and in 1863 was enlarged by adding a third story. During the Winter of 1864-65 there were in attendance one hundred and nineteen pupils. On the night of December 18th, 1867, Blair Hall was destroyed by fire, but through the munificence of Mr. Blair it was rebuilt in 1868-69, upon an enlarged scale, and the grounds made more capacious. Thus were provided the present accommodations of Blair Hall, consisting of a building one hundred and twenty feet long by thirty-five deep, with wings forty by thirty feet, all three-stories high, exclusive of basement and attic. In 1868 Mr. Blair set apart $10,000, the interest of which was to pay the tuition of five sons of ministers belonging to Newton Presbytery, and the same year, at Mr. Blair's suggestion, the Presbytery appointed five ministers

South Trinitarian Church, New Bedford, Mass., in April, 1845; became pastor of the Mercer Street Presbyterian Church, New York city, in April, 1851; received the degree of D.D., from Bowdoin College, 1854; resigned on account of ill health in the Spring of 1858 and went abroad for two years; on his return gathered a new congregation on Murray Hill (the Church of the Covenant), and was installed its pastor in the Spring of 1862, and resigned in April, 1873, in order to accept a call to the Skinner and McAlpine Professorship of Pastoral Theology, Church Polity and Mission Work in the Union Theological Seminary. Later, Pastoral Theology having been transferred to the Chair of Sacred Rhetoric, Apologetics and Christian Ethics were added to Dr. Prentiss' chair. Besides numerous sermons and addresses, he has published "A Memoir of Sargent S. Prentiss" and two elders as a Board of Directors, which it has continued to maintain. In 1870 the real estate, comprising Blair Hall and seven and a half acres of land, were conveyed to a Board of Trustees, to be held in trust for the use and purpose of an academy under the control and management of the Board of Directors appointed by the Presbytery. In 1822 the "Scribner Library" was established. Mr. Stevens, the Principal, resigned in 1873, and his successor, H. D. Gregory, Ph. D., was chosen in 1875. In July, 1874, by legacy of John P. Smith, of Bloomsburg, N. J., and donation of Mr. Blair, the endowment was increased from $10,000 to $25,000. In 1876 Mr. Blair donated an additional piece of ground, and an invested fund of $36,500 to the Institution. In 1883 the Principal resigned, and Prof. J. H. Shumaker was elected to succeed him, and Mr. Blair added $100,000 to the endowment fund.

Presbyterian Alliance. The meeting of the Second General Council of the Alliance, in Philadelphia, September, 1880, was an occasion of great interest.

On the evening of the 22d the Governor of the State and the Mayor of the city formally received the delegates and the friends who accompanied them, in the Academy of Fine Arts, on the corner of Broad and Cherry. The handsome edifice, with its rooms already enriched by numberless paintings and other works of art, was rendered still further attractive through a profusion of exotics that had been secured by a committee of ladies from the churches, co-operating with the committee on entertainment, by whom the arrangements for the reception had been made. It was crowded to repletion by those who were connected with the Council, and by invited guests from Philadelphia and other places, among whom were not merely prominent Presbyterians, but a large number of representative men from the other religious Denominations and from the various departments of business, social, and political life. The concourse was in every way a remarkably striking one.

George Junkin, Esq., Chairman of the Business Committee, in an exceedingly neat and happy address, introduced the Council en masse to the Executives of the State and City, who stood upon the platform in the large reception room. Governor Hoyt and Mayor Stokely responded in hearty speeches, extending the welcome of the State and City to the guests of the evening. They were followed in brief, varied and appropriate addresses by Principal Cairns, of the United Presbyterian Church of Scotland; Dr. Murkland, of the Presbyterian Church of the United States (South); the Rev. Mr. MacIntosh, of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland; Gen. George B. McClellan, Governor of New Jersey, and an elder in the Presbyterian Church of the United States of America; and the Rev. Narayan Sheshadri, from India.

At the close of the speeches, which occupied about an hour, the members of the Council were introduced, personally and by name, to the Governor and the Mayor, and then to the crowded concourse. The rest of the evening, until a late hour, was spent in a free social intermingling of the delegates with each other and with the guests who had been invited to meet them. A band of music enlivened the reception.

On the morning of Thursday, the 23d, the delegates and the resident and visiting Presbyterian ministers assembled in the Chambers Church, at Broad and Sansom, and then marched in procession to the Academy of Music, in which the opening services were to be held. The procession was marshaled by Samuel C. Perkins, Esq., with General Hartranft, ex-Governor of the State, Col. A. Loudon Snowden, Col. R. Dale Benson, and Maj. Samuel B. Huey, as aids. The route of the procession was lined by numerous spectators, who gazed with eager interest upon the scene. It was estimated that not less than a thousand ministers were in the line. They crowded the platform and the lower portion of the Academy, and the whole building, even to its standing room, was occupied by an audience of at least four thousand persons.

The morning sessions of the Alliance were held in Horticultural Hall, and the afternoon and evening sessions in the Academy of Music. Great historical interest centred in paintings with which the walls of the Hall had been hung. The Rev. Henry C. McCook, D. D., had designed a series of decorations which blazoned forth the leading events and heroes in the histories of the Presbyterian churches abroad, and under his superintendence, they had been painted on a series of canvas which almost completely covered the walls of the building. They were the theme of universal and constant commendation.

The Presbyterian Board of Publication, 1334 Chestnut street, at an early day resolved to place its building at the service of the members of the Council for social intercommunion, letter-writing, and other necessary purposes, to present each member with a specially prepared and handsomely bound Descriptive Catalogue of its publications, and to extend them a formal reception in their large Assembly room, on Saturday evening, the 25th of September. The building was decorated with flags and supplied with flowers during the sessions of the Council. The reception on the Saturday evening was largely attended, and an apposite address of welcome was delivered by the Hon. E. A. Rollins, ex-United States Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and President of the Centennial National Bank, and also a member of the Board.

A large number of invitations to visit public places were received by the Council, and accepted with thanks, though the Council in a body was unable to respond only to one of them. On the Monday after the adjournment it visited Princeton, in a train specially provided for it, and was received by the authorities of the College of New Jersey and of the Theological Seminary. The Rev. Dr. A. T. McGill addressed the guests in the Seminary Chapel, and the Rev. Dr. James McGosh in the First Presbyterian Church, where addresses were also delivered by the Rev. Drs. Main and Lang, the Rev. Narayan Sheshadri, and George H. Stuart, Esq.

The deepest impression which from the first and to the end was made by the assembled delegates, was that of consecrated intellectual power. This prominent intellectuality was noted with emphasis by the secular press, and it provoked the criticism, in more than one quarter, that the Presbyterian ministry is the intellectual ministry of the Denominations. An unusually large proportion of the prepared papers read on the occasion, as well as the discussions which followed them, were striking expressions of this mental power and theological culture. Whilst, however, the powerfully intellectual tone dominated, the devotional spirit was very pervasive. The half hour of praise and prayer with which the sessions of every day were opened was marked by a tender spirituality that also swayed the Council at times in the midst of the routine business.

And how suggestive of the catholicity of Presbyterianism was this grand Assembly! The white, the black, the copper-colored races, were all there. A North American Indian, a Brahmin from India, and Negroes from Africa sat with Europeans, and made most effective addresses to the thousands of spectators who crowded the places of meeting. The delegates came from all the continents and from the isles of the sea. A grouping of the list shows that the places actually represented were: In America—the United States and Canada; in Europe—England, Scotland, Wales, Ireland, Belgium, Germany, Bohemia, France, Switzerland, Italy and Spain; in Asia—Syria, India, Japan, China and Ceylon; in Africa—Egypt, Gaboon and Corisco, the Cape of Good Hope, Basuto Land; in Australia—New South Wales, South Australia, Victoria and Tasmania, and the New Hebrides, while papers and letters were received from other countries, and from writers who could not personally be present.

The following gentlemen were present as members of the Council, and as representatives of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States (North): Rev. William P. Breed, D.D., Philadelphia, Pa.; Rev. Charles A. Dickey, D.D., Philadelphia, Pa.; Rev. S. I. Prime, D.D., New York city; Rev. Samuel J. Nicolls, D.D., St. Louis, Mo.; Rev. The Rev. Henry A. Boardman, D. D., the senior Presbyterian pastor in Philadelphia, who, as Chairman of the General Committee of Arrangements, was to deliver the address of welcome at the opening of the sessions of the Alliance, having been removed by death, as had also the Rev. Elias R. Beadle, D. D., LL. D., his predecessor in the Chairmanship of the General Committee of Arrangements, the Rev. W.

P. Breed, D. D., delivered an admirable address of welcome, by request.

The Rev. William Adams, D. D., LL. D., who had been appointed to preach the opening sermon of the Alliance, having also been called to his reward, the Rev. W. M. Paxton, D. D., by appointment, rendered this service. From Dr. Paxton's excellent sermon, on Matt. viii, 11, we make the following extract, which well deserves the permanent form which we give it.

In looking back, it strikes us—

First, That one prominent characteristic of the great family of Presbyterian churches is loyalty to the person of Jesus Christ. This is the centre from which all our theology starts, the foundation from which we draw all our inspiration. We do not claim this as a distinction peculiar to ourselves, but we point to it as a characteristic that needs to be emphasized. Jesus Christ stands out before us as a great historical character. It is a simple fact that He is the greatest personage in the world's history, the mightiest force in the world's action, the grandest influence in its civilization. Hence the inquiry, Who is He? is the question that is back of all other questions. The answer to this by each individual determines his own personal experiences and character. The answer to this by a church or denomination of Christians determines the value of the religion which it teaches and the measure and character of its efficiency in the world.

If you give the Arian or Socinian answer, which denies His divinity, even though it accredits Him as the highest of created beings, or as a divinely-endowed man, you have a religion which leaves man in a state of sin without a Redeemer, under a consciousness of guilt without an atonement, and with no incentive but that of a pure humanitarianism to raise him to something higher and better.

If you take the Gnostic answer, which denies His humanity, or the Apollinarian answer, which denies Him a rational spirit—the place of human intelligence being supplied in Him by the eternal Logos, then you have a religion which brings us in contact with the Divine, without a single element of human comfort or consolation. We have no “daysman” to represent our nature in any form of mediation between God and man; no form of humanity to bear the burden of our guilt; no brother or friend to open to us a heart of sympathy, or to soothe the bitterness of human woe.

Or if, advancing to later times, you take the answer of Schleiermacher, or any of the more advanced theories of philosophic speculation which regard Christ as the ideal man—the one man in whom the ideal of humanity comes to its fullest realization—and He the source of new life to others by awakening in them the same God-consciousness, then you have a religion in which Christ is lost in humanity, and the glorious person of the God-man Mediator is shrouded in mystery and lost to the view of faith.

But if, turning from all these hidings of His power and glory, we take the answer of Nathanael: “Thou art the Son of God; Thou art the King of Israel;” or of Peter: “Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God;” or of Martha: “I believe that Thou art the Christ, the Son of God that should come into the world;” or of Thomas: “My Lord and my God;” or of Paul: “In Him dwells all the fullness of the Godhead bodily;” or of John: “And the Word was made flesh and dwelt among us (and we beheld His glory, the glory as of the only-begotten of the Father), full of grace and truth”—then you have standing out before your apprehension a glorious Person—God, yet man; very God, yet very man—God and man in one Person, that, by the mysterious union of their two natures in one Person, he might reconcile God to man by making expiation, and man to God by making intercession for him.

This is the glorious Person to whom the Presbyterian heart and the Presbyterian faith has ever been loyal. It was in the light of this wonderful Person that Augustine interpreted the scriptures, and drew out that marvelous Christo-centric system of theology that has guided the Presbyterian faith, and has shed its light of hope and peace all down the ages.

It was this gracious Person who, enshrined in the hearts of Vaudois and Waldenses, enabled them to preserve the light of truth through the dark night of the Middle Ages, to kindle again the torch of the Reformation.

It was this truth, the person of Jesus Christ, and the love of God in Him, that inspired and guided the Reformation. It was heart loyalty to the person of Christ that enabled John Knox, as the English Ambassador testified, “to put more life into his hearers from the pulpit in one hour than 600 trumpets.” It is this truth that leads the van of our doctrinal beliefs, and all else follows in its train. It has stood foremost in Confessions and symbols of our churches, age after age, until at length it found its simplest and most perfect expression in the Westminster Catechism—“The only Redeemer of God's elect is the Lord Jesus Christ, who, being the eternal Son of God, became man, by taking to himself a true body and a reasonable soul, and so was and continued to be God and man in two distinct natures and one person forever.”

Here is the person of a living Redeemer, around whom my affections may cluster, who has the worth of divinity to give value to His sacrifice, the form of humanity to suffer the law penalty which humanity has incurred—a wealth of love to challenge our affection and a motive to service which binds us to Him with the hands of a man and cords of love. Such is the religion that a proper apprehension of the person of Christ must ever produce. A stalwart religion, that grasps by faith the arm of a mighty Redeemer; a strong love, that holds Him in a steadfast embrace; a warmth of devotion, that counts all things as loss for Christ, and a courage that smiles at the stake, and triumphs in a martyr's victory. Obscure the glory of that person and the Church sinks into imbecility.

Be assured that no Church can ever bear an effectual part in the conquest of the world but a Church that is loyal to the person of Jesus Christ.

Second—A second distinction of our Presbyterian churches in the past is their character as witness-bearers. We should certainly fail to understand ourselves or to appreciate our mission in the future if we should let this fact drop from our memories, or fail of its realization in our consciousness as we prosecute our work.

"Ye are my witnesses, saith the Lord" (Isaiah xliii, 10). "Ye shall be witnesses unto me, both in Jerusalem and in all Judea, and in Samaria and unto the uttermost parts of the earth" (i, 8). These and similar Scriptures seem from the beginning to have taken a deep hold upon the Presbyterian heart, and to have come to a vivid realization in the experience of the whole Church. Accordingly the long line of our past history is strewn with testimonies, confessions and witnesses to the truths of God, written in symbols, delivered in pulpits, illustrated in glorious and illustrious lives, uttered amidst the flames and sealed with blood. Hence, as we look back, we are compassed about with a great cloud of witnesses—Paul witnessing against the Judaizing tendencies of the carnal heart which afterwards effloresced in Romanism, and against a philosophy, falsely so called, which has only now reached its ultimate evolution. Augustine witnessing for the sovereignty of God and the doctrines of Grace, when the Pelagian heresy threatened to pale their glory. The Waldenses witnessing, midst sword and flame, for freedom of thought and the right of private judgment, and for the precious doctrines of the Cross, when the light of these truths was almost extinguished by the overlaying of vain traditions and the smothering accretions of Romish superstition. Then, again, we have the witnesses of the great family of the Presbyterian churches of the Reformation to the absolute sovereignty of the Bible, to its immediate and plenary inspiration, to its all-sufficiency and infallibility as the only and authoritative rule of faith and duty, against the Romish doctrine of tradition as a coördinate rule of faith, and against the presumptuous claim of the Papacy to be the infallible teacher of the true faith and the final judge of all controversies. It was this witness that broke the chain that bound the Scriptures in the cloisters of the Romish monasteries, and opened the truth of God to the people. Then came the voices of witness-bearers, like the sound of many waters, testifying to the contents of Heaven's precious message to man. They witnessed to a salvation only effected through the blood and sacrifice of Jesus Christ; not by human merit, not by works of righteousness which we have done, not by penance or self-sacrifice, as the priesthood taught; nor yet by the life of Christ as a model for imitation, charming us to a better life and lifting us to the realization of an ideal humanity, as rationalism suggested then and is urging now; but by the efficacy of an atonement which expiates sin by satisfying the penalty of the broken law, and secures free pardon and a gracious acceptance for fallen man. It was this effective witnessing to the love of God in the atonement of Jesus Christ that broke the fetters of spiritual despotism and produced the Reformation. As benighted men, who had trembled under the idea of God as an inexorable Judge, lifted their eyes to the face of a Father in heaven whom they felt sure loved them, they adored, worshiped and believed. No less powerful was their witness to the doctrine of justification by faith alone, and to the efficacy of Divine grace in the regeneration and sanctification of the soul. We cannot follow in detail the long line of witnesses. But among all these witnesses one voice, clear and strong, falls upon our ears. It comes to us like the shout of a king. It is a sound that made thrones rock and monarchs tremble. It comes from the misty hills of Scotland. It is the voice of John Knox, witnessing to the kingship of Jesus Christ, that He alone is the King and Head of the Church. The Church is Christ's house, Christ's kingdom. He alone has the right to fix her institutions and appoint her Ordinances. He alone is her Supreme Head and Governor. Hence we can acknowledge no Pope; can bow to no potentate; and when a civil ruler dares to plant his foot within the Church to claim dominion over the consciences of Christ's people and assert the possession of a power which the King of Kings has not given him, it must be a violation of Christ's crown rights and a usurpation of Christ's prerogative. Nor was this a solitary voice. A long line of witnesses repeated the testimony. It was uttered by petitions, by remonstrances, by solemn leagues and covenants—in Councils, in Convocations, in Parliaments—and proclaimed by the cannon's roar upon the battle-field. It was a witness that disenthralled Scotland and secured the chartered freedom.

As we assemble to-day the voices of all these witnesses are sounding in our ears. They recall our history. They remind us of our ancestors. They shame our imbecility. They confront us with these blood-sealed testimonies of heroic devotion to Jesus Christ. They call us to repeat the same witness, to give up no principle, to surrender no truth. They point to the coming contest, and call us "to fight a good fight," "to stand in the evil day, and having done all to stand."

Again we notice that a third characteristic of Presbyterianism is its catholicity.

We do not claim to be the catholic Church, nor a catholic Church, for this at present is an impossibility. No church can be catholic until its doctrine and polity has been preached and accepted throughout the whole world. Yet, strange to say; this appellation, catholic, has been appropriated by many claimants—by the ancient Arians, by the Greek Church, by the Roman Catholics, and even by the Donatists, the most narrow and exclusive of the Separatists. We make no such absurd pretension. We are not catholics, but catholic. We are not the catholic Church, but a part of the great Universal Church of Jesus Christ, which has many members, who bear many names. Our name is Presbyterian. As another has expressed it, "Christian is our name, Presbyterian our surname." We are Presbyterian Christians—Christians, because we belong to Christ; Presbyterians, because we believe that the true original Apostolic Episcopacy was Presbytery. Our principles and polity and methods of operation are all catholic, and may be reduced to practice with a wonderful facility under any circumstances and in any nationality. Our Presbyterianism, for example, is catholic in its idea of the Church.

As defined in the Westminster Confession, the Church "consists of all those throughout the world who profess the true religion, with their children." Here is a definition as wide as universality itself. It unchurches no one, but comprehends the whole world of believers in the amplitude of its charitable embrace. Again, our system is also catholic in its polity. It is not founded, like Papacy and Prelacy, upon the narrow and exclusive model of the Jewish Temple, but upon the free, popular and catholic system of the synagogue worship. Its first principle is the rights of the people. Church power does not rest in the clergy. The people are not subject to Popes and Prelates, but have a right to a substantive part in the government of the Church. It affirms the universal Priesthood of believers, which makes them all equal, also the parity of the ministry—they all stand upon equal footing. Upon this basis of free and equal rights the ruling elder, the representative of the people, joins with the minister in all acts of judicial authority. These, then, are principles of a far-reaching and catholic sweep. They are capable of an application to people of all classes, to every form of national government and under all the circumstances in which human life is cast.

Again, our Presbyterianism is catholic in the spirit of love with which we can co-operate with evangelical Christians of every name in works of faith and labors of love. We have no peculiarity, no prejudice, no hobby, to dig a chasm of separation between us and other servants of our common Master. To all who love the Lord Jesus Christ we can open our hearts with the warmest affection; to all who are building the walls of Zion we can offer a helping hand, and our only contest is who shall build the wall strongest and highest. We can recognize the ordination of the Episcopalian and the baptism of the Baptist. We can respond with all our hearts to the "Amen" of the Methodist and join with our brethren in any psalmody that puts the crown upon the brow of Jesus. Thus it is that our system, whether viewed in detail or regarded as a whole, is catholic in all its features, and is capable of an expansion to the uttermost circumference of our humanity.

There is a Persian fable which tells of a young prince who brought to his father a nut-shell, which, when opened with a spring, contained a little tent, of such ingenious construction that when spread in the nursery the children could play under its folds; when opened in the council chamber the king and his counsellors could sit beneath its canopy; when placed in the court-yard the family and all the servants could gather under its shade; when pitched upon the plain where the soldiers were encamped the whole army could gather within its inclosure. It possessed a quality of boundless adaptability and expansiveness. This little tent is the symbol of our system. It is all contained within the nut-shell of the Gospel. Open it in the nursery, and the parents and children will sit with delight beneath its folds. Spread it in the court-yard, and the whole household will assemble for morning and evening worship beneath its shadow. Open it in the village, and it becomes a church, and the whole town worships under its canopy. Pitch it upon the plain, and a great sacramental army will gather under it. Send it out to the heathen world, and it becomes a great pavilion, that fills and covers the earth.

But in this endeavor to understand our mission in the past, we cannot omit to notice that a fourth characteristic of our Presbyterianism is its intimate connection with civil liberty. This is certainly one of our historic distinctions, but we have time only for a passing glance. It is a simple fact that Calvinism has always been hated by infidels and Presbyterianism by tyrants. King James I said, at the Hampton Court Conference, "Ye are aiming at a Scots Presbytery, which agrees with monarchy as well as God and the devil." By monarchy James doubtless meant his own will, which was tyranny. To that great-hearted Presbyterian, Melville, he said: "There never will be quiet in this country till half a dozen of ye be hanged or banished." "Tush, sir," replied Melville, "threaten your courtiers in that manner! but, God be glorified, it will not be in your power to hang or exile His truth." "The doctrine" (that is, the doctrine of the Presbyterians), said Charles I. "is anti-monarchical." "I will say," he continued, "that there was not a wiser man since Solomon than he who said, 'No Bishop, no King.'" It was doubtless a wise saying.

Civil and religious liberty are linked together. If there is liberty in the Church there will be liberty in the State; if there is no Bishop in the Church there will be no tyrant on the throne. This brings us to the very centre of truth upon this subject; civil liberty springs out of the very core of Presbyterian doctrine and polity. One of the great truths asserted and established by the Reformation was "the kingship of all believers;" they are all equal and all kings. This is just the first principle of our Presbyterianism, "the rights of the people." In whom does Church power rest, in the people or in the clergy? When you settle this question you decide the question of the civil liberty of the nation. If you decide that the power rests with the clergy, then you establish a principle which, by an inevitable analogy, associates itself with the principle that the civil power rests in kings and nobles.

But if you settle, as Presbyterians do, that Church power rests in the people, in the Church itself, then from this principle springs the other, that civil power rests in the people themselves, and that all civil rulers are the servants of the people.

Accordingly Dr. Schaff in his history of creeds says that "the inalienable rights of an American citizen are nothing but the Protestant idea of the general priesthood of believers applied to the civil sphere or developed into the corresponding idea of the general kingship of free men. Hence it is that history shows that from the underlying principle of our Presbyterianism has sprung the civil and political freedom of many nations. The Westminster Review, which certainly has no leaning toward Presbyterianism, says: "Calvin sowed the seeds of liberty in Europe, and evoked a moral energy which Christianity has not felt since the era of persecution."

"The peculiar ethical temperament of Calvinism," it continues, "is precisely that of primitive Christianity of the Catacombs and the desert, and was created under the same stimulus." Again it says, "Calvinism saved Europe." The eloquent Roman Catholic historian Bossuet, speaking of the General Synod of France in 1559, says: "A great social revolution has been effected. Within the centre of the French Monarchy Calvin and his disciples have established a spiritual Republic." Macaulay has shown that the great revolution of 1688, which gave liberty to England, was in a great measure purchased by the labors, sacrifices, treasure, and blood of the Presbyterians of Scotland. But the most conspicuous illustration of this principle was the birth of the American Republic. Our national historian, Bancroft, says, "He who will not honor the memory and respect the influence of Calvin knows but little of the origin of American liberty."

Dr. Schaff, the honored historian of our Creeds, says: "The principles of the Republic of the United States can be traced through the intervening link of Puritanism to Calvinism, which, with all its theological rigor, has been the chief educator of manly character and promoter of constitutional freedom in modern times." Chief Justice Tilghman says that "The framers of the Constitution of the United States borrowed very much of the form of our Republic from that form of Presbyterian Church government developed in the Constitution of the Presbyterian Church of Scotland." But time will not permit us to pursue the thought. Enough has been said to remind us of our history and to assure us that the church of the future, the church that is to be most effective in conquering the world for Christ, will be a church that is loyal to the great principle of civil and religious freedom.

V. Again, if time had permitted, I had thought to mention as another characteristic of our Presbyterianism, its educational character. Our historian Bancroft says that "Calvin was the father of popular education, the inventor of the system of free schools." However this may be, it is certain that home education, instruction in the Bible and Catechism, have been a characteristic of our Presbyterian families, and that wherever our churches have gone they have carried with them the school, the academy, and the college. From no quarter, therefore, could a protest come with more propriety than from this Council, against the godless secularism which characterizes so much of the boasted education of the present time.

VI. I had thought, also, to point your attention to the missionary character of our whole family of churches. But the simple mention of this fact suffices, as we now pass in conclusion to our second question.

What should be our mission in the future?

The answer is simple and brief. "To stand in our lot," to repeat the same record, to follow in the same line, to cultivate the same characteristics, to aim at the same distinctions. Let our hearts cleave to the person of Jesus Christ with a loyal affection and devoted service. Let us, like our fathers, be intrepid witnesses for the truth of God amid a crooked and perverse generation. Let us stand fast by the principles of religious liberty, which have given the boom of civil and political freedom to the world. Let us maintain our principle of liberty, which brings us into co-operative unity with other Christians in the whole work of the Master's Kingdom. Let us assert our catholicity before the world, that ours is a system adapted to a world-wide efficiency and capable of a universal prevalence. Let us cultivate the spirit of missions, and catching our inspiration from the Cross of Christ, let us work on, in the confidence that the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdoms of our Lord and His Christ.

There is nothing in our past record that we could wish changed—no characteristics that we could improve by alteration. We need no changed plans, no novel principles, no new creeds. Our system contains all the elements of efficiency which in times past have proved to be the power of God, and all the elements of blessing which have gladdened the world. Our polity, as administered by our fathers, has been a benediction to the world, and we need not fear that it will fail of the same result in time to come. This is an age of progress; let us progress, not by changing God's truth, not by altering a system which has been baptized by unction of the Holy Ghost, but let us progress in all holy activities, in all Christian work, in our love for the souls of men and in the intelligence and ardor of our zeal for the glory of God and for the cause and kingdom of Jesus Christ. Let us progress in an intelligent appreciation of the significance of our past history and of the promise of the future which it embodies. What God did in time past for our fathers is but the type and promise of what He will do for us now. The Lord God of Elijah will be the God of Elisha. Let us seize the falling mantle, and as by faith we smite the waters, let us cry: "Where is the Lord God of our fathers?" We should train our children in the memory of their mighty acts. The historian Sallust tells us that the Roman mothers trained their children in the presence of the busts and statues of their ancestors. In like manner we should train our children and our rising ministry, as it were, in the presence of their forefathers, in all the memories of our past history, and urge them, as the Roman mothers did, never to be satisfied while the virtues and victories of the past were more numerous or more glorious than those of the present.

But how are these results to be attained? By unity of action. By bringing together these Presbyterian bodies from every part of the world, not in an organic union, but into such oneness of thought and sympathy that they shall act in a co-operative unity, like several armies moving against a common enemy, animated by the same spirit and aiming at the same result. But again the question returns: How shall this be done? How shall this unity be secured? Not by resolutions; not by the decrees of Councils; not by ecclesiastical pressure; but by the power of warm Christian affection. The unity must not be from without, but from within; it must be from that love which unites heart to heart, until the bond encircles the whole family. The smallest Presbyterian body struggling under discouragement in the most distant country must be made to feel that it does not stand alone, but is linked in effective sympathy with a great family of vigorous churches who feel for them and will act with them in their time of need. No church must be permitted to have a feeling of solitary orphanage. The brethren must take home from this family council the salutations of the churches to each other, and such messages of love and sympathy as will make the discouraged lift their faces from the dust, and thank God and take courage. So, too, the churches and brethren laboring in the great centres and bearing the burdens of heavy responsibilities must be made to feel that in this strain and struggle they have the support of brethren and churches who feel and work with them and for them, and that from the vast family all over the earth prayers are going up for their success. But here, still, the question returns: "How is this to be effected?" Only by the presence and power of the Holy Ghost in all our churches and in the hearts of all our ministers and people. "It is not by might nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord of Hosts." He is the Spirit of love, who must bind all our hearts in unity; the Spirit of truth, who must take the things of Christ and show them unto us; the Spirit of courage, who must make us witnesses for Christ, and the Spirit of power, who alone can give us the victory. As the disciples waited at Jerusalem so we should wait here, with one accord, for the coming of the Holy Ghost, and as we separate carry the benediction with us to the ends of the earth.

Presbyterian Board of Church Erection.

The field of this Board is the United States, with all their Territories. Their work during the last year extended from Eastern New York to the Pacific coast, and from Alaska to Florida, including almost every nationality. For the Freedmen in the South they secured during the year sixteen houses of worship, and nearly as many school-houses, for nearly every church has its school, taught in the same building. Not less than ninety churches and chapels have been secured for these colored people, by the help of the Board. In Utah, that land of moral darkness, they have erected nineteen more of these light-houses, whose glad some rays are penetrating the surrounding gloom of moral darkness. In Iowa, Kansas and Nebraska they have built fifty-one churches. In all they have aided two hundred and fifteen churches, during the year, in the erection of houses for the worship of God. The opening of these two hundred and fifteen sanctuaries has been the occasion of unspeakable joy to thousands of God's poor people, who for years past have not known what it was to have a Christian home or the stated means of grace.

The work and method of this Board are as follows: 1. The design of the Board is to aid feeble churches (not able of themselves) to secure comfortable but uncostly houses of worship, free of debt. 2. The Board in no case gives more than one-third of the cost of the building, and in but few cases so much as that. 3. The average cost of the buildings is $2000, and the average of the Board's grant is $500, which must pay the last cent of debt, and leave the property and congregation unencumbered. 4. To guard the property against alienation and loss by fire, the parties receiving aid must give the Board a first and only mortgage, also a perpetual policy of insurance for the amount received. 5. No application is entertained or grant made by the Board without the endorsement of the Presbytery under whose care the church is. 6. This endorsement must certify that the church applying has done all it can to help itself, and that the amount asked for is really needed to complete the building free of debt. 7. The church aided must also promise to send the Board an annual collection. 8. The Board now holds securities on churches for more than $1,000,000, protecting property worth over $3,500,000. This amount is yearly increasing.

The officers of the Board are: Rev. Joseph Fewsmith, D.D., President; F. G. Burnham, Esq., Vice President; Rev. H. R. Wilson, D.D., Corresponding Secretary; Rev. David Magie, D.D., Recording Secretary; Rev. H. R. Wilson, Jr., Treasurer. Office, 23 Centre street, New York city.

Presbyterian Board of Publication. The germ of the Presbyterian Board of Publication was planted in Philadelphia in the year 1833. Its original design was the publication of tracts and other small works treating of the distinctive doctrines and polity of the Presbyterian Church. Among those most zealous and active in bringing about an organization for this purpose were the Revs. Ashbel Green, D.D., John McDowell, D.D., C. C. Cuyler, D.D., William M. Engles, D.D., Samuel G. Winchester, and among the ruling elders, Solomon Allen, Matthew L. Bevan, Alexander Symington, Alexander W. Mitchell, M.D., and Alexander Henry, with many others of like minds. An overture was drawn up and laid before the Synod of Philadelphia, which, on November 21st, 1833, organized and established "The Presbyterian Tract and Sunday School Book Society." Being without funds and without tracts, during the first year the Society accomplished little, but in 1835 issued its first tract. It was on the subject of Baptism, its author being the Rev. Samuel Miller, D.D., of Princeton, N. J. This was followed by others, until in 1838 it had issued eighteen tracts and one small volume, of which its entire issue was 104,000 copies. In the latter year (1838) this young but now growing Society was offered to the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, which promptly and cordially accepted the grant, and reorganized the Institution, under the name of "The Assembly's Board of Publication of Tracts and Sunday-school Books," which in 1839 was again changed to the present name, "The Presbyterian Board of Publication." The Assembly also endowed the Board with ample powers to conduct a work demanded by the wants of a wide and rapidly growing Denomination. The first small volume issued by it was entitled "The Way of Salvation," by the Rev. Archibald Alexander, D.D. The scope of the Board's work was broadened by the Assembly so as to include the publication also "of approved works in support of the great principles of the Reformation, as exhibited in the doctrines and order of the Presbyterian Church, and whatever else the Assembly may direct," which, permanent or periodical, are adapted to promote sound learning and true religion. The Society's Board of Managers was constituted of forty ministers and forty laymen (afterwards increased to a total of 101), divided into four classes, appointed by the Assembly for a term of four years, one class to go out of office each year.

The semi-centenary of the establishment of the Presbyterian Church in this country in its complete arrangements, occurring in the year 1839, the Assembly appointed the second Sabbath in December of that year to be observed, with religious solemnity, as a day of praise and prayer, to be accompanied by "gifts" to this infant Board of Publication. From these gifts or collections the Board received about $40,000, and was thus provided with a moderate capital. A charter of incorporation was obtained from the Legislature of Pennsylvania in 1847. Under judicious and energetic management the Institution henceforth prospered, gaining favor with the churches and enjoying the often expressed confidence and approval of the General Assembly.

During the civil war of 1861-5 this Board took an active part in the work of supplying the soldiers and sailors on both sides of the great conflict with suitable books and tracts. At the opening of the war many thousand dollars' worth of such books and tracts were in the South. The Board authorized these to be distributed to the Confederate soldiers and sailors. Large quantities of small books and tracts were distributed to the Union soldiers and sailors, through the agency of the Christian Commission. Over 300,000 copies of "The Soldier's Pocket-Book," were thus distributed gratuitously.

The business of the Board soon became so large that a commodious building became a necessity, and in the year 1848 such a building, three stories high, and of brick, No. 265 (which number was afterwards changed by a new numbering to No. 821) Chestnut street, was purchased and occupied, but was destroyed by fire in January, 1849. The loss was partly covered by insurance, and the remainder of it was made up by generous contributions from a number of churches and from a few liberal gentlemen, chiefly from New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore, when a larger and much more commodious building, of three stories, with a brown stone front, was erected. This was occupied by the Board until after the reunion of the Old and New School churches, in 1870.

As early as 1810 the Board made the experiment of distributing its books by colporteurs, to be paid out of the income of the store. In 1847 the present system was adopted, by which its publications were carried by men commissioned as colporteurs, to the destitute, for gratuitous distribution and for sale. The attention of the churches was called to it, and contributions were procured for the purpose. Great success attended this branch of the Board's work, and colporteurs have ever since been kept in the field. They have accomplished, and are now accomplishing, an unspeakable amount of good, by going from house to house, holding religious conversation and prayer, and distributing, both by sale and gift, the books and tracts issued by the Board. Multitudes, in every part of the land, but chiefly in the West, of the poor, the needy, and those destitute of religious privileges, have thus been reached and benefited.

Meanwhile the New School Branch of the Presbyterian Church in 1852 organized its "Doctrinal Tract Committee," which title was changed in 1855 to "Presbyterian Publication Committee." In 1857, by the aid of collections from the churches and generous contributions from several Philadelphia gentlemen, prominent among whom was John A. Brown, Esq., the property No. 1331 Chestnut street, opposite the United States Mint, was secured, a book store opened, and a thriving business established therein, after many and arduous struggles.

At the reunion of the two branches of the Presbyterian Church, in 1870, these two concerns, the Old School "Presbyterian Board of Publication" and the New School "Presbyterian Publication Committee," were united into one, under the former name, and built the present commodious and beautiful edifice, opposite the United States Mint, on Chestnut street, which is still occupied by its book store, its offices, and, on its invitation, by those of various other branches of the benevolent work of the Presbyterian Church. Its catalogue now contains the names of over 2500 of its own publications, of which about 1500 are volumes, the remainder being tracts and pamphlets. It regularly issues eleven religious periodicals, some of them illustrated, for the Sabbath schools, young people and families of the Presbyterian Church, of which eleven periodicals alone it issued during the year April 1st, 1882-83, 11,940,819 copies. It published during the same year, of the volumes on its catalogue, 443,750 copies.

By direction of the General Assembly, a depository of the Board's publications has been established at Chicago, Ill., and also at St. Louis, Mo., and business arrangements have been made by which its issues can be obtained, at Philadelphia prices, in Harrisburg and Pittsburg, Pa.; New York city, Albany, Syracuse and Buffalo, N. Y.; Cincinnati and Cleveland, Ohio; Detroit, Mich.; Minneapolis, Minn.; Omaha, Neb.; Denver, Col.; Indianapolis, Ind.; Baltimore, Md.; Richmond, Va.; Halifax, N. S.; London, Ont.; and Montreal, Quebec.

The present officers of the Board are, President, Rev. W. P. Breed, D. D.; Vice Presidents, Hon. Joseph Allison, LL. D., Rev. Thomas J. Shepherd, D. D., Rev. J. A. Henry, D. D.; Corresponding Secretary, Rev. William E. Schenck, D. D.; Editorial Secretary, Rev. John W. Dulles, D. D.; Secretary of Sabbath-school Work, Rev. James A. Worden, D. D.; Business Superintendent, John A. Black; Recording Clerk, Rev. Willard M. Rice, D. D.; Treasurer, S. D. Powell.

Presbyterian Church, Second, Cincinnati, Ohio. The first records of this congregation are dated January 29th, 1816, though its organization was not authoritatively settled till 1817. It originated virtually in a small colony from the First Presbyterian Church of the city. They were pious and devoted people. They worshiped for some two years in such rooms as they could find about the city; in private houses, in school-rooms and the like. In an application to the Presbytery for a minister to supply them, they offered the sum of $550 per annum. In 1817 or 1818 they erected a small frame building on the east side of Walnut street, a little north of Fifth, where they continued to worship for about twelve years. The erection of this humble building cost them not a little trouble and anxiety. An aged lady of the congregation used to relate that at one time they were stopped in the work, for want of lumber; they had not been able to lay it in beforehand, and there was none in the city and none expected. They had a prayer meeting at her house, and, among other things, prayed earnestly that God would help them along with the work. Next morning some of the members happening to be at the river, saw a raft of lumber afloat which the men aboard could not land, for want of help. So they hurried out, helped them ashore, and in return got a supply of lumber very cheap, and thanked God for it. The architect of the court house had a lot of window sash which, through some mistake, would not fit, and gave them to the church at half price. Thus it was that little church was built. The salary of Mr. Root, the first settled pastor, was nominally one thousand dollars, but it was fixed at a time when the circulating medium there was greatly depreciated, and ultimately, contracts of that period were generally settled at one-third discount for specie; so that Mr. Root, at the beginning of his pastorate, received only six hundred and sixty-six dollars in coin.

In 1827 the subject of building a new church was agitated. The site on Fourth street was selected as peculiarly eligible, central, conspicuous, yet retired and quiet. There was then no business on that street, and there were scarcely any buildings on the square. In the Spring of 1828 a contract of purchase was made with the Bank of the United States, for $5000. A building committee was appointed, consisting of Jacob Burnet, who, as Judge Burnet, exerted as great an influence in the judicial and legislative affairs of the State as any other man; Martin Baum, who was a distinguished merchant of the earliest period of the city, proverbial for unostentatious honesty; John H. Groesbeck, who was long a model merchant and banker, and did much to maintain a high tone of mercantile integrity in the city; Timothy S. Goodman, long a successful merchant and banker, and highly esteemed by all; Jonathan Bates and John T. Drake, also merchants, and men of sterling worth, and highly respected; Henry Starr, a lawyer, of distinguished talents and learning, distinguished by the epithet, an honest lawyer, and Nathaniel Wright, a gentleman of exemplary Christian character, who survived all with whom he was associated on the committee.

The corner-stone of the edifice which it had been decided to build was laid May 13th, 1829, in the presence of a large congregation, with appropriate solemnities. On the 20th of May, 1830, the building was publicly dedicated to the worship of the Triune God. It was regarded as an ornament to the young city; was commended by the press as a work of art; a specimen of chaste style of architecture, a Grecian chapel with a Doric portico, a style which has stood the criticism of two thousand years. The church was incorporated by Act of the Legislature, February 11th, 1829. The first Board of Trustees, under the charter, was elected May 4th, 1829, and were Jacob Burnet, Martin Bann, John H. Groesbeck, Nathanael Wright, Timothy S. Goodman, Jesse Kimball, and John T. Drake. The city had a large clock, with no place to put it, and in January, 1831, the use of the tower and the bell was granted for this purpose.

The original members of this church were eleven in number. The first ruling elders elected were Robert Wallace, Daniel Tremper, John Kelso and Jesse Churchill. It was some time before a pastor was settled. For a considerable time the pulpit was supplied successively by the Rev. Samuel Robinson, the Rev. William Arthur and the Rev. John Thomson, father of the distinguished missionary and author, who has spent a life of great usefulness in Palestine. Rev. David Root was elected pastor September 4th, 1819, commenced his services the latter part of 1820, and continued pastor till the Spring of 1832, when he resigned. The Rev. Lyman Beecher, who had been appointed Professor in Lane Seminary, in connection with his duties in that Institution, supplied the pulpit from November, 1832; was formally elected pastor March 11th, 1833, and so continued to the Fall of 1843. In the Spring of that year a colony of thirty-six was dismissed from this church, for the purpose of organizing the George Street Presbyterian Church, since known as the Seventh Street Church. The Rev. John P. Cleveland was pastor of the church from August 2d, 1843, to December, 1845; the Rev. Samuel W. Fisher from October 26th, 1846, to July, 1858; the Rev. M. L. P. Thompson from December 15th, 1859, to May, 1865; the Rev. James L. Robertson from April 3d, 1867, to November, 1870; and the Rev. Thomas H. Skinner from July 12th, 1871, to 1882, when he resigned to accept a professorship in the Theological Seminary of the Northwest at Chicago. Some of these ministers are more particularly noticed elsewhere in this volume.

In 1861 the question of selling the church lot on Fourth street began to be discussed by the members of the congregation. In October, 1866, it was decided that the lot should be sold, and a new church erected. In consequence of the price fixed, and other impediments, matters remained in this situation until 1871. In that year the trustees were instructed to proceed at once to sell, without restricting them as to price or otherwise, and buy a lot and build a new church. The old church property was sold for $160,000, and two lots on Elm street were bought, for an aggregate cost of $71,000. On Sunday evening, April 2-5th, 1872, the congregation met for the last time in the old church, and listened to an appropriate historical address by Elder Nathanael Wright, which was subsequently published. On May 1st possession was given to the purchaser, and in the work of demolition that commenced at once soon disappeared the last trace of the old home of the congregation.

Thereafter, until the occupation of the new chapel, the congregation met in the Cincinnati College Hall. The pastor's study was located in the same building. The Sunday school found hospitable quarters in the Ninth Street Baptist Church, and the Bible class, in the First Presbyterian Church. The corner-stone of the new edifice was laid, with appropriate services, July 28th, 1873. On Sunday, March 8th, 1874, religious services were held for the first time in the chapel of the new building, when Dr. Skinner preached, on Isaiah, lix, 10. Thereafter the congregation met in the chapel until January 3d, 1875, when the first services were held in the main building. Dr. Skinner preached in the morning on 1 Tim. iii, 15, and in the evening on 1 Peter ii, 15, on both occasions to very large congregations. On Sunday, April 11th, 1875, the new building was solemnly consecrated to its sacred uses, the Rev. J. L. Robertson and the Rev. Drs. Skinner and H. J. Van Dyke taking part in the interesting exercises. Such is a succinct account of a congregation which has been largely blessed, as well as eminently useful, and of a church in which the glorious gospel of the blessed God has been long and ably, and faithfully preached.

Presbyterian Church in Connecticut. Presbyterianism has not been without right in Connecticut. The principal friends and patrons of the colony at the time of its settlement were Presbyterians, and so were many of those who came over at an early day. Some of the first ministers of this colony were avowed Presbyterians. The later Puritan emigration brought with it "a heaven of Presbyterianism," says Dr. Bacon, and its workings are to be traced in the Saybrook Platform. Under the system of church government defined by that Platform the Consociation could be made, and was made, to a great extent, a judicial and authoritative tribunal, corresponding with the Presbytery. In keeping with these facts the name Presbyterian has been applied very commonly to the churches of Connecticut, and on more than one occasion it has been affirmed, upon high authority, that the system of church order prevailing among them was really Presbyterianism.

But the churches in Connecticut that have been in a stricter and more usual sense Presbyterian have never been numerous, unless they have come into existence under special conditions.

In Tollandtown, Windham county, a Presbyterian church was organized October 15th, 1723. Its first pastor, Samuel Dorrance, was settled in that year and dismissed in 1770. The church was reorganized June 30th, 1779, as a Congregational church.

In Milford, New Haven county, a considerable minority of the people left the established or Congregational Church in 1741, and "professed themselves to be Presbyterians according to the Church of Scotland." The secession resulted from the dissatisfaction awakened upon the settlement of Rev. Samuel Whittlesey, December, 1737, who was regarded as unsound in doctrine. The Presbytery of New Brunswick took the newly formed congregation under its care, and sent Rev. Samuel Finley, afterward President of Princeton College, to preach to them. But the congregation had not obtained recognition, either from the civil or ecclesiastical authorities of the colony, as a religious society, and for the offence of preaching to them Mr. Finley was indicted, arrested, and sentenced to be transported, as a vagrant and a disturber of the public peace, out of the colony. In 1747 Job Prudden, a licentiate under the care of the Presbytery of New Brunswick, was ordained and installed as pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Milford. The people, however, continued to be taxed for the support of the Congregational minister. The Connecticut law, while it exempted from such taxation certain religious societies duly authorized to have worship in their own way, refused thus to exempt seceding Congregationalists and Presbyterians. In 1750 they were released from this burden, and ten years later they obtained from the Legislature an incorporation as the second ecclesiastical society in Milford, and their connection with Presbytery ceased. "Mr. Prudden was a laborious, prudent, and faithful pastor, sound in doctrine and experimental in his preaching. His people were entirely and universally satisfied with his talents, meekness and piety." He died June 24th, 1774.

In Mansfield, Tolland county, a minority of the church, together with the bulk of the congregation, under the ministry of Rev. John Sherman (1797 to 1805), went over with him to Unitarianism. A majority of the membership of the church, however, held on to the faith as delivered to the saints, and, by a formal vote, changed their ecclesiastical organization from the Congregational to the Presbyterian order, upon the ground of its more scriptural character. This form of government continued for many years. The last ruling elders were ordained in 1833. These are all dead, or have removed from the town, and committees have been appointed from time to time, to act according to Congregational usages; but there has never been a direct vote of the church to change back to Congregationalism.

The second church in Cornwall, Litchfield county (now the church in North Cornwall), was formed about or before the year 1790, by members seceding from the First Church, and "denominating themselves strict Congregationalists or Separates." Rev. John Cornwall, their pastor, was a member of the Presbytery of Morris county, and united with others, in 1791, in forming the Associated West Chester Presbytery. The congregation continued its relations to that Presbytery until the year 1807, when its differences with the First Church were composed, and it was dismissed to the care of the North Association of Litchfield County. This church "has been very greatly blessed with revivals, from its beginning until the present time, and is now in a prosperous condition."

The Presbyterian congregations that have been formed more recently in Connecticut have been composed largely of persons originally belonging to Presbyterian churches in the Middle States or in lands across the sea. Three of these congregations have ceased to exist, and a fourth has joined another ecclesiastical body. The remaining seven are now in connection with the Presbytery of West Chester, Synod of New York. Besides these there is one under the care of the Presbytery of New York, of the United Presbyterian Church.

The First Presbyterian Church of Thompsonville, Hartford county, was gathered under the labors of Rev. Joseph Harvey, D.D., and was organized by the Presbytery of New York, July 5th, 1839. Dr. Harvey continued to be its pastor until April 28th, 1857. He died in Michigan, February 4th, 1873, aged eighty-six years. His successors have been Rev. Carson W. Adams, installed December 1st, 1857, dismissed June 1st, 1868; Rev. Henry F. Lee, installed July 13th, 1869, dismissed December 20th, 1873; and Rev. Frederick S. Barnum, present incumbent, installed July 20th, 1874. Membership (1883), 249.

The Presbyterian Church of Tariffville, Hartford county, was constituted by the Presbytery of New York, October 24th, 1844. Its first and only pastor was Rev. Robert G. Thompson. The pastoral relation was dissolved by the Presbytery of Connecticut, September 11th, 1853. After Mr. Thompson left, the church was practically disbanded.

The United Presbyterian Church of Thompsonville, Hartford county, was organized December 22d, 1845, as the Associate Reformed Presbyterian (now United Presbyterian) congregation. On the first Sabbath of September, 1845, an instrument of music was first employed to assist in the singing of the First Presbyterian Church. Its introduction followed a somewhat heated controversy, and a part of the congregation, with three elders, withdrew and formed this church. The following have been its pastors: Rev. Peter Gordon, from April, 1847, to March, 11, 1851; Rev. James MacLoughlin, from September 12th, 1851, to July 10th, 1857; Rev. John M. Heron, from 1858 to June, 1861; Rev. William B. Sutherland, from July, 1866, for about six months; Rev. George M. Hall, from 1868 to June, 1872, and Rev. C. L. McCracken, from October 28th, 1873, to the present time (1883). It has now a membership of 140.

The First Presbyterian Church of Hartford was organized by the Presbytery of Connecticut, November 4th, 1851. A congregation had been gathered through the labors of Rev. James Ely, commissioned by the Board of Domestic Missions during the previous Summer. Rev. Thomas S. Childs, the first pastor, was ordained and installed June 30th, 1852. The pastoral relation was dissolved October 18th, 1865. He was succeeded by Rev. J. Aspinwall Hodge, the present incumbent, who began his labors February 8th, 1866, and was installed May 4th, 1866. During Dr. Hodge's pastorate a new and commodious church has been built. Membership (1883), 263.

The Presbyterian Church of Stamford was organized by the Third Presbytery of New York, February 26th, 1853. The pastors have been: Rev. J. Leonard Corning, April 19th, 1853, to October 15th, 1856; Rev. Robert R. Booth, March 4th, 1857, to February 18th, 1861; Rev. Dwight K. Bartlett, April 14th, 1862, to February 23d, 1864; Rev. Samuel P. Halsey, March 8th, 1865, to February 7th, 1867; Rev. Alexander S. Twombly, April 30th, 1868, to May 1st, 1872; Rev. Evert Van Dyke, April 23d, 1873, to October 1st, 1875; and the present pastor, Rev. Richard P. H. Vail, who was installed May 11th, 1876. The church building was struck by lightning and destroyed by fire, August 7th, 1882. Additional ground was at once purchased, and a stone church is now in process of erection, which will be completed early in 1881, at a cost of about $85,000. Membership (1883), 310.

The Presbyterian Church of Bridgeport was formed October 16th, 1853, when eighty-two persons, having withdrawn from the Second Congregational Church, entered into a church relation, and requested the Presbytery of New York to receive them under its care. They were so received, and their first pastor, Rev. Nathanael Hewit, D. D., was installed, October 31st, 1853. Rev. Horace G. Hinsdale was installed as associate pastor October 28th, 1862. Dr. Hewit died February 3d, 1867, in the seventy-ninth year of his age. The first church edifice was dedicated August 8th, 1855, and was destroyed by fire December 9th, 1871, and replaced by a beautiful stone structure, which was dedicated October 12th, 1876. Mr. Hinsdale resigned his charge October 4th, 1877. His successor, Rev. Henry A. Davenport, was installed February 14th, 1878. Membership (1883) 231.

The Presbyterian Church of Deep River, Middlesex county, was organized July 27th, 1856, by the Presbytery of New York. Its only pastor, Rev. George W. Committ, was released from the pastorate February 4th, 1862 (by the Presbytery of Connecticut), and its fifteen remaining members were transferred to the Presbyterian Church of Hartford.

The United Presbyterian Church of Hartford was organized on May 15th, 1862, by the Presbytery of Boston. The introduction of hymns and an instrument of music in the First Presbyterian Church caused some dissatisfaction, and one elder, with thirty-nine communicants withdrew, and with a few others formed the United Presbyterian Church. Their first pastor was Rev. W. M. Claybaugh. He was dismissed, March, 1865. Rev. John M. Heron was installed January 17th, 1866, and was dismissed December 31st, 1867. The organization was during the next year given up, and most of the members returned to the First Presbyterian Church.

The Presbyterian Church of Durien, Fairfield county, was organized by the Fourth Presbytery of New York, November 4th, 1863. Its first pastor, Rev. James W. Coleman, was ordained and installed March 6th, 1864. He resigned his pastorate January 4th, 1874. The church continued without a settled ministry until July 7th, 1881, when the Rev. E. P. Cleveland was ordained and installed pastor. He was dismissed October 3d, 1882, since which time the church had stated supplies. Membership (1883), 33.

The German Presbyterian Church of Bridgeport was organized in 1865, by the Presbytery of Connecticut. It was dismissed a few years after, to place itself under the care of the German Reformed Church.

The Presbyterian Church of New Haven was organized by the Presbytery of Westchester, March 11th, 1873. Financial embarrassments made it necessary to abandon the enterprise, and the church was dissolved by the same Presbytery, January 19th, 1875.

The Presbyterian Church of Greenwich, Fairfield county, was organized April 26th, 1881, by the Presbytery of Westchester; thirty-two persons withdrawing from the Second Congregational Church of that town to form this organization. Rev. Rollin A. Sawyer, D. D., is its acting pastor. Membership (1883), 64.

Presbyterian Church (First), Indianapolis, Ind., was formed July 5th, 1823, with a membership of fifteen, eight by letters and seven on profession. The town was incorporated in 1821. The first sermon by a Presbyterian minister was preached by Rev. Ludwell G. Gaines, a missionary from Ohio, on the 21st of August, 1821, under a large walnut tree. Rev. David Proctor, of the Connecticut Missionary Society, supplied three-fourths of the time for one year. During his ministry a house of worship was built, at a cost of $1200. The first pastor was Rev. George Bush, from May 5th, 1825, to June 23d, 1828. His successors were Rev. John R. Morland, from October 27th, 1828, to May 15th, 1832; Rev. James W. McKenna, from June 11th, 1835, to April, 1839; Rev. P. D. Gurley, from December 15th, 1840, to November 28th, 1849; Rev. John A. McClung, from December 31st, 1851, to September 29th, 1855; Rev. T. M. Cunningham, from May 7th, 1857, to May, 1860; Rev. J. H. Nixon, from April 17th, 1861, to April 11th, 1869; Rev. R. D. Harper, from October 19th, 1869, to February 23d, 1871; Rev. J. P. E. Kumbler, from October 1st, 1871, to September 11th, 1875; and the present incumbent, Rev. M. W. Reed, installed October 4th, 1877. In the intervals between pastorates the church has generally been favored with stated supplies. Of the ten pastors only the last four survive. From its members eight have entered the ministry. This church has been the honored mother of others in the city. In 1838 fifteen of its members united in forming the Second Church. Twenty-one were dismissed in September, 1851, to organize the Third Church. The Seventh and Ninth churches were the results of Sabbath-school efforts, begun and continued by its members. Both of them were furnished with comfortable houses of worship by the liberality of members of the First Church. This church had the principal agency in forming the first Sabbath school in this city. One of its elders, Dr. Isaac Coe, is justly regarded as the founder of Sabbath schools in Indianapolis. This church has a memorable history. It has been blessed with a line of faithful and highly useful pastors. Many of its members have been prominent for Christian activity and practical benevolence.

Presbyterian Church in Southern Illinois, since January 9th, 1829. Since the erection of "Centre Presbytery of Illinois," some one hundred and eighty ministers have entered this field as pastors, stated supplies or evangelists. In the delicate work of selecting some representative lives to go on this limited record, we will observe this distinction: 1. Some whose ministry has been developed on this field; 2. Some who have been especially useful in building up the churches.

Rev. Thomas Lippincott was the first minister ordained by Centre Presbytery, and was prominent in worth and usefulness. (See his sketch.)

Rev. Isaac Bennet was another licentiate in the bounds of Centre Presbytery when it was formed. He was born in Bucks county, Pa.; graduated at Jefferson College, Pa., in 1827; was a member of the first class in the Western Theological Seminary; was licensed by the "Addison Congregational Association" at Monckton, Vt., June 4th, 1829; and was commissioned by the "Assembly's Board of Domestic Missions" to Carmi and Sharon, Ill., August 3d, 1829. He was stated supply of Pleasant Prairie Church, 1830-33; and ordained by the Presbytery of Palestine, April, 1833. In the Fall of 1833 he located in Lawrence county, in a wing of Father Bliss' charge, and here Pisgah Church was organized, in 1835. He was stated supply at Canton, Ill., 1851-56, and died there in June, 1856. Mr. Bennet possessed a mind of logical grasp and power, his thoughts were vigorous, and his language and manner plain. The common people heard him gladly. He was a great Bible student, and the best scholar in New Testament Greek among his brethren. In unfolding the gospel he made much and grand use of the history, prophecy, and types of the Old Testament. Taken all in all, he was the greatest preacher of the gospel in his day and field. He was an active Christian, and had an insatiable fondness for religious conversation. As a missionary he was an incredible worker. His long and lonely tours to destitute places, filled with incessant preaching, conversation, interviews, on the roads and in their cabins, with all kinds of people, and always on the one topic that absorbed him, made up his experience during the week. By Sabbath he was quite likely to be back in his pulpit. Rev. R. H. Lilly, a contemporary says: "He must have preached not less than one hundred and seventy good long sermons a year, for twenty years, and traveled, mostly on horseback, three thousand miles each year." Thus he ran on the heavenly errand.

Under the ministry of Mr. Bennet, a man native to the soil and a product of Presbyterian ordinances alone, became a representative elder—THOMAS BUCKANAN, Esq. He was born in an Indian fort in Gallatin county, Ky., of Scotch ancestry, and raised by a pious grandmother, who "fed him on the Bible and the Shorter Catechism." In 1813 he went with Governor Shelby's expedition to Canada, and was in the battle of the Thames. In April, 1819, he removed to Lawrence county, Ill., connected with the Wabash Presbyterian Church, on profession of faith, November, 1828, and was elected a ruling elder in 1833. When Pisgah Church was organized he was elected elder in it, and served forty-one years. Mr. Buchanan was blessed with a good constitution, and was a man of strong will and firm purpose. In that early day drinking customs prevailed. He became convinced that liquors were injurious, stopped drinking and began to agitate temperance views. This was long before the "Washingtonian Movement." After his conversion he came to the front in all Christian work. He was Sabbath-school superintendent at Pisgah, chorister, and leader every way. But, best of all, he "studied to be a workman needing not to be ashamed"; studied his Bible and religious books, and gave diligence to know the system of saving truth. He loved the Scriptures, and gloried in the distinctive doctrines and mission of the Presbyterian Church. And Pisgah "flourished as a field that the Lord hath," "rejoiced even with joy and singing," with Mr. Bennet as pastor and Mr. Buchanan as the matchless organizer. In later years he engaged as a "Colporteur of the Board of Publication," and traveled extensively in Southern Illinois. What makes his character and life shine brighter is the fact that naturally he was choleric, opinionated and harsh in temper and speech. Almost to the last the old flame would sometimes burst out. But grace had a great triumph in steadfast, loving, "old Uncle Tommy." He was an excellent presbyter. He was often sent to the General Assembly. In 1867 he nominated Dr. P. D. Gurley, President Lincoln's pastor, for Moderator of the Assembly, and was one of the committee to escort him to the Chair. He died in great peace, November 26th, 1876, at his old homestead, the "first house in the country raised without liquor."

REV. JOSIAH WOOD was born at Cobbleshill, N. Y., April 7th, 1814. He studied at Hanover College, Ind., and Lane Seminary, but did not graduate. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Madison, April 4th, 1843, and ordained by the same, October 12th, 1843. He was pastor of "Nine Mile Prairie Presbyterian Church," Ill. (Old Du Quoin), November, 1843, to September, 1851. In view of the need of an evangelist in the country around, filling up rapidly with new settlers, he resigned his pastorate, and gave himself to arduous itinerant labors. Twice he took charge again of "Old Du Quoin," when vacant, and when the 'Seminary' needed his energies, but at last he removed to Tamaroa, in 1863, where he closed his life, June 5th, 1870. This general field was the scene of his twenty-seven years of ministerial life. He organized some of the most important churches on the Ill. C. R.R. He was very successful in revival meetings. Under his ministry "Du Quoin Female Seminary" came into being.

Rev. John Crosier was born in Manchester, Ohio, August 29th, 1822. He graduated at Miami University in 1848; studied theology at New Albany Theological Seminary in 1851; was licensed by the Presbytery of New Albany, April 3d, 1850, and ordained by the Presbytery of Palestine, April, 1852. He was stated supply, Palestine, Ill., 1851-52; Charleston, Ind.; Iowa City, Ia., and Palestine, Ill., 1852-5. He was agent of the Board of Domestic Missions, 1855-57; Olney, Ill., 1857-66; missionary of the Presbytery of Saline, 1866-67; pastor, Oxford, Ohio, 1867-69; pastor, North Sangamon, Ill., 1869-81; pastor, Olney, Ill., 1881; stated supply, St. Croix Falls, Minn., 1883. Mr. Crosier has assisted in organizing churches in this field, and performed a vast amount of missionary work. His talents and his temperament qualify him for this form of service. He is distinguished for his sound theology and his scriptural and exhaustive discussions. His fervent manner, plain language and homely and pertinent illustrations make him very acceptable to the average hearer.

Rev. Samuel C. Baldrige was born in Eugene, Ind., August 6th, 1829. He graduated at Hanover College in 1849, and at New Albany Theological Seminary in 1853. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Madison, 1853; ordained by the Presbytery of Palestine, October, 1851. He was stated supply and then pastor at Wabash, Friendsville, 1853-1882, with much oversight and service among vacant and feeble churches in the wide field. Pastor at Cobden, Ill., 1882. The chief features of Mr. Baldrige's long pastorate in this humble field are, the organization of five churches; reception of more than three hundred members; the establishment of the "Friendsville Male and Female Seminary;" 1860, publication of the "Sketches of the Life and Times of the Rev. Stephen Bliss and his Co-Laborers," with an average of three preaching services a week for more than twenty-nine years.

Rev. Benjamin C. Swan was born near Camden, Ohio, November 27th, 1823. He graduated at Miami University in 1845, and studied theology at the Associate Theological Seminary, Oxford, O., Western Theological Seminary, and New Albany Theological Seminary. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Oxford, 1850, and ordained by same 1851. He was stated supply in Oxford Presbytery two years; organized Presbyterian Church, Carthage, Ill., and pastor, 1853-60; pastor at Shawneetown, 1860-68; stated supply of Carmi, Enfield and Sharon, 1868-70; pastor of Carmi, 1870-77; stated supply of Enfield, Sharon and McLeansboro, 1877; stated supply at Harrisburg, 1883. Mr. Swan is a close student, and entirely devoted to his work. His influence over his charge is always good, and when he leaves a field it is strong and united. He has shown special talent in educating and bringing out favorite elders into active work. One example among many must suffice, that of the Rev. John Mack, M. D. This useful brother was practicing medicine at Carthage, and was made a ruling elder at the organization of the church. He studied and applied theology in his duties as an elder, left his practice, and was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Schmyler. He was stated supply at Equality, with great blessing on his labors, 1859-61; ordained by Presbytery of Saline, April, 1860; stated supply and then pastor at Pisgah, Bridgeport and Union, with much growth and enlargement, 1861-70; and dismissed to Presbytery of Topeka. His preaching was eminently sound, fresh and vigorous, and full of good fruits. At Equality his Calvinistic doctrines were publicly assailed. The licentiate answered at once, with unexpected force, and continued to preach the Scriptures on the points in question with such simplicity, convincing logic and good spirit, that a great awakening followed.

Among the pastors or stated supplies who have been especially useful in more or less brief service, and whom we are now to notice, one of the most remarkable was the Rev. William Chamberlin. He was born at Newberry, Vt., February 29th, 1791; led by singular providences to Christ in 1811; found himself inclined and led on to activity in Christ's service; had a year's schooling in the Academy at Wilkesbarre, Pa., 1816; was sent by the A. B. C. F. M., to the Cherokee Indians in Georgia, 1818-35, and was missionary for Alton Presbytery, 1840-49. In these nine years he was traveling almost incessantly, and occupied with preaching, conversing, praying, distributing tracts, and striving to save souls. His coming was animating to a congregation. Wherever he appeared something was going to be done for God and man. His piety was vital and contagious. He assisted in organizing fourteen churches. He died at Alton, March 14th, 1849, while assisting in a glorious revival.

Rev. Robert C. Galbraith was born in Indiana county, Pa., February 26th, 1811. He graduated at Jefferson College in 1834; at Princeton Theological Seminary in 1837; was licensed by the Presbytery of Huntingdon, 1836, and ordained by the Presbytery of East Hanover in 1844. He was a missionary in Virginia, and pastor in Baltimore, 1844-65. In 1865, pastor at Odin, Ill., then Odin and Flora, each one-half his time; then Flora and Fairfield half his time, and then Fairfield, 1873-81. He was pastor at Metropolis, 1881, and at Golconda, 1882. In the Odin field, this genial, tireless, loving brother revealed his zeal. The new railroads were planting villages in the prairies, and he sowed beside all waters. With him pastoral care meant visiting the poor, the sick, the stranger, and neglected people and neighborhoods, and ceaseless ministrations every way. But this local work was mixed with church building and evangelistic tours far and near, assisting pastors and vacant churches, often with great blessings. The brick edifices at Odin and Fairfield, and the church and parsonage at Flora, are relics of those days. Mr. Galbraith is a good scholar, an omnivorous reader, and uses current literature freely in pulpit services. He is a platform preacher, using no 'notes,' at least only a 'brief,' and is, beyond all comparison, the most animated speaker and talker in the Presbytery, even at seventy-two years of age.

These sketches must not omit mention of one of the most eminent ministers of the Presbytery, merely as a preacher—the deep-thoughted Christian orator, the Rev. John S. Hawkins. He was born at Chambersburg, Pa., August 8th, 1800; graduated at Washington College, Pa., 1818; at the Western Theological Seminary, 1827; was licensed by Washington Presbytery, April 21st, 1825, and ordained by same, October, 1827. He was pastor at Connersville, Pa., fifteen years; stated supply of Sharon and Carmi, 1844-50; stated supply at Mount Carmel, 1852-56; stated supply at Baxter Springs and at Carbondale, 1872-82. In his work he depended almost entirely upon his sermons. Free and genial with a favored few, an instructive and courtly guest, his habits were those of seclusion. On the Sabbath he would come forth "laden with the riches of the gospel of Christ." There was no difference in his sermons, whether preached in cabin or cathedral, to many or few. They were always elaborate, scriptural, packed with truth, robust, clothed in language fastidiously exact, and delivered in a style deliberate, vigorous and impressive. At 82 years he "retired," with his intellectual force well nigh unabated, from the important Church of Carbondale.

Rev. Benjamin Y. George, lately pastor of the Presbyterian Church in the city of Cairo, Ill., is conspicuous as a Christian gentleman, kind, cordial and frank. He is universally esteemed, excels as a preacher, and is faithful as a pastor. In plagues of yellow fever, smallpox or cholera, his parish, at the confluence of the Mississippi and Ohio rivers, was peculiarly exposed, but in every case he remained with his people, and shared their dangers and duties. As a presbyter he is prudent, clear and firm. Mr. George was born January 3d, 1843, in Calloway county, Mo.; graduated at Westminster College in 1859, and studied theology at Princeton Theological Seminary. He was stated supply of the Second Church, Newburyport, Mass., 1863, and pastor 1864-66; stated supply at Columbia, Mo., 1867-70; Professor of the Latin Language in Westminster College, 1870-73; stated supply of Webster Street Church, St. Louis, Mo., 1873-5; stated supply at Cairo, 1875-78, and pastor, 1878-83; pastor of Lewiston, Ill., 1883. His labors have been blessed with revivals at Cairo, Cobden, etc.

Rev. Evan S. Davies was stated supply at Anna, 1872-74, and again, 1877-79; stated supply of "Plymouth Congregational Church," Cobden, 1872-77. This church adopted the Presbyterian Form of Government, August 12th, 1874, and came under the care of the Presbytery of Cairo. Under his ministry occurred the remarkable revivals of 1876-7, by which seventy-seven souls were added to the church—sixty-eight by profession of their faith, in the midst of an infidel community. Mr. Davies was the man for this field. He was skilled in the Natural Sciences, had been in the Faculty of Farmer College, Ohio, and stated supply at Battle Creek, Mich. He was familiar with skeptical thought. "Prof." William Denton, of Boston, Mass., delivered a course of lectures in the Horticultural Hall, in the interest of Atheism. Mr. Davies met his challenge with a close-knit logic, a breadth of knowledge and a vigor that put radical views at a discount. The "Horticultural Hall" is now the "Presbyterian Church."

Presbyterian Church in Tennessee, Early History of. Near the year 1770 the van of an emigration, largely of Scotch-Irish Presbyterians, from the Valley of Virginia, from Maryland and from Pennsylvania, entered the limits of the present State of Tennessee by occupying the country—then supposed to be in Virginia—on the right bank of the Holston river and lying in the present counties of Sullivan and Hawkins. The river in this part of its course was considered the boundary between Virginia and North Carolina, as the line had not been established so far West. About the same time (1770-71) another stream of emigration from the country at the eastern base of the Blue Ridge in North Carolina was flowing into the Valley of the Watanga, and another, a few years later, into the Nolachucky Valley.

In the Autumn of 1773, John McMahon, Sr., established his family four miles from the site of Jonesborough, the oldest town in the State (laid off in 1779). No settler was then known to be south or west of the McMahon's, except one or two on the Nolachucky, twelve miles distant. This family, by subsequent intermarriage with the Mitchells, from Gaillard, N. C., contributed to the formation of the future Salem Church (1780), and also contained the germ of the Hebron Church, organized in 1790, quite near their home, and in 1796 merged into the Jonesborough Church. From this family descended a godly posterity that helped to form and sustain various Presbyterian churches. It also furnished several ministers of the gospel, one of whom was the Rev. John A. Mitchell, one of the first missionaries of the Presbyterian Board to China. The Rev. Messrs. Charles Cummings and Joseph Rhea were the first Presbyterian ministers to preach in what is now Tennessee. The former became pastor of Ebbing Spring and Sinking Spring congregations, in what is now Washington county, Virginia, in 1773. The latter, an emigrant from Ireland in 1769, had charge of the Piney Creek Church, in Frederick county, Md. In 1775 and 1776 he visited the Holston settlements to find a home for his family and a field of labor. In the Autumn of 1776 Messrs. Cummings and Rhea accompanied, the former as chaplain, Colonel Christian's expedition into the country of the Cherokee Indians, south of Little Tennessee river, who had, by British agents, been excited to determined hostility against the settlers. When the object of the expedition had been accomplished, Mr. Rhea returned to Maryland, with intent to remove his family to occupy land he had purchased on Beaver Creek. While making preparations, he died, in 1777. He had, during his visits, by preaching among the settlers, chiefly in the forts, prepared the way for one, if not two churches in the Holston country. In 1779 his family, with many members of his congregation in Maryland and in York (now Adams county), Pa., joined in the march of emigration to the Holston settlement. A number of them, in the Fork of the Holston and Watauga, became New Bethel Church, in 1782.

Emigration, even during the Revolutionary War, was full and rapid. And notwithstanding the hardships of wilderness life, sentiments of patriotism filled the breasts of the backwoodsmen. Theirs was the spirit of the congregations of the Rev. Charles Cummings. Members of these, with others, assembled in council at Abingdon, January 20th, 1775, and said, "We are deliberately and resolutely determined never to surrender any of our inestimable privileges to any power on earth, but at the expense of our lives." And "from these remote regions" most effective service was rendered, both against the Indians and at King's Mountain, in the struggle for liberty. In 1778 Samuel Doak was ordained by the Presbytery of Hanover, on a call from the congregations of Concord—Upper Concord—and Hopewell, north of the Holston, in what is now Sullivan county, where Mr. Doak had preached. Mr. Doak remained here two years. He then removed to Little Limestone, in (now) Washington county, and remained there more than thirty years. Indians were hostile, but he, in concert with

Rev. Charles Cummings, in 1780, "organized" Concord, New Providence and Carter's Valley, in (now) Hawkins county; New Bethel, in (now) Greene county, and Salem, at his new place of residence. The New Bethel Church, above mentioned, was gathered by him. In 1783 or 4 Providence, in the edge of (now) Greene county, was organized, and the Rev. Samuel Houston accepted their call. He served the church four or five years, and then returned to Virginia. At Salem Mr. Doak opened a classical school, chartered in 1785 as Martin Academy—the first Institution of the kind ever established in the Valley of the Mississippi. No Institution of learning has rendered the South and West a more important service. Becoming Washington College in 1795, it continued to send forth trained men to fill up the ranks of the ministry and other professions, as well as the ordinary walks of life. The students of Samuel Doak were almost the only teachers in the infant settlements of the West and South. He not only served Salem Church and conducted Martin Academy, but preached far and near, as settlements extended. He, Cummings and Houston, were still members of the Presbytery of Hanover.

The Presbytery of Orange properly covered this whole region, but the Alleghenies interposed a barrier to attendance on its meetings by the Western brethren. In May, 1785, Hezekiah Baleb, a member of Orange Presbytery, having taken charge of Mt. Bethel, joined with Messrs. Doak and Cummings in a petition to Synod that a new Presbytery might be formed west of the Alleghenies. The Presbytery of Abingdon was accordingly erected; separated from Hanover by New river, and from Orange by the "Apalachian mountains," and extending indefinitely westward. In May, 1786 it was divided. The Cumberland mountains bounded Abingdon on the west, with one new minister, John Cosson, yet without a field, but in after years serving Jonesborough, Providence and New Bethel. The Presbytery of Transylvania "comprehended" Kentucky and the settlements on Cumberland river. The situation of Abingdon rendered it the grand route by which the pioneer columns of the Presbyterian army were moving on to occupy the inviting country beyond the mountains. Its licentiates and ministers, one and then another, continued, for forty years, to follow the march of emigration. But unfortunately, for many years after its formation the body was in constant ferment. A schism in 1796 was the result. Psalmody was discussed with much bitterness. The disputes as to the use of Rouse or Watts had been intensified, perhaps excited, by the Rev. Adam Rankin, in his visits to the churches of Holston and Nolachucky, in 1782. Political differences also, growing out of an effort to establish the State of Franklin west of the mountains, distracted the Church. In 1786 the Synod instituted inquiry and took measures to settle the disputes of contending parties. A satisfactory result seemed to be reached.

But excitement still continued. Mr. Balch, being a zealous Hopkinsian, by his indiscretions provoked determined opposition. Finally the matter was brought before the Presbytery. The majority voted to dismiss the case. Five prominent members—three in Tennessee, Messrs. Doak, Lake and James Balch, withdrew, in 1796, and formed the Independent Presbytery of Abingdon. The complicated case engaged the attention of the Synod of the Carolinas and of the General Assembly, and both the seceding members and Mr. Balch were severely disciplined. Upon the submission of the former, the Presbytery of Abingdon was constituted as before. But in 1797 the Presbytery of Union, embracing Rev. Messrs. Hezekiah Balch, Cosson, Henderson, Blackburn and Carriek, and their charges, was set off from Abingdon, on the south, leaving as members (in Tennessee) of Abingdon, Revs. Messrs. Doak and Lake, at New Bethel, and James Balch, at Sinking Spring, Green county. In 1794 the Territorial Legislature had chartered Greenville College, with Hezekiah Balch as President, and located it three miles from Greenville. He held his office till his death, in 1810. He was succeeded by Charles Coffin, who for many years retained this position, and preached much to neighboring churches. The college was largely patronized. At one time students from nine different States and Territories were in attendance, and a more than usual proportion of them rose to eminence.

In 1797, just before the erection of Union Presbytery, Abingdon Presbytery, in a report to the General Assembly, defines its territory as "extending in length from the New river on the northeast to the frontiers on the Tennessee river on the southwest, at present about two hundred miles, and from the Blue or Eastern Ridge of the Apalachian mountains to the Cumberland mountains, about one hundred and forty miles in breadth." A portion of the territory, therefore, was in Virginia, and a part in North Carolina. Thirty-nine congregations were enumerated—eleven in Virginia, three in North Carolina, and twenty-five in Tennessee. Of these last, two were reported as extinct and twelve vacant. Many of these "vacant" churches were in after years supplied, and continue to exist, some as flourishing churches; others became extinct. Of the twenty-five, only twelve at the present day are known by their original names—viz., New Providence (Hawkins county), New Providence (Maryville), Mount Bethel, New Bethel, Providence, Jonesborough, Salem, Westminster, Hopewell (Dandridge), Concord (Lower), Knoxville and Eusebia.

In 1785 the Hopewell Church, in (now) Dandridge, Jefferson county, was formed, and in 1788 Westminster, in the same county. In 1788 Robert Henderson, licensed by the Presbytery of Abingdon, assumed the pastoral charge of these churches, and retained it for twenty years. In 1789 Rev. Samuel Carriek, just from Lexington Presbytery, Virginia, preached to a company of backwoodsmen, on a mound at the confluence of the French Broad and the Holston. Next year the Fork Church was there organized, and in 1791 Mr. Carriek was settled as its pastor. Four miles from the Fork the city of Knoxville was laid off, in 1793. Mr. Carriek began to labor here in connection with the Fork. In 1794 the Territorial Legislature established, "in the vicinity of Knoxville, Blount College," afterwards known as East Tennessee University, now the University of Tennessee. Mr. Carriek was the first President of Blount College, and held his office till his death. Ten miles from Knoxville the Grassy Valley Church began its existence in 1793. In 1798 Rev. Samuel G. Ramsey, from the Valley of Virginia, became its pastor, preaching alternate Sabbaths at Ebenezer, his home, and Pleasant Forest. In 1801 he opened the Ebenezer Academy, which, by its superior excellence, drew students for several years from a distance. After Mr. Carriek's death, in 1809, Mr. Ramsey preached every third Sabbath in Knoxville, and by his persevering efforts the first Presbyterian church edifice in that city was erected. Across the Holston, sixteen miles from Knoxville, the New Providence Church was established on the site of the present town of Maryville, in 1793 or 1794. Gideon Blackburn, recently licensed by the Presbytery of Abingdon, joined a company of soldiers to protect a fort on that site. The Cherokees were hostile, and several forts were erected in the region, to protect the settlers. Blackburn continued to preach in them all. He founded New Providence, served it and Eusebia, ten miles distant, and labored in all the country around. After peace was made, he was moved to undertake the evangelization of the Indians. In 1799 he brought the matter before Union Presbytery, and in 1803 to the General Assembly. Encouraged by this body he entered on his work eagerly, and in spite of illness and pecuniary embarrassment he continued it in connection with his pastoral charge till 1809. This noteworthy instance of personal missionary enterprise laid the foundation for the subsequent successful mission of the American Board among the Cherokees. In the prosecution of it, four churches on the Presbyterian model were organized at Brainerd, Hightower, Carmel and Wellstown, and were, in 1824, with the missionaries laboring among them, received into Union Presbytery. In 1799, from the upper end of Union, including also some churches in North Carolina, Greenville Presbytery, with three ministers, Hezekiah Balch, John Cosson and George Newton (in North Carolina), had been established. It was afterwards joined by Samuel Davis at Manore, North Carolina, and Stephen Boxelle, at Sinking Spring, Greene county. Its existence was brief, as it was dissolved by request of its members, in 1801.

The Presbytery of Transylvania had charge of the settlements on Cumberland River till 1810, when the Presbytery of West Tennessee was erected, with four members. In 1808 a colony from South Carolina, headed by Rev. James W. Stephenson, bought a large tract of land in (now) Maury county, and founded "the Frierson settlement" and Zion Church. Dr. Duncan Brown followed Stephenson from South Carolina, took charge of several newly formed churches, and made extensive missionary tours. Robert Henderson, in the year 1808, resigned his charge at Dandridge and Westminster, and entered upon work in "Cumberland," as the whole region was then called. He labored at Murfrees' Spring and Pisgah, in (now) Rutherford county; also at Franklin, and preached in Nashville, laid off in 1784, but no church edifice in it when Mr. Henderson visited it. He preached, by invitation, on "Profane Swearing," when some of the most noted swearers in Tennessee, holding high official position, happened to be present. He did not shrink from the responsibility of the occasion. In 1810 Gideon Blackburn left Maryville, to be succeeded there by the Rev. Isaac Anderson, who became the chief agent in founding The Southern and Western Theological Seminary, incorporated as Maryville College in 1821, and removed to Maury county. In 1811 he took charge of Harpeth Academy, near Franklin, and preached in a range of fifty miles, at five different places, of which the city of Nashville was one. His efforts resulted in the organization of a church at each place. These four constituted the New Presbytery. Ministers and churches now rapidly increased throughout middle Tennessee. In 1816 the Presbytery of Shiloh was set off from the Presbytery of Muhlenburg, in Kentucky, and from the Presbytery of West Tennessee, on the east; Shiloh extended well nigh to the southern boundary of the State. Dr. Blackburn, having removed to Louisville, in 1823, was succeeded in Nashville by the Rev. A. D. Campbell, and he, in 1828, by Obadiah Jennings. In 1821 the Presbyterian Church was greatly strengthened by the acquisition of Dr. Philip Lindsley, who came to Nashville as President of Cumberland College, the name of which, in 1826, was changed to the University of Nashville. Here, for twenty-five years, he exerted a widespread influence. In 1829 the Presbytery of Western District was organized, with five ministers; and in 1830 the first Presbyterian Church in Memphis was established by the self-denying efforts of the Rev. Samuel M. Williamson, who contributed much to the extension of the Church in the southwestern part of the State. A half-century has now elapsed since the first churches in the northeastern corner were established, and with it closes the life of Samuel Doak, D. D., the pioneer and founder, at Tusculum, in the eighty-second year of his age.

The Synodical relation of the different Presbyteries was as follows: At the formation of the General Assembly, the Presbytery of Abingdon was attached to the Synod of the Carolinas, but was, in 1803, transferred, at its own request, to the Synod of Virginia. The Presbytery of Greenville during its brief existence belonged to the Synod of the Carolinas. The Presbytery of Union was also thus connected until 1810, when it, at its own request, was transferred to the Synod of Kentucky. In 1817 the Presbyteries of West Tennessee, Shiloh, Mississippi (constituted in 1815, and covering a part of Western Tennessee) and Union were, by a division of the Synod of Kentucky, organized into the Synod of Tennessee. As Gideon Blackburn had visited St. Louis in 1816, and preached there with much effect, the churches in the territory of Missouri, and others in Illinois, were, in 1818, constituted the Presbytery of Missouri, which was attached to the Synod of Tennessee. The Presbytery of French Broad was erected from Union in 1825, and Holston from Abingdon in 1826. In this year the Synod of West Tennessee was formed, consisting of the Presbyterians of West Tennessee, Shiloh and North Alabama, to which was added, in 1829, the Presbytery of Western District. In 1829 the Presbytery of Mississippi became a part of the new Synod of Mississippi and South Alabama. In 1826 the Presbytery of Missouri became a part of the new Synod of Indiana. The Presbyteries of Abingdon (detached now from Virginia), Union, French Broad and Holston were left to constitute the Synod of Tennessee. The six Presbyteries of Holston, French Broad, Union, Shiloh, West Tennessee and Western District, representing the strength of the Church within the bounds of the State, in 1830 contained in the aggregate near one hundred churches and seventy-one ministers. Revivals had at different times prevailed, notably that of 1800, in East Tennessee, and that of 1827 and 1828, in Middle Tennessee, under the preaching of the widely known evangelist, James Gallaher, and his companion, Frederick A. Ross. The Calvinistic Magazine, established in 1827, and conducted by Rev. Messrs. David Nelson Gallaher and Ross was also doing good service in vindicating the doctrines of the Church and of Evangelical Christianity.

Presbyterian Element in our National Life and History. (From an Address delivered before the Synod of Central New York, at Watertown, October 18th, 1876, by Prof. J. W. Mears, D. D.) After an appropriate introduction, Dr. Mears proceeds to say:—

"It is past doubt that the very existence of our country is due to forces set in motion and brought to play in history by the Reformation under Calvin. The Puritans in New England, including Roger Williams and the early Baptists, the Dutch in New York State, the Covenanters in the Cumberland Valley, the Quakers in Eastern Pennsylvania, and the Huguenots of the Carolinas and New York, all performed parts of the first importance in the original colonization of our country, and all drew their inspiration more or less directly from the great Reformer of Geneva.

"As to the Puritans, I cannot do better than to quote from one of the most illustrious of their descendants' words, uttered at one of those anniversaries which New Englanders observe with a pride which would be sectional, if New England did not belong, in a peculiar sense, to the whole country. 'In the reign of Mary,' says Mr. Choate, 'a thousand learned Englishmen fled from the stake at home to the happier seats of Continental Protestantism. Of them great numbers, I know not how many, came to Geneva. There they awaited the death of the Queen, and then, sooner or later, but in the time of Elizabeth, went back to England. I ascribe to that five years in Geneva an influence that has changed the history of the world. I seem to myself to trace to it . . . the opening of another era of time and of liberty . . . a portion, at least, of the objects of the great civil war in England, the republican constitution framed in the cabin of the Mayflower, the divinity of Jonathan Edwards, the battle of Bunker Hill, and the independence of America. In that brief season English Puritanism was changed fundamentally and forever. . . . On the banks of a lake lovelier than a dream of fairy land, in a valley which might have been hollowed out to enclose the last home of liberty, there smiled an independent, peaceful, law-abiding and prosperous commonwealth. There was a people governed by laws of their own making. I confess myself to be of the opinion of those who trace to that spot and to that time the republicanism of the Puritans.

"There was a State without kings or nobles; there was a church without a bishop. I do not suppose that learned men needed to go to Geneva to acquire the idea of a commonwealth. But there they saw the problem solved. Popular government was possible. This experience they never forgot.'

"It is not necessary to multiply authorities or to look further for the genesis of Puritan principles in their bearing upon the life and character of the nation. As Presbyterians, we are willing to concede to New England all the eminence she claims in the early history of the nation, if her most gifted and loyal sons agree to trace that eminence to the influence of the Genevese Reformer upon the characters and beliefs of the Pilgrim Fathers.

"As for the Huguenots, their settlements in America antedated all others nearly half a century, but Spanish bigotry and cruelty trampled them out in blood, anticipating by seven years the horrors of St. Bartholomew, by the massacre of the nine hundred settlers of St. Augustine. Scarcely enough of them escaped to tell the story. More than a hundred years passed, during which the Huguenots of France were learning, by the hard drill of Popish persecution, the incalculable value of religious and political liberty, and when, by the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, in 1685, they were scattered by hundreds of thousands over the Protestant world, those who came to America brought the very material which was needed in the structure of our liberties, a something which can be likened to the spring and the fibre of finely tempered steel. The first child born in New York State was of Huguenot parents; and such names as John Jay, Henry Laurens, Elias Boudinot, the first President of the American Bible Society, John Bayard and Francis Marion, illustrate the prominence of this element in the early struggles, in war, diplomacy and Christian beneficence, of our countrymen. It was the son of a Huguenot that gave his name to Faneuil Hall and offered it for those purposes of consultation and eloquent appeal which have secured for it the title of 'Cradle of Liberty.'

"The Covenanters are represented by the Scotch-Irish, who did not leave their country before striking heavy blows for the truths of the Reformation at home. The sons of the men who, on the 7th of December, 1688, shut the gates of Derry, and starved rather than surrender to the Popish troops of James, were trained to endure the hardships of frontier life, and had nerves which did not flinch or quiver, however great the foe before them, because there was a conscience behind them. They were fit material to enter into the structure of the new commonwealth. They came late, and yet, twenty-six years before the Declaration of Independence a quarter of a million of Ulster County Presbyterians had landed upon our shores.

"From what great struggles and preparatory experiences came the Presbyterians of the Low countries, I need not detain you to tell. History has no task more honorable than that of recording the contest between the Beggars of Holland and the Grandees of Spain. The conflict for liberty, only partially successful there, had to be transferred to the soil of America in order to attain a complete and enduring triumph. The first settlers in New Netherlands were thirty families, chiefly Protestant refugees from the Belgian provinces. They came in the Spring of 1623. 'The settlement of Manhattan,' says Bancroft, 'grew directly out of the great Continental struggles of Protestantism.'

"The beneficent influence of the Quakers upon the opening scenes of our Colonial history cannot easily be overrated. George Fox, the founder of the sect, may fairly be regarded as an outgrowth of English Puritanism. William Penn received part of his college education at Saumur, where there was a Calvinistic Institution under the guidance of Amyraut. The religion and the philosophy of the Huguenots had their influence with the founder of the Keystone State. It could scarcely have been Quakerism which reserved, in the Colonial law, the first day of the week as a day of rest. We, as a Synod, have a share in the closing on the Lord's Day of the doors of the Centennial Exhibition, in the great city founded by William Penn, but I suspect it would have been a more difficult task but for that Presbyterian element which the Quaker legislator imbibed into his own nature, and infused into the laws and customs of his famous colony.

"If we except the settlers of Virginia, and that small but dominant part of the colonists of Maryland who were Catholics, and the Lutherans and Moravians who came to Georgia under Oglethorpe, we shall find America at the Revolution little else than a community of Calvinists, of different degrees of strenuousness in doctrine and practice, but showing the same general features of that system. All other constituent elements of the population might be omitted without vitiating a general estimate of its character, but what would the united colonies on the eve of the Revolution have been, if suddenly the entire element due to the Calvinistic Reformation had been withdrawn from the country? Conceive, if you please, the loss in mere numbers made good by an equally sudden multiplication of either of the other elements then to be found in small numbers in Virginia, Maryland and Georgia, and it is impossible to believe that under such auspices a great free nation could have grown up on this continent. In fact, the second supposition is itself impossible, for it was only the so-called Reformed element of the world's population that was then in sufficient numbers, under the colonizing impulse, under the propelling force of an outraged conscience, which gladly preferred exile to the sacrifice of principle, which had been made ready by the special training of Providence for the very work of establishing in a new world a new age and a new order of things. Without them, without the men and the sons of the men who had gone through the experiences of St. Bartholomew's Day, of Leyden and Harlem, and Derry and Smithfield, we may be very sure the independence of America would never have been attempted or achieved.

"As we approach the critical period of the national history, the beginning of the century which we are now celebrating, the lines are drawn more closely, and the relations of the Reformed element to the struggle of the Revolution assume a positive, unmistakable attitude. Presbyterianism, through the length and breadth of the country, allies itself, identifies itself, with the cause of free government. Of the Scotch-Irish race in America, it is said that it was, perhaps, the only race of all that settled in the western world that never produced one Tory. The nearest case to it ever known was that of a man who was brought before a church Session in Chambersburg, and tried upon the charge that he was not sincere in his professions of his attachment to the cause of the Revolution. It is claimed that General Washington, when making a long and disheartening retreat, was asked where he expected to pause. He replied, that if he were obliged to cross every river and mountain to the limits of civilization, he would make his last stand with the Scotch-Irishmen of the frontiers, there plant his banner and still fight for freedom.

"The first public voice in America," says Bancroft, 'for dissolving all connection with Great Britain, came not from the Puritans of New England, the Dutch of New York, nor the planters of Virginia, but from the Scotch-Irish Presbyterians.' He refers to the celebrated Declaration of the county of Mecklenburg, N. C., which preceded the Declaration of Independence more than a year, and which not only anticipated the spirit, but to a most remarkable degree the very language, of that memorable document. Here was a secluded people, not carried away by the infection of a general excitement, but led by the sheer force of conviction and consistency with principle alone, to declare themselves absolved from former ties of allegiance, and to organize an independent government, nearly fourteen months before they were followed and supported by the united voice of the country. It is not ludicrous, this arrayal of a single county against a great and proud empire. The document itself shows that a grand spirit, a broad humanity, dictated the movement. The Presbyterian elder, Ephraim Brevard, who signed it, sealed his fidelity by the sacrifice of his life in the national cause. The document, printed in Charleston, was spread through the South, and was forwarded by a messenger to the Continental Congress. Its direct influence upon the phraseology of the greater Declaration which followed it has been denied; so be it; it only follows that the Presbyterian as well as the Jeffersonian document flowed from the same deep fountain of popular love of liberty and preparedness for self government which the Presbyterians were the quickest to recognize and the first to put into articulate speech.

"It was the great State of Virginia, Jefferson's State, which, more than a year after the Mecklenburg Declaration, and a few weeks before the 4th of July, 1776, passed the first Bill of Rights involving the principle of self-government and independence, and although the Act of the State was practically unanimous, yet it would scarcely have been the work of a people wholly descended from the cavaliers and adventurers who formed the early colonists of Virginia. 'The population,' says Bancroft, 'had been recruited by successive infusions of Scotch-Irish Presbyterians, Huguenots, and the descendants of Huguenots, men who had been so attached to Cromwell or the Republic that they preferred to emigrate on the return of Charles II, and other elements.'"

After referring to the prominent and influential part which the Rev. John Witherspoon, D. D., and the Rev. George Duffield, D. D. (of whom sketches are elsewhere given in this volume), acted in the times of the Revolution, Prof. Mears goes on to say:

"It is almost superfluous for me to attempt to explain to this audience what it is in Presbyterianism and in the Reformed churches generally, which necessarily led them to assume the position of avowed and active adherents to the Revolutionary cause. Nowhere else in the world is a more ardent love of liberty joined to a more decided attachment for system and order. Liberty in law is the watchword of Presbyterianism. The Reformation itself was a direct appeal to God, a personal union of the human heart to its Creator, in opposition to a crushing weight and an impenetrable barrier of priestly mediators. It gave to every man personal worth. Every individual could and must for himself realize the priceless benefits and dignities of redemption. It arose at once both against the ecclesiastical tyranny of the times and the political machinery by which that tyranny was sustained. In proportion as the religious reaction of the Reformation was more radical, was its relation to civil life more manifest. Wherever the hierarchical element was swept clean away, there, naturally enough, appeared the idea of a popular government. The Church without a bishop carried with it the State without a king. John Calvin was 'the Reformer who pierced to the roots.' His faith was dreaded, with one consent and with instinctive judgment, by all the monarchs of the world, as the creed of Republicanism.

"King James I, born and reared a Scot, spoke what he knew when he said, 'A Scots Presbytery agrees with monarchy as well as God and the devil.' Lord Bacon says, 'Discipline by bishops is fittest for monarchy of all others.' James II said, 'If there is no despotic power in the Church, there can be no despotic power in the State, or, if there be liberty in the Church, there will be liberty in the State.' Charles the Second pronounced Calvinism a religion not fit for a gentleman.

"It found its home and historic centre and political expression in the Republic of Geneva. But limited to that narrow city, it must have perished for lack of development. It must get rid of Old World restrictions or die. It must realize on a broader field its God-given impulse and tendency to become in some true sense a Kingdom of God on earth. Buffeted, trampled upon, disfranchised, outlawed at home, its future seemed dark indeed, when the New World, which Popish enthusiasm had discovered and claimed, arose upon the horizon. Rome claimed it. Commercial and scientific interests sighted its frontier and outlined its shape. But it waited for a century and a quarter, substantially unoccupied, until the hour for the Calvinists' migration had come. Calvinism was destined to live. Its ecclesiastical and political characteristics were too fundamentally important to be allowed to disappear. Therefore the New World was opened and reserved for them. America was theirs. America was for the Calvinists as truly as, in Divine providence, the Calvinists were for America. The adherents of this system could not come to America without bringing along their intense convictions, ingrained into their souls by a century of persecution. If Great Britain would not yield them a practical independence, of necessity they would grasp it. If armed resistance was requisite to realize their ideal here, in these remote parts of the earth, they unhesitatingly would offer it.

"There was dignity in their coming; not as a mere mob or frightened herd of fugitives did they come. In place of the cast-off yokes of mediævalism, they brought grand conceptions of a moral order and a divine government, drawn from an intelligent study of Scripture models, and from the previous experience of an inward self-restraint. Those in whom a genuine Christian manhood had taken the place of slavish dependence upon confessionals and priestly absolution, were prepared to frame just laws, to found a righteous government, and in their conduct to illustrate, as well as by their blood, if necessary, to maintain and defend them. The constitution of Plymouth Colony was written upon the cover of a Bible, in the cabin of the Mayflower, and signed and sealed upon the ocean, by the company of Pilgrims. The revolt of these men from arbitrary human government was for no selfish end whatever, but in the name and for the glory of God. Therefore, in His name, they were quick to re-establish and zealous to maintain it.

"In fact, the Presbyterianism of these colonists was the very form and mold of a free government; the safest and best, in its main outlines, that could be found. As the Presbyterians of North Carolina anticipated the fact and form of the Declaration of Independence, so the Presbyterians of Geneva and Scotland, in working out the plan of a free but orderly Church, had anticipated, in all its main features, the political fabric by which that independence was consolidated into a grand national and historic reality. In this Church all power proceeds from the people; but presbytery is not democracy, it is not a weak confederation. It is a compact representative government, with a written constitution. The largest autonomy is allowed to the elementary parts which is consistent with the unity and organic life of the whole. Every member has rights which the body is bound to protect. The clergy is not a whit better off in this respect than the laity, and no clergyman better off than his brother clergyman. This principle of parity is essentially republican. At the same time presbytery is a government. It is not merely advisory, it is authoritative. 'It is designed to settle and determine things. It implies, as its correlative, obedience. The submission which it demands is not the mere submission which the mind renders to good advice. . . . It is the submission due to those who are appointed to rule, and who are entrusted with authority.'—Albert Barnes' Presb. its Affinities, pp. 9-10.

"The analogy between our Republican form of government and that of the Presbyterian Church is so striking that the subject has become too trite to need extensive statement here. When we consider the great preponderance of the Presbyterian element in the early history of the country, when we reflect that the men who framed our Constitution were largely trained under one or the other form of church government allied to Presbyterianism, we cannot permit ourselves to doubt that the blended strength and elasticity, the variety and the symmetry, the liberty and the order, in fact, the sound republicanism of our Government, were contributions of Presbyterianism to our national life.

“But polity is only an outward form, only valuable as the result of inward forces. And it is these inward forces of Presbyterianism in which are the real hidings of its power. These inward forces are comprehensively described under the single term Calvinism. Calvinism has been regarded as, in fact, a doctrine of government; a method and form in which the divine power is put forth in the government of the universe. ‘It is based on the idea that God rules; that he has a plan; that the plan is fixed and certain; that it does not depend on the fluctuations of the human will, on the caprice of the human heart, or on contingencies and uncertain and undetermined events in human affairs. It supposes that God is supreme; that he has authority; that he has a right to exercise dominion; that for the good of the universe that right should be exercised and that infinite power put forth only in accordance with a plan.’—Mr. Barnes.”

“The habit of thought and the style of character growing out of this view of the universe have gone deeply into the life of America. They have been as pillars of adamant, as an anchorage among rocks, during the formation and growth of its political order. This is by no means an exhaustive statement of the vital elements of Calvinism. Joined with them is the sense of direct personal responsibility to God, and of the moral equality of all men before Him, of the emptiness of all earthly distinctions compared with those conferred by His grace and Spirit, and of the moral unity of the race in Adam. The prevalence of these ideas broke down all the foundations of tyranny, while those saved the liberty from becoming the license of liberated slaves, and gave it the checks and balances of right reason and of subordination to the higher law of God.

“Presbyterianism is a system of clear and strong convictions, rather than a matter of feeling and of form. It takes hold of the man through his intellect and his conscience. Its grasp upon the will, therefore, is clear, strong and regulative. It will do nothing without a sound reason. Its moving forces are applied to the deepest principles. It is not like the tempest, which stirs great waves for a time and upon the surface, but like the tides and the silent and deep currents, which, day and night, and year after year, keep on their steady course around the globe.

“Strength of character, stability and endurance, are the social and natural outcome of such a system. It may be said that these points belong constitutionally to the Anglo-Saxon race. But take away from them their monarchical Old World associations and aristocratic repressions, and give them independence; let them stand alone; the race will then need an inward, self-regulative principle. Never was it called to stand alone as in America. It would not have attempted thus to stand alone, if it had not been conscious of possessing a backbone, such as Calvinism has given it.

“Calvinism gives toughness and fibre, and an anvil-like power of resistance, which wears out hammers rather than yields. Calvinism rears the word discipline in the word disaster. Calvinism gets victory by the rough road of defeat. Calvinism teaches and practices a perseverance which springs from faith in a supreme and righteous God. It may not be exactly just to the æsthetic side of our nature. It is not great in art. The Reformers were not particularly known as admirers of nature. These deep-souled men were unmoved by the sentimental raptures of a Rousseau, and, indeed, could scarcely enter into the deep feeling for nature of the Old Testament writers. Luther thought the leviathan and behemoth of the Book of Job were allegorical representations of the devil. But in that enterprise which crosses vast untraveled seas, which penetrates the unexplored depths of new continents and founds commonwealths while keeping savage foes at bay on the one hand, and wresting liberty from civilized foes on the other, it is without a rival in the history of mankind.

“The doctrine which is common to Calvinism and to Protestantism generally, that each individual mind may be in direct communication with its Creator, that He has revealed His will by the written Word to all, must tend to the universal diffusion of learning; on the other hand, the doctrine that God is a God of order and plan, must tend to encourage that higher learning which seeks to discover the order and system of the universe. Hence Calvinism has been the source, not only of the common school system as it exists in our own country, but of almost every one of our earlier colleges and universities; notably Harvard, Yale, Princeton, Union, Bowdoin, Dartmouth, Rutgers, Dickinson, Washington and Jefferson, Middlebury, Hampden-Sidney, Amherst, Lafayette and Hamilton, not to mention more recent enterprises. For generations, nearly the entire cultivated mind of the country was under its training and stamped with its peculiar impress.

“Thus it is no mere sullen, stubborn, blind power of endurance and of resistance which Calvinism has contributed to the country. Calvinism is not a cold stoicism, nor, on the other hand, is it a daring fanaticism, which can give no account of itself or of its actions. It is not a sort of baptized Islamism, as some have believed it to be. It is not fatalism, the doctrine of bigots and of Oriental dreamers. This, indeed, has conquered a name and created a despotism, but it has never marked its course with free schools and colleges. It is the intelligent, philosophical and scriptural dogma of predestination, not fatalism, that is to be associated with Calvinism. It is the doctrine of a supreme, intelligent, infinitely wise Ruler of the Universe, who acts with infinite forethought, and whose purposes are the best, the holiest, the most beneficent that can possibly be. It is such a doctrine that in every age has found its place in the minds of resolute, well-poised, thinking men, and that has ever tended to form, train and develop an order of things and a class of minds of exalted character, in sympathy with itself. This was the chief historic factor in our country's life when it started on its career, a hundred years ago."

Presbyterian Home for Women, Baltimore, Md. In March, 1883, a number of Presbyterians of the city of Baltimore met to effect an organization looking to the establishment in their city of a home for Presbyterian women of the State of Maryland. Contributions to this object were received in such amounts as to encourage the originators of the enterprise, and to ensure the early commencement of the work.

Two adjoining buildings were secured and fitted up for the purpose, on North Calvert street, in a beautiful and growing section of the city, and on January 14th, 1884, were opened with appropriate dedicatory services.

The Institution is intended for women of limited means. No admission fee is required, but three dollars per week is charged for board. In this way the Home will be, in part, at least, self-supporting.

The first officers of the Association were: President, Mrs. Cyrus Dickson; Recording Secretary, Miss Courtenay; Financial Secretary, Miss Ramsay; Treasurer, Mr. Robert Wylie, together with a number of Vice-presidents and managers.

An Institution of this kind was much needed in Baltimore, and will meet a long-felt want.

Presbyterian Home for Aged Women, New York City. This excellent Institution owes its existence to the fact that a few earnest Christian ladies of the Presbyterian Church could neither obtain a suitable boarding place for some worthy women in whom they were interested, or procure admission for them in the Institutions then existing for the aged and helpless. They therefore determined to appeal to members of their own Church to aid them in the effort to provide a suitable Home for these aged, helpless ones who belonged to the same Church. They knew that most of the charitable Institutions of the city were largely aided by Presbyterians, and they felt encouraged to believe that an appeal on behalf of their own members would be successful.

Their appeal was most kindly received, and they felt encouraged to hire a house and to commence their undertaking. The Home was organized April, 1866, and incorporated December 7th, 1866. After a year or two the managers were enabled to announce that

Mr. James Lenox had generously donated four lots on Seventy-third street, between Madison and Fourth avenues, to be used in the erection of the building of a Home, which, in its size, structure and appointments, should be adequate to relieve the class for whom it was particularly designed, and that other Christian friends had furnished the money necessary for the erection of a building. They at once commenced the erection of the edifice which they now occupy. This building was opened in 1870, for the admission of those who had already been cared for, and for all others who come under the rules and regulations of the Institution, and the enterprise has since been crowned with gratifying tokens of the Divine favor.

Applicants for admission to the Home must be residents of New York city, members of the Presbyterian or Reformed Dutch Church for three years, and (except in special cases) sixty-five years of age. They must sign an agreement to pay three dollars a week as part payment for their board, or must provide some responsible party who will sign such an agreement for them.

The Institution is practically supported by the Presbyterian Church. It had, in 1883, four hundred and sixty-nine inmates. The expenses of the Institution for the year closed April 17th, 1883, were $32,713.19, and the receipts $35,321.46; leaving a balance of $2578.27 in the treasury. The amount received for the board of inmates during the same period was only $6910.25.

The Institution is controlled by a Board of thirty-five lady managers. The officers are: First Directress, Mrs. Sheafe; Second Directress, Mrs. Taber; Treasurer, Miss L. P. Halsted; Secretary, Mrs. Townsend; Financial Secretary, Miss Rachel L. Kennedy.

Such an Institution needs no commendation. Old age in its best estate is attended with labor and sorrow, but its burden falls with especial heaviness upon the hearts of those who, in losing their capacity to cope with the misfortunes of life, have lost nothing of their sensibility to its hardships and trials. The Managers feel assured, as well they may, that the churches will deem it a duty as well as a privilege to sustain the Home, which, while having nothing exclusive or sectarian in its character, proposes to relieve the wants of the poor in their own communion, in order that other communions be not unduly burdened with the performance of a duty which is pre-eminently theirs, and in simple fidelity to that instinct of Christian fellowship, and that injunction of Christian obligation, which constrains the members of the same Christian family to provide for their own household.

Presbyterian Home, Philadelphia. In 1871 the project of a "Presbyterian Home for Widows and Single Women in the State of Pennsylvania," sprang up in the hearts of two Christian ladies in Philadelphia, Mrs. Ann G. Thomas, and Mrs. Samuel Field. Mrs. Thomas, generously concluded to give a fine tract of ground, more than five acres in extent, eligibly situated at Fifty-eighth street and Woodland avenue, in a rural section of West Philadelphia, as a site for the erection of the Home. This donation was subject to the condition of $20,000 being raised for building purposes within the year ending September, 1872. A society was organized, consisting of thirty lady managers, together with an advisory committee of gentlemen, who assumed some of the most onerous burdens.

The erection of a stone building, estimated to cost $40,000, was at once commenced, which was completed in 1874, and formally opened Nov. 19th of that year, with eighteen inmates. The Presbyterians of Philadelphia have generously contributed to the Home, Mrs. Thomas having supplemented her first gift of six acres of land by a devise of nine additional acres and $1500, her aggregate donations being valued at $13,500, and numerous churches and individuals contributing generous sums. The original building has been greatly enlarged, at an additional cost, by the addition of wings, containing at present over one hundred rooms. A "chapel" has been erected, at a cost of $20,000, and an "infirmary" is now in course of completion. These two buildings are connected with the main structure by corridors, and by a wise foresight of the architect the building was so planned that the additions have been made not at the expense of the symmetry of the edifice. The structure, as it now stands, is one of the most imposing private charities in Pennsylvania.

The annual report of the managers for 1883 gives the number of inmates as ninety-four; receipts (for the year ending December 11th, 1882), $25,302.36; expenditures, $21,239.31, leaving a balance in the hands of the treasurer of $1006.02. Each inmate has a separate bed-room, and the Home is conducted very much on the plan of a large hotel, the inmates being under very little restraint, and having very comfortable accommodations. A committee of the managers visits the Home weekly.

Applicants for admission must be residents of the State of Pennsylvania; have been members of the Presbyterian Church in some one of its branches for three years; and, except in cases of special infirmity, have reached the age of sixty-five years. They are also required to pay an admission fee, which is regulated by the age of the applicant, but is in no case less than $150.

The Institution is under the control of fifty-three lady managers, with the following officers: President, Mrs. Samuel Field; Vice-Presidents, Mrs. D. Haddock, Jr., Mrs. Alfred Nevin, Mrs. E. F. Holloway, Mrs. W. S. Adair; Treasurer, Mrs. Enoch Taylor; Recording Secretary, Miss Clara A. Lindsay; Corresponding Secretary, Miss S. W. DuBois. The managers also have the aid of a board of gentlemen advisers. The site of the Home is a very desirable one, being removed from the noise and heat of the city, yet being of easy access by both steam and street cars. It is adjacent to the Presbyterian Orphanage.

It is due to the memory of the late W. E. Tenbrook, builder of this Home, to state that he was its devoted and generous friend from its very inception, and that its successful completion and subsequent prosperity were largely owing to his quiet but earnest interest and activity. Mr. Tenbrook was an honored, useful elder of Clinton street Immanuel Church, a gentleman of admirable Christian spirit and character, and abounded in good works. He died in 1882.

Presbyterian Eye, Ear and Throat Hospital, Baltimore, Md. This special Charity, now one of the largest special hospitals in the United States, was opened December 1st, 1877, by the Presbyterians of Baltimore, for the use of all poor persons who may be afflicted with eye, ear or throat diseases, regardless of color, creed or nationality. It was the immediate outgrowth of a private hospital established by Dr. Julian J. Chisolm, in 1870. When the work became too great to be continued as the charity of one individual, it was adopted by the Presbyterians of Baltimore, and is now in very successful operation. The Hospital is under the control of a Board of Governors, composed exclusively of Presbyterians, and its affairs are administered by a Board of Lady Managers, who are selected from the sixteen Presbyterian churches of Baltimore. W. W. Spence, Esq., is the President of the Board of Governors, and Mrs. Peyton Harrison is President of the Board of Lady Managers. Dr. Julian J. Chisolm is the surgeon-in-charge, and is aided in the work of attending to the sick by a large surgical staff of able physicians. The Hospital has an out-door department, or free dispensary, and an in-door department, or wards, in which patients are nursed and fed while undergoing treatment. The Hospital is supported by contributions from the members of the Presbyterian churches in the city of Baltimore. Each church takes charge of the Hospital for one month, the committee of ladies from said church visiting the Hospital, inspecting and supervising its management, and collecting money for its expenses. Two weak churches combine, so that the sixteen churches arrange for the twelve months' supply. Patients who can pay for board are charged at the rate of $1.00 per day. Those who have no means receive the same careful attention as those who pay board.

The Hospital was started in a hired house. Recently an extensive property has been purchased, and the Presbyterian Eye, Ear and Throat Charity Hospital has become one of the permanent works of the Presbyterian Church of Baltimore. The growth of the Hospital has been extremely rapid. From 1873 patients for the first year of opening, the Hospital books show 2139 for 1879; 2757 for 1880; 3115 for 1881; 3363 for 1882; and 4553 for 1883, with an aggregate attendance for the year of 25,642, or 92 patients for each day of the year 1883. Since the Hospital has been in operation, now six years, 18,670 patients have been treated, and 4245 operations have been performed for the relief of persons suffering from serious eye, ear or throat diseases. Among these 369 cataracts have been removed; 578 crossed eyes in children have been made straight; 490 cases of tear drop have been relieved, 133 lost and painful eyeballs have been extirpated, to prevent loss by sympathy of the remaining eye, etc. Presbyterians number one-tenth of the applicants at this charity. Of the 4553 persons who applied for treatment in 1883, 1628 were Methodists; 1259 Romanists; 584 Lutherans; 449 Presbyterians; 273 Episcopalians; 238 Baptists; 112 Hebrews; 3983 were whites, and 570 were colored patients. All the money collected for this charity hospital is expended in charity work. The boards of governors, lady managers and the medical staff give their services as a gratuitous offering to the poor. The free dispensary is open every day from one to four o'clock, and medicines are given free of charge to all poor applicants. Over 12,000 packages of medicine were given away in 1883, to those who had no means to purchase the medicine required for the successful treatment of the diseases with which they were afflicted. Fully ninety-five per cent. of all applicants to this hospital go away relieved.

Presbyterian Hospital, New York City.

This Institution originated in the ascertained necessity of enlarged hospital accommodations, to meet the existing and growing wants of the sick and disabled of the rapidly augmenting population of New York, and being governed by existing precedents, it was decided that the success of such an undertaking would be promoted by giving to it, in some degree, a denominational character. The recognition of this long-felt social necessity and the form of its polity eventually found an earnest, practical response in the beneficence of one of New York's most esteemed citizens.

On January 2d, 1868, James Lenox, Esq. (see his sketch), addressed letters to a number of eminent and benevolent gentlemen, inviting them to join with him, as managers, in establishing such an institution. In this letter he said: "I am authorized to say that a large and eligibly situated plot of ground in this city, suitable for buildings, and funds to the amount of one hundred thousand dollars, to be appropriated either towards the erection of such buildings, or some other purposes connected with the establishment and maintenance of a hospital, will be made over to the managers, as soon as practicable."

This circular letter, with its munificent proposals, received encouraging replies. Hence, on the 30th of January, 1868, a meeting of the gentlemen addressed was called in the lecture room of the First Presbyterian Church, at which a full attendance was secured, and a temporary organization effected. Application having been made to the State Legislature for a charter, an act of incorporation to found a Presbyterian Hospital in the city of New York was passed by that body, February 28th, authorizing the institution to hold real estate and personal property to an unlimited amount, which, by the liberal provisions of the Act, are exempted from taxation. In this charter the following gentlemen were named as a Board of Managers: James Brown, Marshall S. Bidwell, William A. Booth, Aaron B. Belknap, William E. Dodge, James Donaldson, John C. Green, Winthrop S. Gilman, Robert M. Hartley, Richard Irvin, Edward S. Jaffray, Thomas Jeremiah, Morris K. Jesup, John Taylor Johnston, James Lenox, David Olyphant, William Paxton, Thomas C. M. Paxton, Joseph Stuart, Robert L. Stuart, Thomas U. Smith, Jonathan Sturges, Otis D. Swan, Charles N. Talbot, Willard Parker, M.D., John R. Ford, Henry M. Taber, Alexander VanRensselaer, William M. Vermilye, Washington R. Vermilye, A. R. Wetmore, A. Robertson Walsh, Rev. William M. Paxton, D.D., as minister of the First Presbyterian Church, the Rev. William Adams, D.D., as minister of the Madison Square Presbyterian Church, the Rev. Thomas Dewitt, D.D., as senior minister of the Collegiate Church of the Reformed Protestant Dutch Church, and the Rev. John N. McLeod, D.D., as minister of the First Reformed Presbyterian Church, all in the city of New York.

On the ensuing 26th of March the charter was maturely considered and accepted by the Board of Managers; James Lenox, Esq., was elected President; other officers were chosen, and the Presbyterian Hospital in the City of New York thenceforth became a corporate institution. A permanent legal status having thus been secured, at a subsequent meeting, June 17th, the President conveyed in due form, to the Board of Managers, for hospital uses, the block of ground in the City of New York, bounded by Seventieth and Seventy-first streets, Fourth and Madison avenues, and the sum of One Hundred Thousand Dollars in money—generously paying at the time the governmental succession tax on its transfer, for benevolent purposes, amounting to Twelve Thousand Dollars.

The work of constructing an edifice of a high order, embracing all modern improvements in hospital architecture, involved extensive inquiry and protracted consideration. Recent developments in medical science and hospital hygiene having greatly modified former theories, it was the aim to embody in the plan of the structure and its arrangements whatever has been discovered that can be applied for the alleviation of suffering and the restoration of health. Sunlight, ventilation, healthful surroundings and interior salubrity—these indispensable curative agencies, were effectively secured by the plan of construction which was finally approved and adopted.

The formal opening of the Hospital took place October 10th, 1872. The Dedictory Exercises were held in the chapel of the Hospital at 1 o'clock, P. M. The attendance was large, many being unable to gain entrance to the chapel. After reading of the Scriptures, and a prayer by the Rev. Dr. McLeod, addresses were delivered by the Rev. Drs. Paxton and Adams, and by Willard Parker, M. D. The President announced that the Hospital was now open for the reception of patients of every creed, nationality and color. The exercises were concluded with the benediction by the Rev. Dr. McLeod.

During the year ending September 30th, 1883, 1223 patients were admitted; 492 were discharged cured; 530 were discharged improved, and 85 died. Of those who died, 22 were in a dying condition when admitted to the Hospital. It cost to maintain the Institution during the year, $48,739.51, while the income was $15,711.62. Of those admitted during the year, 608 were Roman Catholics. The Institution is under the control of a board of gentlemen managers, with the following officers: President, George W. Lane; Vice-President, John S. Kennedy; Treasurer, Robert Lenox Belknap; Corresponding Secretary, Walter Edwards; Recording Secretary, Henry M. Tabor. The officers of the Medical board are: President, Wm. Dcmold, M.D.; Vice-President, Alfred C. Post, M.D.; Secretary, Frederick A. Castle, M.D.

It is proper to add, that the Hospital enterprise embraces not only the Presbyterian churches, but the Reformed Dutch and the Reformed Presbyterian churches, all the churches, indeed, in the city, that acknowledge Presbyterian polity and doctrine. Resting on so broad a basis, as respects unity of faith, irrespective of minor differences, there must be in the future, as there has been in the past, a like union of spirit and effort for this pre-eminently Christian undertaking, in which all have a common interest. It is to the honor of our holy religion that such blessed institutions are being multiplied throughout the land. The world is indebted to Christianity for the true idea of beneficence. Heathenism built no hospitals. The philosophies of the world, where they were unfructured by Christianity, propounded no high law of self-sacrificing charity, and reared no asylums for the sick and suffering. The ruins of ancient cities have been searched, in vain, for the remains of such institutions of benevolence, or for traces of civilization such as give evidence of the existence of this species of philanthropic sympathy. The world waited for Christianity to announce this higher law, and its fulfillment is among the noblest and grandest of its achievements.

Presbyterian Hospital, in Philadelphia. This Institution, situated in one of the most pleasant and healthy locations in West Philadelphia, stands as a handsome monument of the charity and large-hearted benevolence of the Presbyterian citizens of the city.

When the Philadelphia Presbyterian Alliance was formed, on the 19th of September, 1870, for the purpose of combining the interests and energies of the Presbyteries in thorough and systematic work for "the evangelization of the masses," the specific things aimed at being done were the providing of hospitals, homes, etc., for the care of the sick and needy. The principal officers of this organization were: President, Rev. George W. Musgrave, D.D., LL.D.; Secretary, Rev. Alfred Nevin, D.D.; Treasurer, J. A. Gardner, Esq. Among the standing committees of this body was the Hospital Committee, composed of Rev. William T. Eva, Rev. William O. Johnstone, Rev. Alfred Nevin, D.D., Rev. Matthew Newkirk and William McElroy, Esq., to whom were afterwards added Rev. Dr. Musgrave and Fulton W. Hastings, Esq. About the close of the previous year the trustees of the Charity Hospital, which was located in the northwestern part of the city, offered to transfer their establishment to the Presbyterian Church, upon certain conditions; but, after a thorough examination, and especially in view of a more available opening presented, the offer was declined.

Just then, the Rev. E. D. Saunders, D.D., extensively and favorably known as the President of the Courtland Saunders Institute, in West Philadelphia, proposed to convey, on liberal terms, his property in that section of the city, bounded by Filbert street and Powelton avenue, Thirty-ninth street and Bondinot street (with the exception of a lot one hundred and fifty feet square, at the southeast corner of Bondinot street and Powelton avenue), for the use of a hospital to be established and maintained by the Presbyterian Church, and tendered his service as agent of the enterprise. The proposition was accepted by the Alliance, and Rev. Dr. Saunders and Robert M. Girvin, M.D., were requested to co-operate with the Executive Committee in procuring a charter, and on April 1st Dr. Saunders entered officially upon his work as the agent of the hospital. On the 3d of April, 1871, the charter having been procured, the trustees met in the hospital grounds and organized by the election of officers. By the terms of the charter, Rev. Dr. Musgrave was President of the Board, ex-officio; William J. McElroy, Esq., was elected Secretary, and John D. McCord, Esq., Treasurer. Subsequently the Board, impressed with the desirableness of the half-acre lot, purchased it. Thus the area of the property was extended, so as to embrace the entire square of ground as already described, making it one of the most complete and convenient, as well as beautiful and salubrious locations for the purposes of a hospital to be found in the city of Philadelphia. The site is more than one hundred feet above the Schuylkill river at Market street bridge, and is on a level with the vane of Christ Church steeple.

At a meeting of the Board held on the 1st of July, 1871, the papers of conveyance were officially received from Dr. Saunders, by Rev. Dr. Musgrave, on behalf of the Board and the Presbyterian churches represented. Daniel M. Fox, then Mayor of the city, presided, and addresses were delivered by Judges Strong and Allison, and several ministers of the city. On the 21st of August, 1871, the Board were notified by Mr. Alexander Brown that his father, the late John A. Brown, Esq., of this city, had donated to the Institution $300,000, to be used as an endowment fund, from which an annual income could be derived of $18,000.

The gentlemen prominently identified with this movement, as named in the charter, were George W. Musgrave, Ephraim D. Saunders, William O. Johnstone, Alfred Nevin, Z. M. Humphrey, Alexander Reed, Richard H. Allen, William T. Eva, J. Addison Henry, Matthew Newkirk, William Strong, William A. Porter, Charles Macalester, Alexander Whilldin, Samuel Field, Jacob A. Gardner, William Montelins, Fulton W. Hastings, John D. McCord, John B. Gest, William J. McElroy, John Wanamaker, James Hogg, Henry Disston, and Henry R. Raiguel. Those gentlemen composed the Board of Trustees, and that they, one and all, took an active and earnest interest in the undertaking, their efforts in its behalf fully proved.

It is noteworthy that with a sincere unanimity they agreed to insert in their charter a clause to the effect that no patients should be excluded from the Institution by reason of creed, country or color. During the following year a number of needed changes and improvements were made in the stone or Hospital building. An apothecary's department was furnished with all proper requisites, and donations pouring in, helped the trustees along very materially.

Some time afterwards the Ladies' Aid Society was formed, and has continued in existence ever since. The wonderful amount of good work which it did in times that were trying and under circumstances that were depressing, is creditable to its members. In 1873, a male surgical pavilion ward was erected on the grounds, according to the plans of Mr. Joseph M. Wilson, engineer and architect. The principles of its arrangement were based on those of the United States Temporary Military Hospital, erected during the late war, and afterwards extensively adopted in Germany, during the Franco-German war, and also to a greater or less extent made use of in some of the later European permanent constructions. The building, as it now stands, consists of only one story, and is comprised in a rectangular space of 32 feet by 143 feet, its position lengthwise being nearly north and south. It contains the same apartments as those in the other pavilion, erected at a more recent date. A sitting-room of 30 by 16 feet, at the south end, communicates directly with a ward room of 30 by 88 feet, the latter having a capacity of 28 beds. From the north end of the ward-room, a hall of six feet in width connects with an entrance from the street at the north end of the building. On the west side of this hall are arranged the operating room, 11½ by 16, and the nurses' room, 11½ by 14, the latter having a large linen closet, 11½ by 5 feet attached to it. On the east side are the baths, lavatories and water closets, and a special diet kitchen of 11½ by 10 feet. The foundations of the building are of stone. The floor is raised to a level of five feet above the ground, and the space underneath left open to the free circulation of air by means of arches in the brick walls along the sides of the building, the area of ground contained within being covered with a good asphalt pavement, so as to prevent moisture arising from it. The ground around the building is well sloped off, so as to drain all water away from it. The exterior walls are of brick, thirteen inches thick and built hollow. The north, or street entrance is of pressed brick, with courses of colored brick and Ohio stone dressings, the entrance steps being of granite. The arrangements made for free ventilation are of the most elaborate character, and the building is heated by a hot water circulating apparatus. It should be added that Mr. Wilson presented to the Institution the plans for this building.

On July 15th, 1877, the pavilion, until lately used as the women's surgical ward, was commenced, under the supervision of Messrs. Wilson, Brothers & Co., architects and engineers, of this city. The task of raising the necessary funds was assumed mainly by the ladies of the Presbyterian churches throughout the city, the cost being about $18,000. The building is of fine pressed brick, ornamented with belt courses of black bricks and encaustic tiles, and with Ohio sandstone and green serpentine stone trimmings to the doors and windows. It is one story in height, with a basement at each end and an open space beneath the ward, and a high, peaked roof, finished with ornamental combing. The building is 147 feet long by 33 feet wide, and 35 feet high to the peak of the gable. At each end are ornamental iron porches. The ward occupies the centre of the building, and is 94 feet long by 30 feet wide, and will accommodate 28 beds. At either end of the building are sitting rooms, water-closets, bath and operating rooms; in the basement under the sitting room is the diet kitchen. All the recent improvements and appliances for hospitals are introduced. The inside walls are finished entirely with lime and white sand, no plaster being used.

The building is heated by indirect radiation. There are twenty steam coils in the air space under the ward, one being placed in a radiator box under each window. Fresh air, from a large steam fan, is forced through an underground duct, and thence through the radiator boxes, where it is heated, and rises through registers into the ward. The foul air is drawn off through registers, under each bed, and into a foul air duct, fifty feet high, at the base of which a furnace is constantly kept burning, to create a draught. The walls of the building are all double, with an air chamber between the inner and outer thicknesses, and there is also ridge ventilation in the roof. In the old building the first floor is used as a male medical ward. A small building to the north of it is used as the drug room, and has three private rooms for pay patients. During the Summer of 1883 a handsome and commodious Women's Medical Ward was erected, and dedicated November 23d. This valuable addition to the buildings of the Institution, with its furniture, was the munificent gift of Mr. Robert Lenox Kennedy, of New York city.

The annual report of the Board of Trustees for 1883 states that during the year 538 patients were admitted, of which 331 were males and 207 females; remaining over from 1882, 61, making a total of 599 treated. Of this number 155, or 29 per cent., were Presbyterians, and 119, or 28 per cent., were Roman Catholics. The average number of patients per day was 59, and the average cost of their maintenance $1.13. The total number of patients admitted to the Hospital, from its beginning to March 17th, 1883, was 5975.

The present officers of the Board of Trustees are: President, Rev. Charles A. Diekey, D.D., 1811 Pine street; Treasurer, John D. McCord, Esq., 1331 Chestnut street (to whom all remittances of money may be made), and Secretary, William L. Maetier, Esq. The officers of the Ladies' Aid are: Honorary President, Mrs. Matthew Newkirk, 1011 Race street; Vice Presidents, Mrs. M. B. Grier, Ridley Park, Mrs. George W. Toland, 1711 Germantown avenue; Treasurer, Mrs. J. S. Patterson, 1511 Spruce street; Secretary, Miss Miller, 1230 Spruce street.

The Institution has rapidly grown in public favor. It has been generously remembered by Christian philanthropists, both by direct personal contributions, and by legacies. Many of the churches of the Synod of Philadelphia take annual collections for its aid. It is admirably conducted in every respect, reflects great credit on the Denomination whose name it bears, and promises to be long a source and centre of great blessing to suffering and sorrowing humanity. Its present faithful and efficient chaplain is the Rev. Francis Hendricks.

It is proper to add that all persons may, by the payment to the Hospital of the sum of thirty dollars or more yearly, or the sum of five hundred dollars at one time, become members of the corporation, and that churches may secure a free bed by the annual contribution of three hundred dollars. The form of devise of real estate is: "I give and devise to The Presbyterian Hospital in Philadelphia, their successors and assigns, all that there describe particularly the real estate intended to be given."

Presbyterian Interest in the Chinese. In the year 1807 there sailed from New York, in an American vessel, because he was not allowed passage from England by the East India Company, a Presbyterian young man, into whose heart God had put an ardent desire to preach the gospel in China. He was born at Newcastle-on-the-Tyne, where the numerous Scotchmen who had crossed the Cheviot Hills from their own soil had formed a Presbyterian Church, of which his father was a faithful elder. Robert Morrison, for that was his name, was welcomed by his father's countrymen in New York, and they followed him with prayers and sympathies when he left them for the great mission field, where for twenty-seven years he labored as the pioneer of Protestant missions.

Few sympathized with Morrison in China; but among his friends was a young American merchant, who seeing the difficulties which confronted missionaries from Great Britain, determined to invite some to come out there from the United States. By his efforts the American Board was induced to send out Rev. E. C. Bridgman, in 1829. While he lived, this devoted and generous merchant, Mr. D. W. C. Olyphant, never ceased his personal efforts, nor his large gifts and sacrifices, for the sending forth of missionary laborers to China. As a member of the Board of Foreign Missions in New York, his influence, with that of its Secretary, the Hon. Walter Lowrie, helped greatly to arouse a thoroughly missionary interest in the Presbyterian Church touching the people of China. This spirit continues to this day, rendering our missionary work, since distributed over the north and centre and south of the empire, efficient and blessed.

Rev. Matthew B. Hope, afterwards Secretary of our Board of Education, and Professor at Princeton College, and Messrs. Mitchell, Orr and Travelli, were sent out by the American Board (through which the Presbyterian Church then operated), to commence labors among the Chinese emigrants at Singapore, the opium war having not yet opened the ports of the empire. One of the first men upon the ground after that peculiar event, in 1842, was the beloved Walter M. Lowrie, whose martyrdom at the hands of Chinese pirates, five years afterwards, set a seal to the Church's commission, and roused her to yet more determined zeal to hasten to the three hundred millions of that race ignorant of a Saviour.

When the Chinese began to come to the New World, the first efforts to meet them with the offers of the Word of Life were those of the Presbyterian Church, in 1852, and the seeds of good which were thus sown by Messrs. Speer and Loomis and Condit have, coupled with the labors of others, been multiplying and bearing good fruit wherever these people have gone, throughout this country.

In the Eastern States, the school of Rev. Lyeurgus Railsback, which was begun in 1868, and was continued by Rev. Arthur Folsom, a missionary from Canton, and by the late devoted Miss Goodrich, was the earliest plant. It was nurtured in New York by social aid, by the Board of Foreign Missions, and when given up by it, was assumed by the Board of Home Missions, and marks the commencement of that extensive interest in the instruction of the Chinese which is now manifested by several of the leading denominations of the country. Some of the converts of these labors have aided the beginnings of the enterprises of others, in this city and elsewhere.

Thus it has been a great and blessed privilege of the Presbyterian Church to lead the way toward the conquest of the last and greatest of heathen empires. Those who love its name and its ordinances, in every part of the land where the Chinese, scattering abroad from the Pacific Coast, are settling down in quiet and useful employment, should hasten to avail themselves of the opportunity thus given to impart the Truth to this people. Thus doing, many of them will become the humble and efficient disciples of Christ, and be made the means of spreading the tidings of salvation to a still greater number of their race and nation.

Presbyterianism in California. The rush to the Pacific coast was great on the discovery of gold. But the missionaries of Christ were soon among them. Three missionaries of the Presbyterian Church (Old School) arrived there in 1849, Revs. Albert Williams, Sylvester Woodbridge and James Woods, known as the three W's, pioneers of the Church.

Mr. Williams organized the First Presbyterian Church of San Francisco, which was the first Protestant Church organized in San Francisco. Rev. Sylvester Woodbridge established a church in Benicia, a town that promised to be the capital of the State, but from various causes failed, and is now a small village. After some years he removed to San Francisco, and became the editor and publisher of the Occident, and established the Howard Street Presbyterian Church of San Francisco, and afterwards another congregation, whose church is named after him, The Woodbridge Church. Here he preached with zeal and power until his health failed, and he was called to rest the early part of 1853. Rev. James Woods established the First Presbyterian Church in Stockton, and has zealously labored as a missionary almost over the whole coast, and been instrumental in organizing or assisting a number of congregations. He is still laboring in the cause. Rev. Albert Williams still lives to labor for the cause of Christ. Some New School Presbyterian ministers, Baptists, Congregationalists, Methodists and Episcopalians were on the field also, at an early day.

The union of the Old and New Branches of the Presbyterian Church in 1870 has been a great blessing to the cause of Presbyterianism. As Rev. Thomas Fraser, who has spent many years as Synodical Missionary, and whose labors have been unceasing and greatly blessed, says the union of the two branches of the Church "has simplified machinery, lessened expenses, consolidated and reorganized our battalions, harmonized and quickened our forces, put an end to controversy, and raised the work of evangelization and of Foreign and Domestic Missions to its proper place, as the one God-given work of Christ's people."

The reports at hand give the following items. The Synod of the Pacific embraces the States of California and Nevada. It consists of 142 ministers, 130 churches and 9063 communicants. Two ministers, six churches and 390 communicants have been gained during the past year. The reports give 13,297 members in the Sabbath schools, which is 784 more than in the year preceding. Total annual contributions $242,000, an average of twenty-six dollars for each communicant. Of this sum about nine-tenths were for congregational purposes. Some of these churches are small and feeble. Almost all our churches owe their beginnings to the Board of Home Missions and to assistance from the East and from the Board of Church Erection, for their houses of worship. Our people are widely scattered over the valleys and mountains, and many of them comparatively poor. Some of our churches are unfortunately in debt, which is a great drag on any congregation, and greatly hinders all church work, and is unfavorable to spiritual growth. There are 1853-30 pastors, 51 stated supplies, 8 evangelists, 8 professors or teachers, 2 secretaries or agents, 3 foreign missionaries, 3 editors and 22 without charges or honorably retired, and 11 in transitu, 1 home missionary, 1 P. M. and 1 P. Ch.

California is a vast field for missionary work. And though as yet but few of our churches are altogether self-sustaining, with more men of the right qualifications for the work, and more money, the close of this century will see the Presbyterian Church on this coast a great power for Christ. Sabbath-school work here is as effectively carried on as in the other States. Very few of our young men, however, are inclined to study for the ministry. The world absorbs them. This is partly owing to the circumstances that surround them, and partly for the want of schools under religious influence. There are five or six excellent Institutions under the care of able ministers or elders of the Presbyterian Church; but what are these for so great a population? A vigorous effort is now on foot, by the Synod, to establish a Presbyterian college, which it is earnestly hoped will be successful. The San Francisco Theological Seminary, on the plan of Princeton, was inaugurated in 1871, under the care of the Synod and of the General Assembly. The Seminary building is a commodious house, with well furnished rooms and a valuable library of over 6000 volumes of choice books. It has gone on with its work regularly ever since 1871, and has had about fifty students. It is in great need of scholarships and of larger endowments for professors. In bonds and property the Seminary is worth over one hundred thousand dollars. In 1859 Dr. Scott edited and published The Pacific Exposition, in San Francisco, a monthly magazine devoted to the cause of education and the interests of the Presbyterian Church. It obtained quite an extensive circulation, and reached its third year, but was discontinued at the breaking out of the civil war. About the closing of the war The Occident, a weekly paper, was established in this city by Rev. Dr. Eells and Rev. Dr. Woodbridge, and is now published and edited by Rev. C. A. Poage & Co.

"While," says Dr. W. A. Scott, "we are thankful for what has been done, we regret that a great deal more has not been accomplished. We deeply feel our obligations to our brethren east of the mountains, and fervently desire their prayers and aid to help us in doing the Lord's work on this side of the continent. Our growth as a Denomination would have been greater than it is if we had had larger means and more men. The territory is ample, and many more faithful laborers are called for. All the Evangelical churches are earnestly at work, such as the United Presbyterians, Cumberland Presbyterians, Methodists, Baptists, Congregationalists and Episcopalians. And so, also, is the Church of Rome, and quite a large number of all classes of isms and branches of infidelity. But our whole continent must be won for Christ."

Presbyterianism in Charleston, S. C. Presbyterians were among the first settlers in South Carolina. They have been proportionably numerous in all periods of its history; and during the latter part of the eighteenth century the great majority of emigrants were Presbyterians. In the year 1704, when there was but one Episcopal congregation in the whole province, then numbering towards six thousand white inhabitants, the dissenters had three churches in Charleston, and one of the first regular churches formed in the colony was independent. As early, however, as the year 1690, the Presbyterians, in conjunction with the Independents, formed a church in Charleston, which continued in this united form for forty years. During this period two of their ministers, the Rev. Messrs. Stobo and Livingston, were Presbyterians, and connected with the Charleston Presbytery, which was formed about 1720, but was never in connection with the General Assembly. After the death of Mr. Livingston twelve families seceded, and formed a Presbyterian church, on the model of the Church of Scotland. Their building was erected in 1734, near the site of the present, which was completed in 1844.

CIRCULAR CHURCH.

The church founded in 1690 was, doubtless, the church now called the "Circular Church." Holmes, in his American Annals, probably alluding to the same church, says: "In 1698 a church was gathered by the Rev. John Cotton, son of the celebrated minister of Boston, who died after the short ministry of about one year. In the short time of his continuance there were about twenty-five members added to the church (besides those first incorporated), and many baptized, it being much of a heathenish place before."

THE HUGUENOT CHURCH.

The church with the corporate name, "The French Protestant Church of Charleston," was founded by French Protestant Christians, who, having left France to avoid the persecutions which followed the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, in 1685, sought civil and religious liberty in South Carolina. Its tenets are contained in the articles entitled "Confession de Foi, faite d'un commun accord par les Eglises réformées du Royaume de France." And its government and discipline were, as far as local circumstances permitted, in accordance with the principles laid down and explained in the book entitled "Le discipline Ecclesiastique des Eglises Réformées de France." Its worship was liturgical. The book used, as far back as memory extends, is an edition in quarto, entitled "La Liturgie ou la Maniere de Celebrete Service Divin, que est etablie dans les Eglises de la Principaute de Neufchatel et Vallangin. Seconde édition. Reue et corrigée, a Neufchatel, chez Jonas Gallandre & Compagnie, 1737." The psalmody of the church was conducted according to the book entitled Les Psaumes de David, mis en rime Françoise, par Clement Marot, et Theodore de Beze; in which book the Psalms are set to music.

But the worship of the church, for a long time subject to interruptions, in consequence of the necessity of procuring ministers from Europe, had for years been suspended, partly for the reason just stated, but chiefly on account of a gradual dispersion of the families of members among churches in which the services were conducted in English. This, being the language of the country, had become the language of the descendants of the French. A corresponding change in the services of the church was not made in due time. Its necessity, slowly admitted, eventually led to measures for effecting a translation of the Liturgies into English; which work having been accomplished, an edition was printed, by order of the Corporation, in 1836.

The property of the church, an ancient endowment from the Lords Proprietors of the then Province of Carolina, had in the meantime been preserved and improved. A new and more commodious house of worship, on the original site, and partly on the foundation of the former house, was commenced in 1844, completed in 1845, and dedicated to the service of God on the 11th of May, in the latter year.

Thus provided with means, with a pure and scriptural liturgy in a language familiar to us, and with a convenient edifice, this ancient church again gathered a congregation deeply interested in its history and prospects, to whom divine worship and sacred instruction, according to the forms and principles of its founders, have been regularly afforded. For many years the Rev. Dr. Petrie was pastor of this church. It is now under the pastoral care of Charles S. Vedder, D.D. Both these gentlemen's sketches will be found elsewhere in this volume.

THE FIRST CHURCH.

The First Presbyterian Church was organized in 1731, the members of our Denomination having until that time remained united with the Independent or "Circular Church." The First Presbyterian Church was supplied with ministers from the Church of Scotland, and has never been in connection with our own General Assembly until very recently. In 1882 it was received into Charleston Presbytery, and thus into organic union with the General Assembly. Its present convenient and tasteful edifice was erected in 1814, and the church, under the ministrations of its pastor, the Rev. Wm. T. Thompson, continues to prosper.

SECOND CHURCH.

The Second Presbyterian Church, was formed in 1809. It grew out of the necessity of providing new accommodations to meet the religious wants of the city, the old Scotch Church being filled to overflowing. This edifice was finished in 1811, at an expense of $100,000 and upwards. It is a beautiful and spacious edifice. Without being offensively decorated its style of architecture is airy, tasteful and elegant. Its first pastor was the Rev. Andrew Flinn, D.D., who was called in 1809, and died in 1820. Dr. Flinn was celebrated for his eloquence. He was Moderator of the General Assembly in 1812. Dr. Flinn was succeeded by Rev. Artemas Boies, called in 1820, and who left in 1823. The Rev. Thomas Charlton Henry, D.D., was called in 1824 and died in October, 1827. His fervor and eloquence contributed to make his ministry very successful. In May, 1829, the Rev. William Ashmead was installed pastor, who died while absent in Philadelphia, in December of the same year. The Rev. Thomas Smyth, D.D., was called in 1832, and continued in this relation until his death in 1873. Under the ministry of Dr. Smyth the church attained a high degree of prosperity, both spiritual and temporal, and few pastors have done so efficient service in the Kingdom of Christ in the various forms of usefulness opening to the ministerial office. The present pastor is the Rev. G. R. Brackett, D.D., whose sketch will be found in its proper place.

THE THIRD PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.

In 1814 a secession from the Scotch Church, then under the pastoral care of Rev. Dr. Buchan, erected a church building in Archdale street, which was called The St. Andrew's Presbyterian Church. But financial and other troubles led to the abandonment of the enterprise, and the sale of their property some nine years after. Their building and cemetery lot subsequently came into possession of the Third Presbyterian Church, which was organized in 1823. The Rev. William A. McDowell was called from Morristown, New Jersey, to become its first pastor. He removed to Philadelphia in 1833. After a vacancy of three years, Rev. William C. Dana (afterwards D. D.) was installed by the Charleston Union Presbytery. This, his only pastoral charge, he served for forty-six years. During a large part of its history "this church and its pastor remained in a state of isolation from the Synod." In 1848 a new church building was erected on Meeting street, and the congregation assumed, as their corporate name, the title The Central Presbyterian Church. The Westminster Church now (1883) owns and occupies this building.

GLEBE STREET CHURCH.

The Zion Glebe Street (now the Westminster) Church, originated in a revival of religion with which the Second Church was blessed in 1836. As the result of this gracious baptism, the Session of that church, under the lead of its pastor, determined, in the Spring of 1847, to set on foot a movement for the establishment of another Presbyterian church in the city. This movement was placed under the charge of the Rev. Abner A. Portner. The church was organized by the Charleston Presbytery, May 16th, 1847, thirty-four persons being enrolled as members, twenty-seven of whom were from the Second Church. A church edifice was finished and occupied in the Spring of 1848. It was built on Glebe land, belonging to St. Philip's (Episcopal) Church, for which an annual ground-rent of one hundred and forty dollars was paid. But in 1856 the fee-simple ownership was secured. In 1858 improvements were completed. The Lecture and Sunday-school rooms, and the pastor's study, were added, making a most valuable contribution to the comfort, convenience and beauty of the building.

Eight pastors have served this church. Dr. A. A. Porter was installed in November, 1848, and remained until February, 1851. Dr. J. H. Thornwell accepted a call in the Fall of this year, and entered upon the work, but during the Summer of 1852 he was elected to the Presidency of the South Carolina University at Columbia. After an interval, during which the pulpit was supplied by the Rev. Mr. Smythe, of Alabama, the Rev. J. L. Kirkpatrick, D.D., became pastor, and continued so for eight years. The Rev. A. Pickens Smith was installed as Dr. Kirkpatrick's successor in November, 1860. In April, 1866, the Glebe Street Church united with the Zion Presbyterian Church (which had been organized in 1850), under the name of the Zion Presbyterian Church. The first pastor of the Zion Church was the Rev. John B. Adger, D. D. He was followed, after an interval of some months, during which the Rev. Ferdinand Jacobs, D. D., supplied the pulpit, by the Rev. Dr. Girardeau. In April, 1866, Dr. J. L. Girardeau became the pastor of the church created by the union of the Glebe Street and the Zion churches. At the first meeting of the joint Session of these two churches, it was resolved to carry out the purpose for which Zion Church was originally organized, viz: the religious instruction of the colored people. With this end in view, an associate pastor, in the person of the Rev. J. B. Mack, D. D., was called, in September, 1867. This arrangement continued, with great advantage to the church, for two years. The present pastor, the Rev. W. F. Junkin, D. D., has sustained this relation since 1876.

At a meeting of the Charleston Presbytery, about two years since, that body, by a unanimous vote, combined into one the Zion Church (Globe Street) and the Third or Central Presbyterian Church of Charleston. That action was taken at the request of the two congregations interested. The Central Church having become vacant by the death, in 1851, of its venerable and beloved pastor, Rev. W. C. Dana, D. D., proposed to the Globe Street Church to unite with it. This proposal was agreed to, and the two churches became one. The congregation selected as the permanent name of the church, The Westminster Presbyterian Church, Charleston, S. C. The building (Globe Street) was sold, and it was decided that thereafter public worship should be held in the Central Church building in Meeting street, until such time as "the way shall be clear" to carry out one of the conditions of the union, viz.: "to erect, from the proceeds of the sale of both buildings, a new church edifice, somewhere in the western part of the city."

Presbyterianism in Colorado. Colorado was organized as a Territory in 1861; admitted into the Union, with the rights and powers of a State, in 1876; has an area of 105,000 square miles, nearly equal to that of New England and New York together; a population of about 300,000; and for grandeur of scenery, salubrity of climate, capability of soil, when irrigated, and variety and abundance of mineral resources, can scarcely be excelled.

Until the year 1859, this vast region was merely a part of the great American desert—the haunt of wild beasts and of the still more dreaded Indians. In the Spring of that year began the first rush from the East and South to Pike's Peak. The great mass came first with visions of silver and gold. Some came impelled by nobler reasons—the love of souls and the desire to win the plains and the mountains for Christ. The pioneer of Presbyterianism in Colorado was the Rev. Lewis Hamilton, then of the Presbytery of St. Joseph, a good man and devoted to the Master. He reached Denver on Saturday, June 11th, and the next day held religious services in a hall on Ferry street. Among his hearers on that occasion was Horace Greeley, who suggested to Mr. Hamilton to follow the surging crowd into the mountains. The then chief seat of the mining excitement and activity was the region around Central City. Thither, therefore, Mr. Hamilton made his way, and on June 28th, preached to a large and interested audience under the shade of the mountain pines. Other faithful men soon joined him, and, at different points in the region, wrought earnestly in the work of the gospel. Precious spiritual results were gained, but for a time the whole condition of things seemed uncertain and unsettled. The way was not open for complete and permanent church organizations. At length, however, this work began. The First Church in Denver was organized in December, 1861, by Rev. A. S. Billingsley; the Church in Central City, in January, 1862, by the Rev. L. Hamilton; the Church in Black Hawk, in February, 1863, by Rev. G. W. Warner; the Church in Boulder Valley, in September, 1863, by Rev. A. R. Day; the Church in Upper St. Urian, in October, 1869, by Rev. A. R. Day; and the Church in Idaho Springs, in March, 1870, by Rev. Sheldon Jackson. At about this last date, the Rev. Mr. Jackson was also instrumental in the formation of churches in Pueblo, Colorado City, Golden City and Georgetown.

Early in the Spring of 1869, by the concurrent action of the Presbyteries of Missouri River, Fort Dodge, and Des Moines, the Rev. Sheldon Jackson (now Dr. Jackson) was appointed Superintendent of Missions, for central and western Iowa, Nebraska, Dakota, Montana, Utah and Wyoming. In July of the same year the Board of Domestic Missions enlarged this immense field of the Superintendent, so as to include Colorado. Dr. Jackson filled this important position (some geographical changes occurring) with great diligence and success, until 1880, when he was succeeded, in the Colorado portion of it, by the present efficient Synodical Missionary, the Rev. John G. Reid.

The Presbytery of Colorado was organized by direction of the General Assembly of the Church in February, 1870. In the following May it reported to the General Assembly, Ministers, 9; churches, 10; communicants, 236; Sunday-school scholars, 79; collections for all church purposes, $7750. Ten years later, in 1880, the Presbytery reported to the Assembly, Ministers, 37; churches, 42; communicants, 2056; Sunday-school scholars, 3298; collections for all church purposes, $38,088.

By this time it became apparent that the interests of our Church work in Colorado would be promoted by a division of the original Presbytery into two. Under the direction, therefore, of the General Assembly, the Presbytery of Colorado was dissolved October, 1880; and, in accordance with its request, it was succeeded by the duly organized Presbyteries of Denver and Pueblo. The geographical line between them, as fixed by the General Assembly, is the 39th degree of north latitude, which very nearly divides the State into halves.

The work among the Mexicans, in Southern Colorado, was first brought to the notice of Presbytery by the Rev. A. M. Darley, in 1878. Since then six churches have been organized among that people, and an hundred and fifty members gathered into their communion.

At the present time (1883) there are in the State, Presbyteries, 2; ministers, 45; churches, 51; Sunday-school scholars, 4000, and communicants, 3000. From the nature of the main industries here, those data which involve the future are perhaps slightly less certain than in some other States, but to intelligent and thoughtful men the whole outlook is big with promise.

Presbyterianism in Indiana. [The following article, by Rev. J. F. Tuttle, D. D., contains additional items to those embraced in Indiana, Synod of.] The settlements in Indiana previous to missionary work began at Vincennes—French—in 1710. Americans settled there in 1795. Other settlements followed. In 1800 the Territory was organized. In 1804 Peter Cartwright—Methodist—preached the first sermon in Indiana, and in the Spring of 1805 that great preacher and pastor, Dr. Thomas Cleland, preached the first Presbyterian sermon in the Territory.

In 1806 Rev. Robert B. Robertson organized the first Presbyterian Church—"the Indiana Church"—near Vincennes. Then from that date to 1824 sprang into life the churches in their order—Charlestown, Washington, Madison, Salem, New Albany, Livonia, Blue River, Pisgah, Bloomington, Hanover, Evansville, Indianapolis, Crawfordsville, Franklin, Columbus and several others.

Some of these early churches are still prominent and vigorous, and new ones of the same sort have also come.

In 1824 these churches and the ministers of Indiana belonged to the Presbytery of Transylvania, a part of the Synod of Kentucky. In that year—1824—the Presbytery of Salem was formed, and in 1825 this was divided into three Presbyteries of Salem, Madison and Wabash, including 14 ministers, 43 churches, and 1500 communicants. In October, 1826, the Synod of Indiana was organized, and so warm was the zeal of its members that souls were converted during the meeting. It was a revival meeting, and that, for several years, was not an unusual incident of meetings, both of Synods and Presbyteries.

The missionary zeal of ministers and churches was shown in the frequency of Presbyterial meetings to license and ordain ministers. Such men as Dickey, of Washington, Johnson, of Madison, Martin, of Livonia, Crowe, of Hanover, James Thompson, of Crawfordsville, Carnahan, of Dayton, Post, of Logansport, Ross, of Ft. Wayne, and others as good, traveled long distances, winter and summer, on this official work and in special services, especially communion, of which a great deal was then made, and ought to be, in our own day.

There were remarkable men who then itinerated the vast wilds of Indiana, on evangelical missions. Besides those named, we find such as Samuel T. Scott, Thomas C. Searle, D. C. Banks, Baynard R. Hall, Charles C. Beatty, James McGrady, David C. Proctor, G. Lowry, John Thomson, senior, and his son, John S. Thomson, and others.

They were noble pioneers, and they did noble work. They were evangelists on horseback. The cabin, the school-house, the "templed woods," were the places in which they preached Christ to people in the wilderness. There were some plain churches, but these men preached where they could find people. The missionary journeys of Charles C. Beatty, the patriarch of Steubenville, John M. Dickey, John F. Crowe, and James H. Johnston, of Hanover and region, James Thompson, of Crawfordsville, Ross, of Ft. Wayne, Carnahan, of Dayton, and Post, of "the Mouth of Ecl," as Logansport was then called, are very inspiring. The records show remarkable results.

It is no invidious remark that the work of Dr. Henry Little, of Madison, in all parts of Indiana, has no superior in the annals of Home Missions in this State. He could endure more fatigue than the horse he bestrode. He was a wonder on horseback, in getting to out of the way places to preach to hungry people.

For several years the camp-meeting was very effective. The Mount Tabor camp-ground near New Albany has had a most remarkable history. There are others which, as Poplar Spring and Crawfordsville, have become as holy ground, by the baptisms of the Spirit there felt.

In close connection with these statements must be mentioned the founding of Hanover College, in 1827, and of Wabash College, in 1832. Also the Theological Seminary for several years doing its work at Hanover, then at New Albany, and finally transplanted as the germ of the Northwestern Theological Seminary at Chicago. All these Institutions have done a vast work in educating home talent for home work. Indeed, the rolls of our Synod, at first one, then in 1838 two, then four, by the division of the two, and now again one, by the reductive order of the General Assembly, are full of proof of what has been done by these Institutions, planted and nurtured by Christian men and money. Their power has been grand all over Indiana, and far beyond in this land and the distant parts of the world.

It has been and it is still a Church of revivals. The results have, in many respects, been vast. We need a revival like that which attended the labors of Dickey, Crowe, Johnston, Martin, Thompson, and their brothers in the early times.

Presbyterianism in Maryland. The early history of Presbyterianism in this country is involved in obscurity. We have been accustomed to think that it had its beginning on the eastern shore of Maryland, about the year 1683. But Jamaica, L. I., New Castle, Del., and Annapolis, Md., claim an earlier date.

The record is that Puritans, who had tarried for a time in Virginia, came and settled in Annapolis and the country around, as early as 1619. Persons holding various theological views were called Puritans at that time. Neal says, "All were Puritans with King James, who stood by the laws of the land in opposition to his arbitrary government, though otherwise "never so good Churchmen."

Dr. C. Hodge says, "The word Puritan has in history a much wider sense than that assigned to it in modern usage. In English history the designation Puritan was applied to all those who, under the reign of Elizabeth and Charles I, were desirous of a further reformation of the Church. Many prelates, and thousands of Episcopalians and Presbyterians were included in that class.

There were Church of England Puritans, and Independent Puritans, and Presbyterian Puritans. If these who came to Annapolis had been Church of England Puritans, they would not have been persecuted, and finally driven out of Virginia. The Independent Puritans did not favor a regular ministry, or allow elders to assist in the government of the church. These persons were favorable to both, for while they were in Virginia they sent to New England for ministers, and after they had arrived at their new home on the Severn River, an elder, by the name of Durand, was the most conspicuous character.

They had no ecclesiastical connection with the Church in New England, and asked for ministers from there, not because they had a claim upon the people of New England, but because of their urgent need. The Church there seemed to be indifferent to their wants; but, after a time agreed to send three of their ministers "who might most easily be spared." After that there seems to have been no further correspondence between this colony and the Church in New England, and for that reason we judge that they differed somewhat in their doctrine or Church polity.

Besides, Robinson, who led a party out of England into an exile of twelve years in Holland, intended to join this company who came to Annapolis. Robinson, in giving an account of their views, declared that they fully agreed with the Church of Holland. Holland and Scotland were in accord at that period, as they have been since, and English Puritanism was largely of the same type.

The people who settled Annapolis and the country around were isolated, and, of course, had no connection and no correspondence with other religious bodies. Who ministered to them after they came to Annapolis, and with what regularity their services were held, we have no means of learning; but the ruins of their church are to be seen not far from Annapolis, and tombstones bearing the date of the death of their people some time prior to 1700.

As three ministers were sent from New England, who, on account of the persecuting spirit of the Church of England in Virginia, had to return without rendering any service, and as these people, in less than six years after coming to Maryland, gained control of the whole State, we judge that they were a large and influential body of people. To accommodate these, on their arrival, required a large extent of territory. From the land records of the State we learn that some of these received thousands of acres, one as many as twenty thousand acres. Before 1700 lands remote from Annapolis were occupied by this people and their descendants. The early churches of Marlborough and Bladensburg, we have no doubt, were formed largely by these people. Elder Durand, already mentioned, the land record tells us, had nine hundred acres on the Patapsco river. It is not at all improbable that the lands on this river were occupied some years before we hear of the Patapsco Church, which is now known as the Mt. Paran Church. That church had been in existence some time before they made application to London merchants to send them a minister; and Rev. Thomas Reynolds, of England, had been contributing to its support, it is likely, long before Rev. Hugh Conn had been set over it as pastor by the newly organized Presbytery of Philadelphia. Towson, Lawson and Lyon are some of the names that have been perpetuated in this ancient church.

And it is not at all improbable that, pushing their adventurous way still further north, the choice lands on Deer creek, near the Susquehanna, were settled by this people long before we hear of the Deer Creek Church, which was fully organized before Whitefield came into Maryland, in 1739. Archer, Preston, Warren, Lloyd, are some of the names perpetuated in this church, now known as the Churchville Church.

Here, then, we see how this earliest branch of Presbyterianism in this land flowed on and mingled with that branch that began to flow thirty-four years later from the Eastern Shore, where Makemie had served several churches. The Scotch and Irish of the eastern shore mingled with the English of the western shore of Maryland, and that Church thus formed has gone on, embracing not only these nationalities, but others, until it has become a Church for all people, and embraces in it people in all parts of the earth.

Presbyterianism in New England, excepting the State of Connecticut. It is an interesting fact that as early as 1631, when the territory along the banks of the Merrimac river was being taken up by colonists, Presbyterians in Scotland, being assured by letters that they might exercise their church government in New England, sent over agents to locate a place for settlement. They started, but on account of the roughness of the voyage returned home without reaching this continent. Rev. John Livingstone then wrote Governor Winthrop, and in September the Court assigned them the territory where the city of Newburyport is now located. The originator of the project and its most persevering helper was Rev. John Blair, a name famous among the ministry of that day. He secured the building of a ship for the use of this projected colony, of which he was part owner, and which was called the "Eagle Wing." On September 9th, 1636, they loosed from Loch Fergus, in all one hundred and forty persons. Among them were Blair and Livingstone and others of note. The ship soon after grounded on the coast of Scotland. The leaders being undaunted, they started again. Off the coast of Newfoundland they encountered a hurricane, the ship sprung a leak, and they finally decided to give up the voyage. As Mather says, "meeting with manifold crosses, being half-seas through, they gave over their intendments." Had this colony succeeded, the rise of Presbyterianism in this country would have dated in New England.

The earliest successful organization of a Presbyterian church in this section was that of the Huguenots, in Boston, who were organized in 1696 and continued until 1761, amid many obstacles and persecutions, on account of the intolerance of the colonists.

In 1718 there was a Scotch-Irish emigration from Londonderry, Ireland, who founded the town of Londonderry, N. H. They organized a Presbyterian Church, probably in 1719, with Rev. James McGregor, who came over with them, as pastor. In 1723 they built a manse, and a meeting house the next year. At the Spring communion of 1723 there were present two hundred and thirty members, and two years later they had four schools within their bounds, and nine years from the time of their settlement paid one-sixteenth of the State tax. This organization still continues. A volume containing the history of Londonderry and Derry, embracing a full history of this church, was published by Rev. E. L. Parker, one of its pastors, in 1851.

Some time about 1727, the Federal Street Church (then Long Lane), in Boston, was formed with Rev. Mr. Morehead, from Ireland, as pastor. It continued until 1786, when it passed over to Congregationalism. In 1746 the First Presbyterian Church of Newburyport was fully organized, and the first meeting house built, services having been held for two years previous. The second house of worship was built ten years afterward, and it was considered one of the largest in New England. This church was the result of Whitefield's labors in this town. The first pastor was Rev. Jonathan Parsons, of Lyme, Conn., with whom Whitefield had special intimacy, and at whose house he died in 1770. At his own request, Whitefield was buried under the pulpit of this Church, where his remains still repose.

The church at Londonderry, N. H., sent out, from time to time, colonies which have formed prosperous churches. The first colony organized the Church at Windham, in 1717. A second colony settled at Bedford in 1737, and in 1757 organized the church there. Another colony went to Antrim and, in 1775, formed a congregation which was organized into a church in 1778. The Rev. W. B. Cochran, its present pastor, has published a volume containing a full and valuable history of this church.

From 1745 to 1791 Presbyterian churches existed in the State of Maine, among the immigrants who came out from Ireland and Scotland. At Georgetown, New Castle, Brunswick, Boothbay, Bristol, Topshew, Warren, Gray, Canaan, Turner and other places, churches were formed, but they have become extinct, or gone over to Congregationalism, so that there is no church of our denomination now existing in that State.

It is stated, on good authority, that from 1768 to 1793 there were seventy organized Presbyterian churches in New England. Most of these have gone over to independency. Owing to the prevalence of Congregationalism and the unity of feeling which has existed between that Denomination and ourselves, no aggressive efforts have been made to spread Presbyterianism in this part of our country. The churches of recent years have been mostly confined to organizations among the Scotch-Irish, in the cities and manufacturing centres.

The Presbytery of Boston, which comprises all the churches in connection with the General Assembly in the New England States, except Connecticut, consists of eighteen churches, located as follows: Seven in New Hampshire, one in Vermont, one in Rhode Island and nine in Massachusetts. The whole number of communicants is 2875. Within a few years a large immigration of Scotch-Irish from the Old Country, the Provinces and Nova Scotia, has come to the manufacturing centres of New England, who desire the forms of church government in which they have been trained, which is opening a new and important field for Presbyterian enlargement in this section.

In addition to the above enumeration the United Presbyterians have ten churches in New England, viz.: six in Massachusetts, one in Rhode Island, and three in Vermont, with a total membership of 1260. The Reformed Presbyterians have seven churches, two located in the city of Boston, and five in the State of Vermont, with a total membership of 610.

Thus it will be seen that Presbyterianism in New England has not spread as in other sections of our country, but has been confined to localities, and mainly among the descendants of the Scotch. The Puritans and their descendants were independents. In doctrine and worship, however, they were so allied to the Standards of the Presbyterian Church that they have absorbed the American Presbyterian element which has located in this section of the country. Many of the Congregational churches have enjoyed the ministry of pronounced Presbyterians, and their colleges and seminaries have sought instructors from her ranks. Differing only in Church polity, there has not hitherto been a necessity for making aggressive effort in a field so well supplied with religious privileges.

Presbyterianism in New York City. The first movement which led to the organization of a Presbyterian congregation in New York, was in January, 1707. Prior to that period a few Presbyterians had assembled for worship in a private house, being without a minister. Two ministers of the faith, named Francis Makemie and John Hampton, from the eastern shore of Maryland, now visited New York on their way to Boston, and application was made to the Consistory of the Dutch Church for the use of their place of worship, that these clergymen might preach. Permission was given by the Consistory, but that of Lord Cornbury, the Governor of the province, was also requisite, and it was refused. Mr. Makemie, however, preached in a private house in Pearl street, and baptized a child. The performance of these ministrations, without a license from the Governor, resulted in the arrest of both Mr. Makemie and his companion, who were brought before his lordship, and by his order thrown into prison. After two months of confinement they were brought before the Chief Justice by a writ of habeas corpus, and Mr. Hampton, not having preached, was discharged, and Mr. Makemie admitted to bail. The latter returned from Virginia, in June, to answer his prosecution before a civil court, where he was acquitted by a jury, but was obliged to pay costs to the amount of £83, 7s., 6d.

In 1717, John Nicholl, Patrick McKnight, Gilbert Livingston, and Thomas Smith, with a few others, organized a congregation, and called as their minister the Rev. James Anderson, a native of Scotland, but at the time a member of the Presbytery of Philadelphia. Worship was held in the City Hall, at the corner of Nassau and Wall streets, the use of which was granted by the corporation of the City. In 1718 a lot was purchased in Wall street, and in the following year a church edifice was erected. Money was collected in Connecticut and in Scotland for the new enterprise. In 1720 application was made for a charter, the granting of which was successfully opposed by the vestry of Trinity Church at this time, and at other periods, for more than half a century. Having no prospect of obtaining a charter by which they might enjoy, as an incorporate body, a right to their church and cemetery, and alarmed by what had occurred at Jamaica, Long Island, where the property of the Presbyterians had been actually taken from them by the Episcopalians, they invested the fee of their church and ground in the General Assembly of the church of Scotland. Subsequent to the Revolution the property was re-conveyed to the trustees of the church. The church was enlarged in 1748. The following inscription was placed in the wall, over the magistrate's pew: "Under the auspices of George II. King of Great Britain, Patron of the Church and Defender of the Faith." Rev. David Bostwick was called to the church in 1756, and early in his ministry a portion of the members seceded and formed the First Associate Reformed Church, in Cedar street, now the Scotch Presbyterian Church, in Grand street. In 1765, the Rev. John Rodgers was installed, when the church was revived, prospered, and greatly increased. A lot was obtained from the corporation, on the corner of Nassau and Beekman streets, on which a new building was erected, and dedicated in Jan., 1768.

Most of the members of the First Church and their ministers went into exile during the Revolution. On their return, they found their churches had been desecrated and left in an injured and ruinous state. The parsonage house belonging to the church had been burned. The vestry of Trinity Church, now unsolicited, offered the Presbyterians the use of St. Paul's and St. George's churches until their own might be repaired. At a later period, a lot of ground on Robinson street was donated for the use of the Presbyterian senior minister. In fact, the Episcopalians in a minority, as they were after the war, were a very different people than when in a majority. The Brick Church was re opened in June, 1784, and the Church in Wall street in the following year. In 1798 a third Presbyterian church was opened in Rutgers street, in later days under the charge of Dr. Krebs. In 1807 a colony from the Wall Street Church and from the Brick Church, with others who were unable to obtain pews in either, purchased ground and built the Cedar Street Church. The churches were separated, and became independent of each other in 1809, each having their own pastor, except that Dr. Rodgers continued his pastoral relations to the First and Brick churches. During 1809-10, the Wall Street Church was rebuilt, the old materials being used for building another church in Spring street, in part. A separation of the Wall Street and Brick churches was effected by mutual consent. Dr. Rodgers died in May, 1811, leaving Dr. Miller, who became a colleague in 1792, sole pastor, which he retained until 1813, when he became one of the Professors at Princeton Theological Seminary. In 1815 Rev. Philip M. Whelpley accepted a call to the church, but was removed by death, in July, 1821. He was succeeded by Dr. Phillips, in January 1826. In 1834 the church was partially destroyed by fire, but was immediately rebuilt and reopened, in 1835. In May, 1841, the building was vacated and removed to Jersey City, and appropriated to the purpose for which it was originally built. The corner-stone of a new edifice, to be erected on the corner of Fifth Avenue and Eleventh and Twelfth streets, was laid in September of the same year, and the first service was held January 11th, 1846. The church is constructed of brown free-stone, and is one of the most imposing in New York, and the congregation is among the most wealthy. (See Brick Church, and Hall, John.)

Presbyterianism in Northern New Jersey. The counties of Sussex and Warren may be appropriately designated as Northern New Jersey, because of natural boundaries. As near as can be ascertained churches have been organized in this region as follows, viz.: Washington, First (originally Mansfield Woodhouse, and subsequently Mansfield, First), 1730; Greenwich, 1738; Hackettstown (known also as Lower Hardwick and Independence), 1739; Oxford, First (originally Oxford), 1749; Yellow Frame (originally Hardwick, or Upper Hardwick), 1750; Newton, 1757;

Sparta, 1787; Knowlton, 1800; Harmony, 1807, and Markshoro', 1811; all of which were organized by the Presbytery of New Brunswick. Wantage, First, 1817; North Hardiston, 1819, and Branchville, 1820; by the Presbytery of Newark. Stillwater, 1822; Danville, 1831, and Belvidere, First, 1834; by the Presbytery of Newton. Wantage, Second, 1835; by Presbytery of Newark. Mensconctcong Valley, 1837; by Presbytery of Newton. Stanhope, 1838; by Presbytery of Rockaway. (?) Blairstown, 1840; by Presbytery of Newton. Belvidere, Second, 1840; by Philadelphia, Fourth. Stewartsville, 1850; Phillipsburg, 1853; Swartswood, 1853; Hope, 1854, and Mansfield, Second, 1855; by Presbytery of Newton. Lafayette, 1857; by Presbytery of Rockaway. Bloomsburg, 1857; Andover, 1858; Ashury, 1860; Oxford, Second, 1863; Montana, 1869; Delaware, 1871, and Papakating, 1882, by Presbytery of Newton. In the early history of the region it was customary for two or three churches to be united under one pastor; so that the names of ministers often appear, in the histories of the churches, as being in different charges at the same time. Aside from the numerous supplies sent out by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, we find, as the earliest pastors in the region, the names of John Rosbrugh, at Greenwich, Mansfield, Woodhouse and Oxford, from 1764 to 1769; Joseph Treat, at Greenwich, from 1775 to 1797; Wm. B. Sloane, at Greenwich and Mansfield, from 1798 to 1815, and at Greenwich alone till 1834; Francis Peppard, at Upper and Lower Hardwick, i. e., Yellow Frame and Hackettstown, from 1773 to 1783; Ira Condict, at Upper Hardwick and Newton, from 1787 to 1793; John Boyd, in the same charge, from 1803 to 1811; Peter Wilson, at Hackettstown and Mansfield, from 1786 to 1796; David Barclay, at Knowlton, in connection with Oxford and Lower Mount Bethel, from 1805 to 1811; Joseph Campbell, at Hackettstown and Pleasant Grove, from 1809 to 1832, and at the former place alone till 1838. The later history of the region is identified with that of the Presbytery of Newton, which see; also, for further details, see "Fiftieth Anniversary of the Organization of the Presbytery of Newton, by Rev. Presbyterianism in Pennsylvania.

PHILADELPHIA.

To the Rev. Francis Makemie is usually accorded the honor of being the first Presbyterian minister in this country. A native of Donegal county, Ireland, educated at one of the Scottish universities, he was licensed and ordained by the Presbytery of Laggan, with a view to his coming to America in response to an appeal for ministerial help which had been sent to that body from Maryland. Shortly after his ordination, the date of which is not known, he came to this country and settled in Maryland in 1683, where he organized the Church in Snow Hill, the first Presbyterian church in America. Several other congregations were gathered in that region. Mr. Makemie went from place to place as an itinerant missionary, extending his journeys into the neighboring colony of Virginia and as far as South Carolina.

In 1692 he visited Philadelphia, and it is probable that Presbyterians were gathered together and organized as a congregation at that time. Their first place of worship was a frame building on the northwest corner of Second and Chestnut streets, known as "the Barbadoes Warehouse." It belonged to the Barbadoes Trading Company, and had been used by them as a place for the storage and sale of merchandise, but had been abandoned on account of reverses which came upon the company.

In the Autumn of 1698 Mr. Jedediah Andrews, a licentiate from Massachusetts, a graduate of Harvard College, began to preach to them. He was ordained and installed their pastor in the Autumn of 1701, the year in which Philadelphia received its charter as a city, and Edward Shippen became its mayor. The place then contained 500 houses and a population of 5000.

In 1701 the congregation erected its first church building, on the south side of High (Market) street, corner of Bank street. It was surrounded by large buttonwood trees, from which it came to be known as the Buttonwood Church. It was enlarged in 1729, rebuilt in 1793, and finally abandoned, on account of the encroachments of business, in 1820, after it had been occupied one hundred and sixteen years. The congregation then removed to the church edifice it still occupies, on Washington Square. In this first frame church the first American Presbytery was organized, in 1705 or 1706. The first leaf of the records has been lost and the precise date is therefore unknown.

The growth of Presbyterianism in Philadelphia was very slow during the first half century of its existence. The growth of the city during the same period was by no means rapid. In 1750 Fourth street was its western limit; it contained only 2076 houses and 15,000 inhabitants. Presbyterianism received a new impulse towards the middle of the century, from the immigration of many Presbyterian families, and also from the labors of the Rev. George Whitefield. Under his preaching large congregations were assembled and many converts were made. The revival was also accompanied with serious discussions. These discussions, together with the growth of the city, led to the formation, in 1743, of the Second Church, which had for its place of worship the Whitefield Academy, on Fourth street, south of Arch, and the celebrated Gilbert Tennent for its first pastor. Its first church edifice was erected and occupied in 1750, on the northwest corner of Third and Arch streets; enlarged and reconstructed in 1809. In 1837 the congregation removed to north Seventh street, below Arch, and in 1872 it took possession of its present building, corner of Walnut and Twenty-first streets.

The third congregation was organized in 1762, though it continued in connection with the First Church until 1771, when the Rev. George Duffield became its pastor. The Fourth Church was not formed until 1799. Thus, at the beginning of the present century, there were in Philadelphia four churches in connection with the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church. In this city, during that century, were formed its first Presbytery, in 1705 or 1706, its first Synod, in 1717, and its first General Assembly, in 1789. It had shown a determined patriotism during the War of the Revolution, its ministers and people giving an undivided support to the cause of freedom against the encroachments of British tyranny and oppression. But while the city had made great advances in population and wealth, Presbyterianism had not made a corresponding advance. It began the present century with only four churches and less than 500 communicants in a population of 70,218.

With the beginning of the present century it entered upon a more prosperous era, and from that time its progress has been very remarkable, as the following table, compiled from official sources, will show:—

Years.	Churches.	Communicants.	City Population.	Ratio.
1800.....	4	500	59,287	1 to 140
1810.....	6	1,058	96,287	1 to 91
1820.....	14	2,843	119,325	1 to 42
1830.....	21	4,956	167,325	1 to 34
1840.....	33	7,699	238,937	1 to 34
1850.....	37	10,968	498,562	1 to 37
1860.....	60	15,510	505,529	1 to 36
1870.....	96	18,907	674,922	1 to 36

Thus it appears that while the population of the city is only twelve times as large as in 1800, the Presbyterian communion rolls are 55.5 times as large, or that the Church has grown in numbers nearly five times as fast as the City. It will be observed, also, that during the period of separation between the "Old and New Schools" (1837-1870), the rate of advance was materially retarded, and that the reunion so happily effected in 1870 gave it a new impulse. If to the eighty-three churches and 27,747 communicants of this Denomination we add the 29 churches and 15,000 communicants of other Presbyterian bodies, we will have an aggregate of 112 and 42,747 communicants, or one to every twenty of the population. From these data we safely estimate the whole Presbyterian population as 210,000, or one-fifth of the entire population of the city.

The growth of the benevolence of the Church is even greater. The amount contributed for benevolent causes, to the General Assembly, on whose records we rely for our statistics until 1807, when the entire Presbytery of Philadelphia, which consisted of twenty churches, four of which were in the city, reported only $871, is stated to be as follows:

In 1825 the amount was $1048; in 1853, $40,503; in 1860, $79,377; in 1870, $190,170; in 1883, $223,484, or 256 times as much as in 1807, and three times as much as in 1860.

The amount expended for congregational purposes has also largely increased. At the beginning of the century the salaries of the pastors were small and irregularly paid; not unfrequently they felt very seriously the lack of means to meet current expenses. A few thousand dollars covered all that was paid for Church purposes. At the General Assembly in May last our Philadelphia churches reported $105,965 raised and expended for congregational purposes. Add to this the $223,484 contributed for the support of the missionary and benevolent operations of the Church, and we have an aggregate of $629,449 raised and expended by Philadelphia Presbyterians for their denominational work during the year ending the first of April last, whilst they have been, as always in preceding years, among the foremost of the supporters of the Bible, Tract and Sunday-school societies, and other union associations for benevolent work.

In 1800 there were but three church buildings; now there are ninety-three. In 1800 the entire value of the church property did not exceed $40,000; now it is worth not less than $2,500,000. Add to this the twenty church edifices of the other branches, and you have one hundred and eleven Presbyterian places of worship, and church property amounting in value to not less than $2,750,000.

These churches are, in the main, well equipped for work, with faithful, earnest, laborious pastors, and active, intelligent helpers among the laymen. Several that have been without pastors have very recently settled men, from whose labors great results are expected. The Sabbath schools are large and flourishing, with a membership of 33,674.

Besides co-operating with other Christian people in union benevolent work, Presbyterians have, during the last fifteen years, established, and to some good extent endowed, three institutions of their own: the Presbyterian Hospital, the Presbyterian Home for Women, and the Presbyterian Orphanage.

Philadelphia is also the home of three of the Boards of the Presbyterian Church: the Board of Publication, the Board of Education and the Board of Ministerial Relief. Here also is the Presbyterian Historical Society, with its large and valuable library, collected mainly through the long-continued and persevering labors of the late Samuel Agnew, to which, however, valuable additions have been made since his lamented death. The interests of Presbyterianism are also supported by three weekly denominational papers, ably conducted and widely circulated. On all sides the outlook for the future is encouraging and hopeful, and it is confidently expected the future growth will be even more rapid and satisfactory than the past.

INTERIOR OF THE STATE.

The increase of the Presbyterian Church through the interior of the State, on to the Susquehanna, as in Philadelphia, was not greatly disproportioned to that of the population. As immigration pushed its way towards the West, felling the forests, bridging the streams, plowing the fields and crowding the rich pastures with grazing folds, the blue flag floated over the advancing tide, and ministers increased in number, churches were planted, and presbyteries were formed. With the impetus given to industrial and commercial enterprise, Presbyterianism kept pace. With such noble men as Anderson, Bertram, Latta, Boyd, Irwin, Grier, Smith, Carmichael, Foster, McFarquhar, Mitchell, Blair, Craighhead, Finley, Sample, Cathcart, Snodgrass and others, the cause was carried forward in steady line and solid progress. Prominent among the churches which sprang into existence, was the Church in Abington, which was organized in 1711, by the Rev. Malachi Jones, and of which the Rev. Dr. William Tennent was pastor for twenty-nine years; the Church in New London, of which Dr. Francis Allison was one of the first pastors, having, in connection with his pastorate, the charge of an academy, at which many young men were trained for usefulness and distinction in the various vocations of life; the Church of Upper Octorama, which has been blessed with a succession of faithful pastors during all its long history, and which, in addition to the local influence it has exerted for good, has sent out a number of able ministers and several devoted missionaries; the Church at Brandywine Manor, which has been blessed with the faithful labors of Carmichael and the Griers (father and son), and from which, also, many have gone forth to the work of the ministry, to do noble service for the Master; the Church at Poquea, which was for forty-two years the pastoral charge of that able theologian and profound casuist, Dr. Robert Smith, whose school, which he established, acquired a great reputation, but who is better known to posterity as the father of those two great lights of the Church, Dr. Samuel Stanhope Smith, of Princeton College, and Dr. John Blair Smith, of Union College, both of whom succeeded their father in the Moderator's chair in the General Assembly; the Church at Chestnut Level, which was long under the care of that able divine, the Rev. James Latta, D.D., Moderator of the General Assembly in 1793, and father of four sons who entered the ministry, the Revs. William, Francis, James and John E. Latta, the last of whom was for a considerable time permanent clerk of the General Assembly; Donegal Church, located in one of the most important Scotch-Irish settlements in the county of Lancaster, upon the banks of the "Shecessalungo" creek, in 1714, and invested with peculiar historic interest; Old Derry Church, Paxtang Church and Old Hanover Church, around which cluster many sacred memories, and notices of which will be found in their appropriate place in this volume.

With all the advantages they possessed east of the Susquehanna, the enterprising and energetic Scotch-Irish were not satisfied, and hence they pushed their way further westward, crossing that river, at Peixtan, Peshtank, or Paxton, and entering what was then called "Kittochtimny Valley," or "North Valley," but is now known as Cumberland Valley. These immigrations began about 1730. In 1740 the number of settlers reached several thousands; in 1749 the number of taxables was 1897, and in 1751 it had considerably increased. The history of this people is replete with interest. They were, in general, plain in their style of living. Their houses, says Dr. Creigh, were but log cabins, in dimensions from 20 to 25 feet, by 28 and 30 feet, with oiled paper, in most cases, instead of glass, in their windows, chimneys built of sticks of wood plastered benches made of logs split in two parts and hewed down to a proper thickness, supported by four legs. Around the walls were driven in wooden pegs, on which were hung the garments of the inmates. Another set of pegs upheld the rifle, the pouch and the powder-horn. And here, too, was the little shelf on which rested the meagre library. And this one apartment of the cabin was used for parlor, family-room, chamber, nursery and kitchen.

Their clothing was of the simplest kind. The materials of which it was made were mainly wool and flax, all of which was prepared by their own hands. The men's ordinary wear was a loose wamms or hunting-shirt, made of woolen, with trousers of the same material or purely of linen, and moccasins, made of deer skin. Their finer wear was a coat of homespun, and a waistcoat, with breeches, often made of buckskin, with knee buckles, long stockings, shoes and shoe buckles, with cocked hats. The women's ordinary wear was a short gown and petticoat made of linsey-woolsey, a sun bonnet or hood. Their finer costume was often of silk and of other material equally costly, with a bonnet, made of material to correspond, and a kerchief of white around the neck and covering the upper part of the breast. Five or six yards were amply sufficient for a dress.

Their food was equally plain. Hog and hominy and potatoes, with mASH and milk, were their standing fare. The amount of wheat which they raised was but small, and then, when they had it, there was great difficulty in getting it ground for family use, there being no flouring mills within the limits of their settlement at this time. And then, again, it was, for them, the best medium of exchange by which to procure salt and iron, and other articles equally important. As for coffee and tea, if the old folks could afford to have either of them once a week, on the Lord's day, they were satisfied, while to the younger members of the family they were contra-

Their sources of knowledge, too, were very limited. Books were very scarce and high-priced, and hence the only ones they could afford to own were the Bible, the Confession of Faith, the Psalm Book, Pilgrim's Progress, Fourfold State, Saints' Rest, and such like. But these they read, they studied, they made themselves familiar with, and thus they became theologians, and were mighty in the Scriptures. They had a great care, too, that their children should be instructed; and so, whenever a settlement was formed a school was established, in which were taught spelling, reading, writing, arithmetic, geography, and in some cases, surveying.

But, in thus speaking of their domestic life, we must not overlook the family altar. Most of them being pious, and all of them having the highest regard for religion, no family was complete in its arrangements without the family altar. To this they had been trained in the land of their nativity, and in the land of their adoption they could not neglect it. And some of their most precious seasons were when, as a family, they were engaged in this delightful service. And such a scene as this, described by Burns in his "Cotter's Saturday Night," is just as true of the settlers of those parts as it was true of those in Scotland at the time it was written.

In organizing their churches in those early times, and in erecting their church buildings, great care was taken lest the limits of one congregation should encroach on those of another. Hence, when application was made to the Presbytery for the organization of a new congregation, or the erection of a new church building, the Presbytery would appoint what was called a "perambulating committee," who would measure the distance of ten miles from the nearest house of worship. And this usage continued until the unfortunate division in 1711, which rent the Church in twain.

The first church buildings of this people were plain log structures, which were fitted up with benches to accommodate the worshippers; they were without fire-places or stoves, and it was no uncommon thing for both the pastor and the male members of the congregation to bring their rifles with them to the place of worship, to be prepared for any attack which might be made by the Indians. True, these plain structures in the course of time gave place to edifices of a better architecture, yet even these were without ornamentation, and the services in them were of the simplest and most unpretending character. One of our kinsmen (Professor William M. Nexin, LL. D., of Franklin and Marshall College), whose boyhood was identified with one of these venerable buildings (Middle Spring), has given a faithful and touching description of it, which is equally applicable to all the rest. (See Middle Spring Church.) and Silvers' Spring—were, as their several sketches indicate, men of fervent piety, intellectual culture, great force of character, and earnest zeal, and they have left an influence for good which must be felt to the latest generations.

Lingering no longer on the beautiful Cumberland Valley, with its handsome towns, rich and productive farms, and intelligent, industrious, thrifty and law-abiding population, except to say that, as the result of its Scotch-Irish Presbyterianism, no district of our broad and blessed country has furnished more representative men in all the walks of life—men distinguished for their ability, integrity, patriotism and influence—we turn briefly to other directions.

The picturesque Juniata Valley, under the labors of the faithful missionaries by whom it was visited from time to time, and the earnest, able and diligent pastors with which it was favored—such as Linn, Wilson, McKinney, Peebles, Woods and Gibson—soon began to blossom as the rose, and became one of the strongholds of Presbyterianism. Under the culture of such devoted men of God, it is no wonder that this attractive region is so famous for its men of intellect and probity, as well as for its general prosperity, and that the spiritual soil was so grandly improved, that now Huntingdon Presbytery, covering territorially the seven prosperous counties of Blair, Huntingdon, Mifflin, Juniata, Bedford, Centre and Clearfield, has on its roll the names of 55 ministers and 69 churches, numbers 9274 communicants, and in the number of its churches is the third Presbytery in size in the United States.

BEYOND THE ALLEGHENIES.

In 1766 we find Mr. Beatty, in conjunction with Mr. Duffield, performing his Western mission. At Fort Pitt (Pittsburg) he was invited by McLagan, Chaplain to the Forty-second Regiment, to preach to the garrison, while Mr. Duffield preached to the people, who lived "in some kind of a town without the fort." The missionaries, on their return, reported "that they found on the frontiers numbers of people earnestly desirous of forming themselves into congregations, and declaring their willingness to exert their utmost in order to have the gospel among them," but their circumstances were "exceedingly distressing and necessitous," in consequence of calamities inflicted by the war.

It is impossible to determine how far the measures of the Synod for mission labor in Western Pennsylvania were carried out with each successive year, but they were regularly made at each annual meeting, and in some cases, at least, were successful. The war of the Revolution, however, interrupted the further prosecution of the plan, and yet before its close (1781) Redstone Presbytery had been organized on the field.

The Rev. W. F. Hamilton gives the following graphic description of the first meeting of this Presbytery:—

Of the three ministers, the oldest is James Power. He is thirty-five, of fair complexion, medium height, erect and rather slender in person, noticeably neat, though plain in dress, courteous and easy in his manners, but not lacking gravity, rather combining affability and dignity in due proportion. Next in age is Thaddeus Dodd, four years younger. He is considerably taller than Mr. Power, but equally slender. His dress hangs more loosely. He has a sallow complexion, black hair and black eyes, keen, piercing, but not unkindly. His whole general appearance is in contrast with that of Mr. Power, and by no means gives such promise of longevity. The other minister, still younger, is John McMillan, not yet turned of twenty-nine. In complexion he is neither fair nor sallow, but swarthy. His features are rough hewn, Scott, of Pigeon Creek, is one year younger; as is also John Neel, from Mt. Pleasant. They are good specimens of the better class of early settlers. Presbytery is opened with a sermon by Mr. Dodd, from the words, 'I have heard of thee by the hearing of the ear, but now mine eye seeth thee. Wherefore I abhor myself in dust and ashes.' Presumably a plain, searching gospel sermon, good alike for ministers and elders and people, good for all, young and old, who have gathered to hear it. Mr. McMillan is then elected Moderator, and Mr. Power clerk. There is but little business demanding attention, and so more time for prayer and conference. Another session is held the next morning, then they adjourn. They are glad they have seen each others' faces, they are proud to be an independent Presbytery, and having pressed each in some eyes homely, certainly masculine. His manner is blunt, abrupt, impatient of formality. His look stern, almost harsh, were it not tempered by benevolence. His person nearly if not quite six feet high, with head and neck inclining forward, giving already slight promise of corpulence, setting off to good advantage the cocked hat and broad-skirt coat with doublet, and the breeches with knee buckles, which constituted the conventional costume of the day. If there is either of the three that would be adjudged at once a man of commanding energy and force of character, a man of superior executive ability, it is certainly McMillan. Of the three elders the first noticed, perhaps, is Demas Lindley, from Ten Mile, a man of stalwart frame and great physical strength, yet one who sits as a child at Jesus' feet. He is in the vigor of manhood, aged forty-eight. Patrick others' hands with a parting grasp, they are ready to return to their homes."

Such was the Presbytery, and such were the churches, by which Presbyterianism was established in Western Pennsylvania. They were the advance guard, not only of Christianity, but of civilization and learning. Population, cities, colleges, agriculture, manufactures, and churches of all denominations, have since that time crossed the Mississippi, leaped the Rocky mountains, descended to the shores of the Pacific, and crossed that ocean to the Sandwich Islands, Japan, Siam, China, India and Persia. Little did the three ministers and three elders who met at Pigeon Creek on the morning of September 19th, 1781, understand the breadth and depth of the foundation they were laying, or the vast proportions of the great work they were inaugurating.

Here, again, as in Cumberland Valley, a very primitive state of society was that which greeted the eye and shaped the experience of the first pastors of the Presbytery. The persons that composed their congregations were by no means dressed in accordance with the fashions of our present cities. In nine cases out of ten, a blanket or a coverlet served as a substitute for a great coat in winter weather, and the worshiper was not ashamed to wear it. Deer skin was a substitute for cloth for men and boys. Everything that was not brought from a distance of more than a hundred miles across the mountains had to be manufactured by patient industry and primitive agencies. The best dwelling of the settler was for many years a log cabin, and its furniture was of the simplest description. Here and there a fort told the story of danger from Indian invasion, and suggested the hazards by day and night to which the inhabitants were exposed.

Until 1790, it is not known that a church edifice or house of worship was erected in the region. Meetings were held in the shady groves, or, for greater security, within the walls of the forts. They were attended sometimes from a distance of twelve or sixteen miles, and he was fortunate whose residence enabled him, by a walk of not more than five or six, to enjoy the regular ordinances of Sabbath worship. In many cases, every man came armed. The guns were stacked, and a sentinel was appointed to sound the signal of alarm in case of danger from Indian attack. The perils from this source did not cease till Wayne's victory, in 1791.

The toils and hardships of the ministers were excessive. They not only shared the lot of their people in respect to food, clothing, and lodging, but in their extended journeyings from place to place to preach, administer the ordinances, and visit their scattered sheep in the wilderness, were exposed to peculiar hazards. Often did they have to travel a distance of from fifteen to fifty miles in order to discharge their parochial duties, so extended were the fields which they were called to occupy. They were indeed bishops, in the primitive sense, and each had his diocese. For days together they were absent from their families. In some places there were no roads, or only those of the worst description. A blind path, but seldom used, must be followed, when every neighborhood road, tea mill or a smith's shop, being much more distinct, would be almost sure to mislead them. Guide-boards there were none. Bridges had not yet been built, and fording places were not always easy to be discovered. Yet, braving all perils, exposed to heat and cold, plodding through the mud or facing the storm, they discharged their duty, brave in a heroism not less noble than it was obscure, not less admirable than it was the fruit of Christian faith and pastoral fidelity. A notable example of this we have in the case of the Rev. George Hill, grandfather of the Rev. George Hill, D. D., now at Blairsville, who, having, while pastor of Donegal, Ligonier, and Fairfield, to cross the Conemaugh in going to one of his places of preaching, was known, in times of high water, to swim the river on horse-back, preach in his wet clothes, recross the river and return to his own house, a distance of ten miles, the same day.

The support of the clergyman in this region was by no means ample, yet two and sometimes three congregations were united to secure it. Even then he might be necessitated to eke out his salary by cultivating a farm, or unite thrift with charity in the work of instruction. There was indeed ample wealth around him—such as it was—but it was the riches of a fertile soil, and the verdure of hill and valley; it was nature herself, with her mines and acres waiting for the hand of industry to coin them into shape and imprint upon them the image and superscription of civilization and culture.

But a richer soil than that of the hills and valleys was that which the laborer in the Lord's vineyard was called to cultivate. His parishioners were by no means the miscellaneous driftwood which emigration usually floats off from older communities to new settlements. Among them were men of culture, and a large proportion of them were characterized by stern religious principle. They were men whose energy and vigor were developed by the circumstances of their lot, and who, in grappling with the forest, and repelling or guarding against savage attack, were made more sagacious, fearless and self-reliant. They were men of pure principles and exalted ambition—men whose descendants now generally occupy the places of honor, trust and responsibility in the community.

At this point a notice of the Old Presbytery of Erie, erected by the Synod of Virginia in 1801, is called for. It embraced all the churches and settlements north and northwest of the Ohio and Allegheny rivers. It extended from Beaver, Pa., on the Ohio river, on the south, to Lake Erie, on the north, and from the Allegheny river, on the east, to Canfield, O., on the west, embracing the whole of what is now the Synod of Allegheny, with portions of the Synods of Wheeling, Buffalo and Pittsburg. The field was almost wholly uncultivated by ministerial labor. The population was mainly Presbyterian. They had brought with them a few books from the East. The Bible, the Westminster Confession, the Hymn Book, and some works on practical religion; these were their spiritual pabulum during the intervals of their labor and toil. They often met together on the Sabbath and held what they called "Society Meetings." The exercises consisted of singing, prayer, and reading a sermon from Burder or some other standard work. But the parents felt that, much as they delighted in those social meetings, they needed the minister of Christ. Their children had many of them been baptized in their infancy, but were now growing up, and they felt the deepest interest in their spiritual welfare. Says the Rev. John Munson, "They saw the importance of having the standard of the gospel planted at the commencement of their new settlement. In all their meetings for prayer they earnestly sought the Lord that He would send them a godly man, to break to them the bread of life, and be the instrument of laying the foundation of a rising church in the wilderness. Their prayers were heard, and thus God in a short time selected out of these and other families materials for the organization of a church."

This remark has reference to the settlement in Beaver county, Pa., which afterwards constituted the congregation of Mount Pleasant; but was also characteristic of other portions of the territory constituting the Presbytery of Erie. There was, therefore, an eager call for laborers, that went up with an earnestness almost Macedonian, and was responded to by many of the ministers in the older settlements with a zeal and self-denial well-nigh apostolical. The people had no great inducements to offer; certainly very few of a temporal kind. There was labor and self-denial, with little in the way of salary or worldly fame. But there were opportunities for doing good, seldom exceeded. There was the way opening for planting the church in the wilderness, and of gathering immortal souls into its safe and peaceful inclosure.

And so the early fathers of the Presbytery of Erie girded themselves for the work and the warfare, and went forth with manly hearts, to labor as best they might in the Lord's cause.

These fathers were a hardy set of men, modeled after a type peculiar to their day, and eminently adapted to the performance of the great work to which they were called. They had been educated mainly in the West. Of the first twenty-eight on the roll, embracing a period of twenty years of its history, twenty-three were educated at Canonsburg, and at the academies that sprung up and were fostered under the influence of the Presbytery. And of the same twenty-eight, twenty-two pursued their theological studies in the West, and no less than eighteen at Dr. McMillan's log cabin. These men had been inured to labor. Almost every one of them had been accustomed to the work of subduing the forest, and of cultivating the soil from childhood. Even during his studies at Canonsburg, Robert Lee was engaged in clearing land from forest trees, and in order not to trench upon the hours of study and recitation, had labored at rolling logs and kindling fires at night. As a general thing, then, they came to the duties of the ministry with physical constitutions matured and indurated by labor and exercise. They were enabled at once to endure the hardships and privations that were peculiar to frontier life. Not only did they make long and fatiguing journeys in the work of organizing and supplying churches in remote places, but were obliged also to labor with their hands in securing a support. This may also account for the longevity that characterized these early fathers. They were enterprising men, too. They saw the field spreading before them, with its labors and its promises; they had girded themselves for the work, and neither labor nor peril appalled them. Whether they set out for the shore of Lake Erie, or plunged into the wilderness seeking the red man of the forest in his wild haunts, it mattered not. It was the Lord's work. It was for this they had entered the service; and they took the labors and the privations as matters of course.

If they lacked the polish and accomplished education that pertain to more modern times, they possessed that furniture that better fitted them for the then rude contact with Nature, and with the hardy race of pioneers that were felling the mighty forests and opening up the pathway for the progress of Empire in its mighty Western march.

The following extract from the admirable historical discourse, delivered by the late and lamented Rev. S. J. Wilson, D.D., LL.D., at the Centennial Celebration of the Presbytery of Redstone, at Uniontown, Pa., September 21st and 22d, 1881, is too appropriate to our purpose not to be transferred to our columns:—

"To the Christian historian no theme can be more interesting and edifying than the study of the providential preparations for the planting and growth of Presbyterianism on these shores, the formation and conservation of this land, 'a place of broad rivers and streams;' the preparation of a seed with which to plant and the conjunction of influences favorable to the increase of that which was planted; God threshed the nations, and winnowed the threshings, and sifted the winnowed grain for the finest of the wheat; and in no spirit of boasting, but according to the calm judgment of history, let it be put on record, with deep and humble gratitude, that the choicest of this seed wheat was Scotch-Irish Presbyterianism. As surely as Jehovah raised up a chosen people, and educated them in a peculiar manner, that they might be fitted to become citizens of the promised land, so surely did he prepare our Scotch-Irish ancestors, by a discipline which was large, severe, peculiar, that they might be fitted for this special field and mission. For the winnowed wheat, there was ready a fitting field, and through the varied ordinances of Providence, sunshine and storm, it grows to a prolific harvest. No less distinctly is the hand of Providence discerned in the details of the history than in its general outlines. Not only was a people prepared for their heritage, but this people had assigned to them a position which, as a strategic point, was as much a key to the possession of this land as Jericho was the key to the conquest of Canaan. The divine purpose, and the means by which and the times at which this purpose is to be fulfilled, agree, the one to the other. A people fitted, found a fitting land, at fitting time for the possession of that land. The intricate parts of the accomplishment of the great plan fell together as noiselessly as the stone and timbers of Solomon's Temple.

"When organized, the Presbytery of Red-stone occupied the picket line of Presbyterianism on this continent: a vanguard thrown across the Alleghenies to secure outposts and to lead the advancing columns of the Sacramental Host, through hardships and perils, to take possession in the name of the Lord. This little band, consisting originally of four ministers—nestling at the foot of the Alleghenies—commanded the most important strategic points, ecclesiastically, on the continent. On the head waters of the Ohio it commanded the great natural highway of the nation southward and westward; while on the north it touched the great chain of lakes. Its charter and commission the Almighty wrote legibly, in characters formed of rivers and lakes and mountains and oceans. To the vanguard of the advancing columns the line of conquest is clearly defined. It must be from ocean to ocean, one wing resting on the Lakes, the other on the Gulf. With a sublime faith this little band read the commission, and never once faltered in the presence of the gigantic enterprise.

"Not to speak of other branches of the Presbyterian family, there are now under our General Assembly more than a score of Synods west of the Alleghenies, where a century ago there was but one Presbytery consisting of four ministers. Not only has there been growth, but a growth such as the fathers of a hundred years ago no more entertained a hope of than they had in expectation the steam engine and the electric telegraph, and the steam printing press.

"Presbyterianism, a divine institution, instinct with organizing and expanding vitality, in such a field, at such a crisis, would, according to the laws and forces of its being, grow, and growing, would diffuse a thousand quickening influences along every fibre of the body politic. By its constitution vital Presbyterianism must grow; by its growth it demonstrates its vitality; and its growth is the diffusion of a thousand benign influences through all the channels of intellectual, social and spiritual life. Let us, therefore, gratefully and reverently, study the forces and potencies which this type of Western Presbyterianism carried within itself, which caused it to grow, and which made its growth an inestimable blessing to the nations of the earth. Among these potencies and forces I mention:—

I. ITS ORGANIZATION.

"Presbyterianism in the West a century ago, although small numerically in its beginnings, and one of the weak things as the world counts weakness, yet was not crude in its principles nor inchoate in its elements and form, but was a clearly defined and thoroughly developed system. It had a mind, a purpose, a consciousness, an organization and an individuality. It did not come into the New World passive and plastic, to be determined in its character and history by force of circumstances or by the accidents of its environment, but came with positive opinions, deep and strong convictions of truth and duty, and with clear conceptions of its mission, to mould and determine the character of the new world. Its form of government was drawn directly from the Word of God, and was simple and efficient. It worked as successfully in the churches and the Presbytery in these western forests, as it did in the cities of Calvin and Knox. There was no uncertainty as to modes of procedure, no groping in the dark. It understood itself and its mission. It developed from a power that was within, and according to the law of its inner life. An acorn planted at the foot of the Alleghenies is not in doubt as to the form it is to assume. In Druidical groves and in American forests oaks grow according to inner life. The seed of Presbyterianism here was the same as the seed of Presbyterianism in Geneva or Edinburgh. This Presbyterianism, therefore, had the strength and effectiveness which come from compactness of organization and singleness of purpose.

"In addition to this, the organization, being Scriptural, was simple in its workings. There was no cumbersome or expensive machinery. All the force was made available. None was wasted in useless friction. The Presbyterian pastor was Bishop without the leave of the Bishop of London or of the Archbishop of Canterbury; he did not have to wait until he could be assured that consecrating grace had come down to him in an unbroken line from the Apostles. In the forest, without vestments, altar or ritual, he officiated as a minister of Christ, an office which needs no meretricious trappings to give it dignity or solemnity.

II. ITS DISTINCTIVE DOCTRINES.

"Within this organization—as the soul within the body—imparting to its life vigor, health, symmetry and aggressiveness, was a system of doctrines which were distinctive and sharply defined; doctrines which, although popular, commended themselves to men's consciences, and took hold of the deepest intuitions and convictions of the human soul. These apostles of Presbyterianism on these shores (in America) carried with them the Westminster Confession of Faith, and the Larger and Shorter catechisms which constitute the most admirable summary of Scriptural truth that has ever been produced. As a system of doctrine the Westminster Confession is the most complete and comprehensive of all the confessions of Christendom. It is at once Scriptural, profound, comprehensive, logical and precise, and he who has mastered it has been brought face to face with the deepest and highest problems that emerge in theology, and has had presented to him the light which the Word of God sheds upon these problems. In the Shorter Catechism this system of theology is condensed into a series of the most wonderful definitions that the theological genius of the Church has ever produced. Here these great doctrines are condensed, crystallized, until every point beams with light as clear as the flash of a diamond. These pioneer Presbyterian ministers were ignorant of many things which are deemed essential now-a-days to a wide and varied scholarship, but they knew thoroughly the Bible and the doctrines contained in it as they are formulated in the Westminster Confession and Catechisms—the doctrines in definitions which are exact, sharp, precise, analytical. Consequently there was no ambiguity in their preaching. The trumpet in their hands and at their lips gave no uncertain sound. Their preaching was Scriptural, after the Calvinistic type, and their style took its form and its coloring from the nervous Anglo-Saxon of the English Bible.

These doctrines, clearly apprehended by the understanding and authenticated by profound Christian experience, formed the subject matter of preaching in those days, and they were preached with positive, downright conviction, and with an earnestness and an unction which are only born of that spiritual travail whereby a soul becomes acquainted with the truth experimentally. Swift and straight, and with resistless force, these doctrines were launched into the hearts and upon consciences grew, and the wide pulpit in these western forests became a centre of power such as the Church has seldom known since the days of the Apostles. These solemn doctrines, preached with awful earnestness and enforced by the tremendous sanctions of eternal rewards and punishments, took hold of the hearts of men with demonstrations of the Spirit and with power; souls were converted, natures renewed, human characters revolutionized, and men's lives throbbing with new, strange forces and enthusiasms, were lifted to higher levels of thought and action. There was infused into the young life of the nation that healthful, vigorous religious spirit which has enabled it thus far to resist the death-dealing miasma of atheism and materialism. Here again we discover how excellently fitted to the accomplishment of the purpose were the means and agencies which were used. The religious interest begotten by the use of these instrumentalities was not a transient flush of excitement which passed away like the morning cloud or the earthy dew, but deepened into a consistent and growing Christian life and character. The truth thus preached, and thus by faith accepted, enlightened the mind, swayed the conscience, enlisted the affections, and enkindled an unquenchable zeal for Christ. As believers and converts multiplied, their common confession found expression, and their love found appropriate exercise, in the worship and service of the Presbyterian Church. This Church, therefore, was not an artificial structure, fashioned according to man's device, but was an organism developing from an inner life; not an association or institution inspired and sustained by superficial excitement and sensations, but a spiritual body, feeding upon the Word of God and growing thereby. The preaching of the gospel was accompanied with mighty power upon the hearts and the lives of men; the truth under the demonstration of the Spirit touching and sounding every note in the gamut of feeling, from the deepest, bitterest conviction of sin, up to the most ecstatic raptures of spiritual joy and triumph. But this feeling was the result of the truth apprehended by faith, and not the product of any artificial excitement. The deep, suppressed feelings which attended the 'falling exercises' were not produced by impassioned appeals to the emotions or to the imagination, but by the quiet force of the truth. Churches which were thus founded and thus built up, had in them a solidity and strength which made them as towers, bulwarks and palaces of Zion. In these Western forests, a hundred years ago, such towers, bulwarks and palaces were reared, and here they continue unto this day.

With such spiritual food and such experimental discipline, no wonder there were giants in those days. Instead of dabbling in muddy puddles of materialism, to discover their genealogical descent from the tadpole, their thinking was along the line of the infinite, and in mind, heart and character, they were great and noble. For these infinite stretches of thought did not lose themselves in regions of speculative clouds and mists, but following closely the line of the divine thought and purpose; although their range was from eternity to eternity, they were human still, and true to human interests, instinct with human sympathy, and were themselves the proof and the earnest of the glory and immortality of man. And this conducts us naturally to another of those vital working forces of Presbyterianism, viz. :—

III. ITS BELIEFS AND TEACHINGS CONCERNING THE INFINITE WORTH OF THE HUMAN SOUL, AND THE DIGNITY OF MAN AS MAN.

Calvinism exalts God, invests Him with infinite majesty and absolute sovereignty, and at the same time it honors and dignifies man as created in the image of God. The motto of Sir William Hamilton in his lecture room was: 'On earth there is nothing great but man. In man there is nothing great but mind.' And this sentiment he did not derive from philosophy or philosophers, ancient or modern, but from the Calvinistic theology of his native Scotland. These beliefs concerning the worth of the soul have not been dead doctrines in the Calvinistic system, but have been an integral part of the effective formative power of that system, and in their practical influence, have imparted to the history of Presbyterianism some of its most characteristic features; as for instance,

" I. Its interest in and its service to the Cause of Education.—In history, Presbyterianism and intelligence have gone side by side, hand in hand, and this is not an accident to be noted simply, but it belongs to the philosophy of the history. Her interest in education does not arise from any utilitarian motives, nor primary social or æsthetic consideration, but abides in and perennially springs out of the estimate of the infinite worth of the soul. Consequently her interest in this subject is exhaustless. When Presbyterianism ceases to educate man for man's sake, mind for mind's sake, she will have forfeited her birthright, and Ichabod shall be blazoned on all her palaces; her spirit shall have departed, and the carcass shall be cast out to the dogs and vultures.

"Moses, the typical Presbyterian of Old Testament times, educated at the court of the Pharaohs, understood and carried forward the most stupendous educational enterprise ever committed to any one man. At bottom his work was educational; none the less but all the more truly educational because it contemplated and embraced the whole man, body, soul and intellect, and the whole nation, in all its relations, civil, social and religious. The educational impulse communicated by the learned son of Pharaoh's daughter has never been lost. John Calvin began his labors at Geneva as a teacher. To Geneva John Knox went as a student. Presbyterianism cannot take root in the shallow soil of ignorance. The history of Presbyterianism in any region is largely also an educational history of that region. The pioneers of American Presbyterianism, true to the traditions of the past, coming down in unbroken line from Moses, brought the lamp of learning with them into the wilderness. They did not wait until the terrors of Indian wars were past; until forests were felled and the land cultivated, and the safeguards and comforts of civilization were secured, but in the presence of these dangers and in the midst of these discouragements, established schools and colleges.

"When some competent pen shall have given worthy treatment to this theme, it will be confessed by all that a more heroic chapter of history has never been enacted than that which records the labors and achievements of those early Presbyterians in the cause of sound education. And there is no more glorious leaf in the annals of our American Presbyterianism than that on which is written the history of her early educational institutions. The tenants of the old log college on the banks of the Neshaminy; Blair at Fagg's Manor; Finley, at Nottingham, Md.; Dodd, on Ten Mile Creek; Joseph Smith, at Upper Buffalo; Dr. McMillan, on the Chartiers; Patillo, Hall, Wallis, McCorkle and McCaule, in North Carolina, and Doak, in Tennessee—these were master workmen in laying the foundations of American civilization. They laid these foundations in sound learning and Calvinistic theology. Amid the sore privations of their homes in the backwoods, these heroic men devoted their time and their strength to the training of young men for the ministry, for, with prophetic vision, they foresaw that future success, and extension and permanency of the Church, depended, under God, on an educated ministry. The skilled Syrian laborers of David and Hiram in Lebanon did not make more efficient preparation for the Temple of Solomon than did those self-denying laborers in the forests of America for the spiritual temple which now fills the land. In view not only of the history which has been enacted, but in view of the profound motives by which the history was prompted, as well as the dangers and privations in the midst of which the work was done, and also in view of the immeasurable influences of the work as done—the shades of these rude log colleges have more glorious associations than belong to the classic academy of Plato or the Lyceum of Aristotle.

"Another of these distinctive features of this Presbyterianism, resulting from its beliefs and teachings concerning the infinite worth of the soul and the dignity of man as man, was

"II. Family Religion.—These men carried the Church with them. The Church was in every house. The family altar was set up at every fireside; and this was so not because of any tradition or custom, or for sake of a decent conformity to an established order, but the living practice sprang out of the profound convictions concerning the human soul and human destiny.

"Temporal interests were not neglected, but they were held rigidly in subordination to the immortal interests of the soul. The soul was the pearl of great price, and its salvation and development was the consideration of greatest importance. Character was of greater value than riches. Hence family religion with them meant family instruction. There was a school in every house. The church and the school in the house meant discipline, obedience to parents and rulers, subordination to authority. Each house thus became a church, a school, a gymnasium for the development of these truest and noblest virtues; and thus each house became a bulwark of strength and a tower of defence.

"Another of these distinctive features of Presbyterianism resulting from its belief concerning the dignity of man as man, was

"III. Its Loyalty to the Principles of Constitutional Liberty.—Modeled after the Israelitish Commonwealth, Presbyterianism is republicanism in its form and spirit. In its heroic struggles in the cause of freedom, and its resistance to tyrants and tyranny, its record is as changeless as the course of the sun in the heavens. James of England, who encountered this dauntless and indomitable spirit, tersely expressed his judgment of it in the adage, 'No bishop, no king!' and in the opinion that 'Presbytery agreeth as well with monarchy as God with the devil!' which being interpreted according to the history of the period means, that with Presbyterian bishops there can be no tyrannical kings, and that Presbyterianism is absolutely inconsistent with despotism of all sorts. The record of Presbyterianism in this respect is consistent throughout, from the time of the emancipation of the Israelites of Egypt under Moses to the present day and hour. Nor is it an accident that this is so; nor is it enough to say that Presbyterianism sympathizes with human rights, or that it has a liberal spirit or liberal tendencies; nor is it enough to say that it resembles the republicanism of the Israelitish Commonwealth. This feature and potency of Presbyterianism lies deeper than any of these statements. With Presbyterianism, and its conception of man, there can be no despotism in Church or State; for, according to this conception, each soul is of infinite value and dignity, and no prelate or king can be lord over another man's conscience.

With this untarnished record, and with the moral momentum gained by struggles and sacrifices for the objects, and in the same direction for generations, these men whose services we commemorate to-day came into the New World, and into these then remote parts of the New World. When the crisis came not a man of them sullied the past record. They did not require political instruction as to what they ought to do. Their instincts led them aright, and no amount of sophistry or of logical chicanery could confuse them in their apprehensions of the crisis, and of the issues involved in it. Unswayed, undazzled, they maintained the safe middle ground between despotism on the one hand and atheistical anarchy on the other, advocating, at all hazards, at all times, and by all means, liberty without license, authority without tyranny. For the views and practices which now prevail so largely throughout the nations, the world is more indebted to the principles of Presbyterianism as taught and witnessed unto, even unto death, by representative Presbyterians, than to any single influence in history. These principles emanating from the republic of Geneva, consecrated by the holiest blood of Scotland, sheltered and defended by more than Spartan heroism and endurance in the forests of America, now underlie the institutions of every free government on the face of the whole earth.

Without fanaticism, without extreme or distorted views, more than by any single man, the true principles of religious liberty were taught in this country by Francis Makemie, the father of Presbyterianism in the United States. False to every principle of their creed, and dead to every inspiring memory of their history would the Presbyterians of this country have been if they had not stood as a tower of defence for human freedom.

Another of the potencies of this Presbyterianism was

IV. ITS FAITH IN THE INSPIRATION, POWER AND SUFFICIENCY OF THE HOLY SCRIPTURES.

Resulting from this, through Scriptural preaching, we have as a distinctive feature of this Presbyterianism,

"I. Mighty Revivals of Religion.—Not only was the early history of Presbyterianism on this continent characterized, distinguished, emphasized, by revivals of marvelous power and of boundless influence, but the story of those revivals, in their antecedents, progress and consequents, is substantially the history of Presbyterianism for that time in this region, and thus it established its legitimate descent in the glorious line of succession which can be traced back to the times of the Apostles through a series of revivals. The revivals here began in the midst of the imminent and the pressing dangers of Indian warfare and by the use of the simplest means. They began too, at one of the most momentous crises of the history of the nation, when French infidelity of the boldest and baldest sort threatened to deluge the land and submerge the last remains of Christian faith. The tremendous issue trembled in the balance. During the Revolutionary War, on the borders of Western Pennsylvania, in a rude fort into which had been driven the scattered families of a sparse population, and in which they were besieged by bloody savages, through the modest, earnest conversations of one layman, the mighty work began which forever settled on these the issues as between the Gospel and French infidelity. During the decade of the last century corresponding to the present decade of this century there was almost a continuous effusion of the Holy Ghost, in marvelous power, upon the churches in Western Pennsylvania. In the latter part of that decade the work began on the other side of the Blue Ridge, in a prayer meeting held in the forest by four students of Hampden-Sidney College, which spread through Virginia, North Carolina and Kentucky.

As another result of this faith in the sufficiency of Holy Scripture we have,

"II. The Spirit of Missions.—The first act of the Synod of Pittsburg after its organization was to constitute itself into the Western Missionary Society. The power of genuine revivals and the spirit of missions are identical. The gospel is preached to every creature, and it is the divinely ordained means for the salvation of men. It is the sovereign remedy for the ills of humanity, and fitted to all times and to all nations. By such faith as this were these our forefathers actuated and inspired, and so in accordance with the truth of history, as also in accordance with the philosophy of that history, the theatre of the great historical revivals in Western Pennsylvania was also the birthplace of the Board of Foreign Missions in our Church, the Western Foreign Missionary Societies being organized just fifty years ago. The parts of this great history harmonize."

Returning now to the statistics of our sketch; at this date (1883) Pennsylvania, with an area of 46,000 square miles, has on the roll of its Presbyteries 855 ministers, 931 churches and 133,669 communicants. It also has 3596 ruling elders, 135 candidates for the ministry, and 117,503 Sabbath-school members. If these churches and ministers were distributed equally over it, there would be an average, throughout the entire State, of one Presbyterian church, with one hundred communing members, to every six square miles of territory, and one Presbyterian minister to every seven and a half square miles of territory.

Such are some of the facts and figures which the branch of the Presbyterian Church in Pennsylvania belonging to "The Presbyterian Church in the United States of America" is able, under God, to report. It is the largest of the denominations in the State, and to deny or doubt that it has done as much, at least, as any other to make the old Keystone what it is to-day, in strength and beauty, and is surpassed by no other in its learning, loyalty, catholic spirit, practical benevolence, exemplary living, regard for the Sabbath and other institutions of Christianity, devotion to moral reforms, and efforts for the world's restoration to allegiance to its Maker, would be to show an ignorance of past history and present statistics which no one caring much for his reputation for general information, would be willing publicly to acknowledge.

It may be added that the Synod of Pennsylvania, which was organized in the Capital of the State, October 19th, 1882, by order of the General Assembly, and by the consolidation of the Synods of Philadelphia, Harrisburg, Erie and Pittsburg, is a larger body than any other Presbyterian organization in the English-speaking world, the larger Assembly of the Church, and the Assemblies of Scotland only excepted. May its influence upon the generations to follow be worthy of its high and holy mission, and of its illustrious predecessors, which did so grand a work, and have left so precious and promising a heritage!

Presbyterianism in Pittsburg, Pa., fifty years ago. Half a century ago Pittsburg had given promise of great commercial and manufacturing importance. It had been readily seen that its abundant supplies of coal would make it a great manufacturing centre, and that the broad and beautiful Ohio, with its tributaries, would secure a market for all the products of its artisans. No one who had looked at the map of the continent could be at a loss to understand why the French had selected it, as much as seventy-five years before, as the site of Fort Duquesne. They had evidently regarded it as the key to the West. They knew that, having the control of the headwaters of the Ohio, they could maintain their claim to all territory between the Fort and the Mississippi.

In 1832 the Unitarian Church (Rev. S. G. Bullfinch, pastor), was on the northeast corner of Smithfield street and Virgin alley. Saint Patrick's Catholic Church, Rev. Charles E. McGuire, pastor, was on Liberty street, about two hundred feet west of the Union Depot. It was probably built in 1810, and enlarged in 1825. The Trinity Protestant Episcopal Church, Rev. George Uphold, D. D., pastor; the Smithfield Methodist Episcopal Church; the Smithfield German Church, Rev. David Kennerer, pastor; the Reformed Presbyterian Church built in 1803, Rev. John Black, D. D., pastor; were on the grounds respectively which they now occupy. The Associate Reformed Church, Rev. Joseph R. Kerr, pastor; now the Second United Presbyterian Church, and the Associate Church, Rev. Robert Bruce, D. D., pastor, now the First United Presbyterian Church, have not removed from their original locations.

At the date of which we write, there were but three Presbyterian churches in Pittsburg.

The First Presbyterian Church was located on the corner of Wood street and Sixth avenue, where it now stands. (See illustration, p. 238.) Rev. Francis Herron, D. D., then in the strength and vigor of his manhood, was its pastor. Consisting of four hundred and twenty-nine communicants, it had all the prestige of its early occupation of the ground. In 1784 it had requested supplies from the Presbytery of Redstone, and in August, 1786, a log house of worship was in process of erection. It had therefore been in existence nearly half a century, and had attracted to itself much of the intelligence, wealth and social influence of the city. Rev. Samuel Barr had been the first who statedly ministered to it, a call for his services having been presented in December, 1785, and he continued to serve it till June, 1789. Rev. Robert Steel succeeded him, his labors extending from 1800 till his death, March, 1810.

It was in this church that the Synod of Pittsburg had been organized, in 1802, and here it had met for more than two-thirds of the time in the first thirty years of its existence. During this period, when not meeting in Pittsburg, it had been entertained by the First Presbyterian Church of Washington, Pa.

In June, 1803, the congregation of the Second Presbyterian Church had petitioned the Presbytery of Redstone to be organized, but for a time this was delayed. In 1805 their request had been granted, and they were reported to Synod as able to sustain a pastor. Rev. Nathaniel R. Snowden, who was with them only for a few months, fulfilled the duties of pastor from May till December 9th, 1805. He was succeeded by Rev. John Boggs, who remained from October 20th, 1807, till December 3d of the same year. Rev. Thomas Hunt continued from December 27th, 1809, till July, 1818, and was succeeded by Rev. Elisha P. Swift, who was pastor from November 4th, 1819, till March 3d, 1833. The next was Rev. Joseph W. Blythe, whose ministry extended from February 5th, 1831, till July 26th, 1836, and was followed by that of Rev. Robert Dunlap, who labored from June 25th, 1837, till his death, March 21st, 1847. Rev. William D. Howard, D. D., was pastor from May 16th, 1849, till September 23d, 1876, the date of his death. He was succeeded by Rev. W. S. Stites, May 13th, 1877, who resigned, October 23d, 1879.

The original location of this church was on lots Nos. 65, 67, 69, 71, 73, 75, Diamond street, or Diamond alley, as it was then called. The frontage on Diamond street was 120 feet, and the depth was 110 feet. Two of the lots are now covered by the Opera House, and the remaining four by the machine shops of Marshall Brothers. The ground not covered by the church building had been used for the burial of the dead, and, at the period of which we write, was quite crowded with graves. Access was had by entering the gate on Diamond street, turning east and passing around the end of the church nearest to Smithfield street.

During the pastorate of Rev. Elisha P. Swift, an incident occurred in these grounds, making a very unusual sequel to a funeral. The pastor had attended the burial of a very estimable lady member of his church. The coffin had been deposited in the grave, the friends and himself had retired, and the sexton was engaged in filling the grave. Suddenly he was arrested in his work by three distinct raps, as though coming from the coffin below. He waited a moment and then resumed his work, when the knocks were repeated, with as much of distinctness and emphasis as before. It is hardly necessary to trace the hurried movements of the excited sexton, but when the pastor, who lived not far away, and who had been sent for, came into the graveyard, the coffin had been raised, the lid had been removed, and the physician who had been called was examining the body. He stated that he found no signs of life, and it was agreed that the mysterious knockings were probably occasioned by the sudden and unequal chilling of the wood of which the coffin was made, for the day was intensely hot, and the precious burden had been carried for some distance, as was common then, on a bier. And besides, the rough boxes for the reception of coffins, regarded as indispensable now, were unknown then.

The breadth of the church building was somewhat greater than its length. It had three doors opening into the aisles of the auditorium. The middle and the cross aisles were quite spacious, tables being used in the observance of the Lord's Supper. The hymns on sacramental occasions were generally selected from the third book of Watts' Psalms and Hymns, this portion of the volume having been devoted to the hymns most suitable for communion services.

The galleries were quite capacious, extending around three sides of the building. It was evident, from their construction, that the accommodations of a choir had not been contemplated, for the space in the centre of the front gallery, had been devoted to an aisle, and the choir occupied the block of pews to the east of this aisle, the seats being, in no respect, different from those in the other parts of the gallery. When the choir rose to sing there was, consequently, a one-sidedness in their location.

Mr. Benjamin C. Critchlow, who was then in course of preparation for the ministry, was leader of the music. Miss Sarah Lowrie, Miss Rachel Thompson, Miss Eliza Semple (now Mrs. Hain), Miss Margaret Semple, Miss Eunice Hatch (now Mrs. Critchlow), and Mr. John M. Lowrie, were among the members of the choir.

The windows on either side of the pulpit were very broad, making it difficult to keep the venetian blinds with which they were provided in good working condition. The pulpit was supplied, in the first instance, with projecting candelabras, each sustaining three candles and ornamented with pendant prisms. None but spermaceti candles were used. But about the time of which we write two astral lamps were substituted, which were suspended from the sounding board projecting over the pulpit.

During the pastorate of Rev. Joseph W. Blythe an amusing incident occurred, by which the length of his sermon was somewhat abridged. The first pew on the right of the pulpit was occupied by Mr. William Hartupce, a venerable ruling elder. It was his custom, when overtaken by drowsiness during the sermon, to resist its supervening power by rising and standing for several minutes. On this occasion his effort in rising happened to be coincident with the termination of one of the pastor's most earnest and glowing paragraphs. The cadences of the speaker and the movements of the elder in his conspicuous position produced a result which was quite unexpected, for the impression was instant that the sermon had been finished, and the whole congregation, by a simultaneous movement, rose to their feet. Mr. Blythe gazed at his people, for a moment, with a look of astonishment, for almost a third of his sermon remained undelivered, and then, accepting the situation, he led them in the closing prayer. A few of the more observant in the congregation thought they discovered some abruptness in the termination of the sermon, but the large proportion were ignorant of the part they themselves had played, in abridging the services of the morning.

The lecture room was located on the west side of the main building, and extended from the line of the church property on Diamond street, about sixty feet back. One of the windows in the southwest corner of the auditorium was covered by this lecture room, and when the latter was crowded, the sash of this window was often raised, and some fifteen or twenty additional persons could be accommodated.

In 1832 the church numbered three hundred and eighty-five communicants, and its hours of service were, 10.30 A.M. and 3 P.M. The evening of the Sabbath, however, was often improved by a third service, of a more social nature, in the lecture room.

Mr. John Torode was superintendent of the Sabbath school; Miss Eliza Semple, Miss Margaret Semple, Miss Rachel Thompson, Miss Jane Lowrie, Mr. John McCurdy, Mr. James M. Davis, and Mr. Robert Davis, were among the teachers.

Mr. Samuel Thompson was superintendent of the colored Sabbath school, which met in the gallery of the auditorium. Miss Eunice Hatch was one who assisted in this department.

A member of the congregation whose venerable appearance would at once impress the stranger was Rev. Joseph Patterson. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Redstone, August, 1788, and in April, 1789, he accepted a call from the united congregations of Raccoon and Montour's Run. In twelve years the latter had grown so as to require the whole time of a pastor, and he resigned that part of his charge, but continued to minister to the Church of Raccoon for twenty-seven years and a half. The infirmities of age compelling him to relinquish the active duties of the ministry, he removed to Pittsburg, and for fourteen years preceding his death he was a worshiper with the Second Presbyterian Church. He would sometimes assist in sacramental services, and at long intervals he would preach, his tottering step and his fervent piety making his words tenderly impressive. His place of sitting ordinarily was in the first pew on the right of the pulpit, a cushioned chair having been placed for him in the end nearest the wall.

Rev. Elisha P. Swift commemorated the labors of this eminently godly man in a discourse, which was published in the Christian Herald. The larger portion has been preserved by Rev. Joseph Smith, D.D., page 386 of "Old Redstone."

The wife of Mr. Patterson, a saintly woman, who survived him for several years, sat in the end of the pew nearest the aisle. With left hand raised to aid her hearing, which had been impaired, she sat, the very picture of devout attention.

The third church to which we have referred as having an organized existence in 1832 was the First Church of the Northern Liberties, for such was the designation of that portion of the city East of Eleventh street. The church was the result of a mission work by Rev. Allan D. Campbell, D.D., and was about a year old. Though it has had earnest and laborious pastors, and though there have been periods when its congregations have filled the house, its decline and ultimate extinction was foreseen, for the Presbyterian element was retiring from that part of the city, and the Roman Catholic was moving in and settling around the two large churches established near by. When, therefore, the change of locations did not improve its prospects, the Presbytery of Pittsburg dissolved it. At the date to which these reminis-cences carry us back the Third Presbyterian Church had not been organized. But the growth of the population and other influences were preparing for the movement, which took form in March, 1833. In due time the stately and beautiful structure, in which it worshiped for so many years (until its destruction by fire), on the corner of Third avenue and Ferry street, was reared, and its dedication was regarded as marking the introduction of higher architectural taste. Its bell, one of the sweetest ever cast, could be heard through the two cities. To intelligent Christian people the chief attraction was, of course, the evangelical and talented young pastor, Rev. David H. Kiddle. But to those more affected by material things, there were three objects in the auditorium which they were specially curious to see.

One of these was the organ, the first introduced into any Presbyterian church in this region. Previous to this there had been one in Trinity Episcopal Church, and perhaps, one in St. Patrick's Roman Catholic Church. The small reed organs, now so common, were unknown.

Another attraction was the chandelier. It was of Japan work, in the shape of an inverted cone, some eight or ten feet in diameter at the top. It was supplied with three rows of lamps, each having a reflector, and the chimney of each, passing through the reflector and the surface of the cone, conducted the heat into the space above the auditorium. The large circular opening in the ceiling, was covered by a movable floor, and when the hour of evening service arrived, this was removed, and the chandelier, with each lamp regulated, was let down by pulleys, until its top was even with the ceiling. It completely illuminated the whole auditorium, and for a time, no pulpit lamps were used.

The third attraction was the expensive and elegant decoration of the wall back of the pulpit. It corresponded in breadth to the length of the sofa, and consisted of very elaborate drapery, of crimson velvet, with graceful loopings and heavy folds, the fringes and tassels to correspond.

The congregation was disturbed for some weeks after the dedication, by the departure, in the midst of the sermon, of those who had been attracted by mere curiosity, and Dr. Riddle would sometimes say that if there were any who could not remain till the close, an opportunity would be given them to retire, before he began to preach.

A portion of the basement of the Third Church was used for educational purposes, the entrance to it being from Ferry street, through the narrow yard in the rear of the building. Here Mr. George L. Crosby conducted a large and excellent school for young men, having Mr. Young for an assistant, now better known as Rev. Alexander Young, D.D., Professor of Didactic Theology in the United Presbyterian Seminary of Allegheny.

In 1832, besides these city churches, there were quite a number within seven miles of the city. There was Pisgah, Concord, Beulah, East Liberty, Pine Creek, Sharpsburg, Hillands and Allegheny.

There, too, was the Western Theological Seminary, with Rev. Luther Halsey, D.D., and Rev. John W. Nevin, D.D., then a licentiate, as its professors.

Beside the pastors and professors already mentioned, there were quite a number of ministers who were residents of Pittsburg and Allegheny. John Andrews, Joseph Stockton, Robert Patterson, John Joyce, Job F. Halsey, and Samuel C. Jennings, would be often met.

The Presbyterians also had their weekly religious newspaper—The Christian Herald, edited by Rev. Samuel C. Jennings, D.D., and having its succession in The Presbyterian Banner.

If they had no denominational publishing house, they had something almost as good. They had Mr. Luke Loomis manifesting his tact and judgment, in republishing standard religious works, such as "The Balm of Gilead," "Willison's Communicants' Catechism," "The Afflicted Man's Companion," and "Looking unto Jesus."

These statements may suggest reminiscences, both pleasing and profitable, to some who still linger, while they may also add to the definite knowledge for which those will be seeking, who are living fifty years hence.

Presbyterianism in Southern Illinois. The first Presbytery in the State was the "Centre Presbytery of Illinois." It was erected by the Synod of Indiana. Its first meeting was held January 9th, 1829. It was constituted with seven ministers and twenty-one churches, and embraced the State. In May, 1831, it was divided by the General Assembly. About one-third of the Southern part of the State was formed into the Presbytery of Kaskaskia, embracing seven ministers and seventeen churches. The rest of the State was divided into Sangamon Presbytery on the east, and Illinois Presbytery on the west. These three Presbyteries were constituted into the Synod of Illinois. In 1833 the Presbytery of Kaskaskia was diminished by the erection of Palestine Presbytery, which took some ministers and churches on the northeast side. In 1836 it was further diminished by the erection of Alton Presbytery on the west. In 1858 the Presbytery of Hillsboro was erected, taking more of the territory on the north, and the Presbytery of Saline on the southeast. In 1870 the Presbytery of Cairo was established, embracing the original territory of the Presbytery of Kaskaskia, except a tier of counties on the north, and a part of Alton Presbytery on the west.

The Rev. Stephen Bliss, A.M., was the first settled Presbyterian minister in Illinois. He was born at Lebanon, N. H., March 27th, 1787, graduated at Middlebury College, Vermont, in 1812; studied theology with Dr. Samuel Wood, Boscawen, N. H.; taught at Milton and then at Utica, N. Y., until 1818, when he went to Southern Illinois, for the climate, in company with George May, also a graduate of Middlebury College in 1814. They organized the first Sabbath-school in the State in their cabin, April 11th, 1819, and observed the "Monthly Concert of Prayer" for the conversion of the world. At the organization of the Wabash Presbyterian Church these brethren were elected ruling elders, March 5th, 1822. Mr. Bliss was licensed by the "Hopkinton Congregational Association" in August, 1822. He began his public ministry August 3d, 1823, and was elected to the State Senate in November, 1824. He was ordained by Salem Presbytery, August 4th, 1825, and died December 6th, 1847. Mr. Bliss organized Bethel Church, Coles county (Oakland), August, 1831; Shiloh, May, 1833; Pisgah, 1835; Mt. Carmel, 1839. He was a good preacher, clear, wise and faithful. He was revered everywhere for his dignity, wisdom, judgment, piety and uprightness. A genial Christian gentleman, of the finest New England type.

The Rev. Benjamin Franklin Spilman was the first pastor, and one of the fathers of Presbyterianism, in the State. (See his sketch.) While pastor of the Shawneetown Church, his Session was constituted of men than whom no laymen in the State are more favorably known. One of this noble group of elders, and whose service is finished and glorified by the hand of death, was J. McKee Peoples, Esq. (See his sketch.)

The Rev. John Brick was an Englishman. He was prepared for the ministry in the "Countess of Huntington's Connection." He was located at Jacksonville, Ill., in 1825; organized the "First Presbyterian Church of Jacksonville," June 20th, 1827; was a zealous missionary, and accomplished abiding good. He was a powerful man physically, walked in his tours; was unmarried; of an honest, determined spirit, and spoke with a strong brogue. He was frozen to death in attempting to cross a prairie, in March, 1837.

Rev. John Matthews was born in Beaver county, Pa., February 7th, 1777. He graduated at Jefferson College, Pa., and studied theology with Dr. John McMillan. He was pastor in Erie Presbytery, 1810-17, and resigned to become an itinerant missionary. He was a member of the Presbytery of St. Louis at its organization, December 18th, 1817. He was stated supply at Apple Creek Church, Mo., 1825-28; at Kaskaskia and Pleasant Ridge, 1828-34; and for brief terms to churches in Illinois, Ohio, Pennsylvania and Missouri, 1834-51. He resided at Steel's Mills, 1851-61; and died May 12th, 1861. He was in the Presbyterian ministry fifty-one years, and was one of the Fathers. He was in the organization of the Presbytery of Missouri, December 18th, 1817, Centre Presbytery of Illinois, January 9th, 1829; Presytery of Kaskaskia, March 4th, 1831; and the Synod of Illinois, September, 1831; and preached the opening sermon at each. He was very active as a missionary, visiting the destitute, organizing churches and supplying vacancies.

Rev. Solomon Hardy was born at Hollis, N. H., September, 1796. He graduated at Middlebury College, and completed his theological studies at Andover, in 1827. He was licensed, and probably ordained by the Presbytery of Londonderry, and commissioned by the American Home Missionary Society to Illinois. He was stated supply at Kaskaskia, 1827; at Shoal Creek and Greenville, 1828-31; missionary in Illinois with brief charges and failing health until 1835, when he returned to the East, and preached with much success at South Wellfleet and Eastham, Mass. He died at Eastham, October 2d, 1842. Unlike his coadjutors, his worthy life was brief, his sun going down at noon.

Rev. Thomas A. Spilman was born in Garard county, Ky., in October, 1797. He studied with his brother, Rev. B. F. Spilman, and afterwards with Rev. W. K. Stewart, in his academy at Elkton, Ky. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Muhlenberg in 1827, and joined his brother in missionary labors in southeastern Illinois. He was ordained by Salem Presbytery, and was stated supply at Hillsborough about 1829-42; at Carlyle, and then Union and West Union Churches, 1843-52. He died February 12th, 1858. He was a close student and a faithful pastor. He retained his charges unusually long for those times.

Rev. John Millot Ellis, the tireless evangelist, pastor, organizer, was one of the grandest sons that the East ever gave to the West in her need. Here he grandly fulfilled the promise of his early ministry. He seemed to rouse men wherever he addressed them. He was electrical with a dead-earnest purpose, and so, vehement, absorbed, irresistible, whether as pastor, evangelist, or missionary. He has left his shining impress upon the West, which must abide forever by the influences he set at work. (See his sketch).

Such is a glimpse of the men of God who began the work of the Presbyterian Church in Illinois, and who by their fidelity in toil and trial have set an example as worthy of admiration as it is deserving of imitation.

Presbyterianism—Its part in Moulding the Nation. The Rev. Sylvester F. Scovel, pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, Pittsburg, Pa., in an excellent address on this subject, says: "Our faces are toward the future, and we are now in the atmosphere of duty. What an ambitious thought is conveyed in the subject assigned! The nation is scattered over an area of vast magnitude; is composed of 50,000,000, plus immigration and natural increase; is utterly heterogeneous; is largely influenced in sections by Roman Catholicism, by organized skepticism, and still more largely by worldliness, indifference and immorality. Presbyterianism, on the other hand, is a matter of one-fiftieth of the nation's bulk—is but a little 'flock of kids,' while the nation fills 'the land.'

"Nevertheless, our part in moulding the nation is a thought we must think. Unconscious influence we cannot avoid. God is certainly making use of us as one force in the general scheme of the world's redemption. Our responsibility for whatever measure of power we are endowed with is one of our own cardinal principles. And we are led to the thought by genuine love to our fellow-men, and genuine conviction of the system we profess. Therefore, since we must, our care ought to be to think soberly and righteously, and to some purpose.

"I. Have we anything to do with the nation at all? Many answer in the negative, emphasizing the spirituality of Christ's kingdom, pointing to our work for individuals, and prophesying innumerable troubles in connection with any supposed national mission. We answer affirmatively, because (1) national life is one of the greatest factors in God's plan of the world's conquest; because (2) God has not commanded his people to live in a separate nationality, but the reverse, having sent them into the world, not of the world, but for the world; because (3) the word of God has its distinct politics (in the larger sense of that abused word) free as to form, moral as to direction, religious as to sanction; because (4) the state of the national life stands in closest connection with the most spiritual works the Church is called upon to perform.

"II. To what department of national life ought our conscious purpose and active effort to be directed? 1. Negatively, not (1) to material prosperity (though indirectly assuming it); not (2) to party politics as such (being amenable to a higher law than platforms); not (3) to any scramblers for office. But 11. Positively to the moral life of the nation, and to this directly and exclusively. Hereunder we must labor for (1) justice to all nationalities; for (2) the rights of all classes; (3) to teach the duties of all men to all other men; (4) to influence the general methods of political life which have moral results; (5) to provide adequate and firmly-grounded moral legislation (with due regard to the doctrine and to the limits of individual liberty); (6) to maintain an education Christian in spirit and intent (both in public and private institutions); and (7) to secure such acknowledgment of our national relation to God and His law as shall provide a logical and indisputable basis for Christian morals in our laws, and essential Christian education in our schools.

"III. What reasonable hope have we that we can in any appreciable degree mould the national life in this general direction? Answer:—

"1. We work with God.

"2. We work with moral forces which lie closest to life and life moulds.

"3. We have our Bible—the grandest of popular moral forces—and our Standards; a clear, tried and effective method of making the Bible regnant over men.

"4. We have our history, concerning which, when all just concessions are made, the real claim stands as firm as the granite of the everlasting hills, that in other lands first and most effective of all influences; and in our own land, without fleck or flaw, and first and most effective against the early dangers of Church and State combinations, Presbyterianism has been a tower of strength to liberty, both in securing and limiting it.

"5. We have also our organization, growing out of the popular heart; adapted to secure a knowledge and sympathy with the moral demands of popular life; possessing flexibility in its instrumentalities; prepared for immediate execution and constant efficiency.

"6. Finally, we have our experience. This way is no new way. Our Church has ever stood beside the government, helps to educate the freedmen; aids the Indians to citizenship; legislates in favor of the Sabbath; encourages temperance, both as law and practice, and frowns upon sinful amusements and all sources of popular corruption.

"IV. What are the conditions of our efficiency in moulding the nation?

"1. Keeping up our spiritual life to the highest point, in conversion, edification and extension. 2. Comprehension of our duties in the direction outlined. 3. Knowledge of our dangers, with deliverance from pride and presumption concerning them. 4. Faith in God. 5. The old-fashioned severity of conscience. 6. Willingness to sacrifice taste and inclinations. 7. Patient study of our past by our young people of both sexes. 8. Learning by our mistakes to avoid isolation, narrowness and quarrels about little things. 9. Eclectic common-sense, joined with principled conservatism."

Presbyterianism—"True Blue." What is the origin of "true blue" in this connection? Some say the term is taken from the Scriptures, and point to Numbers xv, 38: "Speak unto the children of Israel, and bid them that they make them fringes in the borders of their garments throughout their generations, and that they put upon the fringe of their borders a riband of blue. And it shall be unto you for a fringe, that ye may look upon it, and remember all the commandments of the Lord, and do them." Another theory is that the Scotch Covenanters assumed blue ribbons as their colors, and wore them as scarfs, or in their bonnets, in opposition to the scarlet badge of Charles I. Other antiquarians trace the Scotch blue up to the aboriginal races on the island of Great Britain. Cæsar thus describes the Britons of his day: "All the Britons dye themselves with wood, which produces a cerulean or blue color." (Lib. v. 11, de B. G.) Other inquirers satisfy themselves with the fact that blue predominates in the tartans of the most ancient and gallant clans, while it enters as a constituent color more or less into all. Hence "true blue" became symbolic of Scotch patriotism and national renown:—

"It's guid to be upright and wise,
It's guid to be honest and true;
It's guid to support Caledonia's cause,
And bide by the bonnets o' blue."

Without entering deeper into the origin of our clannish blue, we will content ourselves with assuming that blue characterized the Scotch tartan from time immemorial, like red the dress of the Southern Englishers, and that in the civil wars of the seventeenth century "a true blue Presbyterian" was synonymous with a Scotchman who fought for liberty and his Church. What is the meaning of the word now-a-days?

A True-blue Presbyterian is a Christian who loves the old-fashioned Bible doctrines in the Confession of Faith. He lays much stress on God's sovereignty and the doctrines of grace. The Word of God, in its simple, spiritual meaning, as explained in the Confession of Faith, not for "substance of doctrine," but for true doctrine, is dear to his heart. The fathers across the waters, with Calvin and Knox at their head, were thorough believers in all the distinct doctrines of grace. So were our own great ancestors, Makemie, the Tennents, Dickinson, and Davies. "As to our doctrines," replied Francis Makemie, when arraigned by the High-Church Governor of New York, in 1707, "we have our Confession of Faith, which is known to the Christian world. In that compend of Bible truth the real Presbyterian believes, as containing the best human interpretation of the Divine will.

He is also a strict friend of the Sabbath and of Divine ordinances. The Lord's day is dull and wearisome to a worldling, but it is a day of sober meditation and of spiritual delight to those who have faith in Divine teachings. Sobriety and joy are not inconsistent terms. May-poles, feasting, and dancing, which agreed with the taste of King Charles' Christians, were the horror of those of Covenanters' stock, whilst attendance on the house of God, and a reverence for its ministrations and ordinances, were the joy of the latter, and will be of their descendants, from generation to generation.

A true-blue Presbyterian calls the covenant of grace in the training of his children. He dedicates them to God from birth, seeks in their behalf the ordinance of baptism, brings them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord, engages with them in family worship, instructs them in the Bible and Shorter Catechism, disciplines them on the principles of Solomon, is careful in the selection of their books and companions, sends them to a parochial or religious school, provides for them an honest calling, and in every way endeavors to act upon the truth. "train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it."

A thorough Presbyterian is a conservative in Church and State. Theological novelties, telegraphed from former ages, do not secure his credence. Extravagances of doctrinal statement he disrelishes. He does not approve of new measures, boisterous excitements, and man's devices in Church affairs. A true friend of revivals, like Dickinson and Alexander, he is unwilling to hazard the permanent interests of religion for doubtful issues, but prefers in all things the good old paths. In the State, as a citizen, he is never carried away by the dreamland theories of reformers and infidels. He is never found advocating the abolition of capital punishment, resisting the law of the land, affording new facilities for divorces, encouraging agrarianism in any shape. Conservatism, as opposed to extravagance, is the law of his life, the first and second nature of the inner man.

A thorough Presbyterian loves his own Church. Why should he not? Has he not been nurtured by her care? does she not hold forth the truth? are not her methods founded on the Scriptures? The form of church government is no trivial and unimportant matter. Sessions, Presbyteries, Synods and General Assemblies are ramparts, which he may go round about and admire. His mode of worship, simple, Scriptural, God-ward, uncontaminated by the pomp and circumstance of artificial forms, is dear to his inmost soul. The more simple, the better for him. His heart is with his Church, which Christ has honored with blessings, and will honor, even with life, forevermore.

The thorough Presbyterian aims at extending the knowledge of the truth, as he understands it, among all nations. As he loves his Church, so he desires to see her excellence perpetuated and extended. He prizes her institutions. These institutions of his Church he patronizes, on the ground that it is the Church's duty to do her own work, and that no church is better able to attend to her own affairs than his own. He is no idle religionist, asleep over the wants and woes of his fellow-men. With an enterprise as energetic as his doctrines, and with a sense of responsibility stimulated by the sovereignty of his King, he aims at communicating the Word of Life in its purest form to the millions of mankind.

The thorough Presbyterian, notwithstanding his uncompromising ecclesiastical principles, has a sectarianism that is tolerant and magnanimous. He does not unchurch other Evangelical denominations, nor does he, on the other hand, seek to co-operate with other sects on conditions which compromise his own principles, and in unions which often end in alienation and strife. All his views of truth cherish charity towards others, and practically other denominations find that, notwithstanding his peculiarities, they can live with him as peaceably, if not more so, than with those whose professions of brotherly love may exceed his. He knows that no church assists more than his own, beyond its own limits, in relieving the wants of the poor and needy, and in substantial acts of general and public benevolence. His sectarianism is an honest and a manly one, without croakings or concealments, and bearing fruits of which he is not ashamed, either before God or man.

Finally, the true Presbyterian, after aiming at and striving after a life of holiness, which acknowledges its imperfections at the best, wishes to die trusting alone in the imputed righteousness of the Lord Jesus Christ. Presbyterianism brings Christ prominently to view, not by the abstractions of philosophy which the common people cannot understand, but by a tender, personal union, through a living faith, which may be realized in every pious heart. Such a system, in its relation to holiness produces two effects: it directly prompts to holiness, and it produces a consciousness of coming short of perfection. Perfect sanctification is the reward of the glorified, and this the believer pants for, and hopes for, only as Christ saves him here from his sins, and gives him admission to heaven through His own blood and righteousness. On a dying bed the religious experience of a sincere Presbyterian will be found to magnify Christ and His cross. His life having been "by the faith of the Son of God, who loved him and gave Himself for him," his death testifies to the consistent desire to "be found in Him, not having his own righteousness, which is of the law, but that which is through the faith of Christ, the righteousness which is of God by faith."

These remarks on the characteristics of a consistent and loyal Presbyterian are not offered in the spirit of "we are the Church," but simply as descriptive of one of the many shades of doctrinal belief and practice which prevail in the Christian world.

Presbyterianism—What It Is. The Doctrinal Creed of Presbyterians is sometimes called Augustinian. Without explanation, this would be a defective and misleading definition. While Augustine formulated and defended some of the cardinal doctrines of revelation in a manner which has commanded the assent and admiration of all Reformed Churches, they have, with almost equal unanimity, rejected his expositions of others.

So, too, while the Calvinistic faith is justly called Calvinistic, Presbyterians (Nullius addictus jurare in verba magistri) do not receive all of Calvin's teachings without qualification, nor do they regard him as the inventor or originator of their doctrinal system, although they do recognize in him one of the clearest, most logical and evangelical of all the writers who have ever systematized doctrinal truth.

There is a wonderful harmony in all that is substantial and vital in the Creeds of the Reformed churches: such as the Gallican, the Second Helvetic, and Belgic Confessions, and the Canons of the Synod of Dort; but the ablest and most comprehensive statement of Presbyterian doctrine is to be found in the Westminster Confession and Catechisms. These, for the most part, are the Standards of English-speaking Presbyterians throughout the world.

RADICAL PRINCIPLES.

I. Since the Church is the kingdom of Christ, and His divinity the foundation on which it is built, it is bound to receive His doctrines as its faith, and to execute His will as its law. Hence, no officer or court of the Church can justly claim any other authority than that of executing the revealed will of its Divine Head, nor can either enforce anything but obedience to His requirements.

Of course, this does not contradict the principle either that just inferences are not binding, or that the laws of Christ may not be so applied as to meet ever-varying circumstances, or that in executing His work the Church may not make such arrangements as are necessary and proper in carrying that law into effect.

All this is well expressed in our Confession of Faith when it is said that "there are some circumstances concerning the worship of God and the government of His Church common to human actions and societies, which are to be ordered by the light of nature and Christian prudence, according to the general rules of the Word, which are always to be observed." The hours for religious service; the number to be held on the Sabbath and during the week; posture in prayer; the appointment of days of humiliation and thanksgiving; the seasons for ecclesiastical meetings; questions relating to hymnology; methods of securing contributions for pious uses; the conduct of Sunday schools; catechetical instruction, etc.; all these may be regulated by Christian prudence, experience and common sense; but this discretionary power does not extend to the enactment or enforcement of any new rule of faith or duty.

II. The Word of God is the Constitution of the Church. It is "the only rule to direct us how we may glorify and enjoy Him." The traditions of men, the teachings of the Fathers, the creeds of the Primitive Church, have no authority except as they are in accordance with the inspired Word. Nothing is to be received as revealed or commanded by Christ which cannot be found in that record, and when we have ascertained the Canon of Scripture, then we have ascertained the only records to be relied on as of infallible authority.

GENERIC AND DISTINCTIVE PRINCIPLES.

We use the terms Generic and Distinctive, because some of the principles which Presbyterians hold dear, and which are essential to the government of their Church, are held by other denominations, wholly or in part, while others differentiate it from all other ecclesiastical organizations. The former of these we call Generic; the latter, Distinctive.

1. Presbyterianism, as the word implies, is a system of Church government by Presbyters. Presbyters are either teaching or ruling elders. The former are called Ministers of the Word, because they preach as well as rule; the latter are commissioned to govern, and hence their name. This is well expressed by the Westminster divines, when they say: "As there were in the Jewish Church elders of the people, joined with the priests and Levites in the government of the Church, so Christ . . . hath furnished some in His Church, besides the Ministers of the Word, with gifts for government, and with commission to execute the same when called thereunto, who are to join with the minister in the government of the Church, which officers Reformed churches commonly call elders."

2. Presbyterianism recognizes but two orders of church officers—elders and deacons. The first has already been considered; of the second, our Standards thus speak: "The duties of this office especially relate to the care of the poor, to the collection and distribution of the offering of the people for pious uses, under the direction of the Session. To the deacons also may be properly committed the management of the temporal affairs of the Church."

3. In maintaining what is called the parity of the clergy, Presbyterians occupy common ground with some other Evangelical churches, and hence that alone does not constitute a distinctive principle, but the recognition of the ruling elder as holding an office designated by the very term which the Scriptures apply to the teaching elder, and the recognition of the fact that both are entitled to equal authority in all the courts of the Church, is a distinctive principle of Presbyterianism, and one which is steadily gaining favor in other communions, and gradually assimilating them to Presbyterian usages.

It is not the parity of the ministers alone, but the parity of the presbyters, which is asserted—their co-ordinate authority in all things relating to the government of the Church. This position is sustained by references to many passages of Scripture in which the words Bishop (Episcopos) and Elder (Presbiteros) are used interchangeably as equivalents, with reference not only to the same person, but to the same office.

4. Presbyterians insist that in the Primitive Church, as described in the New Testament, there was no higher Order distinct from this, much less none dominating over it; when every town and parish had its Bishop; when in every land where Christianity had been planted, bishops were as numerous as the churches; and when, even in Italy, there were thirty-five bishops in the narrow territory between the Tiber and the Tuscan Sea.

Presbyterians admit that in the course of time the word "Bishop" assumed a very different meaning, and when it could be no longer said, as Vice-Principal Hatch declares in his "Bampton Lectures," that "The early Bishop stood to his Presbyters in the relation of a chairman to the ordinary members of a committee," or, as Presbyterians would say, as the Moderator to the members of a Church Session or Presbytery over which he presides. Without making any reflection on the polity of others, Presbyterians have reason to be gratified at the frequent admissions made by others as to the Scriptural character of their own, and they have special occasion to admire the candor with which men eminent for learning and piety, and loyal to their own system of Church government, such as Usher and Whateley, Hallam and Macaulay, Dean Howson and Dr. Jacob, Dean Stanley and Canon Farrar, Sir Peter King and Bishop Lightfoot, have expressed themselves with regard to the constitution of the Primitive Church, echoing back the voice of Jerome from the fourth century, when he says: "A Presbyter is the same, therefore, as a Bishop; and before there arose preferences in religion, and it was said among the people, 'I am of Paul, I of Apollos, I of Cephas,' the churches were governed by a common council of Presbyters. . . . If it be supposed this is not the sense of the Scriptures, but my own opinion, that Bishops and Presbyters are one, and that one is the name of age and the other of office, read again the words of the Apostle to the Philippians. . . . These things are recorded that we may show that the ancient Presbyters were the same as the Bishops, but by little and little, that the roots of dissension might be torn up, the whole trouble was devolved on one."

5. A distinctive principle of Presbyterianism is that of free representative government; a government of parliamentary courts composed of Presbyters: Presbyters who rule only, and Presbyters who rule and also "labor in word and doctrine." This corresponds virtually to the two Houses composing State Legislatures, each acting as a check upon the other. To commit the government of the church exclusively to ministers, might lead to spiritual despotism; so, if exclusively in the hands of elders, too much license might ensue; but the co-ordinate jurisdiction of the two gives the best combination for securing the Church against ecclesiastical tyranny on the one hand, and popular passion on the other.

6. The last distinctive feature of Presbyterianism to be mentioned in this enumeration is the unity which is secured by the system of representative assemblies. It is thus forcibly stated by Dr. Thornwell: "The government of the Church is not intrusted to individuals, nor to the mass of believers, but to councils. Every judicial and legislative function is performed by courts alone. Government is not administered by a single individual; that would be monarchy; nor by a privileged class; that would be oligarchy; nor immediately by the people; that would be democracy; but it is administered by representative assemblies. These constitute a bond which brings all the parts together into unity, and gives to the Church the property of indefinite expansibility." "A single congregation is governed by the Parochial Presbytery; several associated congregations by the Classical Presbytery; the whole Church by a Presbytery of representative Presbyters from all its bounds," the General Assembly. "This principle of representation is capable of embodying any number of believers. Whole continents may be made one body. There is but one Church, a set of congregations bound together by the nexus of one parliament. Each congregation has every element of the Universal Church, and the Universal Church has no attribute which may not be found in one congregation. There is no organic difference between the Church Session and the largest General Assembly." "Only two churches on earth realize this idea of Church unity, Rome and our own. But these are the poles apart as to the system by which they realize it. Rome, with her infallible Pope at the head, and with graded authorities extending over the whole earth, one class subservient to another, secures a terrible unity, bending all abjectly to one throne. Our system, on the other hand, secures unity with the most perfect freedom."

COROLLARIES.

1. Presbyterians, in accepting the statement of their Shorter Catechism that "the Word of God contained in the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments is the only rule given to direct us how we may glorify and enjoy Him," and that they teach "what man is to believe concerning God, and what duty God requires of man," regard the Bible as a book for the world, and for all generations to the end of time; that the system of doctrine and duty contained in it is a fixed and final system, and not one introductory to a higher; that it is one needing no addition; one never to become obsolete, never to be supplemented by another revelation. They believe that while the canon of Scripture is complete, that the principles contained in it admit of endless evolution and expansion, with infinite capacity for adaptation to all the varying conditions of human life, and that therefore the Bible will be sufficient for all the new forms of civilization which may arise; sufficient for all the new ethical problems that may demand solution; sufficient to antagonize all the new forms of error that may menace humanity; sufficient to lead on the race to the highest spiritual development of which it is capable. They do not admit, therefore, that "the old view of the Bible is fading from their vision," or that there is any need "to enlarge the sphere of divine revelation by adding to the Bible the revelation of Nature, and of man's reason and moral consciousness," or that "religion has much to hope, and the old theology much to fear, from scientific disclosures."

II. The Presbyterian polity is one that furnishes the best security for the protection of the rights of all the members of the Household of Faith, with its ascending series of courts, each larger than the one above it, thus pledging to each individual member the protection furnished by the impartial expression of the matured judgment and sense of justice of the entire body. A local prejudice might work injustice to an aggrieved member who sought vindication from his Church Session, but it would be his privilege to appeal to the Presbytery, and, if need be, to the Synod and General Assembly; so that in each court the assurance would become greater that no local prejudice could affect the decision of the body representing the entire Church. And what is still more important, all questions relating to the constitution and to the work of the Church may be subjected to the same review and control, so that the deliberate judgment of the whole body may be secured in all matters affecting its interests, whether in domestic or missionary fields.

III. The organic structure of Presbyterianism is admirably adapted to give it stability and enlargement. The minister to labor in word and doctrine, the ruling elder to co-operate with him in all that pertains to spiritual government and instruction, the deacon to have oversight of the temporal interests of the Church; each working in his own appropriate sphere, and all acting in unison, with reference to a common end; all this forms a combination, for stability and for efficiency not to be surpassed. And the adaptation of this organization to bring under cultivation outlying fields hitherto unoccupied and destitute, is equally evident. All that is requisite is for the minister, in the discharge of his high commission, to go forth proclaiming the Message of Salvation through Christ, in dependence upon the power of the Spirit; and, as he sows the good seed, and God gives the increase, he has authority to gather those from without into the household of faith, and to complete the organization of a new church by ordaining such elders and deacons as the people may select. And the body thus constituted is a church, prepared not only for its special work in the field where it has a local habitation and a name, but prepared also to affiliate with other churches which have been organized in like manner, until they form a Presbytery; and when churches continue to multiply, new Presbyteries constitute the Synod, and when Synods become sufficiently numerous, they form a General Assembly. Distinct churches thus organized have all the corporate efficiency which belongs to the independent or congregational system, with the additional advantage of being connected by a bond of union which enables them to co-operate as a unit, each developing its own spiritual life, and yet all assimilated, by a common standard of doctrine and discipline, into one body, compacted together, yet acting freely through all its members, stable in structure, flexible in administration, conservative in principle, aggressive in work, thoroughly furnished with every instrumentality for the extension of its boundaries, whether in the home or in the foreign field.

IV. Presbyterianism illustrates more than the mere logical connection which exists between religious and civil liberty. It could be easy to show how the system gives development to the sense of individual responsibility, and to a manly spirit of personal independence, but it needs no argument to show that the spirit which will not brook sacerdotal tyranny in the Church will not submit to civil despotism in the State. While there are systems of faith and forms of government which enchain and enfeeble the understanding by suppressing free inquiry and committing both thought and conscience to the keeping of spiritual rulers, the tendency of the Presbyterian system has always been just the reverse of this. The saddest and yet the brightest pages of Presbyterian ecclesiastical history are those which recount the struggles of our fathers in behalf of the sacred rights of conscience. It is needless to portray the practical power of these principles, as they have been so often illustrated in heroic conflicts for the right and the true, whether in the glens of Scotland or at the foot of the heath-clad Grampians, forever associated with the story of conflict for Christ's Crown and Covenant; or in the plains of Holland, made immortal by the reef Republic which sprang from them; or on the northern coast of Ireland, where men determined to maintain their rights held out to the bitter end; or in the secluded valleys of the Loire; or on the banks of the Garonne, from which men of unconquerable courage went everywhere to seek the liberty for which they battled in vain at home; or in Switzerland, among the great Alpine barriers which have so often been the fortresses both of faith and of freedom.

V. Presbyterianism is characterized also by its catholicity. While it asserts that the Scriptures reveal a system of Church government as well as of doctrine, it by no means makes the former of equal importance with the latter. Much less in claiming a polity of Divine ordering do they unchurch those who hold different views of ecclesiastical government. This principle is distinctly recognized in their Standards, wherein it is declared, "The visible unity of the body of Christ, though obscured, is not destroyed by its division into different denominations of professing Christians, but all those who maintain the Word and Sacraments in their fundamental integrity are to be recognized as true branches of the Church of Christ."

"The visible Church consists of all those throughout the world who profess the true religion, together with their children, and is the Kingdom of the Lord Jesus Christ, the house and family of God." "The Communion of Saints is to be extended to all those who, in every place, call upon the name of the Lord Jesus."

The Westminster Assembly of Divines was held in 1643, but in the "Book of Discipline of the Kirk of Scotland," in 1581, it is declared, "Besides these assemblies there is another more general kind of Assembly of the Church of Christ in the world, representing the Universal Church, which is the body of Christ." There is nothing in the system of Presbyterians which warrants intolerance or exclusive claims to covenant mercy. They recognize all who are united by faith to Christ as members of His mystical body. They admit that as one who "holds the Head" may be a true Christian, notwithstanding a defective creed, so a church may be a church of Christ, notwithstanding a defective organization. They do not deny that the ordination of ministers may be valid even when it is irregular. They receive ministers of other Evangelical churches into their own without requiring a second ordination, just as the Church of England (before the days of Laud) received ministers from the Presbyterian churches of the continent for a hundred years after the Reformation.

The Presbyterian is not a broad Church in the sense of sacrificing any cardinal principle for the sake of conciliating those to whom it is unpalatable; but it is broad enough to recognize the fact that a true Christian unity may exist where there is little outward uniformity, and that this unity not only may, but must, exist among all whose lives are hid with Christ in God. Cherishing such sentiments as these, they can, therefore, without doing any violence to their principles or preferences, in the most cordial way, unite with Christians of other names in the publication and circulation of the Scriptures; they can labor with others in the promotion of genuine revivals of religion; they can invite others to the Sacrament table, and sit at theirs, and thus, while ever ready to defend their orthodox creed and Scriptural form of government, they demonstrate their regard for the communion of saints, by extending the hand of fellowship to ministers of other denominations, by laboring with them in every good word and work, and in rejoicing in the success of all who are toiling to advance the Kingdom of Truth and Righteousness in the world.

The following extract from an article by the Rev. W. P. Breed, D.D., of Philadelphia, Pa., on the same subject which the Rev. Dr. Moses D. Hoge, of Richmond, Va., has so ably presented, and in which he hopes a Manual of Presbyterianism may be written, may be appropriately added to what Dr. Hoge has said. Though covering somewhat the same ground, it has some different points which cannot fail to be of interest and profit to the reader:—

"1. Presbyterianism in Polity.—A presbyter is an elder; and a church in which a body of elders forms an active and efficient governing force is, in so far forth, a Presbyterian church. And no intelligent Bible student needs to be informed that such an eldership has existed in the Church, at least from the time when that Church was held in Egyptian bondage. Out of the burning bush came the command, 'Go, call the elders.' And from this time we read of these elders, in Leviticus, Numbers, Deuteronomy, Joshua, Judges, Samuel and Kings, down to the exile. From exile they returned with the people. Among the first antagonists of Jesus were 'the elders.' The apostles ordained elders in every city. These elders continued, as we believe, among the Waldenses down to the time of the Reformation. With a single exception, they then reappeared in every great body of believers. Thus, through all the changes in the Church, the eldership has been our pillar of cloud by day and of fire by night. Moses passes away, and Joshua; the rule of the Judges and the Kings comes to an end; with Malachi, the heroic race of the old prophets expires; and at last, priest, Levite, tabernacle, temple, altar, sacrifice, and the holy city itself, are all abolished, while the eldership, modified as to some of its functions, yet the same in its essential character, still remains, and will remain to the end of time, as the one, enduring, ruling office in the Church of God. And in heaven, with the four living creatures who represent the whole body of the redeemed, the four-and-twenty elders represent the ministry and government of the Church.

"The New Testament elders include those who bear rule only, and those who both preach and rule. (1 Tim. v. 17). As rulers, all are on a footing of perfect equality; and the preaching elders are all of equal rank and authority. Neander writes, 'It is certain that every church was governed by a union of the elders or overseers chosen from among themselves, and we find among them no individual distinguished above the rest.' And Dr. John Reynolds, second to no ecclesiastic of the Church of England in his time, replying to an offensive sermon of Bancroft, wrote as follows: 'All who have for five hundred years past, endeavored the reformation of the Church, have taught that all pastors, whether they be bishops or priests, are invested with equal authority and power.'

"But the Bride of Christ is one, not many. And organization is a Presbyterian instinct. A score of Presbyterians in contiguity in the heart of Asia will as surely organize themselves, by the election of a board of ruling elders, as the sun will rise in the morning. Half-a-dozen Presbyterian churches, find them where you may, will inevitably form themselves into a Presbytery, and the Presbyteries into a Synod, and the Synods into a General Assembly. A member of a Presbyterian church, tried and censured by a church Session, may appeal to the Presbytery, thence to the Synod, and thence again to the General Assembly. It is, as the writer believes, the inherent and inalienable right of every member of a Presbyterian church, even the poorest and humblest, to have his or her case finally adjudicated upon by the whole Church in General Assembly convened, or by a commission, the representative of the Assembly, and thus also the representative of the Church.

"The radical principles of Presbyterian Church government and discipline are: That the several different congregations of believers, taken collectively, constitute one Church of Christ, emphatically called the Church; that a larger part of the Church, or a representation of it, should govern a smaller, or determine matters of controversy which arise therein; that, in like manner, a representation of the whole should govern and determine in regard to every part, and to all the parts united; that is, that a majority shall govern; and consequently, that appeals may be carried from lower to higher judicatories, till they be finally decided by the collected wisdom and united voice of the whole Church.' (See note under Chapter XII, of the 'Form of Government of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America.')

"The power exercised by the eldership is that of the church which it represents, and for which it acts. For the purposes of their appointment, the elders are the church. Their acts are, within their sphere, the acts of the church. This power includes, 1. That of ordination, the power to say who seem to possess the qualifications necessary for the discharge of the duties of the eldership, and to authorize their entrance into office. Timothy was ordained by the laying on of the hands of the Presbytery; Paul, as an elder, laying on his hands with the rest (1 Tim. iv, 14; 2 Tim. i, 6). 2. The power to embody the chief doctrines of Scripture, as seen in the light which the Holy Ghost has given them, in a Confession of Faith; 3. To prepare and issue a directory of worship; 4. To establish constitutional rules in accordance with which the power vested in the church shall reach its objects; and, 5. To prescribe the terms upon which applicants may enter, and members remain in the communion of the church.

"This, then, is Presbyterianism, as a system of Church government. Its core is the eldership—the whole eldership being the organ for the exercise of the power of the church, and a portion of it, specially ordained thereto, being appointed to discharge the duties of the pulpit and the pastoral office; as rulers, all elders being on a footing of perfect equality, and as ministers, all on a like level of perfect equality. There is no primus inter pares—no first among equals—but all are pares in Christo primo—all equals in Christ, who is the first. The whole Church is compacted into unity by a system of courts—lower, higher and highest—the lowest being subordinate to the next higher, and all to the highest. 'Here,' writes Alexander Henderson, one of the framers of the Scotch Solemn League and Covenant, and Scotch Commissioner to the Westminster Assembly, 'Here is superiority without tyranny, parity without confusion and disorder, and subjection without slavery.'

"Of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States, the late distinguished Roman Catholic, Archbishop Hughes, wrote as follows:—'Though it is my privilege to regard the authority exercised by the General Assembly as usurpation, still, I must say, with every man acquainted with the mode in which it is organized, that, for the purposes of popular and political government, its structure is little inferior to that of Congress itself. It acts on the principle of a radiating centre, and is without equal or rival among the other denominations of the country.'

"2. Presbyterianism in doctrine.—As the venerable Dr. Samuel Miller well says, 'Presbyterianism has generally been distinguished for the stress it has laid upon sound doctrine.' Its symbol is the open Bible. Its watchword is, 'to the law and to the testimony.' It has been wont to lend an attentive ear to the voice of the Spirit as uttered in the Word (Ezek. iii, 17; 2 Tim. i, 13; 1 Tim. iv, 6). May the day never come when, on this point, it shall allow itself to utter an uncertain sound!

"The system of doctrine with which it is most closely allied is that which men call Calvinism. Of this system, as embodied in the Westminster Confession, the able and candid Dr. Curry, of the Methodist Church, writes: 'It is the clearest and most comprehensive system of doctrine ever formed—a comprehensive embodiment of nearly all the precious truths of the Gospel. Some of the best fruits of Christian life, and the noblest specimens of Christian character, have been exhibited among those who have been, at least in theory, Calvinists.' And the words of the historian Froude have become quite familiar: 'When all else has failed, . . . Calvinism has ever borne an inflexible front to illusion and mendacity, and has preferred rather to be ground to powder, like flint, than to bend before violence, or melt under encraving temptation.'

"This system, as we understand it, embraces the following points—(1) The sovereignty of an infinitely wise and holy God, who created the worlds after a plan of perfect wisdom, and who retains absolute control over them, even to the smallest atom and to the most insignificant event; (2) the condition of man by nature, not that of weakness or sickness, but that of death, and therefore of doom to burial in everlasting darkness; (3) the purpose of infinite goodness to rescue from that death a multitude which no man can number; (4) for this end, to give the Son of God, very God of very God and perfect man, made of a woman, made under the law, to live a life of perfect obedience, and die the death of the cross, and by this life and this death to furnish a complete satisfaction to Divine law and justice, and to effect a reconciliation to God of those for whom the obedience was rendered and the death endured; (5) the gift of the Holy Spirit to apply to the heart this purchased redemption, to regenerate the soul, and enable and persuade it to embrace Jesus Christ as He is offered in the Gospel; (6) justification by faith, pardon and acceptance on account of the righteousness of Christ imputed to the sinner, and received by faith alone; (7) the sure perseverance to the end of all the justified.

"From some cause or other, Presbyterianism in government has ever shown a strong affinity for Calvinism in doctrine. Mr. Barnes finds the secret of this affinity in the oneness of principle that underlies the two; the principle of regularity, of government, of order; the idea that things are, and should be fixed and stable, that the affairs of the universe, of society, of individuals, should be guided by settled principles, and not left to chance and hap-hazard. Calvinism recognizes the truth that God works through decree, and towards a predestined end. Thus Presbyterian government and Calvinistic doctrine are twin children of the same great ideas of order, rule, regularity; and hence, with rare exceptions, they are found together.

"3. Presbyterianism in worship.—The genius of Presbyterianism repudiates a fixed and imperative liturgy; for, not only do the infinitely varied and ever varying needs of man defy attempts to reduce them to programme, but, as history unmistakably testifies, such liturgies tend—though, in the experience of many excellent Christians, true piety counteracts the tendency—yet they do tend strongly toward what is known as 'Ritualism'; and Ritualism, again, tends strongly to substitute the things which the eye hath seen and the ear hath heard, for the things which the eye hath not seen and the ear hath not heard; further, it tends to discharge both brain and heart from participation in the worship of God, to reduce worship to mere formal rite and ceremony, and to replace the preaching of the Word of God's inspiration with the reading and saying 'Amen' to prayers of man's composition.

"Presbyterianism makes it a chief duty of the Church, by preaching, to place and keep revealed truth before the minds of the people. The command which Jesus left with His disciples, as the clouds received Him out of their sight, was, Go, preach the Gospel. The apostle says, Christ sent me not to administer sacraments, but to preach, and he writes to Timothy, 'I charge thee before God and the Lord Jesus Christ . . . preach the word;' and preaching has a direct bearing upon worship. True preaching and hearing are worship.

"True worship is the response of the heart to truth perceived by the mind. The heart is the bell. Truth is the tongue of the bell, and the perceiving mind is the force that brings the tongue of the bell against its sides. It is the perceived majesty of God that fills with awe, the perceived justice of God that fills the sinner with dread, the perceived goodness of God that fills with grateful love. And Presbyterianism lays it upon the minister to spend large portions of every week in filling his mind, by study and prayer, with some great, commanding truth of God's holy Word; to come into the pulpit on the Sabbath day, and, under the stimulus imparted by these truths thus pondered and prayed over, to lead the people in their devotions; and the people are to come to the House of God from their closets, where they have prayed for their pastor, that the good Spirit may rest upon him as a Spirit of grace and supplication, and may give him insight into their wants and woes, their yearnings, their discouragements, the spiritual and other necessities of themselves and their households, so that he may gather them up in his spirit, and bear them on his heart before the throne of heavenly grace. When the people listen in this spirit to the gospel message, the truth goes into mind and heart, and becomes food for their devotions. And this service, when the ideal is at all realized—as in millions of instances it is realized—is social devotion in its loftiest style.

"4. Presbyterianism in history.—This is a subject with which Presbyterians should be very familiar. That Presbyterianism, wherever its roll-call is answered by more than a corporal's guard, should make itself felt in the course of events, is a simple matter of necessity. Accustomed as Presbyterians are to the exercise of the right of private judgment; constituted as they are into a series of representative governments, the people being the depositary, and their chosen representatives being the organ of church power, it would be very strange if they sat quietly by and took no part in the great movements that so largely involve the interests of Christ's kingdom among men. There have been times in which Presbyterians were constrained simply to testify and endure. But there have also been times, in many a land, where there was found other work to be done.

"When Francis II, Catherine de Medici, Charles IX and the Guises undertook the extirpation of the best half of the French population, Presbyterians were not the men to come forward, and, quietly laying their heads upon the block, to ask the privilege of having them taken off. When every right of man was menaced, the Huguenots found a Coligny to organize and lead them; and from that hour, through all the horrors of the St. Bartholomew massacre, on through the awful years of the Dragonnades, Presbyterianism testified and fought, bled and died for the good old cause. And it is enough to make man thank God that he is a man, to read the story of Presbyterian heroism in the Netherlands during the awful days of Philip and Alva.

"The very name of Scotland calls up a host of thrilling associations. More than once the patriotic activity of the General Assembly saved the Reformation in Britain, and once, at least, Presbyterianism saved constitutional liberty for mankind. When Wentworth could write to his master from Ireland, 'In this island the king is as absolute as any prince in the whole world could be;' when Laud could report to his royal chief that, thanks to the Court of High Commission and his omnipresent spies, no conventicle could be held in the realm without his cognizance; when Charles, with his Star-Chamber, held the State where Laud held the Church, and only one Mordecai sat in the gate to disturb the peace of the despots and break the monotony of despotism—then it was that Presbyterianism in Scotland spoiled the whole well-laid scheme! Then came the wild outburst at St. Giles' Church in Edinburgh, followed by the sublime scene in Greyfriars Churchyard, where men signed the Covenant with their own blood—scenes and acts which, in their remote consequences, took off the heads of Wentworth, Laud, and Charles, and secured liberty for mankind!

"Carlyle says, 'The tumult in the High Church at Edinburgh spread into a universal battle, a struggle over all these realms; there came out, after fifty years' struggling, what we call the glorious Revolution, a Habeas Corpus Act, free Parliaments, and much else.' Macaulay writes, 'To this step'—that is, the attempt to enslave Scotland—'our country owes its freedom.' And Hallam writes, 'In its ultimate results, it preserved the liberties, and overthrew the monarchy of England.'

"While persecution was developing Presbyterian heroism in Scotland, it was peopling the wilds of America with Presbyterians; and at the first blast of the trumpet of independence, they sprang to arms, every man of them, to lay down those arms again only when independence had been secured. Mr. Bancroft truly says, 'The first voice publicly raised in America to dissolve all connection with Great Britain came, not from the Puritans of New England, not from the Dutch of New York, not from the planters of Virginia, but from the Scotch and Irish Presbyterians.' In the Congress of the Declaration, there was just one clergyman, and he was a Presbyterian; and when the assembly wavered, his eloquent voice proved a heavy weight in the scale of decision.

"Nor should our Presbyterian Manual lack vivid portraits of the characters which have been formed in its nursery and have illustrated the brilliant pages of Presbyterian history. There should appear that scene in the old Bastille—a venerable man in chains, King Henry III standing near, his courtiers all around, while the king exclaims: 'Recant, or I shall be compelled to give you up to your enemies: these two girls here are to be burned to-morrow.' 'Sire,' replied Palissy, the potter, 'listen to me, and I will teach thee to talk like a king. I cannot be compelled to do wrong!' And Knox should be there, in many a crisis of his eventful life; as when on trial before the Queen upon a charge of treason, and reminded that he was not there to preach, exclaiming, 'I am here to speak the truth, and speak the truth I will, impugn it whoso list.' Melville, too, should be depicted there, sent to remonstrate with King James against some of his many outrages, catching the monarch by his robes, and exclaiming, 'Thou God's silly vassal, there are two kings and kingdoms in Scotland—King James and King Christ Jesus, whose subject King James is, and of whose kingdom he is not king, lord, nor head, but a member.'

"Nor should women be omitted from the record; as, for example, Charlotte de Laval, sitting by her husband, the great Admiral Coligny, on the balcony of their castle, and asking, 'Husband, why do you not openly avow your faith, as your brother Andelot has done?' 'Sound your own soul,' was his reply: 'are you prepared to be chased into exile with your children, and to see your husband hunted to the death? I will give you three weeks to consider, and then I will take your advice.' She looked at him a moment through her tears, and said, 'Husband, the three weeks are ended; do your duty, and leave us to God!' And he did! There, too, should be seen Mrs. Welsh, the daughter of Knox, pleading with King James to allow her dying husband to return to Scotland, and breathe once more his native air. 'He may, if he will conform,' is the brutal reply. Gathering up the corners of her apron she answers, 'Your Majesty, I will sooner keep his head here!'

"We are thoroughly persuaded that a more familiar acquaintance with the nature of our polity, the history of our Church, the services it has rendered to all the best interests of man, and the characters that have glorified its career, would fill especially our younger people with a new enthusiasm for all that pertains to its name, its interests, and its growth in the world."

Presbyterian Journal, The, was established in Philadelphia, in 1876, by Rev. J. Ford Sutton, D.D., with the Rev. Alfred Nevins, D.D., LL.D., as its editor-in-chief. It began as a single four-paged sheet, and was designed to be the low-priced family paper of our Church. In 1880 its publishers, The Presbyterian Journal Company, became the official publishers of the volume containing the papers and proceedings of the Second General Council of the Ecumenical Presbyterian Alliance, which met that year in Philadelphia. One of the editors of the Council volume, Rev. R. M. Patterson, D.D., immediately following that, became also editor of the paper. Its circulation is extended and extending. It gives promptly and fully Church news from all quarters; makes a speciality of reading for mothers and children; of the Sunday-school lessons, and of the mission work; has contributions from the best pens in the Church; freely discusses in its editorial and other columns the questions of the day, and is choice in its selections for the devotional life. Its platform is conservative, orthodox, catholic Presbyterianism, but favoring free discussion by progressives, in the conviction that the old truths will be strengthened thereby. Dr. Patterson is a writer of acknowledged ability; and whilst not opposed, by any means, to a free and full expression of opinion by correspondents through the Journal, on the great theological and ecclesiastical questions of the day has always firmly but courteously, adhered to "the old paths."

Presbyterian Literature, Diffusion of.

Literature is thought made visible, tangible, portable. It is a chief medium of contact between mind and mind. As such it ranks among the most potent of moral forces. For mind is a sensitive plant that feels and often thrills under and is sometimes permanently modified by the touch of a single thought. Into the mind of one tottering on the brink of moral ruin, the thought of what he is losing, of what may yet be possible for him to achieve, has come like the touch of an angel's finger to save him and revolutionize his life. And one thought is often as potent to slay as another is to save.

And when a thought has done, or at least begun its work in the mind that gave it birth, it may go forth and repeat that work in other minds, and set up a new series of mind-moulding thinkings that shall never end. That thought may modify opinion, may change the creed, may introduce a new and powerful element into the dominant aim, motive and purpose, and thus determine the conduct, and thus the destiny.

The power of written or printed thought marks almost the whole pathway of religious progress. The moulding influence on the world's history of those ten mighty words—the decalogue—overpasses the reach of the imagination. Under the reading of a few sentences of the book recovered from the rubbish in the temple cloisters at Jerusalem, the king rent his clothes in anguish of heart. And the reading of that Book in the ears of the people issued in a religious awakening that shook the land from Dan to Beersheba. To this power the Reformation owed its rapid progress and sweeping success. Tracts from Wyclif's pen stole from hand to hand into countless homes, and the theses of Luther swept Europe like an American prairie fire.

And never before has the power of printed thought been so great, nor so extensive as it is in our day. The avidity for the printed page is almost universal, and it is insatiable. Book-hunger is one of the predominant traits of the time. Owing to the facilities for education, almost everybody can read, and the all-pervading excitements of the day secure the actual perusal of pages that no man can number.

And of printing pages to feed this book-hunger there is no end. Like tree-leaves are book-leaves for multitude. They are thrust in at the door; they are thrown in at the window; they are piled into the lap in the railway car; they reach us in every form, in the bound volume, in the review, in the magazine, in the newspapers, the daily, the semi-weekly, the weekly; hundreds of them, thousands of them, millions of them.

The number of books in the libraries of the world reaches even to hundreds of millions, and the clang of the press, as it adds to the number, ceases not day nor night. The annual issue of newspapers in the United States alone numbers some six hundred millions.

The moulding effect of this book power on the public mind and heart, conscience, character and conduct, is immeasurable, if even it be not inconceivable.

The general character of this omnipresent page forms, therefore, a very important element in the question as to the need of a Presbyterian literature.

Unquestionably the newspaper press of our day is the medium of a vast amount of excellent writing, of valuable information, and the instrument of powerful, intellectual quickening. And the number of newspapers is not small which not only abstain from what might offend devout feeling, but which expend large effort to procure and publish religious intelligence.

On the other hand, the number of them whose moral influence is as deadly as extensive is by no means insignificant. In fact, newspaper and magazine literature ranges in moral character through all gradations, from the sublime heights of a pure Christian morality and lofty integrity of principle, down through non-religion, irreligion, skepticism, infidelity, atheism, coarse vulgarity and obscenity. Of many a newspaper the following, from the pen of another, will be recognized as anything but an untruthful portrait:—

"It has vastly more power to occupy than to guide, to distract and agitate than to settle and inform the public mind. It is only made to sell, without the responsibility of books and treatises, which are exposed if they do not add something solid to our information or our edification. It collects, with preternatural industry, news—good, bad, indifferent—from all the winds of heaven, and pours it as from a myriad-mouthed watering-pot upon the ever-thirsty attention of the American people. It has become the only reading of millions—their pulpit, library and gallery of art. It helps to make restless, smart, curious, superficial people; to keep up a perpetual buzz and fuss about politics; to drag crime, suicide and robbery before the minds of the whole nation. It sometimes devotes itself for months to the detailed following of hateful cases of vice and filthiness, corrupting a whole generation of youth by their lascivious confessions."

Not less varied in character are the more permanent issues of the book-press. It sends forth volumes of priceless value; and, as we are assured, within two years, it has put into circulation, in New England alone, some 20,000 copies of "Paine's Age of Reason."

In the presence of facts like these we are ready for the question, "What are the marked features of a Presbyterian literature?" To this we reply, a Presbyterian literature is the embodiment and expression of the thoughts that make up the Presbyterian system. It is, therefore,

1. First of all, pre-eminently a theistic literature. As the sun is the centre of the solar system, so God is the centre of the Presbyterian system. As the planets receive their hues from irradiated sunshine, so all the parts of the Presbyterian system receive their hues from irradiated God-shine. God is the beginning, the continuance, the end of all; God infinite, eternal and unchangeable in his being, wisdom, power, holiness, justice, goodness and truth. Of Him, through Him, to Him are all things, to whom be glory evermore. The glory of God is a reason infinitely sufficient for any decree, any act of His. The highest service to which the creature is competent is to show forth the glory of God. The inscription on the banner of Presbyterianism reads: "It is enough for one universe if God be glorified." Man made in the image of God, man made a little lower than the angels, man in all his greatness, and on earth there is nothing great but man, man's chief end is to glorify God and enjoy Him forever.

It is also the will and active power of God that makes the world go round. It is God's eternal decree that we see embodying itself in the events of time. Historic phenomena are merely the dust of God's chariot wheels, as he drives on to his predestinated goal. Napoleon the First fancied himself the child of destiny, and that thought in his heart quadrupled his power. The Presbyterian does not fancy, but knows that he is a child of destiny, and that when he is working upon a heaven-assigned task, he is simply weaving his free thought and action in with the eternal decree of God; and this knowledge puts the shout of victory on his lips when he fires his first gun.

With this ennobling idea of God, his greatness, his goodness, his unlimited power, his unrestricted presence and his universal providences—a God "of purer eyes than to behold evil, and that cannot look upon iniquity"—Presbyterian literature palpitates from title-page to finish.

2. Presbyterian literature is also emphatically Christological.

It is full of Christ—Christ, the eternal and co-equal Son of God, very God of very God; in execution of the eternal decree for the salvation of countless millions, becoming man, rendering a perfect obedience to the law, setting before men an example of absolute perfection, bearing the sin of his people in his own body on the tree, rising again from the dead and ascending to heaven, and there ever living to intercede for those whose sins he bore.

3. Presbyterian literature asserts a clean-cut, distinctive anthropology.

It holds before the face of man the mirror of God's word, and shows man to himself as he is portrayed by the Spirit of God, as fallen in Adam, as crippled in the fall; and not merely crippled; but smitten with disease—"the whole head sick, the whole heart faint;" and not only diseased, but slain—dead in trespasses and sins, and hopelessly and forever dead, but for the operation upon his nature of the new-creating, life-giving power of the Holy Ghost.

4. Presbyterian literature presents a bold Biblical eschatology.

Man must die and be raised again from the dead; appear before God in a final judgment, there to give an account of all the deeds done in the body, and thence to pass either into life eternal or into punishment everlasting.

5. And Presbyterian literature has its well outlined, clearly defined system of polity.

This polity involves those great principles of representation, of transfer of obligation, of vicarious action and endurance which pervade the whole kingdom of God, as that kingdom touches the race of man. These principles bind the Father of the race and all his posterity into an organized unity. They pervade the individual family. They are resistlessly forcing themselves into recognition in the State. They are working with the power of destiny to mould political organizations the world over into representative and constitutional forms.

These are among the vital, controlling ideas that interlace, pervade and throb in a truly Presbyterian literature.

Further, these ideas have realized themselves in biography and history. They have shown, in the sphere of practical life, their competency to build up character, to inspire man with aims as lofty, to equip him for achievements as daring, to nerve him for endurance as protracted and crucial, as the imagination can well conceive.

To go no further back in time, they have left foot-prints of superlative glory in the valleys of Piedmont, in the cities and on the plains of France, among the dunes and canals of the Netherlands, and all over Britain. These principles spake on the tongue of the aged Palissey the potter. When King Henry said to him as he lay chained to the floor of the Bastile, "If you do not recant, I shall be compelled to give you over to the flames," he replied, "Sire, listen to me, and I will teach thee to talk like a king; I cannot be compelled to do wrong." They spake by the lips of Knox that day when, issuing from the presence of that wicked beauty, the Queen of Scots, he overheard the courtiers whisper, "He is not afraid;" he replied, "I have looked many an angry man in the face, and have not been overmuch afraid; why should the tears of a pretty gentlewoman afraid me?"

And thousands of times they spake also in the words and acts of woman. France was trembling with the agitation produced by an oppression no longer tolerable. All eyes looked for a leader. Coligny hesitated, for never did he draw sword on a Frenchman, but with a shudder. In the meantime, the cause was in imminent peril. Charlotte de Laval, his wife, upbraided him with his hesitation. "To be prudent in man's esteem," said she, "is not to be wise in that of God, who has given you the science of a general that you might use it for the good of his children." "But," he asked, "could you hear of the defeat of the army under the lead of your husband, and not murmur against him and against God?" "I could," she answered. "But," he continued, "think of the anxieties, the privations, the bereavements, the woes that may come, not only on others, but on you and yours. Meditate on these things for three weeks, and then I will abide by your decision." Fixing her tear-moistened eye upon him, she answered, "Husband, the three weeks are up; do your duty, and leave the rest to God. I summon you in God's name not to defraud us any more, or I will witness against you at His judgment."

They spake also in the eyes, the heart, and by the lips of Jeanne d'Albret. When word reached her that her husband had apostatized and given orders that her boy Henry should be committed to the tuition of Rome, and that she should follow his base example, she caught up her boy Henry in her arms and exclaimed, "Had I my child in one hand, and my kingdom in the other, sooner than go to mass, I would throw them both to the bottom of the sea, so that they might be no hindrance to me in the way of duty."

These, now, are some of the elements of a Presbyterian literature—these ideas, these principles, and these embodiments of them in character and in historic acts.

Can now the question be even raised, cui bono? What good is to be expected from confronting the general mind with these ideas and these examples? from pouring such a literature into the great deluge of printed thought that fills all the valleys, and rises more than fifteen cubits above the tops of the highest mountains?

The question as to the actual practical effect on men of these thoughts, ideas, principles, has found repeated and effective response in the verdict of keen-eyed observers of many whose affinities are other than Presbyterian.

Of the system which forms the embodiment of these ideas, Prof. Dorner, of Berlin, has said:—

"In its manly, resolute temper; its energy of action, which also expresses itself in strength and energy of thinking; its zealous breathing of soul for the increase of God's kingdom; its willing self-surrender, and its fortitude of pursuit in great and bold designs for the furtherance of Christ's reign; it is these qualities that I admire in Presbyterianism."

Of this system Mr. Gladstone writes:—

"It has given Presbyterian communions the advantages which in civil order belong to local self government and representative institutions—orderly habits of mind, respect for adversaries, and some of the elements of judicial temper; the development of a genuine individuality, together with the discouragement of mere arbitrary will and of all eccentric tendency; the sense of a common life and the disposition energetically to defend it; the love of law, combined with the love of freedom; last, but not least, the habit of using the faculty of speech with the direct and immediate view to persuasion."

The Edinburgh Review not long since gave the following verdict upon this system:—

"The high intelligence which has long distinguished and still distinguishes the lower classes of Scotland," it says, "may largely be attributed to the Presbyterian form of church government, especially taken in connection with the Calvinistic creed. The apprehension of that creed cannot fail to stimulate the mind; the working of that form of government has accustomed Scotchmen of every rank to look upon it as a duty and a right to exercise their judgments on questions involving directly or indirectly the most important subjects of human thought. The Presbyterian polity has also tended to foster that liberality of opinion in secular politics which prevails among the middle and lower classes in Scotland. Such must of necessity be the influence of a church strictly democratic in its constitution, recognizing within itself no distinctions of persons, no grades or rank of office."

The Rev. Dr. Curry, an able and fair-minded leader in the great Methodist Church in America, has written of the Westminster Confession that it "is the clearest and most comprehensive system of doctrine ever framed. It is not only a wonderful monument of the intellectual greatness of its framers, but also a comprehensive embodiment of nearly all the precious truths of the gospel. We concede," he says, "to the Calvinistic churches the honor of having all along directed the best thinking of the country. Some of the best fruits of Christian life," he adds, "have been exhibited among those who have been, at least in theory, Calvinists."

Ralph Waldo Emerson heaves a piteous sigh over the lack of Calvinism in the brain and heart of our day:—

"Our later generation appears ungirt, frivolous, compared with the religions of the last or Calvinistic age. There was in the last century a serious habitual reference to the spiritual world running through letters, diaries and conversation, yes, and into wills and legal instruments, compared with which our liberality looks a little foppish and dapper. The religion seventy years ago was an iron belt to the mind, giving it concentration and force. A rude people were kept respectable by the determination of thought on the eternal world. Now men fall abroad, want polarity, suffer in character and intellect."

And how familiar have become the ringing sentences of the historian Froude:—

"When all else has failed; when patriotism has covered its face, and human courage has broken down; when intellect has yielded, as Gibbon says, 'with a smile or a sigh,' content to philosophize in the closet, and abroad worship with the vulgar; when emotion and sentiment and tender imaginative piety have become the handmaids of superstition, and have dreamt themselves into forgetfulness that there is any difference between lies and truth, the slavish form of belief called Calvinism, in one or other of its many forms, has borne ever an inflexible front to illusion and mendacity, and has preferred to be ground to powder like flint, rather than bend before violence, or melt under enervating temptation."

Now the question before us is as to the desirableness, importance, duty and necessity of making a way into the general deluge of printed thought for the ideas that have made such assertion of themselves among men.

We are by no means to forget that the general Evangelical press is doing a vast and excellent work. If, however, in the Presbyterian system there are not distinguishing and powerful elements of thought and doctrine, then the existence of that system is an impertinence. But if its constituent ideas, thoughts and doctrines impart to it a special and distinctive character, and if this system, bearing this character, has stamped itself on the best life of the world, this very fact makes it imperative on the thirty or forty millions of those who hold this system to keep the mind of the world ever confronted with these thoughts and principles.

Not that we are to lose sight of the fact that there is a constant, large, and effective outlay of talent in the publication of Presbyterian newspapers and magazines. One of these magazines, which, if not a formal organ of this Council, is at least a child of this Council—I mean The Catholic Presbyterian—month by month brings the reader face to face, as no other within the reach of our knowledge does, with the condition and prospects of the Presbyterian churches of the world—the struggles of smaller Presbyterian bodies here and there, in the great awakening of sympathies, evoking prayers, and in many ways exciting and fostering a healthful, religious, Presbyterian enthusiasm. It embodies a kind of Presbyterian literature we should like to see diffused a hundred times more widely.

But aside from all that is or can be done by Presbyterian newspapers and magazines, we assert the duty of organizing and operating agencies for the thrusting in earnestly, constantly, profusely, among the thinkings of men the great ideas that pervade a true Presbyterian literature.

The legitimate aim of such a literature, be it remembered, is, omitting no doctrine of the Word of God, embracing all those ideas which Christians hold in common, to present these common ideas in their logical and necessary connection with those other great truths which distinguish Presbyterianism from other systems of polity and doctrine. One of the necessary results of this Council is a weighty contribution to such a literature. We do not hesitate to affirm that the volume of Proceedings of the Edinburgh Council contains a body of Presbyterian thought of which no church need be ashamed. It is superfluous to affirm that the Presbyterian element in the theological and ecclesiastical literature of the world holds no second place, whether for Biblical soundness or for intellectual power.

And the aim of this paper is to make clear the duty of the thirty millions of Presbyterians in the world to organize agencies in their several local centres, for the placing of her literature within reach of every reading person. This involves the idea of aggression, of propagandism. There must be no waiting for men to apply for these books, any more than there must be a waiting for men to come in quest of the gospel. The command is, go—go into all the world; and the duty of her Presbyterians is to go, in the persons of commissioned agents, from door to door, and from town to town, and from province to province, and present these volumes, induce their reception and perusal, pray with the recipient, and thus get the thoughts enclosed in them deep into the minds and hearts of men.

It would be both interesting and instructive to recite the story of such efforts in the Protestant Church since God gave the printing-press to the world. It would be both instructive and interesting to report the statistics of such work done by the various churches represented in this body. But statistics of vast movements outreach the apprehension, and fail to produce definite practical impression. Let it suffice to call attention to the doings of one only of these various branches.

The branch of which we speak possesses an organized agency for the publication and diffusion of a literature imbued with Presbyterian ideas. Before the organization of this Board, the leading publishers of Philadelphia were implored to republish two British volumes—the Presbyterian Cham. ter. and its one of them—of which I had found one who was willing to take the pecuniary risk. These very volumes have now been published with a Board, and tens of thousands of them have been sold. It puts into the hands of the public more than 50,000 volumes every year. It has sent out more than 100,000 copies of the Westminster Catechism of Faith; some 200,000 copies of the Shorter Catechism; nearly 2,000,000 copies of the Philadelphia Catechism; nearly 200,000 copies of Boston's Fourth Sunday School; more than 200,000 copies of Alexander's Religious Experience; nearly 1,000,000 copies of Dickinson's Five Points of Calvinism; nearly 2,000,000 copies of Fisher's Catechism; more than 5,000,000 copies of Fairchild's Great Supplement; nearly 1,000,000 copies of The Christian's Great Interest; between 15,000 and 20,000 copies of Matthew's Divine Purpose; from 10,000 to 15,000 copies of Salow's Exposition of the Confession of Faith. And as these volumes are permanent and last for years, there must be now in the various families of this land some 5,000,000 copies of the publications of this agency alone; and it adds to that number, as I have stated, more than 500,000 volumes a year. It keeps from seventy to one hundred agents in the field going from door to door to sell and give away these books. If now the whole thirty millions of Presbyterians in the world are doing a work like that of this one branch, which number a little over one-half million of communicants, then there go into the hands of the reading world from year to year considerably more than 20,000,000 volumes of brain-nourishing, heart-strengthening truths; that, in the course of ten years, there would be in the hands of the reading world a good deal more than 200,000,000 of these volumes.

What had the existence of this Alliance and the meeting of this Council was another great agent for the extension and diffusion of a genuine Presbyterian literature. Episcopate, the Second General Council of the Presbytery of the United States, 1847, pp. 120-121, 122, 123, 124, 125, 126, 127, 128, 129, 130, 131, 132, 133, 134, 135, 136, 137, 138, 139, 140, 141, 142, 143, 144, 145, 146, 147, 148, 149, 150, 151, 152, 153, 154, 155, 156, 157, 158, 159, 160, 161, 162, 163, 164, 165, 166, 167, 168, 169, 170, 171, 172, 173, 174, 175, 176, 177, 178, 179, 180, 181, 182, 183, 184, 185, 186, 187, 188, 189, 190, 191, 192, 193, 194, 195, 196, 197, 198, 199, 200, 201, 202, 203, 204, 205, 206, 207, 208, 209, 210, 211, 212, 213, 214, 215, 216, 217, 218, 219, 220, 221, 222, 223, 224, 225, 226, 227, 228, 229, 230, 231, 232, 233, 234, 235, 236, 237, 238, 239, 240, 241, 242, 243, 244, 245, 246, 247, 248, 249, 250, 251, 252, 253, 254, 255, 256, 257, 258, 259, 260, 261, 262, 263, 264, 265, 266, 267, 268, 269, 270, 271, 272, 273, 274, 275, 276, 277, 278, 279, 280, 281, 282, 283, 284, 285, 286, 287, 288, 289, 290, 291, 292, 293, 294, 295, 296, 297, 298, 299, 300, 301, 302, 303, 304, 305, 306, 307, 308, 309, 310, 311, 312, 313, 314, 315, 316, 317, 318, 319, 320, 321, 322, 323, 324, 325, 326, 327, 328, 329, 330, 331, 332, 333, 334, 335, 336, 337, 338, 339, 340, 341, 342, 343, 344, 345, 346, 347, 348, 349, 350, 351, 352, 353, 354, 355, 356, 357, 358, 359, 360, 361, 362, 363, 364, 365, 366, 367, 368, 369, 370, 371, 372, 373, 374, 375, 376, 377, 378, 379, 380, 381, 382, 383, 384, 385, 386, 387, 388, 389, 390, 391, 392, 393, 394, 395, 396, 397, 398, 399, 400, 401, 402, 403, 404, 405, 406, 407, 408, 409, 410, 411, 412, 413, 414, 415, 416, 417, 418, 419, 420, 421, 422, 423, 424, 425, 426, 427, 428, 429, 430, 431, 432, 433, 434, 435, 436, 437, 438, 439, 440, 441, 442, 443, 444, 445, 446, 447, 448, 449, 450, 451, 452, 453, 454, 455, 456, 457, 458, 459, 460, 461, 462, 463, 464, 465, 466, 467, 468, 469, 470, 471, 472, 473, 474, 475, 476, 477, 478, 479, 480, 481, 482, 483, 484, 485, 486, 487, 488, 489, 490, 491, 492, 493, 494, 495, 496, 497, 498, 499, 500, 501, 502, 503, 504, 505, 506, 507, 508, 509, 510, 511, 512, 513, 514, 515, 516, 517, 518, 519, 520, 521, 522, 523, 524, 525, 526, 527, 528, 529, 530, 531, 532, 533, 534, 535, 536, 537, 538, 539, 540, 541, 542, 543, 544, 545, 546, 547, 548, 549, 550, 551, 552, 553, 554, 555, 556, 557, 558, 559, 560, 561, 562, 563, 564, 565, 566, 567, 568, 569, 570, 571, 572, 573, 574, 575, 576, 577, 578, 579, 580, 581, 582, 583, 584, 585, 586, 587, 588, 589, 590, 591, 592, 593, 594, 595, 596, 597, 598, 599, 600, 601, 602, 603, 604, 605, 606, 607, 608, 609, 610, 611, 612, 613, 614, 615, 616, 617, 618, 619, 620, 621, 622, 623, 624, 625, 626, 627, 628, 629, 630, 631, 632, 633, 634, 635, 636, 637, 638, 639, 640, 641, 642, 643, 644, 645, 646, 647, 648, 649, 650, 651, 652, 653, 654, 655, 656, 657, 658, 659, 660, 661, 662, 663, 664, 665, 666, 667, 668, 669, 670, 671, 672, 673, 674, 675, 676, 677, 678, 679, 680, 681, 682, 683, 684, 685, 686, 687, 688, 689, 690, 691, 692, 693, 694, 695, 696, 697, 698, 699, 700, 701, 702, 703, 704, 705, 706, 707, 708, 709, 710, 711, 712, 713, 714, 715, 716, 717, 718, 719, 720, 721, 722, 723, 724, 725, 726, 727, 728, 729, 730, 731, 732, 733, 734, 735, 736, 737, 738, 739, 740, 741, 742, 743, 744, 745, 746, 747, 748, 749, 750, 751, 752, 753, 754, 755, 756, 757, 758, 759, 760, 761, 762, 763, 764, 765, 766, 767, 768, 769, 770, 771, 772, 773, 774, 775, 776, 777, 778, 779, 780, 781, 782, 783, 784, 785, 786, 787, 788, 789, 790, 791, 792, 793, 794, 795, 796, 797, 798, 799, 800, 801, 802, 803, 804, 805, 806, 807, 808, 809, 810, 811, 812, 813, 814, 815, 816, 817, 818, 819, 820, 821, 822, 823, 824, 825, 826, 827, 828, 829, 830, 831, 832, 833, 834, 835, 836, 837, 838, 839, 840, 841, 842, 843, 844, 845, 846, 847, 848, 849, 850, 851, 852, 853, 854, 855, 856, 857, 858, 859, 860, 861, 862, 863, 864, 865, 866, 867, 868, 869, 870, 871, 872, 873, 874, 875, 876, 877, 878, 879, 880, 881, 882, 883, 884, 885, 886, 887, 888, 889, 890, 891, 892, 893, 894, 895, 896, 897, 898, 899, 900, 901, 902, 903, 904, 905, 906, 907, 908, 909, 910, 911, 912, 913, 914, 915, 916, 917, 918, 919, 920, 921, 922, 923, 924, 925, 926, 927, 928, 929, 930, 931, 932, 933, 934, 935, 936, 937, 938, 939, 940, 941, 942, 943, 944, 945, 946, 947, 948, 949, 950, 951, 952, 953, 954, 955, 956, 957, 958, 959, 960, 961, 962, 963, 964, 965, 966, 967, 968, 969, 970, 971, 972, 973, 974, 975, 976, 977, 978, 979, 980, 981, 982, 983, 984, 985, 986, 987, 988, 989, 990, 991, 992, 993, 994, 995, 996, 997, 998, 999, 1000.

Presbyterian Missions in the Pacific Northwest. The gospel was introduced early in the settlement of the territory of the United States; the first was at Astoria and Astoria, Oregon.

At Astoria, Oregon, in the year 1811, the first Presbyterian church in the whole Pacific coast was organized. This congregation was built the first house of worship.

The Presbytery of Oregon, embracing the area between the Rocky mountains and the Pacific Ocean, and all the territory north of N. Adams and Astoria, was organized in 1817, the members being Rev. Messrs. E. B. Taylor, Lewis Thompson and Isaac Hale. These brethren had a very extensive area to traverse in visiting an aggregate population which was about equal to any well-settled county in the Atlantic States.

The long and dangerous journey across the plains retarded the growth of population, and the discovery of gold in California not only suspended it, but drew away a portion of the inhabitants to the gold fields. After the Civil War a steady flow of immigration set in, and it has continued, with increasing volume, to the present time.

In 1870, at the session of both branches of the Church, the Presbytery of Oregon was composed of fourteen churches and twelve members, as follows: John H. Reasoner, Henry H. Spalding, Edward R. Geary, William J. Mendenhall, George F. Whitworth, Messrs. A. Williams, A. L. Lindsley, Robert Robe, Joseph A. Hanna, George W. Sloan, Anthony Simpson, John R. Thompson. The Presbytery undertook to reach all parts of its widely-extended field. The supervision of the work was placed in the hands of an executive committee. An extensive correspondence with ministers and laymen, reaching various places eligible for settlement, was carried on. Many articles were furnished to the newspapers, both secular and religious. An acquaintance was made and kept up with promising missionary localities. From time to time these were supplied and others developed. This often required personal visitation. The work was made much more laborious because no Presbyterial or itinerant missionary could be obtained. In 1876 the growth was expressed as follows, in figures: 25 ministers, 32 churches.

Co-operative work was prosecuted under the auspices of the American Tract Society, Presbyterian Board of Publication, American Bible Society and American Sunday-school Union, in all which this Presbytery participated.

ORGANIZATION OF THE SYNOD OF THE COLUMBIA.

In 1878, the synod of the Columbia was organized by dividing the Presbytery of Oregon into three, entitled Puget Sound, South Oregon and Oregon, leaving to the jurisdiction of the last-named the territories of Idaho and Alaska, with the intention of organizing Presbyteries in each territory as fast as possible. The executive committee which had operated so efficiently in promoting the presbytery that included this great step was also used by the Synod and continued its work. The Presbytery of Idaho was erected in 1878, and the Presbytery of South Oregon was consolidated with the Presbytery of Oregon in 1880. The progress of the work in Alaska now demands the creation of a Presbytery in the Territory, and steps have already been taken to effect an organization. In April, 1887, the number of churches was sixty-three, of ministers fifty-two, of graduates five and Presbyteries four.

MISSIONS AMONG ABORIGINES.

The mission among the Puget Sound Indians was begun in 1871 by the appointment of the Rev. G.

W. Shuman as teacher and his wife as matron. After a few years their work was terminated by the death of Mrs. Seaman, but the seed they had planted in due time sprang up, and the Rev. M. G. Mann became Mr. Shuman's successor early in 1876. His labors were remarkably blessed. A work of grace continued until nearly the whole tribe were brought into the communion of the Church. The Papalligood added a daily report of the efficacy of vital Christianity triumphant and stimulate the cardinal virtues.

The mission to the Walla Walla Indians was begun in 1860 by Marcus Whitman, M. D., and his wife, and was terminated in 1847 by the massacre of the mission family, including the Dr. and his wife, a terrible calamity, which led to the next war with the Indians in this region.

The mission to the Nez Percés, under Rev. H. H. Spaulding and his wife, began in 1836, and was suspended at the time of the massacre of Dr. Whitman.

The mission to the Spokane Indians began under Rev. Messrs. C. Edson and E. Walker, and their wives, in 1846. It was abandoned in 1848.

These missions were under the direction of the A. B. C. F. M., with whom the Presbyterians co-operated.

Twelve years after Rev. Mr. Spaulding returned to his work among the Nez Percés. He found that many of them had kept up religious worship, and their knowledge of reading and writing, but he was not allowed to remain long among them.

On assuming the care of the Nez Percés, in 1871, the Presbytery selected of Foreign Missions sent Mr. Spaulding's kit to his beloved people among whom he labored with great diligence and skillfulness until August, 1874, when he died. The work has been successfully carried on and number of churches have been organized in the mission, headed and conducted by Messrs. S. L. McKethen. These men are engaged in missionary work among Indians of their own and neighboring tribes, one of them is now pastor among Spaulding's band in the Indian Territory.

Among the Spokanes Mr. Spaulding organized missionary efforts, and a great number of churches were established among Christians.

Among the Chinook Indians we have gathered a fine number of scholars. Miss M. Bell's students' progress has been persistently made, successful scholars among the tribes and bands who are called Mission Indians. But their unsettled condition has frustrated all efforts.

The same is the case with part of the tribes under the care of the Synod, the rest of them are already settled on farms and stocks, some on farms and others are in the mineral districts. During the final action of the Government, it is so situated that no work either Christian or heathen can be done, but better results than any of our other tribes, Indians, considering the general condition there have been under our uniform treatment twelve years.

MISSIONS IN ALASKA

The first mission to the Alaskan natives, which was begun in 1870, was through the efforts of British Columbia Christians, one of whom, Mr. B. G. B. formally assumed in 1877, when the trustees of the entered the field. During the fall months of the Presbyterian Board of Home Missions having taken charge, the enterprise was reinforced and the work enlarged. And in 1879 the first American church was organized and a new field was opened at Fort Wrangel, under the direction of the Presbytery of Oregon, to whose jurisdiction the entire Territory belongs. Since then the mission stations have been increased, and the work has progressed as to justify the foundation of a Presbytery.

An extended history of the Alaskan missions remains to be written. A concise and accurate account of their origin has already appeared entitled "Sketches of Alaska," which embraces reports made to the Synod of the Columbia and to the Board of Home Missions by the chairman of the committee on "Missions of Synod with view to the missions organized."

EDUCATION

The main impetus given to Presbyterian church and its inherent tendencies, in promoting and perpetuating to make progress in moral and comprehensive education. In a true sense of the word, Rev. E. R. Stewart, by promoting and expanding during at the East for the purpose of founding a college in connection with the mission work. In the time of the Defiance Institute at Anvik, Oregon, was characterized a student and church site was obtained a large and suitable building erected under a liberal scholarship, fitted with apparatus, furnished with present time. An efficient and organized student body was established and suspended but its success.

The Presbytery of Oregon has been engaged in a similar undertaking by the purchase of an edifice. It is one among the difficulties which are met with in the present in all new enterprises.

The Presbyterian Church is making progress in the field of an institution of learning at White Sulphur Springs.

Presbyterian Sabbath Schools. The progress is a striking feature of the progress of the Presbyterian Church upon the ministry and upon the education of the children as well as upon the parent and the family. This follows directly from the fact that children's removal to the schools of the denomination, and the fact that in the majority of instances, the support of the government of the Church, of the Sabbath School, and in cases where it is established in the houses of the parents, is being manifested by the progress of the Sabbath School. Great success has been attained in the field of the Sabbath School in the Territory, and in the States.

With less opportunity for the Sabbath School, the present Sabbath School is a most successful one.

few suggestions, the adoption of which, in our opinion, would materially enhance the efficiency and value of a department of Christian effort so eminently calculated to accomplish important results.

1. The instructions of the Sabbath school should never be regarded as a sufficient substitute for religious instruction at home, nor should attendance at the school be required so as to interfere with the interests of family religion. The two duties are perfectly distinct, and they may both be attended to, ordinarily, without damage to the interests of either. If, however, unavoidable circumstances bring these departments of instruction into conflict, let the claims of family religion always prevail, how great soever the sacrifice on the part of the Sabbath school.

2. The influence of our Sabbath schools should be fully exerted for the purpose of increasing our own congregations. It cannot be denied that we do good when we train children and youth in our schools for membership in other denominations, and for this good work there is much due to us, as the favor—though often done by us, has been seldom reciprocated. But we insist we should effect greater work, could we retain all our Sabbath scholars as permanent members of our own congregations, that they may be further benefited under the ministrations of the gospel, and be prepared, when occasion shall serve, to render assistance as teachers in the Sabbath school.

To effect this end, our schools must be made thoroughly Presbyterian. We propose this course, not with the view of proselyting the children in our schools whose parents do not belong to our Church, but in fidelity to our own children, the lambs of our flock, whom assuredly we ought to endeavor to retain within their own fold. The voice of the Good Shepherd is distinctly heard within our borders, as elsewhere; here are the green pastures no less abundant; and living waters flow through all our coasts, as free and clear as gushed of old from Horeb's smitten rock.

The only objection of any weight that can be urged against this suggestion is, that, by imparting an early sectarian bias, our children will be deprived of the privilege of judging for themselves in matters of religion when they come to years of maturity. We candidly admit the force of the objection; but we urge, in justification, the law of necessity, indispensable self-defense. If we do not give our children a decided inclination to what we believe to be the truth in religion, there are multitudes ready to bias them in some other direction upon that subject. Above all, the world will not scruple to bias them to the ways of folly and vice, if they be allowed to pass from the Sabbath school without minds as clear and decided in favor of the truth as our instructions and influence can render them. Our children, moreover, should be instructed and interested in the missionary and other benevolent operations of our Church. They may be thus trained to a consistent and systematic benevolence in the cause of Christ, without which the most eloquent appeals from the pulpit often prove unavailing.

The faithful training in the doctrines, principles and operations of the Presbyterian Church, which we recommend to be introduced into all our regularly-organized Sabbath schools, comprehends every Scriptural effort for the salvation of the scholar, and secures the highest spiritual interest of both scholar and teacher. It embraces thorough study of the Word of God, and requires constant approach to the throne of grace. While, therefore, by adopting this suggestion, our Sabbath schools would become more denominational, it is not to be apprehended that they would become, in any degree, less spiritual and evangelical.

To accomplish the proposed change in the character of our Sabbath schools, it will be necessary to discontinue the use of all books of instruction from which are excluded the distinctive views of Presbyterianism. The publications from which all denominational views are excluded, so extensively used at present, though in many respects excellent, are especially suited for temporary use on missionary ground, or in mixed schools, in which several denominations are associated with equal authority to teach, and who have agreed, for the time, to teach nothing offensive to the parties so united. There is no such union, however, in a Sabbath school attached to a fully established Presbyterian congregation, and in such a school there are no sectarian preferences to be respected but our own. Except, therefore, in the case of "union schools proper," neither expediency nor necessity requires the continued use of such books of instruction. For we have all the books our schools need, on sale by the Board of Publication. These books, moreover, have the sanction of our Church, and the introduction of them into our schools is required, both by the general obligation to sustain her institutions, and by the best interests of the schools themselves.

The objections to un-Presbyterian class-books lie with nearly equal weight against Sabbath-school libraries of the same description; they do not meet all the wants of our schools. So important an educational instrumentality as the religious reading of our youth should neither lie unemployed, nor be abandoned to a negative influence. From books read, as well as from living example, and from oral instruction, a deep impression of good or of evil is often received upon the mind, and thence transmitted to the external life. As upon the quality of the aliment received and assimilated depend the health and physical development of the animal, so upon the character of the mental food depend the life and vigor of the spiritual being. If we desire, in the education of our children, to secure the full development of Christian character according to the model of Presbyterianism, we must place in their hands a literature adapted to that end. But a Sabbath library, from which all discussion of the history, genius and tendency of Presbyterianism is omitted, cannot accomplish the object desired. Libraries of this general character may be well adapted to the purpose for which they are designed; namely, the providing of a juvenile religious literature which, all denominational views being excluded, shall exhibit only the principles which are common to all evangelical denominations. Without, therefore, questioning the suitableness of such publications for the purpose intended, we must, nevertheless, regard them as insufficient to supply all the wants of Presbyterian Sabbath schools.

If it be thought desirable to supply our Sabbath schools with libraries of this general character, we think it well; but no Presbyterian Sabbath school should delay to procure the library which has been provided for the purpose now under consideration by the Board of Publication. The catalogue published affords evidence how much has been done by this enterprise, in furnishing for our youth and our Church a Presbyterian literature. We would greatly rejoice to see this Board receive the universal countenance and patronage of our ministers and people, for upon its labors must we mainly depend for the true history of our principles, and the faithful biography of those who, acting on those principles, have adorned the profession of the gospel, and thus to provide the corrective for the injustice which our system has received from nearly all who have professed to write history for the instruction or entertainment of the young. Not to mention the flood of pestilential issues from the corrupt secular press which, by the constancy of the inundation, tends to sweep away all faith and all morality in many of the secular schools which are patronized by Presbyterian parents, authors are used as text-books in history in which, if Calvinism is at all alluded to, it is mentioned with derision and contempt, or held forth to the youthful mind in horrid caricature. This fact, though properly belonging to the subject of "Books for Parochial Schools," is mentioned here as a reason for providing our children a literature that shall exhibit the faith of their fathers in its true light.

3. We regard the care and management of Sabbath schools as an important and interesting part of the oversight committed to the pastors and eldership. Although there is generally an individual who holds the place of superintendent of the Sabbath school, yet the existence of such an office does not preclude, but rather invites, the attention and counsel of the pastor and session. The pastor of the church should be emphatically the pastor of the Sabbath school, ever manifesting an interest in its progress and spiritual welfare. Every teacher and child in the school should be well acquainted with their minister as their spiritual guide and friend. They will thus be encouraged to seek his counsel, and to yield themselves to an influence which they must perceive to be exercised for the great purpose of bringing them to Christ, and of promoting their experimental acquaintance with divine things. This pastoral attention to the Sabbath school will, by the divine blessing, secure accessions to the church of the most valuable character, and when the members of a school so watched over are, in providence, separated from each other, pursuing their respective avocations in the world, they will remember, to the latest period of life, the delightful and profitable Sabbath hours spent in imparting and receiving instruction in the things which make wise unto salvation.—J. Presbyterians, Scotch-Irish, in Cumberland Valley, Pa. At the celebration of the centennial of Silvers Spring Church, in Cumberland county, August 16th, 1883, Col. A. Louden Snowden, of Philadelphia, who was born within the bounds of that church, and attended divine service there in his youth and earlier manhood, paid the following glowing and just tribute to the pioneer settlers of that region:—

"From 1753 until 1758, this rich valley, now made attractive by beautiful homes, fertile farms, prosperous villages and a teeming population of industrious, intelligent and happy people, was the theatre of constant alarms and cruel bloodshed. Without provocation and without much warning, there was precipitated upon the early settlers all the horrors of an Indian war. Under its blasting influence the lands were scarcely tilled, the plow rested and rusted idly in the furrow, and there was but little return to the husbandmen. Each neighborhood furnished its quota of men called to defend the frontiers, which were marked by the then limits of Cumberland county. On every hand was suffering and distress. Men were shot down as they toiled in the fields, and women and children were carried into captivity by the remorseless foe. Ministers of the gospel of peace laid aside their robes of office, and became leaders of their people in scenes of blood, rendered necessary to defend their homes and firesides. It was well for the counties and towns of Eastern Pennsylvania, as it was for Christian civilization, that this valley had been settled by the Scotch-Irish, upon whose intelligence and courage their immunity from danger rested. Very eloquently and truthfully has Dr. McGill referred to their services, in a recent address, when he said:—

"The rich and beautiful Cumberland Valley became the bloodiest battle ground we have ever had since the beginning of our civilization. These Scotch-Irish Presbyterians had been suffered to pour their streams of immigration into that valley in order that they might stand as guardsmen for a nation through nearly the whole of a century.

"If there is any accident of birth of which you and I or any man can be justly proud, it is that in his veins there flows the same blood that sustained these men in all their trials, made them either martyrs, or conquerors over obstacles and every foe, and that constituted them the natural leaders of the people in the march of civilization on this continent. They came not here as paupers, or redemptionists from the tyranny of other lands, seeking to eke out an existence in a new country. On the contrary they came as free men, with an honest and honorable ancestry behind them and with noble purposes and high aims before them. In the survival of the fittest they were the men best fitted by every training and culture to assist in rescuing this land from the savage, and in laying the foundation of a new State whose destiny they mould and whose people they lead. They generally came with means to buy lands and build homes thereon, but more than this, they brought the means of education and spiritual comfort with them. The schoolmaster and the parson came with the emigrant. Thus were education and Christianity, both essential to the up-building and maintenance of free institutions, planted in this valley and elsewhere by the race to which I refer. They resembled the Puritan in the loftiness and earnestness of their purpose, and in their sympathy with moral and intellectual culture, but unlike the Puritan, they united with these a generous and liberal spirit, which recognized and tolerated the right of others to have the same freedom of thought and action that they claimed for themselves. Neither did they feed upon the wormwood of life as chastisement to their souls, but cultivated social intercourse, enjoyments and recreations. They took the good things of this life while preparing for those of the hereafter. This much can be said in truth of the men who inhabited this neighborhood, owned and tilled its farms, laid the foundation of this venerable church, and whose descendants are scattered broadcast over our land, and who are not the least honored of the people among whom they dwell."

"Presbyterian," The. The plan for the establishment of this well-known journal originated with a small company of clerical and lay gentlemen in Philadelphia. To set the machine in motion, a subscription of one hundred dollars each was commenced among friends who favored the enterprise, which so far met with success as to justify a contract for the publication for the first year. The contract was made with Russell and Martien, then young and enterprising printers. According to the written agreement, the publishers were to issue, in good style, two thousand copies, at a cost of sixty-five dollars per week, including all expenses, and its distribution. This contract was signed by the other party, through their "Committee of Superintendence," who were Ashbel Green, Matthew L. Bevan, Henry McKeen, Joshua T. Russell, William M. Engles, Furman Leaming, and John W. Grier (father of the present senior editor).

The first number of the Presbyterian appeared February 16th, 1831, under the editorial management of the Rev. John Burt. Mr. Burt retired from his post, November 21st, 1832, after filling it less than two years. He was succeeded by the Rev. Dr. James W. Alexander. The first number of the paper issued under his management was dated November 28th, 1832, and after continuing about one year he retired, January 9th, 1834. At that date the Presbyterian had embarrassed the publishers with a debt of some thousands of dollars. The firm of Russell & Martien was dissolved, by mutual consent, May 1st, 1831, Mr. Martien continuing to carry on the business. The patronage extended to the enterprise, however, not being sufficient to meet its heavy expenses, the question of its abandonment was seriously considered. At this point the Rev. Dr. William M. Engles suggested to Mr. Martien, who was one of his parishioners, that if he would continue the issue of the paper six months longer, he would edit it during that time gratuitously. The experiment was so far successful as to encourage the hope of resuscitation. At the expiration of this time Dr. Engles was providentially enabled to devote the whole of his time to this work. On his permanent connection with the paper he obtained from some friends in New York a moderate compensation for his labors the first year, after which time the constantly expanding circulation of the paper rendered it self-sustaining.

To prevent any contingency which might result from a failure of Dr. Engles' health, at his suggestion Mr. Martien sold out one-half interest to the Rev. John Leyburn, D. D., who was also to be an associate editor. This occurred in March, 1852. Dr. Leyburn sold his interest to Mr. Alfred Martien, who had succeeded his father as publisher, August 7th, 1861, and returned to Virginia. In the same year and month, the Rev. M. B. Grier, who had resigned his pastoral charge in Wilmington, N. C., was associated in the editorial management of the Presbyterian.

Soon after the death of Dr. Engles, the conduct of the paper fell to the hand of the present senior editor, who, with some strong helpers, carried it on during the years when the discussions arising out of the proposed union of the Presbyterian churches were most earnest. After the reunion the Rev. Dr. E. L. Adams was for a short time editor of the paper. But his health was precarious then, and in a little more than a year he was forced to desist from the labor of writing, and his death soon followed. Then the Presbyterian again returned to the hands of Dr. Grier, and continued there until 1873, when the interest of Mr. Alfred Martien in the paper was purchased by the Rev. Dr. S. A. Mutelmore, who thus became proprietor and editor, and so remains unto the present time, with Dr. Grier as associate editor.

The Presbyterian, throughout its history, has exerted a potent influence for good. Occupying, as it has for years, a conspicuous part, it has always been an unflinching advocate of the doctrines of the Church, neither diluting nor compromising them. It has been a steady and hearty co-operator in the original establishment, as well as a defender of the Boards of the Church, affording them every facility for being heard and known. It has never failed to sustain the theological seminaries—not with local partialities, but with the most comprehensive regard to the general benefits they have conferred on the Church at large. It has been the instrument of collecting thousands of dollars for general charitable purposes, as well as those of a denominational kind. As far as it has reached, it has been an encouragement to pastors, and an advocate for their generous support. It has enlisted the best talents in the Church, and has thus been useful in casting light on almost every question which has called forth discussion; nor has it ever lost sight of the power it could exert in promoting practical godliness among its numerous readers.

Presbyterian Theory of Church Government. Passing over Erastianism, which teaches that the Church is only one form of the State, and Quakerism, which does not provide for the external organization of the Church, there are only the four following radical different theories on the subject of Church Polity.

1. The Popish theory, which assumes that there is a visible head of the church upon earth, and that this dignity is assigned to the bishop of Rome; that he is properly the only bishop by Divine right, the whole Episcopate being vested in him, and from him all other bishops derive their authority; that he has dominion over the whole Christian world; that all Christians are bound to submit to him, and that those who refuse to do so are heretics, and are exposed to eternal damnation, and that he possesses this supreme and uncontrolled power as the successor of Peter, who was bishop of Rome, and at his death, left all his authority and prerogatives to his successors in that See.

2. The Prelatical theory assumes the perpetuity of the apostleship as the governing power in the Church, which, therefore, consists of those who profess the true religion, and are subject to apostle-bishops. This is the Anglican or High Church form of this theory. In its Low Church form, the Prelatical theory simply teaches that there was originally a threefold order in the ministry, and that there should be now. But it does not affirm that mode of organization to be essential.

3. The Independent or Congregational theory includes two principles: first, that the governing and executive power in the Church is in the brotherhood, and secondly, that the Church organization is complete in each worshipping assembly, which is independent of every other.

4. The fourth theory is the Presbyterian. . . . The three great negations of Presbyterianism—that is, the three great errors which it denies are: 1. That all Church power vests in the clergy. 2. That the apostolic office is perpetual. 3. That each individual congregation is independent. The affirmative statement of these principles is: 1. That the people have a right to a substantive part in the government of the Church. 2. That presbyters, who minister in word and doctrine are the highest permanent officers of the Church, and all belong to the same order. 3. That the outward and visible Church is, or should be, one, in the sense that a smaller part is subject to a larger, and a larger to the whole. It is not holding one of these principles that makes a man a Presbyterian, but his holding them all. —Dr. Charles Hodge, in "What is Presbyterianism?"—Presbyterian Board of Publication).

Christ has, in fact, vested all ecclesiastical power in the Church as a whole, none of its members being excluded; yet not in the Church as a mob, but as an organized body, consisting of members, their representatives, ruling elders, and ministers or bishops. Elders or bishops were ordained by the apostles, have always continued in the Church, and were designed to be perpetuated as the highest class of officers in the Church (1 Tim. iii, 1; Eph. iv, 11, 12). All Church power vests, then, jointly in the lay and clerical element, in the ministers together with the people.

"Ruling Elders" (continues Dr. Hodge, in the address just referred to) "are properly the representatives of the people, chosen by them for the purpose of exercising government and discipline in conjunction with pastors or ministers." "The powers, therefore, exercised by our ruling elders are powers which belong to the lay members of the Church." "They are chosen by them to act in their name in the government of the Church. A representative is one chosen by others to do in their name what they are entitled to do in their own persons, or rather to exercise the powers which radically inhere in those for whom they act. The members of a State Legislature or of Congress, for example, can exercise only those powers which are inherent in the people."

Presbytery of Des Moines. The present territory of this body embraces the following counties in Iowa, viz.: Dallas, Polk, Jasper, Makaska, Marion, Warren, Madison, Clark, Lucas, Monroe, Appanoose, Wayne and Decatur. It is the successor of the Presbyteries of the same name, of the late Old and New Schools, also the Presbytery of Chariton, New School. The Old School Presbytery of Des Moines was constituted by the action of the Synod of Illinois, October 14th, 1851, in session at Chicago, with territorial limits as follows: Beginning at the southwest corner of Lee county, thence north on the west line of said county to the southwest corner of Henry county, thence north along the line of said county to the west line of Louisa county, thence north to the Iowa river; to embrace all that portion of the State of Iowa west and south of the Presbyteries of Iowa and Cedar, which, at its organization, consisted of the following ministers, viz.: The Rev. L. G. Bell, the pioneer of Presbyterianism in Iowa, Rev. R. S. Dinsmore, Rev. Robert McGinigan, Rev. Daniel Heider, and the Rev. S. C. McCune, and the following churches: Washington, Crawfordsville and Brighton, in Washington county; Fairfield, Libertyville and Shiloh, in Jefferson county; Union and Keosauqua, in Van Buren county; Ft. Des Moines, in Polk county; Albia, in Monroe county; Dutch Creek, in Keokuk county, and Eddyville, in Wappello county. The first meeting was held in Fairfield, Tuesday, November 4th, 1851, and the opening sermon was preached by the Rev. L. G. Bell, afterwards usually called Father Bell.

The former New School Presbytery of Des Moines was constituted by the Synod of Illinois, N. S., September, 1852, with the following boundaries, viz.: On the south, west and north, by the State line, on the east and northeast by the county of Van Buren and the Des Moines river. It embraces the following ministers: the Rev. Thompson Bird, the Rev. John C. Ewing, the Rev. James H. Shields, and the Rev. Asa Martin; and the following churches: Troy, Bloomfield, and Shunem, in Davis county; Central Des Moines, in Polk county; First Three Rivers, in Warren county; Union, in Appanoose county, and Gideon, in Decatur county. The Presbytery was formally constituted at Keokuk, during the sessions of Synod, the Rev. John C. Ewing acting as Moderator. The Presbytery of Chariton, erected from part of the Presbytery of Des Moines, N. S., by the Synod of Iowa, N. S., held its first meeting in Centreville, Iowa, April 5th, 1860.

The existing Presbytery of Des Moines, which is the legal successor of the three above named Presbyteries, with territory as already indicated, consists of 29 ministers and 54 churches; of these, 46 have houses of worship; 42 have Sabbath schools with an aggregate attendance of 3756; and church membership of 3131; additions last year, 343. The sum of its benevolent contributions for the same time, $3790; and for General Assembly and Congregational purposes $39,866. The larger part of its churches are of recent origin, and feeble. The part of the State of Iowa, occupied by the Presbytery has but recently been settled, but with the facilities now possessed for evangelistic work much is expected, from the faithful efforts which its ministers and churches expect to put forth for the Master in the immediate future.

With regard to educational work done by the Presbyteries of the past it may be remarked that Father Bell maintained a school in Fairfield, which may be regarded as having prepared the way for Parsons College, which is doing a noble work on the same ground for the Presbyterian Church and State of Iowa. The New School Presbytery of Des Moines sustained an academy at Troy, Iowa, which was useful in its day.

Presbytery of Genesee. The Synod of Geneva, February 17th, 1819, provided for the organization of several presbyteries, among them the Presbytery of Genesee, which was directed to meet in Moscow, N. Y., on the second Tuesday of the following April, at eleven o'clock, A. M., to be opened with a sermon by Rev. Ephraim Chapin, or, in case of his absence, by the senior minister present.

In accordance with this direction the Presbytery of Genesee met at the time and place specified, and Rev. E. Chapin opened the meeting with a sermon, and occupied the chair until an organization was effected, by the choice of Rev. Alexander Derwon, Moderator, and licentiate Norris Bull, Stated Clerk. Reviewing the records of Presbytery, October 5th, 1820, the Synod of Geneva took exception to the appointment of Mr. Bull as Stated Clerk, since he was only a correspondent and not amenable to Presbytery. When, subsequently, he became a member of that body, Dr. Bull was for years its Stated Clerk.

At the organization there were five ministers, viz., Rev. Messrs. Alexander Derwon, Elihu Mason, Silas Hubbard, Calvin Colton and Ephraim Chapin, with two licentiates sitting as correspondents, viz., Edward Andrews and Norris Bull, and seven ruling elders, viz., Amos Kingsley, of Batavia; Dr. Jabez Ward, of Perry; John Munger, of Warsaw; Archibald Gillies, of Caledonia; Abraham Camp, of Mt. Morris; Felix Tracey, of Moscow, and Samuel Percival, of Gainesville.

The first regular meeting subsequent to the organization was held in Warsaw, N. Y., August 31st, 1819; at which there was a larger attendance, especially of ruling elders, who outnumbered the ministers two to one. Rules for the guidance of the body were then adopted. And from that time to the present the minutes of proceedings fill nearly five closely written volumes, containing matter of ecclesiastical interest pertaining to the growth and changes of churches, and to the life and pastoral work of a long roll of clergymen, many of whom have been, or still are, distinguished in the history of the Church; such as Samuel T. Mills, Hugh Wallis, Norris Bull, Elihu Mason, Gilbert Crawford, D. C. Houghton, Lewis Cheeseman, Samuel H. Cox and Isaac O. Fillmore, among the dead, and Samuel H. Gridley, James B. Shaw, Gabriel S. Corwin, E. N. Manly, Joseph R. Page, Charles H. Taylor, John Wickes, Edward B. Walsworth, Joseph E. Nassau, Dugald D. McCall, T. Morey Hodgman, William Swan, C. H. Dibble and W. W. Totheroh, among the living.

The records disclose a busy and earnest ecclesiastical life, and are made up of the usual round of statistics and proceedings, much of which is chiefly of local interest. There are noted ministerial changes, church narratives, ordinations, installations, public services, various reports and deliverances on matters of current importance, and tedious trials, some of which aroused animosities and required Synodical review and overruling.

The first narrative of religion, under date of February 3d, 1820, deploras the destitution of the stated ministration of the Word in many of the congregations, and the neglect, in places, of the catechetical instruction of the young people, but makes grateful mention of such cheering tokens as the better observance of the Lord's day, the establishment of Sabbath schools, a growing attachment to Presbyterian Standards, the starting of the streams of beneficence, and a general religious advance.

At a meeting held in Batavia, July 6th, 1820, this Presbytery chose three commissioners, who, with like representatives from other Presbyteries, formed a Board of Commissioners for establishing the Theological Seminary at Auburn, N. Y.

In 1821 the Synod of Geneva was divided by act of the General Assembly, and the Synod of Genesee was erected, to which the Presbytery of Genesee was naturally assigned.

From the first, and continually, this Presbytery testified, in no doubtful terms and by practical measures, against Sabbath breaking, Intemperance, Slavery, Free Masonry, theatre-going, dancing and kindred forms of worldly conformity, and in favor of revivals, family worship, foreign missions, the monthly concert, presbyterial order and the freedom of the slave. As the years went on churches multiplied and the work of the Presbytery increased.

From time to time, it would seem that the prevailing type of the body varied, undergoing some change with the retirement of important members and trusted leaders, and the accession of constituents of another class; so that Presbytery was constrained to take a decided stand for sound doctrine and order. In 1831 it put on record its testimony against laxity in faith and practice, and began more carefully to examine applicants for membership. The decade from 1830 to 1840 was a period of ingathering, yet it was a time of trouble and strife. Presbytery had, in rapid succession, several distracting trials, and was, at times, betrayed into irregularities. In the main this Presbytery was made up of intelligent, devoted men, anxious to fulfill their high calling, sift out what was wrong in belief and methods, and push on the work of the Church with vigor.

At the division of 1857-8 this Presbytery belonged to the excised Synod of Genesee; and this relation was continued by a large majority, though throughout the Presbytery and the Synod there was an influential minority of ministers and churches that adhered to the General Assembly, and so felt constrained to withdraw from their late Presbyterial and Synodical relations. These stormy years left their impress upon the Presbytery of Genesee for a long while. Recognizing the new Assembly, this Presbytery continued to lift up its voice for the Standards and for the legitimate work of the Church. When the two branches of the Presbyterian Church began to gravitate towards union, that consummation was heartily and unanimously welcomed and aided by the Presbytery of Genesee.

In the reconstruction of 1870 the Synod of Western New York combined all the Presbyterian ministers and churches in the two counties of Genesee and Wyoming, and so formed the new Presbytery of Genesee. And the wisdom of this reunion has appeared in the unbroken harmony and prosperity that have since prevailed. Churches have grown, been revived and become more homogeneous, pastorates have increased, Sabbath schools prospered, and the stream of systematic beneficence been steadily enlarged.

The Presbytery of Genesee now has a roll of twenty-four ministers and twenty-three churches.

Presbytery of New Brunswick, N. J. The following comparison, made a few years since, of some of the principal churches within the bounds of this Presbytery more than fourscore years ago with what those same churches, within the same Presbytery at this time, or in some other, were then, will show what advance in numerical strength has been made during that period:—

At the beginning of this century Dr. Samuel S. Smith was pastor of the Princeton Church, as well as President of the College. That church then had but sixty-five communicants, whereas, there are now connected with our Church in that town seven hundred and twenty-nine.

Freehold, now the Tennent Church, which has always been comparatively flourishing since the days of the Tenments, then had two hundred and thirty-two members, whereas, that and the other Presbyterian churches in the territory once covered by the Tennent Church, have eight hundred and thirty-two members.

Trenton City and Maidenhead, now Lawrenceville, were a united charge under the pastoral care of the Rev. James T. Armstrong, and had but seventy-two communicants. Now the Trenton churches, together with that of Lawrenceville, have sixteen hundred and twenty eight.

Trenton First Church, as the Ewing Church was called, till within the last few years was united with Pennington, and under the pastoral care of the Rev. Joseph Rue. The year before the time we contemplate, this united charge had reported only sixty-eight communicants, but a glorious revival had added one hundred to that number, so that the two had one hundred and sixty-eight communicants. Now they have five hundred and eighty-six.

Joseph Clark was then pastor of our Church in New Brunswick, and reported only seventy-five members. Now our two churches in that city report five hundred and ninety-two.

Amwell and Flemington, under the pastoral care of Thomas Grant, reported forty-one members. Now the churches occupying the ground once covered by that united charge report eight hundred and thirty-two. We are not sure but more Presbyterian churches ought to be included within the bounds of what was once that united charge.

Allentown and Hamilton Square, as it is now called, under the pastoral care of the Rev. John Cornell, reported but seventy-six members. Now those two churches, and others that have gone out mainly from Allentown, report five hundred and fifty-seven.

To mention but one other church, to illustrate the point we have in view, Cranbury then had but one hundred and eighty-nine members. Now the Cranbury churches, and those that have largely gone out from them, report twelve hundred and seventy-one.

And so we might go on and speak of the other churches in connection with the Presbytery of New Brunswick at the beginning of the present century; but enough to show, if we may take these churches as a specimen of the whole, the absolute increase between that time and the present.

It will be seen that we have taken churches that were, and still are, strictly in the country, as well as those around which towns and cities have grown up, and these give us seven thousand and twenty-seven communicants, in the place of nine hundred and eighteen which were reported eighty odd years ago. In other words, we number more than seven and six-tenths as many members now as we did then. It only remains to be seen whether our population has increased in the same ratio. If it has, we have only held our own. We have not even done that if our population has increased more rapidly in proportion than the number of our church members.

What, then, are the facts with reference to our population? We have no data by which we can tell, to a certainty, what was the exact number of people in many of these widely scattered parishes, or what it is now; but, taking these parishes as a fair representation of the State, it is not difficult to ascertain the rate at which our population has increased.

In the year 1800, New Jersey had a population of two hundred and eleven thousand nine hundred and forty-nine. In 1880, she had one million one hundred and thirty-one thousand one hundred and sixteen, or less than five and four-tenths times as many as she had fourscore years earlier.

It will thus be seen that our branch of the Church has not only gained absolutely with great rapidity in the parts of the State contemplated, but relatively it has increased much more rapidly than our population has. The same is probably true throughout the entire State, in which, as late as the year 1810, we find but forty-three Presbyterian pastors and eleven vacant churches.

Presbytery of Redstone. From 1710 to 1760 there were great revivals in different parts of the old thirteen Colonies which then comprised this country. In these, Whitefield, the Tennents, the Blairs, and many other godly and able ministers of the gospel labored earnestly and actively. These outpourings of the Holy Spirit prepared the people who were about to remove from the old settlements to the frontiers in the West and Southwest for carrying the Church and its institutions with them, and were the means of raising up devoted ministers of the gospel to accompany them. A steady movement of population from Virginia and the Carolinas into what afterwards became the States of Kentucky and Tennessee began, and continued for many years. But that portion of the great Valley of the Mississippi in which the Indians first gave place to the Anglo-Saxon race was western Pennsylvania. After the treaty of peace at the close of the Seven Years' war, signed at Fontainebleau, November 3d, 1762, great numbers of people from eastern Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, Scotland, and the north of Ireland, turned their attention to the district now comprised within the counties of Westmoreland, Washington, Greene, Fayette, Allegheny and Indiana. And within the ensuing fifteen years extensive settlements were formed. Many of these immigrants had been reared in the Presbyterian Church; not a few of them were from the midst of precious revivals, and some of them were eminent as Christians. Consequently, they at once desired to have the Church and its ordinances; and ministers of superior character soon began to preach the gospel to them, to visit from house to house, and to share in all the hardships and dangers incident to the times in that exposed region.

But it was not until 1781 that a Presbytery was organized. "At a meeting of the Synod of New York and Philadelphia, held on the 16th of May, 1781, the Rev. Messrs. Joseph Smith, John McMillan, James Power and Thaddens Dold, having requested to be erected into a separate Presbytery, to be known by the name of the Presbytery of Redstone, the Synod granted their request, and appointed their first meeting to be held at Laurel Hill, the third Wednesday of September next, at 11 o'clock A. M." The name "Redstone" seems to have been adopted from the fact that "Redstone Settlement" then, and for many years afterwards, was used to designate most of the country west of the Alleghenies, whether claimed by Pennsylvania or Virginia. The "settlement" derived its name from Redstone creek, which enters the Monongahela river, below Brownsville, near where "Redstone Old Fort" stood, and the application of this name is thus explained in the "American Pioneer," vol. ii, p. 55: "The hills around abounded with bituminous coal, and along the water-courses, where the earth had been washed off, the coal was left exposed. The inflammability of that mineral must have been known to the inhabitants at that early period, for, when those exposures happened, fire had been communicated, and an ignition of the coal taken place, and probably continued to burn until the compactness and solidity of the body, and want of air, caused its extinguishment. These fires, in their course, came in contact with the surrounding earth and stone, and gave them a red appearance; indeed, so completely burned were they, that when pulverized they have been substituted for Spanish brown in painting. Many of the red banks are now visible; the most prominent one, perhaps, is that near the junction of a creek with the Monongahela river, a short distance below the fortification, and which bears the name of Kobston— doubtless from the red appearance of the stone near its mouth."

On Wednesday, September 19th, 1781, the Presbytery of Redstone, according to the appointment of Synod, met at Pigeon Creek, one of the oldest congregations in Washington county, as the circumstances of some of the members, by reason of the incursions of the savages, rendered it impracticable for them to attend at Laurel Hill. Ubi post preces sederunt, the Rev. Messrs. John McMillan, James Power and Thaddeus Dodd; Elders John Neil, Demas Lindley and Patrick Scott. Absent, the Rev. Joseph Smith.

"The time at which the Presbytery was organized, was in the closing year of the Revolution—but a month before the surrender at Yorktown. It was the period of the nation's genesis. The Articles of Confederation had been adopted only in the preceding Spring. The anomalous regime of the Continental Congress was merging into the scarce less anomalous regime of the Confederation. The chaos of the former commingled with the chaos of the latter. It was accordingly an era of uncertainty, distrust, financial disorder. Currency was depreciated as never before or since. Travelers carried their money in saddlebags instead of pocket-books. According to a statute of the Ohio county court, in 1780, a traveler stopping at an ordinary paid for his dinner $6, for a gallon of corn $5, for lodging, with clean sheets, $3, for a half-pint of whisky $6, and if it had sugar in it, $2 extra. It was also the period of inter-State conflict. The settlement of the boundary controversy in this region, though arranged for, was not yet consummated. Men were still wondering whether they were Virginians or Pennsylvanians. West Pennsylvania was still practically a province, called so in the deeds, though East Pennsylvania was a State. It was also the period of county organization. Virginia's threefold partition held with respect to Monongalia and Ohio, but Youghiogania had died an infant of days. Under Pennsylvania, Westmoreland had been erected in '73, Washington in '81. Not until afterward was Fayette erected, in '84, Allegheny in '88, and Greene in '96. It was also, to some extent, the period of warfare with the Indians. Though the seat of this Synod, west of the Ohio, there was still exposure to depredation and massacre. Hence the change in the place of the meeting of Presbytery, already noted. The ministers and elders living most westward were not willing to go so far from their homes, exposed as they were. The same cause hindered a meeting at Sewickley the Spring following. In May, '82, the frightful murder of the Corbley family, on Whitedy creek, took place; and in July, '82, the burning of Hannas town followed." For the organization of this Presbytery see Presbyterianism in Pennsylvania.

Prestly, Rev. William H., was born in Pittsburgh, Pa., and is of Irish parentage. He was educated at Western Pennsylvania University, Pittsburgh, Pa.; at Woodward College, Cincinnati, O., and at Miami University, Oxford, O.; graduating at the last named Institution in 1852; studied theology at the Western Theological Seminary, Oxford, Ohio; was licensed by the First Presbytery of Ohio, in connection with the Associate Reformed Presbyterian Church; and ordained by the Presbytery of Big Spring, of the same Church, in 1855, while supplying the Church at Pottsville, Pa; was installed pastor of the Associate Reformed Presbyterian Church, Chillicothe, O., November, 1856. In 1869, this church, pastor and people, unanimously united with the Presbytery of Chillicothe, O. S. After a pastorate of eighteen and a half years he accepted a call to the Church at Tuscola, Ill., and was installed pastor, February, 1875. In September, 1876, he was called to his present charge, Decatur, Ill. Mr. Prestly is a forcible and faithful preacher, diligent in pastoral duty, and the divine blessing has accompanied his ministry in his several fields of labor.

Preston, Rev. Charles Finney, was one of the Church's noble and devoted missionaries. He was born at Antwerp, N. Y., July 26th, 1829. He graduated at Union College in 1850, and at Princeton Seminary in 1853. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Albany, June 15th, 1853, and was ordained as an evangelist by the same Presbytery, November 14th, 1853. Having been commissioned by the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions as a missionary to China, he sailed from New York, in company with Dr. J. G. Kerr and his wife, November 28th, 1853, and landed in Hong Kong, May 12th, 1854. He immediately went to Canton and began the study of the Chinese language. In October, 1856, war broke out between England and China, at Canton, and Mr. Preston, with the other missionaries, took refuge at Macao, where they remained until November, 1858.

During this time Mr. Preston began to preach in the Chinese tongue, and on his return to Canton he entered with zeal upon his life work—preaching the gospel to the heathen of the great city of Canton. In order to reach as many people as possible, after much difficulty in securing a lot, he built a chapel on one of the great thoroughfares of the city, raising the money by personal efforts from English, American and Chinese friends, and contributing liberally to it from his own funds. This chapel was dedicated in December, 1862, and from that day until his last illness, it was his daily work to preach to the crowds who turned in from the busy street to hear him. The street on which the chapel was built was much frequented by literary men and merchants from all parts of the province of Canton, and there was no other place in the city where so many educated and intelligent persons heard the gospel. But Mr. Preston's popularity as a preacher and the excellent situation of the chapel drew large numbers of all classes. He probably proclaimed the gospel to a larger number of heathen than any other missionary in China.

In 1872 the Second Presbyterian (native) Church of Canton was organized, and Mr. Preston became at once its stated supply, which position he held until his death. For many years he also preached regularly in the chapel of the Medical Missionary Society's Hospital, which adjoined his residence. He expended much literary labor upon the translation of the New Testament into the Canton vernacular; he prepared a hymn-book in Chinese, and wrote many valuable articles and treatises, besides giving theological instruction to young men employed as native evangelists.

Mr. Preston's life was a wonderfully busy and useful one. But it was too busy to last long without rest. After numerous impressive warnings of this fact, he at last was engaged in making arrangements to bring his family to the United States, in the midst of which his strength rapidly failed, and he died at Hong Kong, July 17th, 1877, aged 48 years.

Mr. Preston was a genial and kind man, happy in his work, earnest and diligent in study, having extraordinary facility and accuracy in speaking the Chinese language, zealous, prayerful, devoted. His name will always have a high place among those who are planting pure Christianity in the populous empire of China.

Preston, John, is a name intimately and honorably identified with "Tinkling Spring Church," Virginia (see the sketch). Mr. Preston was a ship-master in Dublin. He was not successful in his business in Ireland, particularly on account of his religious opinions. With Colonel James Patton, a man of property, the commander and owner of a merchant ship (whose sister he married), he came from Donegal to Virginia, and resided for a time at Spring Hill, afterwards occupied by Dr. Waddell. About the year 1743 he purchased and occupied a tract near Staunton, some years since occupied by General Baldwin. Here he soon died, leaving a widow and five children, all born in Ireland but one. His eldest daughter married Robert Breckenridge, of Botetourt, the grandfather of those ministers, Robert, John, and William, whose acts have been inwoven with the history of the Presbyterian Church since about 1830. The second married Rev. John Brown, pastor of New Providence and Timber Ridge, whose descendants have been famous in Kentucky. The third child, William, was the father of a numerous family, male and female, that have not been unknown in Virginia. The fourth married Francis Smith, and the fifth John Howard, and their descendants are numerous in Kentucky and the southwestern States.

Devoutly attached to the Presbyterian Church, famed for its vigorous contests for liberty in Scotland and Ireland, and America, a firm believer in the Calvinistic creed, long and well tried as the creed to bear up men in great emergencies, conscientious in his personal religion, estimating the gospel and its advantages to man, a mortal and immortal creature, as beyond all price, devoutly thanking God, before his death, that an orthodox minister was connected with his family; the pastor of a congregation in the wilderness, though cut off in a few years, he impressed a character that has been handed down from generation to generation, by his descendants, for a century and nearly a half, that speaks, beyond all argumentation or praise, the value of the principles on which the early settlers of the Valley built up their society. The traces of the labors of his son-in-law, the first minister of New Providence, remain until this day; and among his descendants may be found persons in all the varied stations of honest and honorable society, the mountain farmer, the minister of the gospel, the lawyer, the Governor.

On a monument in Tinkling Spring burying-ground is the following inscription (north side): "This monument is erected by the members of the Preston family, in the year of our Lord 1855 (west side), To commemorate the virtues of John Preston, who was buried here in the year 1747 (south side), To attest the filial piety of his descendants in the third and fourth generations, of many names, and scattered through many States (east side), And, more than all, to record the faithfulness and mercy of God to the seed of the righteous."

Prime, Rev. Ebenezer, was born July 21st, O. S., 1700, and graduated at Yale College in 1718. The next year he was preaching at Huntington, L. I., as an assistant to the pastor, Rev. Eliphalet Jones. Four years afterwards he was ordained as colleague of Mr. Jones, who continued as pastor till June 5th, 1731, when he died, in the 91st year of his age. Mr. Prime continued to be the pastor of the church until his death, September 25th, 1779, in the 80th year of his age. He was eminently devotional in his spirit, earnest and successful in his work. He and his people greatly enjoyed the revivals which took place in his day, especially that in 1711. Several of his discourses were published, and are preserved by his descendants. He wrote four thousand sermons with his own hand. One of his published discourses was addressed to the soldiers about to leave to participate in the French war; and it was delivered May 7th, 1759.

Prime, Edward Dorr Griffin, D. D., was born at Cambridge, N. Y., November 2d, 1811. He graduated at Union College, in 1832, and at Princeton Seminary, in 1838, and was pastor of a Presbyterian church at Scotchtown, N. Y., from 1839 to 1851. He became associate editor of the New York Observer in 1853; was foreign correspondent of the same and chaplain at Rome in 1851-5; resumed his editorship in 1855, and became one of the proprietors in 1865. In 1866-70 he visited California, Japan, China, India, Egypt and the Holy Land, and on his return published "Around the World; Sketches of Travel Through Many Lands and Over Many Seas." He has also written "Forty Years in the Turkish Empire; or, Memoirs of Rev. William Goodell, D. D., Missionary of the A. B. C. F. M.," 1875. He received the degree of D. D. from Jefferson College.

Prime, Nathanael Scudder, D. D., grandson of Ebenezer Prime, was born in Huntington, L. I., April 21st, 1785. He graduated at Princeton College in 1804, and October 10th, 1805, he was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Long Island. Having labored with great usefulness and success at Sag Harbor, he preached for some time at Fresh Pond and Smithtown. In 1812 he removed to the Northern part of New York, and preaching for a few months at Milton, he was called, in 1813, to the Presbyterian Church in Cambridge, Washington county. His pastorate of seventeen years was signalized by his powerful influence through the whole region, in the several departments of learning, benevolence and religion. He was Principal of the Academy in that place, and in 1830 removed to Sing Sing, N. Y., where he preached two years, and was Principal also of the Academy and Female Seminary. In 1835 he established a Female Seminary in Newburgh, N. Y., where he resided eight years. He was not settled in the ministry again, but being a powerful preacher his services were in great demand, and he continued to preach until his death at Mamaroneck, N. Y., March 27th, 1856. The degree of D. D. was conferred upon him by Princeton College in 1848. Dr. Prime was the author of a work on baptism (1818), and a history of Long Island (1815), and many occasional discourses. So early as 1817 he delivered a sermon before the Presbytery of Long Island, on the evils of Intemperance which was published; one of the earliest Temperance discourses.

Prime, Samuel Irenæus, D. D., son of Nathanael Scudder, was born at Ballston, N. Y., November 4th, 1812; graduated at Williams College in 1829; studied theology at Princeton, and was first settled in the ministry at Ballston Spa, in 1835. In 1837 he went to Matteawan, N. Y., where he was pastor three years, and his health failing, he resigned and became the editor of the New York Observer, in 1840. In 1849 he was Secretary of the American Bible Society, and in 1850 he was one of the editors of the Presbyterian; but he resumed the editorship of the New York Observer, which he has continued ever since. His published works are numerous. Among them are "Travels in Europe and the East" (1855); "Letters from Switzerland" (1860); and "The Alhambra and the Kremlin" (1873). He has also published "The Old White Meeting House; or, Reminiscences of a Country Congregation" (1845); "Life in New York" (1845); "Annals of the English Bible," an abridgment and continuation of the work of Anderson (1849); "Thoughts on the Death of Little Children" (1850); "The Power of Prayer," a sketch of the Fulton street prayer-meeting (1859), translated into several languages, followed by a volume, entitled, "Five Years of Prayer" (1864); and another entitled, "Fifteen Years of Prayer" (1872); "The Bible in the Levant" (1859); "Memoirs of Rev. Nicholas Murray" (1862); "Under the Trees," and "Life of S. F. B. Morse" (1874). He received the degree of D. D. from Hampden-Sidney College, Va. On the 13th day of October, 1883, he preached his semi-centennial sermon in the same place, Bedford, N. Y., where he preached his first sermon in 1833. He is now (1884) the oldest in service of the secular or religious editors in the city of New York. Dr. Prime has often represented the Presbytery of New York in the General Assembly, and has taken a leading part in all the great discussions of the day.

Prime, Rev. Wendell, D. D., son of Samuel Irenæus, was born at Matteawan, N. Y., August 3d, 1837, and was graduated at Columbia College, New York city, in 1856. After studying theology one year at Union Seminary, Virginia, he studied two years and graduated at Princeton Theological Seminary. He was licensed by the Presbytery of New York, in 1860, and ordained pastor of Westminster Church, Detroit, Mich., in the following year. In the year 1866 he resigned his charge and was settled as pastor of Union Church, Newburgh, N. Y., in 1869, where he remained until the close of 1875, when he became associated with his father as one of the editors and proprietors of the New York Observer. He received the degree of D. D. from Union College, N. Y., in the year 1880.

Prime, William Cowper, son of Nathaniel Scudder Prime, was born in Cambridge, N. Y., October 31st, 1825. He graduated at Princeton College in 1843, and studied law in New York, where he entered on its practice. In 1861 he became one of the editors and proprietors of the Journal of Commerce. He has made large attainments in art studies, and is an authority in numismatics and porcelain, on which subjects he has published works which are standard books. He is superintendent of the Art Department in Princeton College.

The Prime family, five of whom have been Presbyterian ministers in five generations, is a striking example of the power of parental example, instruction and fidelity. The son of Ebenezer Prime, the first of the foregoing series, was a physician of great learning, an accomplished author, and a poet of the Revolution; graduated at Princeton College, in 1751; went abroad, and studied medicine in Edinburgh and Paris and took his medical degrees in Leyden University, Holland, in 1761. He practiced in the city of New York and at Huntington, L. I., where he died, October 31st, 1791.

In these five generations there have been about a hundred volumes written in the family and published, all of a useful character, and there has not been in the succession an infidel nor a prodigal.

Princeton College, N. J. Early settlement along the Atlantic coast, from New England to Virginia, was made by well educated people; in the north English Puritans, in the south Episcopalians and Presbyterians from England, Scotland and Ireland, and in the middle English Quakers and Dutch Presbyterians. Among the Puritans were many who preferred the Presbyterian to the Congregational order, and migrating southward, beyond New England jurisdiction, organized their congregations according to that choice. Thus were planted a number of disconnected Presbyterian churches on Long Island and East Jersey, with an increased tendency southward. Among the Presbyterian colonists of Maryland and Delaware, coming directly from Ireland and Scotland, organic union of churches was recognized as desirable, from the first. In their progress northward they met the progress proceeding from the opposite direction in New Jersey, and in 1705 or 1706 formed their first Presbytery, in Philadelphia. Subsequent Presbyterian increase extended chiefly by a broad belt of country from New York, across New Jersey, to Philadelphia and the neighboring south. In 1716 it was found expedient to add to the number of Presbyteries and unite all under the higher judicatory of a Synod. Increase of numbers was greatly accelerated by the revival commenced in 1739 and continued through the next seven years. Of that religious movement the principal scene was central New Jersey, covered by the Presbytery of New Brunswick.

The first ministers of the gospel were educated abroad. But it soon became an urgent concern to have instruction for their successors provided within the colonies. Massachusetts had put her college in operation as early as eighteen years from her own settlement, and Yale College had been constituted for Connecticut in 1701. But those were Congregational, and too far away. The Presbyterians of New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware and Maryland felt the need of a college among themselves. Some of the pastors attempted to supply the lack for the ministry in a temporary way, by conducting classical and theological instruction in their own houses. Of those attempts the most successful was that of the Rev. William Tennent, at Neshaminy, called the Log College. For twenty years, from 1726, that humble enterprise continued to send out zealous and valuable ministers of the gospel, and especially leaders in the revival. But it could not give satisfaction. Measures were proposed in Synod for erecting a fully equipped college, for not only ministerial instruction, but the whole breadth of the public demand. Difficulties lay in the way. The advocates of the Log College opposed what threatened to be a rival, and the Synod, from 1741 to 1745, was agitated by a controversy, dividing it into two. The Synod of Philadelphia set up an academy, and proceeded no further. The Synod of New York did nothing on the subject. In 1746 William Tennent died, and the Log College came to an end. A few members of the Synod of New York, whose pastoral charges were all, except one, in New Jersey, succeeded in obtaining from the colonial Governor and Council a charter, by which the College of New Jersey commenced its existence on the 22d of October, 1746. It was opened in the fourth week of May, 1747, under the presidency of the Rev. Jonathan Dickinson, minister of the First Presbyterian Church at Elizabethtown, and, it is believed, in connection with a school to fit young men for the ministry, already conducted in his own house.*

Thus the Presbyterian College was founded, not by the Presbyterian Church, but simply by four Presbyterian ministers, Jonathan Dickinson, John Pierson, Ebenezer Pemberton and Aaron Burr, who, with eight other gentlemen, were its trustees. Two years afterwards a new charter, with enlarged privileges, was voluntarily granted by Jonathan Belcher. His Majesty's Governor of New Jersey, and passed the great seal of the province on the 11th of September, 1745. All the four ministers concerned in procuring the first charter, with Governor Belcher, who granted the second, were New England men, thus making the Presbyterian Church of America as much indebted, for education, to the English Puritans, as, for organic completeness, to the sons of Scottish Covenanters.

After the Declaration of Independence the grants of the second charter were recognized and confirmed by the Legislature of the State, in an act passed March 13th, 1780.

Mr. Dickinson died on the 7th of October, 1747. The classes were removed to Newark, and the presidential duties devolved upon the Rev. Aaron Burr, minister of the Presbyterian Church in that city, where he had previously conducted a classical school, together with his pastoral work. He was formally inaugurated President at the first Commencement, next year. For that ceremonial, the third Wednesday of May, 1748, had been selected, but to gratify Governor Belcher, who wished to present his improved charter at the same time, it was postponed until the 9th of November. A class of young men, having been so well advanced previously in the schools of Dickinson and Burr, were already prepared to receive their first degree.

Nine years the college remained at Newark. But Princeton had early been selected as the permanent site for it, by Governor Belcher. A large building for the accommodation of students and a house for the President having been erected there, and in habitable condition, by the Autumn of 1756, the President, with his assistants and seventy students proceeded to occupy them. Next year measures were adopted in the two Synods which resulted in the restoration of complete concord, and the college was encouraged with hope in the patronage of a united Church.

At the first Commencement in Princeton, May, 1757, twenty-two young men were prepared to receive their first degree. So far, out of one hundred and fourteen graduates, sixty-two had entered the ministry. That same year Governor Belcher died, on the 31st of August, and President Burr, on the 24th of September, four days before the annual Commencement. After the close of the exercises, September 29th, the Trustees elected to the vacant presidency the Rev. Jonathan Edwards, then minister of the Church at Stockbridge, Massachusetts.

The Grammar School still continued in College by Mr. Burr, aided by two tutors, was retained by order of the Trustees, after his death.

Edwards came to Princeton in January, 1758, and was regularly constituted President, at a meeting of the Trustees, on the 16th of February, when he was also invested with the care of the Grammar School, its masters and ushers, and with a right to the profits accruing from it. The President's salary was to be two hundred pounds a year, with the use of the house, and his firewood from the college grounds. He entered upon his duties with great promise of success. The Senior class were charmed with their new instructor. It was doomed to be only a beginning. Alarmed by prevalence of smallpox in the neighborhood, his physician and friends urged the President to submit to the mitigative of inoculation. The precaution proved unfortunate; and Jonathan Edwards died on the 22d of March, 1758, in the fifty-fifth year of his age. A vacancy then occurred in the presidency, of about a year and four months, supplied by temporary assistants. It was terminated by the election of the Rev. Samuel Davies, of Virginia, who entered upon his duties on the 26th of July, 1759. A preacher of great power and popularity, the new President evinced himself also skillful to govern and a successful instructor. But his term of office was also brief. He died February 4th, 1761, in the thirty-eighth year of his age. Samuel Finley was elected on the 30th of September, the same year, and died on the 17th of July, 1766. Within her first twenty years the college had seen more than half the presidents of her first century.

The next choice was from abroad. When Mr. Davies was in Scotland soliciting contributions for the college, he mentioned in one of his letters a young minister of much promise, by name "Weather- spoon or Witherspoon," whose book, called "Ecclesiastical Characteristics, a Satire upon the Moderates in the Church of Scotland," was creating a sensation. That young minister had now established a reputation broader than the "Characteristics," and at middle age became the sixth President of the College at Princeton. His long term of twenty-four years, from 1768, was crowned with important events, in most of which he took an active part. In the questions of statesmanship whereby the colonies were alienated from the mother country, in the Declaration of Independence, in the deliberations of the Revolutionary Congress, and in those which formed the United States Constitution, he was effectively concerned. The college also passed through the destructive occupation of armies, the derangement and partial suspension of studies during the heat of the war, and the meetings of Congress at the end of it. During the war, the number of students was greatly diminished. In the years 1775 and 1776 the graduating classes numbered each twenty-seven, that of next year only seven, that of 1778 only five, and those of the succeeding three years only six each. With the return of peace the classes successively rose toward the standard of former years, and some, in the last ten years of Dr. Witherspoon, exceeded it. The eminence of her President in public affairs, both ecclesiastical and civil, through all that agitating and momentous epoch, conferred upon the College of New Jersey a character of nationality. A hope of stronger backing was also furnished in the enlargement of the Presbyterian Church, and the crowning of its organization by the General Assembly in 1788.

Dr. Witherspoon died on the 15th of November,

President in that year. Improvement now followed improvement boldly, and yet with prudence, for the only reliance was that the effort would be patronized by the Church and an intelligent public. For the next five and twenty years Drs. Maclean and Carnahan acted, in all college matters, as one man. The originating enterprise of the Vice-President was always respectfully considered and sustained by his superior. And the administration was adorned by the talents of men whom it brought into office. Through the greater part of its first century the College of New Jersey struggled under poverty. Until 1771 its Faculty consisted of only the President and two, sometimes three Tutors. In 1768 a Professor of Theology was appointed and entered upon his duties, but thinking his salary too great a burden upon the funds of the Institution, resigned next year. From 1771, through the Revolutionary war, the President had the assistance of one Professor, and from 1779 to 1783

1794, and on the 6th of May, 1795, Dr. Samuel Stanhope Smith was elected to succeed him. He had been Vice-President several years before. Eight years of depression followed. Application for pecuniary aid was made to the Legislature of the State. A temporary grant was voted, but met with such public disapproval that it has never been repeated. The college, in her poverty, was spared her independence. Nassau Hall was burned in March, 1802. Funds were collected by private donation, whereby the building was restored, and two others were erected for lectures, recitations and library.

Upon the retirement of Dr. Smith, in 1812, Dr. Ashbel Green succeeded, and after ten agitated years resigned, leaving things about as he found them. The first six years of Dr. James Carnahan, who was inaugurated in August, 1823, were years of discouragement. With 1829 a new era in the history of the college began. It was due chiefly to the enterprise of Prof. Maclean, then a young man, made Vice-President in that year. Improvement now followed improvement boldly, and yet with prudence, for the only reliance was that the effort would be patronized by the Church and an intelligent public. For the next five and twenty years Drs. Maclean and Carnahan acted, in all college matters, as one man. The originating enterprise of the Vice-President was always respectfully considered and sustained by his superior. And the administration was adorned by the talents of men whom it brought into office. Through the greater part of its first century the College of New Jersey struggled under poverty. Until 1771 its Faculty consisted of only the President and two, sometimes three Tutors. In 1768 a Professor of Theology was appointed and entered upon his duties, but thinking his salary too great a burden upon the funds of the Institution, resigned next year. From 1771, through the Revolutionary war, the President had the assistance of one Professor, and from 1779 to 1783

of two. But from the latter date, for two years, he had none, and from 1785, for fifteen years, only one. In 1802 a Professor of Ancient Languages was added, next year a Professor of Theology, and in 1804, a Professor of Mathematics and Astronomy. But after 1808 the number of Professors was again reduced to one. From 1813 to 1829 there were only two. In 1830 six departments were added, or separated, and filled with men of mark; two more in 1832; again two in 1831, one in 1846, and two in 1847. By resignation and death, the number at the retirement of Dr. Carnahan, in 1851, was reduced to seven, and until 1869 did not rise to more than eight, with four lecturers. Dr. Maclean was made President in 1854, but enterprise was retarded for a time, by the lack of pecuniary means, a second burning of Nassau Hall, in 1855, and the embarrassment of the civil war.

At the end of fourteen years Dr. Maclean resigned. But other friends of the cause had already appo-bended the demands of the higher education, and resolved that the College of New Jersey should be equipped with the means to supply them. Among the first to step forward in that cause were the Hon. William Henry Green, Chancellor of the State of New Jersey, his brother, John C. Green, and the Governor, Charles S. Olden. For the first time in a career of a hundred and twenty years the college saw money available for the realization of her designs. A man of European reputation was called to the presidency. Dr. McCosh arrived in 1868, and since then there has been no relaxation of effort for the expansion of existing departments and the creating of new.

Theology was taught in the College of New Jersey from the first, as education for the ministry of the Presbyterian Church was the primary motive for its institution. The first Presidents were also Professors of Theology. And the first Professor, in addition to the President, was a Professor of Theology. After his resignation, the duty fell back to the President, latterly sometimes delegated by him to the Vice-President, until after the institution of the Theological Seminary. In 1811, when the Trustees still had in contemplation to procure an endowment for a Professorship of Theology, the General Assembly was agitating the expediency of establishing a separate theological school. On the 25th of June, 1811, through their respective committees, an agreement was entered into between the Trustees and the Assembly, that a Professor of Theology should not be appointed in College, provided that the Seminary, which the Assembly proposed to erect, were permanently established at Princeton. Next year the Seminary went into operation, and the Theological Professorship in College was discontinued.

In secular studies, after the classical literature of the Greek and Latin languages, the highest estimation has always been extended to Mathematics and Natural Philosophy. As early as 1771, when but poorly able to afford it, the College instituted a professorship of that department, which continued to be filled until the expansion of all the departments, after 1829. It was then divided into several professorships, and ultimately, in 1873, gave rise to the School of Science, as a separate institution, additional to the College, under a common government, and co-operative with it. "There are now seven instructors of Natural History, four of Chemistry, three of Engineering, and four of Physical Science." A School of Art has also been lately endowed. A Post-graduate department has been added and largely attended. And a School of Philosophy is in process of construction, to be conducted under three Professors and the general direction of President McCosh.

In voluntary prosecution of literature and general culture, the students early formed themselves into societies. The Well-meaning Club began its history in 1795, and that which took the name of Plain-dealing, in 1796. Subsequently they reorganized under the names of the American Whig and Cliosophic societies, in 1769 and 1770, respectively, under which names they continue to this day.

Organization has also been provided for Christian influence in college. James Brainerd Taylor, of the class of 1826, Peter L. Gulick, and two or three others, instituted the "Philadelphian Society," for mutual spiritual profit. It met once a week, one hour at evening, in the room of some one of the members. An open meeting, to which all their fellow students were invited, or, at least, free to come, was held for prayer and exhortation, every Sunday morning, in the Junior recitation room. Meetings were also appointed, subsequently, for other days in the week, at evening, and in the same place. When the old recitation rooms were abandoned, the Philadelphian Society was assigned to different apartments, according to convenience, until, by the bequest of one of the members, Hamilton Murray, a victim of the Ville de Havre calamity, their present beautiful little Hall was erected, with special adaptation to the purposes of the fraternity.

Princeton's Old Cemetery. In the northern outskirts of the town of Princeton, N. J., not five hundred yards from that time-honored structure, Nassau Hall, is the old cemetery, well known as the "Westminster Abbey of America." There is no display of pomp or show in this time-honored place of the dead. Some who are scarcely known to the world have monuments reared over their graves. But it is noticeable that the greatest men have the humblest graves. Here we find heroes, philosophers and theologians; men who have achieved renown in the nation's history; men who have penetrated the profoundest depths of thought, and sealed the sublimest heights of reason. The storms of more than a century have dimmed and blackened the chiseled marble and nearly obliterated many of the names. Soon the art preservative of all arts will have to point out the last resting place of the illustrious dead. History will never cease to tell its story, though time may dim the crumbling headstone, and forever obliterate the names engraved thereon. As long as America is known in the annals of time, so long will the names of Burr, Edwards, Witherspoon and Stockton, be known and remembered.

Entering the gate from Witherspoon street, and proceeding down the walk a few feet, we come to the grave of John Berrien. The small tablet over this grave is so dingy that the inscription upon it can hardly be read. He was one of the Justices of the Supreme Court of the Province of New Jersey, "who died, much lamented, on the 23d day of April, A. D. 1772, æt. sixty-one years." Passing on down the path we next come to the monument of the Bayard family. In this enclosure are buried Judge Bayard and General George Dashiell Bayard, who died December 14th, 1862. A short distance from the Bayard lot is the Stockton enclosure, which is surrounded by a high hedge of evergreens. On entering this small enclosure we find a dozen or more headstones, most of which are black and dingy with age. Here are buried Richard Stockton, LL. D., his children, his grand and great-grandchildren and other kindred.

THE COLLEGE BURIAL LOT.

Adjoining the Stockton lot is a plot about sixty feet in length and twenty-five in width, enclosed by an iron railing about three feet high. This is the old college burial lot, and here are buried the former Presidents of the College of New Jersey. The graves are nearly uniform, and are each covered with a horizontal tablet resting on six upright posts or slabs of marble. The inscriptions are mostly in Latin, which is indecipherable on some of the tablets. On approaching these lowly graves one would hardly believe that beneath the turf were the mouldering forms of some of the country's wisest and most distinguished sons. Men whose names are written on the magna charta of our liberty, and men who have purchased that liberty with their own blood.

The first grave of the row, beginning from the centre of the cemetery, is that of the older Aaron Burr, who was President of the College of New Jersey in its infant days. He was President for several years, and died at the early age of forty-two. The College is his monument, for no man ever labored more ardently than he in shaping for it the prosperity it now enjoys. The house he built for his residence while President of the College is still standing, and until recently has been the home of his successors. He died September 24th, 1757. He desired an inexpensive funeral, and his lowly grave is a fitting companion with his last wish. On the little blackened tablet which rests over his tomb is a commemorative inscription in Latin, which is scarcely legible.

Next to the grave of President Burr is that of his illustrious father-in-law, Jonathan Edwards, also President of the College and the immediate successor of the preceding. He died, March 22d, 1758, only a few months after his election. The inscription is also in Latin, and is now nearly effaced. The tablet over his grave has been very much disfigured by ruthless relic hunters, who have broken off the corners as relics. Several years ago President Carnahan wrote an eloquent appeal against the desecration of these tombs, and had it framed and placed at the head of one of the mutilated headstones. President Edwards was the great champion of Presbyterianism in his day. He did much to remove the barriers to truth and in gaining a safe footing for philosophic thought. Much of the success of the Presbyterian Church is attributed to his ardent zeal and efforts, and those who cherish its rise and progress must not forget the repose of its founder. If we can trust the records of the past his sleep is but the brilliant morning of which death is the silvery daybreak.

The third grave is that of President Samuel Davies, the successor of President Edwards, who died February 4th, 1761. His grave is like that of his predecessor. The next is the grave of President Finley, who died July 17th, 1796. The fifth grave is that of President Witherspoon, who died November 17th, 1794. He was a signer of the Declaration of Independence and also one of the founders of Presbyterianism in this country. Like the present President, Dr. McCosh, he came from Scotland. The sixth grave is that of President Smith, who died August 26th, 1819. This grave, unlike the rest, has two slabs over it. The upper one is sustained by six marble posts. On the upper one there is an inscription in Latin, to the President, and on the lower one is an inscription to Ann, his wife, daughter of Dr. Witherspoon, who died in 1817, at 69 years. Next to President Smith's grave is that of Walter Minto and his wife Mary. Then comes the tomb of President Green, who died May 19th, 1848. The last in the row is the grave of President Carnahan. The row is now complete, and the future presidents of the time-honored College of New Jersey must seek repose in some other spot.

Leaving what is known as the Old Cemetery, we cross over into the new, where, near the entrance from Wiggins street, in a small enclosure, are the graves of the Alexanders. Here are buried the venerated Dr. Archibald Alexander, and his three sons, Joseph Addison, James Waddell and William C. Alexander. Dr. Archibald Alexander was the first instructor of theology in the Seminary of Princeton. Many, no doubt, will remember his old text-book, Turretin's "Theologia Elenctica," with its "Status Questionis." But the grave that seems to possess a peculiar interest for the visitor is that of Joseph Addison Alexander, who was perhaps the profoundest scholar and one of the greatest philologists of modern times. He was modest and unassuming in life and abhorred any pretensions to ostentation, and in death wished to be remembered as such. The beautiful little snow-white tablet that marks his last resting-place is a fitting monument to the memory of Joseph Addison Alexander. His name holds a sacred place in the annals of Princeton, and his memory is revered by all who knew him. Dr. Charles Hodge, in speaking of the great and good Dr. Samuel Miller, whose mortal remains also slumber in this cemetery, and the two Alexanders, Archibald and Joseph Addison, said: "They are one galaxy. They are like the three stars in the belt of Orion, still shining upon us from on high. Their lustre can never be dimmed by the exhalations of the earth."

Just across the walk from the Alexanders, under a large pine tree, are the graves of the Hodges. Two graves are more noticeable than the others, from having larger monuments than the rest. These are the graves of Charles Hodge and his wife. The marble tablets are as white as snow—fitting emblems of the characters of the departed. The principles of Dr. Hodge's "Systematic Theology" enter largely into Princeton's curriculum. Dr. Charles Hodge has gone to his rest, but as long as Princeton is known in history, and as long as Presbyterianism is known in the Christian Church, so long will his name be known and revered among the generations of mankind.

Princeton Theological Seminary, N. J., the first of all Presbyterian theological schools, was founded by the General Assembly in 1812. The College of New Jersey, in Princeton, had been founded in 1747, as a successor to Tennent's Log College, at Neshaminy, Pa., to prepare a learned ministry for the Presbyterian Church. The presidents of the College or a theological Tutor had trained theological students from the first. And in 1812 the libraries and rooms of the College were freely put at the disposal of the officers and students of the new Seminary.

The Seminary has from the beginning been governed by a Board of Directors consisting of twenty-one Presbyterian ministers and nine elders. These were elected by the General Assembly, one-third of each class every year until 1870, when the Assembly relinquished this election to the Board itself, with power to appoint professors and in all respects govern the Seminary, subject to the veto of the General Assembly itself, in the case of the appointment of an obnoxious professor.

In 1824 the Institution was chartered by the Legislature of New Jersey incorporating a Board of Trustees, twenty-one in number, twelve of whom must be citizens of that State, who are custodians of all the property of the Institution, real and personal, and are empowered to fill up their own vacancies and report annually to the General Assembly. The principal founders of the Seminary were Rev. Drs. Ashbel Green, John B. Roney, James Richards, Samuel Blatchford, Philip Milledoler, John M'Dowel, Samuel Miller and Archibald Alexander.

Rev. Archibald Alexander, D.D., was inaugurated as Professor of Didactic, Polemic and Pastoral Theology, August 12th, 1812, and the Seminary opened with three students. In May, the next year, the number of students increased to fourteen. Rev. Samuel Miller, D.D., pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of the City of New York, was inaugurated as Professor of Ecclesiastical History and Church Government September 29th 1813. These were the first professors of this Seminary, and their eminent talents and sanctified lives have formed the character of this school of the prophets, and determined its after life.

Dr. Archibald Alexander was a laborious and successful scholar; but, above all, he was a simple, childlike Christian, dwelling in the most intimate communion with God. He was a genius rather than a man of talent, though he was both, inasmuch as his eloquence was most singularly natural, and his intuitive knowledge of the human heart, and his power of dealing with individuals, and of holding up a glass to sanctified human nature in all its subtle exercises, has caused him to be called by many, besides Ex-President Theodore Woolsey, "The Shakespeare of the Christian Church." He organized the Seminary, formed its curriculum during its earliest years, and presided over its administration until his decease, October, 1851.

Dr. Miller, equally learned and holy, more graceful and symmetrical, but less original or effective in impressing himself on his pupils than his senior colleague, worked with Dr. Alexander until his death, in January, 1850, in the most beautiful fellowship and harmony of counsel and action. They formed a perfect co-partnership, the more perfect and effective because of the difference of their natural and acquired characteristics.

In 1820 Mr. Charles Hodge was chosen by Dr. Alexander as an Instructor, to act as his assistant in teaching Hebrew. In 1822 Mr. Hodge was installed full professor of "Oriental and Biblical Literature," and in 1840 was, as Dr. Alexander's successor, transferred to the chair of "Exegetical and Didactic Theology." His life as a teacher continued longer than either of his colleagues, fifty-eight years, to his death, in June, 1870, leaving behind it, as his monument, the "Way of Life," his "Commentaries on Romans, Ephesians, and 1st and 2d Corinthians," the Biblical Repository and Princeton Review, of which he was chief editor for forty years, and his "Systematic Theology," in three large volumes.

Dr. Joseph Addison Alexander became Dr. Hodge's Assistant in the Department of Oriental Literature in 1834, and was elected Associate Professor in 1835, was installed in 1838, and became sole professor of the same in 1840, when Dr. Hodge was transferred to the chair of "Didactic Theology." He was a prodigy of encyclopedic learning, of eloquence and of literary skill, the object of his students' enthusiastic admiration, and the glory of his Seminary and of the whole Church.

Drs. John Breckinridge and James W. Alexander were Professors in the Seminary, each for a short period.

As all of these Professors are biographically treated separately, in this Encyclopaedia, the history of the Seminary and the progressive development of its curriculum cannot be set forth to better advantage than by a chronological list of all the Professors to the present time, with the titles of their respective chairs.

during the last ten years was 519. The largest number matriculated in any one year was 36, in 1858, after the great revival of 1857. The other highest numbers were 76 in 1831; 77 in 1832. The present number in the Seminary is 140.

The number of foreign missionaries who have been students in the Seminary appears to be 210, or about 6.10 per cent. of all the matriculants. This is a larger number than has gone forth from any other American Theological Seminary.

The old Seminary building, a well-built and admirable structure, for that age, was finished in 1816. It is of gray sandstone, one hundred and fifty feet long and fifty feet wide, and four stories high. It stands on the eminence upon which the British army formed on the morning of the Battle of Princeton, parallel to and two hundred and twenty-five feet back from the new turnpike opened a few years after the Revolution. A large, square, brick Professor's house, at the eastern end, nearest the village, was built for Dr. Alexander, in 1819, and a precisely similar one was built for Dr. Hodge, in 1821. These continued the only Seminary buildings until the Chapel was erected, in 1833, the first Lenox Library, in 1843, and the Refectory, in 1847. In the meantime all the public offices of the Institution, as well as the lodging and boarding of the students, were accommodated in the old Seminary building, while the number of students fell seldom below one hundred and forty, and at times amounted to one hundred and sixty.

In 1861 "Brown Hall" was built by the munificent generosity of Mrs. George Brown, of Baltimore. It is a dormitory, as long and high and large as the old Seminary, parallel to it, and about one thousand feet southward, and like it, of fine gray sandstone. Stuart Hall was built in 1876, as the gift of Robert L. and Alexander Stuart, of New York city. It is a noble sandstone building of three stories, containing elegant accommodations for class rooms, oratory reading rooms, museum, etc. In 1878 Mr. James Lenox, of New York, crowned his long series of beneficent gifts by the erection of a new and admirably appointed library building, and two new Professors' houses. The Seminary is at present furnished with eight Professors' houses, which in elegance and convenience greatly surpass those provided for Professors in any similar Institution in America. The Seminary now possesses a body of real estate which has cost over $350,000, with an endowment which has become exceedingly deficient for the supply of its annual necessities, through the shrinkage of interest upon its investments since 1874. Its principal bene-

Each Professor at his installation is required solemnly to repeat and to sign a formula declaring that he, in the presence of God, ex animo, adopts the Confession and Catechism of the Presbyterian Church as the confession of his own personal faith, and that he "solemnly promises and engages not to inculcate, teach, or insinuate anything that shall appear to him (me) to contradict or contravene, directly or impliedly, anything taught in said Confession of Faith or Catechism."

The Seminary opened with three students. By the May of next year the number had increased to 11. In the class of 1813-14 there were 18. In the class of 1815-16 there were 23. In the class of 1816-17 there were 27. The grand roll presented in the "General Catalogue" of Princeton Seminary, published 1881, embraces the names of 3461 students, educated in 150 different schools and colleges. Of these, 171 are represented as dead, and 2293 as living. The average number of students matriculated each year throughout the seventy years of the Seminary's history is 49.5. The average number matriculated factors in the past have been James Lenox, Esq., of New York, and the Misses Lenox, John C. Green and Robert L. and Alexander Stuart, of New York; Mrs. George Brown, of Baltimore, and Levi P. Stone, of New Jersey.

The large part of the real estate of the Seminary, given by James Lenox and Robert L. and Alexander Stuart, is guarded from perversion, by stringent conditions and doctrinal definitions. In the case of the gift of the Stuarts the deed provides as follows:—

“Provided always, nevertheless, and upon condition that, if at any time or times, hereafter, the said parties of the second part, or their successors, doctrines are now understood and explained by the aforesaid General Assembly, shall cease to be taught and inculcated in the said Seminary, then, and in either of such cases, the grant and conveyance hereby made shall cease, and become null and void, and the said premises shall therefore revert to the said Robert L. Stuart and Alexander Stuart, their heirs and assigns, as in their first and former estate.”

The library of the Seminary has grown slowly, and is yet very inadequate to the real needs of such an Institution. It embraces about forty thousand volumes and eight thousand pamphlets, collected by shall pass from under the supervision and control of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, in the United States of America, and its successors; and if at any time or times the leading doctrines declared by the Confession of Faith and Catechism of the Presbyterian Church, such as the doctrine of Universal and Total Depravity, the doctrine of Election, the doctrine of the Atonement, the doctrine of the Imputation of Adam's sin to all his posterity, and of the Imputation of Christ's righteousness to all His people for their justification, the doctrine of Human Inability and the doctrine of the Necessity of the Influence of the Holy Spirit in the regeneration, conversion and sanctification of sinners, as these

Rev. William B. Sprague, of Albany, an absolutely unique collection of the contemporaneous sources of history. The whole collection was originally called the Green Library, because of the large contributions made to it at the start by the distinguished founder of the Seminary, Dr. Ashbel Green. Subsequently it has embraced the private collections of Rev. Drs. John Breckinridge, Nesbit, Addison Alexander, and John M. Krebs, of Dr. Collins, and the Alumni and Society of Inquiry libraries, together with a large collection of works on the Baptist controversy, made by Samuel Agnew, Esq., of Philadelphia, presented by his son. Handsome gifts have also been made by James Lenox, R. L. and Alexander Stuart, Levi P. Stone, R. L. Kennedy, William A. Wheelock and others.

The usefulness of this library, alike to Professors and students, has been multiplied many fold by the able, skilled and assiduous services of the present admirably qualified librarian, Rev. William H. Roberts, D.D.

Prioleau, Elias, a French Reformed or Huguenot minister, first pastor of the French Protestant Church in Charleston, S. C., 1686 to 1689. He was a native of Pons, in the province of Saintonge, France, and was the son and grandson of French Protestant pastors. Elias was enrolled as a student of theology in the Academy of Geneva in 1672, and in 1683 succeeded his father in the pastorate in his native town of Pons. Three years later his church was destroyed, its congregation dispersed, and he fled with some of his people to America. Prioleau was a devoted minister of the gospel. He died in 1699, and was buried on his farm, upon Black river, S. C.

Proctor, Rev. John Officer, is a native of Cumberland Valley, Pa. He was born at Carlisle, October 30th, 1818, and graduated at Dickinson College in 1839; ordained an evangelist by the Presbytery of Carlisle, May 29th, 1841; he was stated supply at Williamsport and Hancock, Md., 1843-53; pastor at Gerrardstown and Tuscarora, Va., 1853-61; pastor at Dillsburg and Petersburg, Pa., 1862-65; stated supply at Buck Creek, 1865-66; pastor at Lexington and Belleville, O., 1866-73; stated supply at Belleville and Utica, 1873-75; at Pike-ton, 1876-77; and at Chippewa. Since 1878 he has resided at Wooster, O., in the capacity of an evangelist. He is an humble, good man, diligent in doing good, faithful in his ministry, and esteemed by his brethren.

Progress of Christianity. Every reader of the New Testament knows that at the ascension of Christ his followers numbered, at most, only a few hundreds. At the end of the first century nominal Christians were estimated at only 500,000; at the end of the seventh century, at 25,000,000; at the end of the fourteenth century, at 80,000,000; at the end of the seventeenth century, at 155,000,000; at the end of the eighteenth century at 200,000,000; and in 1880 at 410,000,000. In A. D., 1500, 100,000,000 of people were subject to Christian government; in A. D., 1876, 687,450,000.

In the year 1800, there were in the Evangelical churches of the United States 3030 congregations, 2651 ordained ministers, and 361,872 communicants. In the year 1850 there were 43,072 churches, 25,555 ministers, and 3,529,988 communicants. In the year 1870, 70,148 churches, 47,609 ministers and 6,673,963 communicants. In 1880, 97,090 churches, 69,870 ministers and 10,065,396 communicants. The ratio of the communicants of our Evangelical churches to the entire population of the United States at these different dates was, in 1800, one to every 11.50 inhabitants; in 1850, one to every 6.57 inhabitants; in 1870, one to every 5.78; and in 1880, one to every 5.14 inhabitants. This last, of course, is one communicant to every 2.5 or 3 non-Roman Catholic adult men and women. From 1800 to 1880 the population of the nation increased 9.46 fold; while in the same time the Evangelical communicants increased 27.52 fold. From 1850 to 1880 the population increased 116 per cent., and the Evangelical communicants increased 184 per cent.

In this statement the 6,367,330 Roman Catholics who do not report communicants as distinct from the general mass of adherents, are not included. But they accept and profess the historical truths of Christianity, and express their faith in the Apostles' Creed. They have increased more than four hundred per cent. in the last thirty years. The addition of the Roman Catholics increases the superior ratio of the increase of those who make a personal acknowledgment of the truth of Christianity over that of the general population one hundred per cent.

But what of the denominations which claim to be liberal, and have little or no regard for distinguishing doctrines, and set less value upon supernatural revelation? The Unitarians in 1850 claimed 246 parishes, and in 1880, 335, an increase of only thirty-five per cent. in thirty years, while in the same period the Evangelical churches increased 250 per cent. In 1850 there were 1069 Universalist churches, but only 956 in 1880, showing an actual loss of 113 in thirty years. The number of Christian (Unitarian Baptist) has fallen from 1500 parishes in 1840 to 1200 in 1880.

The helpers to the churches in the work of evangelization—the Sabbath schools, Young Men's Christian Associations, and the Bible and Publication Societies and Boards—must be taken into account. Sunday schools are hardly one hundred years old. In 1830 there were less than 2,000,000 Sunday-school teachers and pupils in the world; in 1880 there were 14,000,000, 8,000,000 in America, and 6,000,000 in Europe. In 1883, there were 248 Young Men's Christian Associations in the world; 840 in North America; 388 in Great Britain and Ireland; 61 in France; 335 in Holland, etc. The vast amount of Christian work done by these is well known. The issues of the Bible and Tract Societies, and the various Boards of Publication are immense. Compared with them the books published in the interest of infidelity and erroneous systems of religion are as nothing. And while religion in colleges has not the prominence desired, yet it is far in advance of former times. Out of 33,000 students in them, there are 9250 professing Christians. In 1813 there were only two or three students in Princeton College who professed to be pious men; in 1883 there are 270, out of a total of 578. In 1795 only four or five students in Yale College were members of the Church; in 1883 there are 290, out of a total of 611. In Williams 147 out of 248; in Andherst, 233 out of 352; and in many other colleges, especially the smaller ones, the proportion is still larger.

The Evangelical churches are extending their limits and making new acquisitions in all directions, with an activity and benevolence which shows their confidence in the success of the gospel of Jesus Christ. The entire sum collected by them in the United States for Home Missions from 1820 to 1829 was $233,826; but from 1860 to 1869 it amounted to $21,015,719; and from 1870 to 1880 to $31,272,154. The work of Foreign Missions is a characteristic enterprise of the present century. Professor Christlieb has estimated that in 1800 the total sum annually contributed in all Christendom to Protestant missions amounted to $250,000. In 1850 the income of the mission Boards in England and America was $2,959,541. In 1872 the amount was $7,874,155. The reports from all the missions cannot be obtained; so that, from the nature of the case, our carefully collected reports fall below and can never equal the real facts of the case. Protestant mission societies in Europe and America reported in A. D. 1830: missions 122; ordained missionaries 656; lay helpers 1236; communicants 70,289; scholars 80,656. In A. D. 1850: Missions 178; ordained missionaries 1672; lay helpers 4056; communicants 210,957; scholars 147,939. In A. D. 1880: Missions 501; ordained missionaries 6696; lay helpers 33,852; communicants 857,332 (148 missions not reporting); scholars 417,602, with hearers and adherents estimated from the actual reports of the missions, amounting to 2,000,000. Thus we see that labors and expenditures in heathen lands have brought large returns.

The facts thus presented are a complete refutation of the assertion that the Evangelical churches are retrograding or even standing still, and a demonstration of the great advances made towards bringing the whole world under the dominion of Christ. But the progress already made should be the strongest inducement for the cultivation of a higher personal piety, greater activity in all Christian work, and an enlarged benevolence. We must not rest satisfied with what has been done; greater conquests are yet to be made. Those who have been predicting the decline of the orthodox Church, or who assert that this has actually taken place, have good reason to hide their faces for shame. "Surely, there is no enchantment against Jacob, neither is there any divination against Israel; according to this time it shall be said of Jacob and of Israel, What hath God wrought!"

Prophecy. Prophecy is not only the predicting of future events; it had the larger office of receiving and communicating generally the will and purposes of God. It was revelation, in fact; the dealing of the Creator with his creatures, disclosing his high pleasure for the interests of truth and righteousness in the government of the world, occupied with both the past and the present, and laying open the future only so far as was required for the accomplishment of its great object. So that we find in Scripture prophecy instructions, warnings, rebukes, as largely as predictions of things to come.

In regard to predictions of future events, there are two particulars which must be noted. They bear a certain relation to the mode in which the images of the future were presented to the prophet's mind, but a more immediate one to the mode in which they were placed on record. Thus, first, the way in which remote events are presented is remarkable. The prophet stands like a watchman on some high hill or lofty tower, scanning the distant horizon, and tells what meets his gaze. To one who so looks out the far and the near lie apparently in contact; the foreground has a distincter outline, and its colors are more vivid; but a multitude of things are blended together, and the haze through which the distant objects are seen obscures their figure and relative proportions. The prophet describing what is so placed before him describes as he sees, and therefore not in historical or chronological order; so that it is hard, before the accomplishment, to distinguish which of the events is near at hand and which more remote. This is called the "perspective" character of prophecy, and illustrates the juxtaposition in the prophetic writings of utterances to be immediately fulfilled with those before the fulfillment of which ages must roll by. An example may be given from Zech. ix. First—the prophet sees the triumphant march of Alexander (1-8); he then beholds Messiah in the distant future (9-10), and afterwards reverts to the age of the Maccabees (11-17). On the same principle our Lord's discourse (Matt. xxiv) may be interpreted; as also those passages in which the apostles seem to describe the final close of all things as to occur in their days.

The other point which was to be noted is the reproduction of past events. There is an organic unity in God's plans, the earlier being the type of the latter, and the latter exhibiting, only with higher combinations and in a more perfect form, that which had appeared before. It was convenient, then, to describe the future in language borrowed from the past. Thus Messiah is said to renew the rule of David; the final triumphs of the Church are colored with the imagery of the fall of Babylon; and the full blessedness of God's people is represented as a return from captivity into the peaceful possession of the land of Canaan. We see here how futile the objection is that the prophet's eye cannot reach to the far-distant future, nor his tongue describe enemies or empires not in his time in existence. He is furnished with the past with an alphabet for the future. And it is not always past events which are so used. Events may have not yet occurred, which, when they do occur, shall be the ground and the type of others similar, yet greater, to occur thereafter. This is what is termed the double sense of prophecy; and it is impossible to shut our eyes to the fact of it. The return of small caravans of exiles from Babylon, under the edicts of the Persian kings, who re-peopled their cities, and rebuilt their temple in fear, vassal to a foreign liege lord, cannot exhaust the magnificent predictions of the ransomed of the Lord coming to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads (Isa. xxxv, 10). There was joy, indeed, when the foundation of the new temple was laid, but there was weeping too (Ezra iii, 11-13); and not then were the walls of restored Jerusalem salvation, nor her gates praise (Isa. lx, 18). The prophecy had an accomplishment in Zerubbabel, but a fuller one in Messiah; and it is traveling onward still, with Messiah's extending kingdom, not to be satisfied till the Redeemer King shall manifestly reign amid the splendors of the New Jerusalem. There is no real ground for objecting to this; for why should not the near event be brought forward as a pledge of what lies far beyond? The principle is admitted in regard to types; for the typical rite had its instruction and its value for those who joined in it, while at the same time it pointed to some greater object; why, then, should it be denied in prophecy? No element of uncertainty is introduced. "The double sense of prophecy," says Mr. Davison, "is of all things the most remote from fraud and equivocation, and has its ground of reason perfectly clear. For what is it? Not the convenient latitude of two unconnected senses, wide of each other and giving room to a fallacious ambiguity; but the combination of two related, analogous and harmonizing, though disparate subjects, each clear and definite in itself; implying a twofold truth in the presence, and creating an aggravated difficulty, and thereby an accumulated proof in the completion. For a case in point, to justify the predictions concerning the kingdom of David in their double force, it must be shown of them, that they hold in each of their relations, and in each were fulfilled. So that the double sense of prophecy in its true idea is a check upon the pretences of vague and unappropriated predictions, rather than a door to admit them. It may be added that it is by no means intended to assert that prophecy has always a double sense. Many predictions, e. g., Mic. v, 2, point to one single event by which alone they are perfectly fulfilled. And in all cases it is wide enough of the cheating ambiguity of heathen responses which were made to answer equally well to two opposite events. The double sense is applicable only where through one event another is foreshadowed; for Scripture has no other meaning in addition to the simple meaning of its words. But yet under this it again has the same, only lying somewhat more deeply imbedded.

That there is great difficulty in the interpretation of prophecy the fact that interpretations are so discordant sufficiently proves. Yet it is not impossible to clear away many difficulties, if we are disposed to use the necessary means. By diligent reading and meditation, comparing Scripture with Scripture, the writings of the Old Testament with those of the New, and pre-eminently by earnest prayer for the guidance of God's Spirit, a great knowledge may be obtained of the meaning and object of prophecy. A complete system of rules cannot here be given; it must suffice to point out some general principles. And if these be thoroughly apprehended the application of them in detail will not be hard. They involve the phrasology, the historical relations, and the doctrinal type of prophecy.

1. It must be the first business to arrive at the just understanding of the words and sentences in which the prophetic declarations are conveyed. In many respects prophecy has a language of its own. Symbolic terms are employed (which must be consistent through the same prophecy); as when a beast denotes a power, and a candlestick a Christian church. These must be carefully noted, that it may be understood whether the expressions are to be construed literally or figuratively. The figurative and, as some would say, hyperbolic character of prophetic speech is not capricious, not just to be ascribed to the east of the Oriental mind, but is definite in its measure, and results from the principles already laid down of prophetic communication by vision, and the clothing of the future in forms taken from the past. And so the past is frequently used in speaking of the future, and described as done when it is to be done, because the prophet looking on with prescient eye beheld it within his horizon. Hence, too, the succession of events in relation to each other, rather than as arranged according to chronological order. Nor must the poetical cast of prophetic diction be overlooked—not poetical simply and altogether; it had too definite a bearing upon the practical life of men, but yet too elevated in thought and tone to sink into bare prose. These various characteristics must be diligently studied and clearly apprehended by him who would interpret prophecy aright. Careful examination, therefore, there should be, the comparison of one part of Scripture with another, the laying over against the prediction of the fulfillment it has received, if it should have already been fulfilled, guided by the declarations of our Lord and his apostles, who pour a flood of light upon the utterances of the ancient seers. And, it may be added here, separate prophecies must as far as possible be accurately distinguished, the ordinary division into chapters occasionally breaking up a single prophecy.

2. The historical relations must also be ascertained; under what circumstances a prophecy was delivered, by whom and on what occasion. The condition of the covenant people among whom the prophet stood, the events on which he was commissioned to speak, the sins he was to reprove, the judgments that were impending, the fears he was to soothe, and the position of surrounding nations whose deeds and whose history had an influence on God's Church and people, should be scrutinized; else an interpreter might readily apply to one time or event the predictions which were clearly directed to another. The historical portions of the Scripture should be paralleled with those that are prophetic.

3. And then there is the doctrinal aspect to be known. This is based on the covenant relationship of God to Israel. Sin is viewed both as treason to a sovereign, and as unfaithfulness to a husband. The desperate guilt of it, and the greatness of the mercy that remits it, are thus most largely illustrated. And prophecy, in accordance with this type, while denouncing sin and predicting judgment, runs on to the fulfillment of the divine purpose, the highest development of the covenant relation, when the faithless spouse, polluted no more, shall be reinstated in the love she had outraged; when the rebellious subjects, disloyalty purged out forever, shall be gathered in peace and prosperity beneath the beneficent sceptre of the universal King.

These observations are but outlines; they may serve, however, to point out the true mode of prophetic interpretation. It is necessary now to direct attention to the accomplishment of prophecy.

To examine this with any fullness would require a far greater space than can be here allowed. For volumes have been filled with the mere list of the predictions which have been accomplished. To such volumes the reader must be directed. And to pick out a few of those on which especially the seal of fact has been placed is to occupy a disadvantageous position. For it is easily forgotten, when particular examples are discussed, and perhaps objections are urged against them, that the subject has really a far wider sweep. The accomplishment of a single prediction may be noteworthy; but it is in its connected chain, it is in its accumulated evidence, that the supernatural character of prophecy is really seen. Particular cases, taken severally, may, if not actually paralleled, be likened to the lucky guesses, the sagacious anticipations, the strange coincidences which from time to time exhibit themselves in history, and which are eagerly laid hold of by those who are glad to produce any show of argument against the authority of the divine Word.

But prophetic evidence "does not," says Dr. Fairbairn, "consist so much in the verifications given to a few remarkable predictions, as in the establishment of an entire series, closely related to each other, and forming an united and comprehensive whole. This is peculiarly the case in respect to the prophecies which relate to the person and kingdom of Messiah, which, more than any others, form a prolonged and connected series." We have trains, therefore, of accomplishment, each valuable in itself, but how much more valuable and weighty when they are found all meeting in one point. Their united force, so brought together, each receiving as it adds, is infinitely greater than the mere sum of so many different unconnected events.

Perhaps it will be best, in the space here allotted, to point out some of those general features which distinguish prophetic accomplishment, leaving it to the reader to examine for himself more minutely the details. Prophecies have been variously classed. The simplest and commonest arrangement is: 1. Those relating to nations in the neighborhood of Israel. 2. Those which respect the Hebrew nation. 3. Those referring to Messiah. 4. Those which predict the destruction of Jerusalem.

I. The nations in contact with Israel, and from time to time their conquerors or oppressors, are threatened. Edom and Tyre and Babylon and Egypt have their future delineated, their fate distinctly announced. Now there is a marvelous diversity perceptible. Sagacious men, looking at the natural causes which tend to the ruin of States, or the local reasons why one should exalt itself above its neighbors, have often been able to anticipate the aggrandizement of the first, the misfortune of the other. But observe the distinguishing peculiarity of Scripture prophecy. Edom should cease to be a people (Ezek. xxv, 12-14; Obad. xviii); Tyre should be brought low, should in a great measure recover, but should ultimately be a mere desolate rock, a place on which fishermen were to spread their nets (Isa. xxiii; Ezek. xxvi, 13, 14); Babylon was to be no more inhabited (Isa. xlii, 19-22); Egypt was to be humbled yet not destroyed; the nation would survive, but be the basest of the kingdoms (Ezek. xxix, 15). Now the course of events has shown the extraordinary truthfulness of these prophecies. The Idumeans literally ceased to be a people; so thoroughly subdued by John Hyrcanus as to be obliged to conform to the law of Moses, and to be, to the entire loss of their nationality, absorbed by the Jews. In this is a more complete fulfillment of prediction than in the desolate ruins of the country which once was theirs—ruins which belonged to a later age. Tyre, again, is little more than a fishing village now; and the plains of Babylonia lie waste, their teeming population gone; while Egypt, still a busy land, has, for two thousand years, lost its independence, and, "a base kingdom," has borne a foreign yoke. Now it may be asked, How could natural sagacity have calculated these results? What quick-sighted eye of man could have foreseen the different fates of Babylonia and of Egypt?—the total subversion in the one case, perpetual depression in the other?

II. The prophecies in regard to the Hebrew nation have the same speciality. It was not extinction as against Babylon that was predicted; it was not subjugation as for Egypt, but a scattering throughout the earth without absorption by the nations among whom they should be mingled; the national existence and identity being still preserved. The predictions of the Pentateuch (Lev. xxvi; Deut. xxvi, xxix), draw the accurate outline of this, to which the declarations of later prophets give additional body and coloring. The fulfillment is a patent fact. "Every attempt," says Dr. Lee (On Miracles; an Examination of the Remarks of Mr. Baulen Powell, etc., p. 42), "to explain it by natural causes has merely served to account for the event itself, but not for its coincidence with what had been foretold many hundred years before." The preternatural character of the fact consists altogether in the correspondence and coincidence between ancient predictions and the present condition of the Jewish people—a condition which one scarcely knows how distinctly to express, but in the words of the prophetic account of it, given, too, by the legislator of the Commonwealth whose dissolution he is directed to foreshow: "Thou shalt become an astonishment, a proverb, and a byword, among all nations, whither the Lord shall lead thee" (Deut. xxviii, 37). Supernatural foresight there must have been, then, in the old prophets. Now let us see its bearing on Christianity.

III. There is the same noticeable peculiarity in the prophetic promise of the Messiah. It is quite different from what natural or national prepossessions would have imagined. We might suppose the dim ideal of a future conqueror and king, with an anticipation that the destiny of Israel would have its highest prosperity under his sway. And prophecy accordingly describes the glories which should encompass One whose throne should be established in righteousness, and whose rule should comprehend the kings of the earth. But along with such a description there runs continually a darker augury; from the very first intimation of a Seed of the woman, the bruising of his heel is prognosticated (Gen. iii, 15), and there is the constant witness to mysterious bloodshedding, and forshadowings of unutterable sorrow to be endured and shame and rejection and death; so that those who most anxiously looked for the fulfillment of the nation's, of the world's hope, were most reluctant to admit that such humiliation could touch the promised One; and even in the anticipation of his reign they had shaped out a far different sovereignty, unconscious of the great principle on which future spiritual glories are delineated in language taken from the earthly fortunes of their royal house. Now here is a whole system of prophetic declaration, foretelling what human thought would have been least likely to conceive, while the fulfillment came in a form so marvelously strange as to contradict all foregone conclusions, and yet so satisfactory as to engage men for the truth of it to resign all they would naturally covet, and seal their belief of it with their blood. The accomplishment of prophecy in the birth, the rejection, the death, the resurrection of Christ, is complete. And, though he did not sway a worldly sceptre, yet his kingdom was not the less real; it was that wondrous rule over the hearts of men, that sovereignty, that more than imperial power, which gathered him a people from every nation of the world. The prophetic description of his kingdom is receiving daily fresh accomplishment; the stone cut out without hands is breaking and subduing other powers; and things are tending to that perfect consummation, when the pride and pomp of earthly kings shall have passed away, and the universe shall become the one wide dominion of the King of kings and Lord of lords.

IV. Our Lord's own prophecy was of the same type. While his enemies were proudly presuming on some worldly, material deliverance, and while his followers expected him to restore the kingdom to Israel, his eye looked sadly on to the time when the holy house of Jerusalem should be desolate (Matt. xxiii, 37, 38; Luke xix, 41–44). "To foresee such results," says Dr. Fairbairn, "results in many respects opposed to the intentions, and the general policy of the Romans, who were the chief instruments in effecting it, and with such a tone of assurance announce them so long before hand, was not to speak in the manner of men; and no one who looks calmly into the circumstances can ever find an explanation that will be satisfactory to his own mind, by the help merely of some unusual degree of shrewdness on the part of Jesus, or of a certain peculiar combination of circumstances in Providence."

The weight of prophecy as an evidence of the truth of the religion of the Bible may be in some degree estimated by what has been said. It stands alone. No other claim to supernatural foreknowledge can be put in comparison with it. And no petty objection to this or that detail, no fancied discovery that here or there fulfillment has not answered to prediction, can be admitted to shake evidence of such a comprehensive character.

It is true that there are prophecies which have not received fulfillment. The prediction uttered by Jonah against Nineveh is an example (Jonah iii). But the explanation is very easy. God has a purpose to perform. And he uses those means which are best adapted to lead to it. For example, He "willeth not the death of a sinner." And it is against men as sinners that his threatenings are directed. So that, if they turn from the error of their way, God's purpose is accomplished, his mercy is exhibited. "If that nation," He distinctly says, "against whom I have pronounced, turn from their evil, I will repent of the evil that I thought to do unto them" (Jer. xviii, 8). This sufficiently vindicates from the charge of changeableness.

Little can here be added. But it is submitted to the candid reader that, after all the deductions which reasonably can be made, after every allowance that can be fairly claimed, prophecy, as exercised among the chosen people and recorded in their sacred books, stands widely distinguished from and far above the pretensions of any ordinary sages. It is a moral wonder that cannot be paralleled elsewhere. It, then, effects have their adequate causes, surely the conclusion to be arrived at here is that "holy men of old spake," not according to their own notions, not as evincing mere human sagacity, but "as they were moved by the Holy Ghost" (2 Pet. i. 21). And we must take this not as an isolated proof that the Bible is from God, but as one among several as weighty departments of evidence, all converging to the same point, to have an adequate notion of the force of proof that is thus supplied.

"Protestant"—Origin of the Term. Luther was ex-communicated by Leo X. and condemned by an edict of the Imperial Diet of Worms, held by the Emperor, Charles V. in 1521, for having written against the abuses and errors of the Roman Church, and especially for publishing his ninety-fifth thesis against the traffic in Papal indulgences, then extensively carried on in Germany by John Tetzel, a Dominican friar.

Frederick the Wise, Elector of Saxony, protected Luther in his struggle with Rome, and at his death, in 1526, his brother, John, "The Constant," engaged still more actively in the cause of the Reformation. A Diet was assembled at Spire, in 1526, for the purpose of imposing a restraint upon the zeal and power of the Reformed Confederacy. But the Diet decided that each Prince should have the liberty to pursue his own course in ecclesiastical matters, until a general council could pronounce upon the existing divisions in the Church. This decree had the effect of giving a new impulse to the Reformation.

At this crisis, Pope Clement VII. and the Emperor resolved to call the famous Diet at Spire, in 1529, at which all the chief Princes and Deputies were present. The combined influence of the Papal and Imperial power succeeded in revoking the decisions of the former Diet of 1526, and in pronouncing unlawful every change in the doctrine or discipline of the Roman Church, until sanctioned by a general council.

The Reformers, indignant at this invasion of their religious liberties, solemnly united in a public protest against the decree of the Diet, on the 19th of April, 1529, at the same time appealing to a general council for the truth of their position. In this protest, six Princes of the Empire united, and the Deputies of fourteen imperial cities and towns. This ever-memorable transaction was the origin of the term Protestant, which is now the badge of the Christian Church, as distinguished from Babylonian Rome. John "The Constant," Elector of Saxony, was the first to sign this protest. The following are the claims contained in the famous protest of the Reformers:—

"LIBERTY OF CONSCIENCE; THE SOVEREIGN POWER OF PRINCES IN PROTECTING THEIR SUBJECTS AGAINST ALL ARBITRARY IMPOSITION IN MATTERS OF FAITH; REPUDIATION OF THE SUPREME AUTHORITY OF THE POPE; AND THE RIGHT TO DECLARE THE HOLY SCRIPTURES TO BE THE ONLY RULE AND SAFE GUIDE OF ALL CHRISTIANS."

For these they appealed to a general council, and to all impartial judges, concluding in the following expressive and appropriate terms:—

"We protest publicly, before God, our only Creator, Preserver, Redeemer and Saviour, who, as the Searcher of all our hearts, judgeth righteously; and we also protest before all the world, that both for ourselves and for all our connexions and subjects, we do not consent to, nor agree with, any resolutions and acts contained in the last decree of Spire above referred to, which, in the great concern of Religion, are contrary to God and to His Holy Word, injurious to our souls' salvation, and also in direct opposition to the dictates of our conscience, as well as to a decree issued by a previous imperial Diet of Spire; and we hereby solemnly declare that, from reasons already assigned, and from other weighty considerations, we regard all such resolutions or acts as null and void."

Thus may the edicts of Rome be ever regarded by Christians and freemen, and Protestantism be perpetuated till Antichrist be no more!

Proudfit, Rev. Alexander, was born in New York city, April 16th, 1839. He graduated at Rutgers College in 1858, and pursued his theological studies at New Brunswick and Princeton seminaries. He was ordained an evangelist by the First Presbytery of New York, September, 1862. His first pastoral charge was Fislerville (Clayton), New Jersey, 1866-78. Since 1878 he has been pastor of the Church at Hackettstown, N. J. He is a successful preacher, and active in every good work. He manifests great interest in the Sabbath-school cause, and is beloved by his brethren and the people among whom he labors.

Pryor, Theodorick, D. D., was born at Annsville, Dinwiddie county, Va., January 9th, 1805, of a worthy ancestry. His early education was prosecuted in an academy in Dinwiddie county, Va. In June, 1823, he entered Hampden-Sidney College, Virginia, and graduated in September, 1826, with the highest grade of distinction. He then entered the University of Virginia, and prosecuted the study of law for a year. After marrying, and spending two years in the practice of law, on the death of his wife he entered Union Theological Seminary, in Virginia, January 9th, 1831, but owing to the illness of Dr. John H. Rice, Professor of Theology, he left in July, and entered the Seminary in Princeton, whence he returned to Union in the Fall of 1831, Dr. George A. Baxter having succeeded, at that time, to the chair of Theology. In April, 1832, he was licensed by the Presbytery of East Hanover, meeting in Portsmouth, Va. He at once entered on his duties as a licentiate, in the county of Nottoway, occupying, till the Fall, the pulpit of the pastor, Rev. Wm. S. White, who had been called to another field of labor. In September, 1832, Rev. Mr. afterwards Dr. White having resigned the charge of the church, Mr. Pryor was called to succeed him, and in November following was duly ordained and installed pastor by East Hanover Presbytery. After serving this church with great acceptance and success till 1853, he accepted a call to the Third Presbyterian Church in Baltimore, and was received on dismission from East Hanover Presbytery and installed pastor in the Fall of that year. He remained, however, only one year, and in September, 1854, to the regret of his charge and his ministerial brethren in Baltimore, he resigned his charge, and returning to Virginia, accepted a call to the Second Church in Petersburg, and was regularly installed pastor, in a few weeks after leaving Baltimore. He continued his labors there till May, 1863, when, at the request of the East Hanover Presbytery he became chaplain in the army of Northern Virginia.

Dr. Pryor's labors in Petersburg had been greatly blessed. On taking charge of the Second Church, he found a small membership and a very thin congregation. The church building was too near that of the long established and flourishing Tabb Street Church. At his suggestion that building was sold and a better site selected on Washington street, where a building costing $30,000 was erected and dedicated, in June, 1861. The roll of communicants had been doubled and the congregation trebled in numbers. For a time he was chaplain. After the war closed he returned as soon as possible to the ordinary work of the ministry, taking charge, for nearly two years, of a small church in Brunswick county, Va. In the Fall of 1867 he accepted a call to his first and tenderly beloved charge, the Church of Nottoway, in which he is still laboring with the assiduity and untiring energy of a man of fifty, instead of seventy-eight. Dr. Pryor has been frequently invited to larger and, on many accounts, far more desirable fields of labor, such as Tinkling Spring, Augusta county; College Church, at Hampden-Sidney, and the Village Church at Charlotte C. H. Besides these in Virginia he has been invited to Hopkinsville, Ky., and Galveston, Texas.

His field of labor in Nottoway has been enlarged by his efforts, two new churches built, one purchased and repaired, and efforts are now in progress towards the erection of another. Five or six hundred persons have been received into the communion of the church under his labors. He has ever been a regular attendant on all ecclesiastical courts, and his participation in their proceedings is always welcomed by his brethren. He preached his semi-centenary sermon last November. During this long and laborious ministry he has, with unwavering fidelity, proclaimed the Calvinism of the Cross. His present ordinary week's work is three or four sermons. His greatest delight is to preach, and with Dr. Payson he can say, "I sometimes weary on, but never weary of the service of the Lord."

Public Worship. This is at once a solemn duty and a precious privilege. Under the former dispensation, all the males of God's chosen people were enjoined "to appear three times in the year before the Lord" (Exod. xxiii, 17). But all their worship of a public nature was not confined to the temple, or to the celebration of the sacred feasts; they had synagogues erected throughout the land, in which they assembled, at least on the Sabbath days, for the service of the Lord (Acts xv, 21). Jesus Christ, while he was on earth, not only went up to Jerusalem at the celebration of the great feasts, but also attended regularly to the service of the synagogue on the Sabbath days (Luke iv, 16). His example lays a strong obligation upon those who profess to be his followers, to be regular and conscientious in their attendance upon the public worship of God. The primitive Christians did not satisfy themselves with worshipping God in secret and in their families, but whenever they had an opportunity they assembled together for public worship (Acts ii, 46). Some of the epistles of Paul are commanded to be read in the churches. The singing of psalms, hymns and spiritual songs is enjoined as an act of solemn worship to the Lord, and Paul cautions the Hebrews that they "forsake not the assembling of themselves together." The practice of the primitive age is also manifest from the epistles of Paul. The Lord's Supper was celebrated by the body of believers collectively, and this apostle prescribes to the Corinthians regulations for the exercise of prayer and prophesyings, "when they come together in the church," the assembly.

Public worship is of great utility. 1. It gives Christians an opportunity of openly professing their faith in and love to Christ. 2. It preserves a sense of religion in the mind, without which society could not well exist. 3. It enlivens devotion and promotes zeal. 4. It is the means of receiving instruction and consolation. God is eminently honored by the social worship of his people, and he delights to honor the ordinances of his public worship by making them means of grace. Most commonly it is by means of these ordinances that sinners are awakened and converted, and that saints are edified and comforted.

Public worship should be. 1. Solemn, not light and trifling (Ps. lxxxix, 7); 2. Simple, not pompous and ceremonial (Isa. lxii, 2); 3. Cheerful, and not with forbidding aspect (Ps. cii); 4. Sincere, and not hypocritical (Isa. i, 12; Matt. xxiii, 13; John iv, 24); 5. Scripturally pure, and not superstitious (Isa. lvii, 15).

Pumry, Rev. Samuel, was born in Northampton, Mass., September 16th, 1687, and graduated at Yale, in 1705. He accepted a call to a congregation in Newtown, on Long Island, in 1708, and was ordained, November 30th, 1709. In 1715 he was received as a member of Presbytery. He died, June 30th, 1744, "leaving his congregation," says the church record, "to bewail an unspeakable loss."

Punishment, Future, of the Finally Impenitent. The Scriptures describe it in forcible language. They speak—and it is to be observed that the words are frequently those of Christ himself—of “everlasting fire,” of “everlasting punishment,” of a worm that “dieth not,” of a fire that “is not quenched” (Matt. xviii, 8; xxv, 41, 46; Mark ix, 43-48; 2 Thess. i, 9; Rev. xiv, 10, 11; xx, 10). The statement, too, that “it had been good for” the traitor “if he had not been born” is difficult enough to reconcile with any notion of the final salvation of all the human race. A great deal of ingenuity has been exercised in the endeavor to explain the expressions just cited as meaning but a long time, some great, indefinite period. But it is replied that the words are the same which describe the happiness of the saved and the misery of the lost. If the one be not endless, why should the other be? And we may go yet higher. If we hence doubt the eternity of punishment, we must beware that we do not also raise a doubt of the eternity of the divine Son of God.

If we are to take the Scripture only as our guide, interpreting its declarations in their obvious sense, we can hardly avoid the conclusion that the punishment of the lost is everlasting, not annihilation—everlasting non-existence is a contradiction in terms—but punishment. And the question will extend further than to men; for the wicked, we are told, are to share the fiery beds of the devil and his angels. The same arguments, too, against the eternal suffering of human beings will apply against the eternal suffering of fallen angels. These arguments are mainly taken from the supposed benevolence of the Deity, incapacitating Him from inflicting an endless penalty on His creatures. But men must take care not to confound benevolence with license, and must not be more concerned for the happiness of sinners than for the righteousness of God. It is maintained that God cannot be pleased with the sufferings of any, and must, therefore, put an end to them; and again, that as He dislikes sin, he will surely not leave any portion of his dominions infected with it. But such arguments appear to go too far. They might be urged against the allowance of any suffering, against the present existence of sin, and it might be asked, “Why does He, the infinitely kind, not spread joy at once into the heart of every sentient creature? Why does not He, the holiest, by the exertion of His infinite power, eradicate every trace of rebellion against His sway?” The question might go higher: “Why did He ever permit sin and suffering to break in upon the universe?” The plain answer is, “We cannot tell.” We can reason upward a few steps; but we must soon stop and confess that God’s ways are higher than our ways, and His thoughts than our thoughts (Isa. lv, 9): “he giveth not account of any of his matters” (Job xxxiii, 13). We are not in a position to judge; we do not see far enough; we cannot account for much of what we do see. And therefore we are bound on such a subject as this simply to receive what God has been pleased to reveal in His Word. And if anything we find there be astonishing to us, it is our wisdom to conclude that the Judge of all the earth will do right, and that every attribute of His glorious being, His holiness, His wisdom, His truth, His mercy, will be exalted to the highest pitch in the sight of all the universe. His very enemies shall acknowledge the righteousness of the hand that subjects them, as well as the saved exult in the love which has redeemed them. On high matters like these we are to be humble.

It is also to be considered that punishment is the natural consequence of sin, and so long as a soul is not purified it must suffer; it cannot behold the favorable countenance of the holy God; it cannot be meet company for the saints made perfect. Before it can pass into heavenly mansions, a vast change must have been wrought. And what should work that change? If the suffering of man were a means of purifying him, why should there have been the precious blood-shedding of the Lord Jesus Christ? Closely is this matter connected with the doctrine of the atonement; and he that imagines that by penal suffering righteousness will be attained, that after this life is ended a hope is still held out for men’s return to God, contradicts most certainly the Scripture warning that after willful sin “there remaineth no more sacrifice for sins” (Heb. x, 26), and devises a fresh state of probation, where opportunity once lost may be regained. Surely, then, so long as God remains changeless in His detestation of evil, so long as the sinner remains unchanged in his state of sin, the sentence must hold, of departure from the Lord’s presence; the ungodly one’s dwelling must be in that outer darkness, between which and the light of everlasting life a gulf is fixed that is impassable (Luke xvi, 26).

Let it not be said that they who so read the Scripture delight in prophesying evil. Gladly would they rather, as knowing the terrors of the Lord, persuade men while yet there is the fullest opportunity, the freest invitation, to flee from the wrath to come. Doubtless, it may be added, the joy of any one’s salvation is enhanced by the thought of what it is from which he is delivered. (Bib. Knowledge.)

Purviance, Rev. George Dugan, was born ———, Md., ———, 1815, and was a son of Judge Purviance, who long was an eminent and honored Judge in Baltimore. He graduated at St. Mary’s College, in 1832, and had his theological training at Princeton Seminary. He was ordained by the Presbytery of Baltimore, in 1839, and was pastor of the Fourth Church of Baltimore, from 1839 to 1855, after which he resided in that city, in infirm health, until his death, April 7th, 1873. Mr. Purviance was a cultivated and genial gentleman. He preached the gospel in its simplicity, and with an evident and earnest desire that it might accomplish its design through his ministry. His Christian character was calm, steady and consistent.

Purviance, James, D. D., was born at Baltimore, Md., February 19th, 1807. He was educated at St. Mary's College, Md., and at the United States Military Academy, West Point. He subsequently studied law, and was admitted to the Bar in Baltimore. Under the ministry of the late Dr. Nevins he underwent that change in his conviction which resulted in his profession of his faith as a Christian, his adoption of the ministry as his calling. He graduated at Princeton Seminary in 1835, and was licensed in the same year by the Presbytery of Baltimore. Choosing the Southwest as his field, he was ordained by the Presbytery of Louisiana in 1836, and for several years supplied the church at Baton Rouge. In 1840 he became pastor of the Carmel Church, in Adams County, Miss., and in 1854 accepted the office of President of Oakland College, to which he had been elected. In this position he distinguished himself by his eminent administrative ability. In 1860, he was compelled, by the severity of chronic disorders, to retire to private life. He made Natchez his home, and engaging as his health allowed, in assisting his daughters in conducting a Female Academy, there tranquilly closed his life, July 14th, 1871.

Dr. Purviance was a thoroughly honorable and upright man, generous in his sentiments, free from guile and intolerant of it in others, a devoted Presbyterian, and a staunch advocate of orthodoxy.

Quarles, Col. James, was an honored elder in Missouri. His was a decided Christian character. Everywhere, and at all times, he stood fearlessly up for his Master. Though his public profession of Christ did not occur until he was in middle life, that event marked a decided period in his career. Every Christian duty was promptly taken up and conscientiously discharged. Henceforth, the morning and evening sacrifice burned upon his family altar. His first connection was with the Boonville Church, and afterwards with the Union Church, in Cooper county, in both of which he was a ruling elder. His favorite sphere of labor was in the Sabbath school, upon which he set a high estimate as an instrumentality for good. Into this work he entered with all the enthusiasm of a naturally ardent and affectionate nature. The churches of Boonville and Union, and the Central Church, of St. Louis, were blessed by his earnest labors, which were always abundant.

The beauty and strength of Col. Quarles' character were augmented by the sacred regard he always maintained for divine institutions. "The law of the Lord" was the supreme rule of his life. With rigid strictness he observed the Lord's day, and required the same of his children and servants. He set his face like a flint against corrupting worldly amusements of every form, and to the cause of Temperance he gave his heart and influence. whatsoever things are true, just, pure and lovely, found in him an open and avowed advocate. He has left the legacy of a devoted and exemplary life. He was born in Virginia, 1809; went to Missouri, 1830; was ordained an elder, 1840; and died, 1871.

Quarles, J. A., D. D., son of Col. James and Mrs. Sarah Quarles, was born near Boonville, Mo., April 30th, 1837. His educational course was pursued first under Prof. F. T. Kemper, of Missouri; then for two years in the University of Virginia; for a similar period in the Seminary at Princeton, and terminated with his graduation at Westminster College, Mo., in 1858. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Missouri, April 9th, 1859, and installed pastor of the Church of Glasgow, February 15th, 1860. After serving this church for seven years, he was called to Lexington, Mo., where he remained nearly eight years, and then took charge of the High Street Church, St. Louis. For the last six years his work has been that of an educator. This work was begun while yet he was at Lexington, and by his election to the Presidency of Elizabeth Aull Female Seminary. It was resumed in 1877, by his re-election to the Presidency of the same Institution, and has been continued to the present time.

As a minister Dr. Quarles is greatly beloved, and has been signally blessed. His labors in all his pastorates were crowned with abundant fruit. His preaching is of that strongly argumentative type, combined at times with earnestness and intensity of appeal, that never fails to stir profoundly. As a scholar, his attainments are varied, though chiefly in the line of metaphysics; as an educator he occupies a high rank; and as an ecclesiastic, few have a more comprehensive grasp of Church law and polity. His latest authorship is the "Life of Professor F. T. Kemper," of Boonville, Mo.

Quarrel, a brawl or contest. Solomon compares him who meddles with the quarrels of people unknown to one who takes a dog by the ears, and so rashly exposes himself to be bitten (Prov. xxvi, 17). If we would honor our God in our Christian path, we must take time, at every step, for prayer, and for the exercise of a sound judgment. Else we shall often rush on, unbidden, to our loss. Many, even with Christian intentions, are too fond of meddling with strife not belonging to them. They constitute themselves too readily judges of their neighbor's conduct. Neutrality is often the plain dictate of prudence. Uncalled for interference seldom avails with the contending parties, while the well-meaning mediator involves himself in the strife to his own mischief. Our blessed Master reads us a lesson of godly wisdom. He healed the contentions in His own family. But when called to meddle with strife belonging not to Him, He gave answer, "Who made me a judge or a divider over you?" (Matt. xviii, 1-6; xx, 24-28, with Luke xii, 13, 14.)

Must we then "suffer sin upon our brother?" (Lev. xix, 17). Certainly not. But we should ponder carefully the most effectual mode of restraining his sin. We do not forget the special "blessing to the peacemakers" (Matt. v, 9). But the true peacemaker, while he deplors the strife, well knows that interference in the moment of irritation will kindle rather than extinguish the fire. Self-control, however, with him is not indifference. He commits the matter to Him whose strength and wisdom he so greatly needs. He will seize the first moment for favorable remonstrance, "and a word spoken in due season, how good is it?" (Prov. xv, 23). Indeed, the common intercourse of life much requires that "wisdom, which dwelleth with prudence" (Prov. viii, 12). "Who is a wise man, and endued with knowledge among you? Let him show, out of a good conversation, his works, with meekness of wisdom" (James iii, 13).

Quay, Rev. Anderson Beaton, was born at Charleston, Pa., May 23d, 1802, and ordained by the Presbytery of New Castle, in October, 1831. He was pastor of the united churches of Monaghan and Petersburg, Pa., 1831-39; of the Church at Beaver, Pa., 1841-44; and of the Church at Indiana, Pa., 1845-51. Subsequently he was agent of the Colonization Society, 1851-56. He died, September 23d, 1858. Mr. Quay was the father of the Hon. M. S. Quay, Secretary of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania under the administration of Governor Hoyt. He was an earnest, impressive, and faithful preacher, and was firm in the discharge of his duties. On one occasion, whilst pastor of Monaghan, an announcement was handed to him in the pulpit for an anti-Temperance meeting, to be held in the church. Mr. Quay read the announcement, but declared "that no such meeting should be held in this church; that if the church were given for such a purpose, he would take his little family by the hand and leave the town." The meeting was held, but held outside of the church, a lawyer from York being employed to speak on the occasion. For the sake of conciliating those in the church who refused to allow any "abridgement of their rights," temperance meetings, too, were held outside of the church, in the graveyard.

Questions in Reading The New Testament.

In the study of the New Testament, and of the gospels especially, we need to inquire and compare. The inspired writings are infinitely rich in truth, and each verse is so connected with the rest that an intelligent inquirer may easily extend his investigations from one passage over the whole of Scripture. Quick, Rev. James, was born at Royal Oak, Mich., August 26th, 1829. He graduated at the University of Michigan in 1854, and studied theology at Union Theological Seminary, New York city, 1854-6, and was ordained April 12th, 1857. He was Home Missionary, Illinois, 1856-7; Missionary at Panditeripo, Jafford, Ceylon, India, 1858-68; W. C., Birmingham, Mich., 1869-71; stated supply at Reading, Mich., 1871-2; stated supply at Blissfield, Mich., 1872-4; and stated supply at Bryan, O., 1874.

Quietness, in a moral sense, is opposed to disorderly motion, to turbulence, to contention, to pragmatical curiosity, to all exorbitant behavior whereby the right of others is infringed, their peace disturbed, their just interest or welfare in any way prejudiced. It is a calm, steady, regular way of proceeding within the bounds and measures prescribed by reason, justice, charity, modesty and sobriety. It is of such importance that we find it enjoined in Scripture, and we are commanded to study and pursue it (W) the greatest diligence and care (1 Thess. iv, 11)

An old and eminent divine justly observes on this subject: 1. That quietness is just and equal. 2. It indicates humility, modesty and sobriety of mind. 3. It is beneficial to the world, preserving the general order of things. 4. It preserves concord and amity. 5. It begets tranquillity and peace. 6. It is a decent and lovely thing, indicating a good disposition, and producing good effects. 7. It adorneth any profession, bringing credit and respect thereto. 8. It is a safe practice, keeping us from needful encumbrances and hazards, whereas, pragmaticalness, interfering with the business and concerns of others, often raises dissensions, involves in guilt, injures others, shows our vanity and pride, and exposes to continual trouble and danger.

Quillin, Rev. Ezekiel, was born in Scott county, Va., May 30th, 1808. He entered the Union Theological Seminary, New York city, in 1831. He was ordained by the Presbytery of Redstone, October, 1838, and was pastor at Clarksburg, Va., 1838-52, stated supply at French Creek, 1852; at Wellsburg, 1852-8; stated supply at Ipava, Ill., 1858, pastor 1869.

Quotations from the New Testament, in the Fathers. We have in the fifth century the writings of Theodoret of Cyprus, in Syria, on the Epistles of Paul, and on most of the Old Testament. Still earlier, Cyril of Alexandria wrote on the Prophets, and on John. In the fourth century Chrysostom wrote commentaries on the whole of the New Testament. To the same century belongs, also, the writings of Gregory of Nyssa. In the second and third centuries we have the writings of Origen and Theophilus, of Antioch; fragments of each remain (though of the second in Latin only), and are often quoted by later writers. In the second century we have the writings, also, of Irenæus, and of Clement of Alexandria. Not less important are the writings of Jerome, who wrote commentaries on Scripture, in the fourth century. To the same century belong, also, the voluminous writings of Augustine.

These are a few only of the authors of the early age of the Christian Church. In not less than one hundred and eighty ecclesiastical writers (whose works are still extant) are quotations from the New Testament introduced; and so numerous are they, that from the works of those who flourished before the seventh century, the whole text of the New Testament (it has justly been said) might have been recovered, even if the originals had since perished. The experiment was tried by Dr. Bentley, and he confirms this statement.

R

Radcliffe, Wallace, D. D., was born in Pittsburg, Pa., August 16th, 1812; graduated at Jefferson College, in 1832, and had his theological training in the United Presbyterian Seminary at Allegheny, and the Seminary at Princeton. He was ordained by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, August 28th, 1836, and was pastor of the Woodland Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, Pa., 1866-70. He was stated supply of the First Church, Reading, Pa., in 1871, and since 1872 has been its pastor, being blessed in his labors among an attached and appreciative people. Dr. Radcliffe is a gentleman of winning address, an excellent preacher, and a faithful Presbyterian. His sermons are prepared with great care, delivered with dignity and solemnity, and are both instructive and impressive. He was chosen by his brethren a Moderator of the Synod of Philadelphia.

Raffensperger, Rev. Edwin Bowman, was born in East Berlin, Pa., January 20th, 1824. He graduated at New Jersey College in 1849, and studied theology at Princeton Seminary. He was ordained by the Presbytery of Sidney, May 4th, 1853; was stated supply at Urbana, O., 1852; pastor 1853-54; pastor at Bellefontaine, 1854-59; pastor of First Church, Toledo, 1859-69; Financial Secretary W. C., 1869-70; pastor of Westminster Church, Cleveland, 1870-73; pastor at Cumberland, Md., 1874-77; and is at present pastor of the Church at Marion, O., which is prospering under his labors. Mr. Raffensperger is an able preacher, a vigorous writer, and has been blessed in his ministry.

Ralston, James Grier, D. D., LL.D., was born in Chester county, Pa., December 28th, 1815; graduated at Washington College, Pa., in 1838, and after studying theology for three years, was licensed by the Presbytery of New Castle, April 14th, 1841. As a licentiate he supplied the church of Florence, Washington county, Pa., in the Summer of 1841, and that of Newark, Del., during the Winter of 1841-2. After leaving Princeton Seminary, he accepted a commission as missionary to the Winnebago Indians, then on their reservation in Wisconsin. Before reaching Pittsburg, he had a violent hemorrhage of the lungs, and was assured by physicians that he could not endure the Winters of Wisconsin. After three subsequent attempts to settle as a pastor, he was also obliged to abandon regular pulpit services. He taught in Florence Academy during the Winter of 1837-8, and was Principal of the Female Seminary at Oxford, Chester county, Pa., from October, 1841, to September, 1845. He was ordained an evangelist by the Presbytery of New Castle, December 17th, 1845; gathered and organized the church at Conshohocken, near Philadelphia, in 1845-6; and founded Oakland Female Institute at Norristown, Pa., October 29th, 1845, continuing at its head until June 16th, 1874, when he closed its doors, being broken down with overwork. Re-recruited, however, by three years rest, he re-opened the Institute, September 11th, 1877, and continued in charge of it until his death. From about 1874 he served for several years as chaplain in the Montgomery County Prison, and by his careful and faithful performance of the duties of that office accomplished great good. For many years he was also an active and useful member of the Presbyterian Board of Publication. He died, strong in the faith and hope of the gospel, November 10th, 1880, in the sixty-fifth year of his age.

Dr. Ralston was a man of great kindness of heart and great generosity of character, and was highly respected and loved by all who knew him. He possessed dignity, energy, and indomitable perseverance. His tastes were literary and scientific, and his attainments, especially in Natural History and Chemistry, were far beyond the ordinary range. In some departments he was a man of extraordinary and widely acknowledged learning. Above all, he was a most diligent and thorough student of the Bible. A great number of young ladies, in successive years, came under his training, and his influence upon them was most decided and salutary.

Ralston, Robert, Esq., first President of the Presbyterian Board of Education, after its organization under the care of the General Assembly, was born at Little Brandywine, Chester county, Pa., in 1761. At an early age he embarked in mercantile pursuits, and by diligence and commercial integrity speedily built up an extensive East India trade, from which, in the course of years, he amassed what was in those days considered a princely fortune. He was for a long time an esteemed ruling elder in the Second Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia. It was largely through his influence and liberality that the Widows' and Orphans' Asylum and the Mariners' Church of Philadelphia were established. He was the father of the Philadelphia Bible Society, the first of the kind on this continent.

His generosity and Christian hospitality largely interested him in the relief of young men preparing for the gospel ministry. Years before there was an organization for concerted aid to worthy, indigent and pious youth, Mr. Ralston operated privately and with a few other individuals, in fostering this commendable beneficence. When the General Assembly's Board of Education was erected out of the previous incoherent elements, he was deeply interested in the transition from voluntary to ecclesiastical control, and was elected the first President of the Board of Education, June 23d, 1819, which office he held until June 23d, 1821.

Dr. Ashbel Green said of him: "His piety was eminent and ardent, yet of the humblest kind that I have ever known; and his liberality in contributing to every pious, charitable and benevolent design has probably, taking his whole life into view, been greater than that of any other man in Philadelphia. He has sometimes been called the Thornton of America. But besides his donations in money, his active personal exertions in promoting all charitable, benevolent and pious undertakings and enterprises has been extraordinary and incessant, probably of more value than all his pecuniary contributions. Take him for all in all, I have often thought and said that he was the best man I have ever known." He died on Thursday morning, August 11th, 1836, in the seventy-fifth year of his age, an eminent philanthropist and a high-toned Christian merchant.

Ralston, Samuel, D.D., was born in Ireland, county of Donegal, 1756. He received the rudiments of a classical education in the neighborhood of his birthplace, completed his studies at the University of Glasgow, and migrated to America in 1794. In 1796 he was called to the pastoral care of the united congregations of Mingo Creek and Williamsport (now Monongahela City, Pa.), where he remained during the residue of his life—pastor of the latter branch thirty-five years, and of the former forty years. He died on the 25th of September, 1851, at the age of ninety-five years. On the day of his death he looked out once more on the visible and militant Church that he had loved so much, and watched with so great solicitude, reading with fresh interest a late number of the Presbyterian. Then, as the struggle came on, he calmly felt his own pulse, found it sinking away, and exclaimed, without faltering or agitation, "I am ready; I am a sinner saved by grace. Tell my brethren, tell the congregation, that I die in the faith I so long preached. I die relying upon the meritorious righteousness of the Lord Jesus Christ. What a blessing to have such a rock!"

The principal productions of Dr. Ralston's pen were, a book on "Baptism," comprising a review of Alexander Campbell's debate with Mr. Walker, and letters in reply to his attack upon this review, a little work of remarkable force and erudition, and "A Brief Examination of the Principal Prophecies of Daniel and John," written at the age of eighty-six, in which there is a display of power to observe and generalize and investigate profoundly, which very few in the vigor of their prime ever attain.

His piety was of a type corresponding with the solid attributes of his understanding. It was remarkably free from irregular impulse and distressing variation. Tender and humble, and self-abasing, it was yet almost uniformly serene and cheerful. Few men exhibit a more delicate and lively appreciation of God's favor in the smallest mercies of his providence or grace. As a preacher, he was eminently didactic and distinctive, clear, copious and profound in the exposition and defence of saving truth. And yet, like every man of truly gifted mind, he was full of strong emotion, which led him to earnest and solemn appeals of a practical kind. He was truly catholic in his feelings, and utterly remote from bigotry and rancor. As an ecclesiastic he was among the most regular and useful members of the Presbytery and the Synod. He possessed pre-eminently that triple element of Christian courage—the spirit of power, and of love, and of a sound mind. Ardent as were his feelings constitutionally, and ready as they were to be zealously affected in every good thing, he was exceedingly discreet, and sober, and well-balanced in his estimation of a popular rage or a fanatical excitement. He was a man whose power was felt wherever he was.

Ralston, Rev. W. W., is the second son of Samuel and Margaret (Buchanan) Ralston. He was born, March 31st, 1835, near Youngstown, Ohio. He was graduated in 1862, at Jefferson College, and in 1865, at the Theological Seminary in Princeton, N. J. In 1864 he was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick. Having received a call, during his last year in the seminary, to the pastorate of the Presbyterian Congregation of Churchville, Md., he was, immediately after the completion of his theological course, ordained and installed in that place, by the Presbytery of Baltimore. During his ministry he has filled the pastorate of the congregation of Churchville, Md., 1865-67; Uniontown, Fayette county, Pa., 1867-72; Xenia, Ohio, 1872-75; Bridgewater, Pa., 1875-83. He is, at the time of the writing of this sketch, pastor of the Church at Hayesville, Ohio.

Mr. Ralston is thorough in his scholarship; clear in his knowledge of the Scriptures in general, and of any particular subject he undertakes to treat; decided in his theological opinions; plain, forcible and earnest in his preaching. He always commands the attention and respect of his hearers. In every congregation that he has served he has left abundant evidence of his fidelity and success as a pastor and preacher.

Ramsey, James Beverlin, D. D., was born near Elkton, Cecil county, Maryland, May 29th, 1814. Though his parents were poor, they were rich in faith. His mother, widowed at an early age, devoted herself to his training when a child, and after his entering the Seminary at Princeton she accompanied him there, and continued to reside with him, the object of his most tender and reverential devotion. By a regular course of three years in the seminary, and then further prosecution of study for a year, he entered the ministry with a most unusually well-cultivated mind. His modesty was only equaled by his humble and devoted piety. He consecrated himself to the work of a missionary among the Indians. Failure of health and prostration of his whole system compelled him to return, and it was only after five years of abstinence from professional duties, part of which he spent in teaching, that he resumed the labors of preaching and settled as pastor of New Monmouth Church, near Lexington, Va. In 1853 he became pastor of the First Church, in Lynchburg. Both in pastoral work and in the duties of the pulpit, he was an example of unremitting diligence and sound, Scriptural teaching. Indeed, he was "mighty in the Scriptures." Growing infirmities compelled him, with the frequently postponed consent of his attached people, to resign his pastoral charge, in April, 1870, after twelve years' eminently successful work. Unwilling to be idle, he took charge of a female school, but his earthly work soon closed. He entered, in peace and joy, on his everlasting rest, July 23d, 1871. The eminent characteristic of his piety was "love to Christ" and gratitude for His mercy to himself a "sinner saved by grace."

Ramsey, Rev. Samuel Graham, of Scotch-Irish ancestry, was a son of Reynolds and Naomi (Alexander) Ramsey, and was born October 20th, 1771, at Marsh Creek, York (now Adams) county, Pa. After completing his collegiate course at Liberty Hall, now Washington College, Va., he studied theology under the Rev. William Graham, and April 20th, 1795, was licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of Lexington. For a short time he traveled in Virginia, and preached in several different churches. He afterwards extended his missionary tour to the "Southwestern Territory," since the State of Tennessee. About 1798 he became pastor of the Grassy Valley congregation, preaching on alternate Sabbaths at Ebenezer and Pleasant Fount. On account of his impaired health, he resigned this charge in 1803. His health having subsequently improved, he preached to the people of Grassy Valley congregation nearly ten years. He died July 6th, 1817. Ebenezer and Pleasant Fount congregations increased and flourished under Mr. Ramsey's ministry. During his engagements with the people of his charge, for a time he preached occasionally to the congregation in Knoxville, and was a great favorite with that people. During the suspension of his ministerial functions at different periods, on account of existing or apprehended hemorrhages, he taught a classical school. Among his scholars were always found some poor and pious young men, who were aiming at the ministry, and who were not only instructed, but boarded in his house gratuitously. As a preacher he was plain, practical, pathetic, instructive and powerfully persuasive.

Ramsey, Rev. William, was born in Lancaster county, Pa., and graduated at Nassau Hall in 1751.

He was licensed by the Association of the Eastern District of Fairfield county, Conn., was received by Abingdon Presbytery, May 11th, 1756, and was ordained and installed at Fairfield, in Cohanzy, December 1st, 1756. He died November 5th, 1771, aged thirty-nine. He lies buried in "the old New Englandtown" graveyard, with this inscription on his tomb: "Beneath this stone lie interred the remains of the Rev. William Ramsey, M. A., for sixteen years a faithful pastor of the Presbyterian Church in this place, whose superior genius and native eloquence shone so conspicuously in the pulpit as to command the attention and gain the esteem of all his hearers. In every situation of life he discharged his duty faithfully. He lived greatly respected, and died universally lamented."

Randolph, Hon. Theodore F., was born in New Brunswick, N. J., June 21th, 1826. He obtained his education at Rutgers College, and afterwards devoted himself to mercantile pursuits, mining, agriculture, etc., in all of which he was eminently successful. He represented his Assembly district in the House, and his county, Middlesex, successively, as Senator, for two terms in the State legislature. In 1868 he was elected Governor of the State, and served the term of three years. On the occasion of a threatened riot in Jersey City, on the anniversary of the battle of the Boync, July, 1871, between rival religious sects, he displayed great firmness, and by his prompt action not only averted a collision, but also vindicated the American right to the largest liberty and expression of opinion. In 1875 he was elected to the United States Senate. Here he served with credit on such committees as mines and mining, to which his large study of the subjects involved and an intimate technical and practical knowledge of the same were made contributory, on military affairs, to which his mind and tastes were somewhat congenial, and on commerce, in which New Jersey is so largely interested. Senator Randolph died November 7th, 1883. For more than thirty years he was a resident of Morristown. He was a consistent member of the Presbyterian Church, and it has been found since his death that he had given away over a tenth of his income in unostentatious charity.

HON. THEODORE F. RANDOLPH.

Rankin, Rev. John, was licensed to preach the gospel in 1775. Supplying, for a time, the churches of Buckingham and Blackwater, Del., yet extending his labors to the vacant churches of Fishing Creek and Vienna, he received from the former a call to settle with them, with which he complied in 1778. For more than twenty years, his ministry was efficient and successful. He had great difficulties to meet. The distractions of the times, political and martial strife, and the sufferings and hardships inflicted by the war, constituted but a portion of his obstacles. Wicked men walked abroad in the unrestrained indulgence of every lust, infidelity was rife, strange sectarists were diffusing their erroneous and even poisonous sentiments over the length and breadth of the Peninsula, and at no time, perhaps, had the prospects of religion been more dark or dubious.

But Mr. Rankin devoted himself to his work, and his labors were not in vain. A well-trained and able theologian, a fervid and zealous preacher, with a ready utterance and a manifest sincerity which commanded confidence, he was attentively listened to wherever he went. Few men have enjoyed greater popularity, and fewer still have turned it to better account. With unremitting energy he visited the waste places, and preached to the destitute wherever he could find them. His own church was remarkably blessed. It was not long before the old frame building in which he entered upon his work had to be pulled down, to accommodate his increasing congregation, and a stately and commodious brick edifice was erected, which, after withstanding the storms of more than seventy winters, was unroofed and dilapidated by the tempest of January, 1857. Mr. Rankin died in 1798, and left behind him a hallowed memory. The obituary record of the Presbytery pronounced that in him "the Church had lost a zealous advocate, the Presbytery a worthy member, and his country a warm patriot."

Rankin, John Chambers, D.D., is a native of the South. He was born May 18th, 1816, near Greensboro, North Carolina. After taking a partial course in the University of North Carolina, at Chapel Hill, he studied theology for three years at Princeton Seminary. Before leaving the Seminary he was accepted as a missionary of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions, but prior to embarking, spent nearly one year in visiting the churches of the West, as an agent. In August, 1840, he sailed for India. After reaching his destination he soon acquired such a knowledge of the native language as to speak and write it with fluency. Besides some minor contributions to the native press, he wrote and published in the Urdu language, in 1845, an extended reply to a learned and formidable Mohammedan book against Christianity, in the meantime teaching and preaching among the heathen with much earnestness and efficiency. In the midst of these labors, after spending five years on the plains of India, his health failed, and he was compelled to resort to the Himalaya Mountains, in the hope of restoration, and finding but little benefit from a residence there of eighteen months, he returned to this country in 1848. In the autumn of 1851 his health was sufficiently restored to justify him in taking a pastoral charge, and in September he was installed over the Church in Baskingridge, N. J., where he is still earnestly and successfully devoted to his work. Dr. Rankin is the author of several interesting articles in the Princeton Review.

Rankin, William, M. D., occupied the position of ruling elder in the Presbyterian Church of Shippensburg, Pa., for many years, and discharged its duties in a most faithful, conscientious and acceptable manner. Often, in visiting his patients, when he found that earthly skill could not avail, he pointed them to the Great Physician, and sought His consoling and sustaining aid in their behalf. Dr. Rankin was born at Potter's Mills, Centre county, Pa., October 9th, 1795. He graduated at Washington College, Pa., in 1814; at the Medical Department of the University of Pennsylvania, in 1819; practiced his profession for two years in Campbellstown, Franklin county, Pa., after which he removed to Shippensburg, where he had an extensive, laborious and successful practice for more than half a century. He died July 15th, 1872.

As a physician, Dr. Rankin occupied a high position. His professional brethren had the highest respect for his skill and attainments. His reputation reached far beyond the wide local range of his ordinary practice. He was generous, sympathizing and eminently pacific in his disposition, and, whilst peculiarly attentive to his own sphere of business, was yet deeply interested in the welfare of his friends and neighbors, and in the prosperity of the community in which he lived. In the tender relations of husband and father he was excelled by none. As a Christian, he was consistent, useful and exemplary. So highly esteemed was he in the town in which he lived that all the places of business were closed whilst his mortal remains were borne to the grave.

Rankin, Rev. William Alexander, was born at Shippensburg, Pa., December 30th, 1829. He graduated at Jefferson College in 1848, studied theology at Princeton Seminary, and was ordained by the Presbytery of Donegal, December 11th, 1851.

He was pastor at Marietta, Pa., 1851-4; pastor elect at Bridesburg, 1854; stated supply at Churchville and Bel Air, Md., 1854-6; stated supply at Middletown, Del., 1856-8; at Hanover Street Church, Wilmington, at Newark and at Warren, Pa., in 1866, becoming pastor at Warren in 1868, and continuing in this relation until 1881. Mr. Rankin is a forcible and faithful preacher, a graceful writer, a good presbyter, and has been blessed in his ministry.

Rapidan Presbyterian Church, Culpeper county, Va. The Church now known by this name, and belonging to the Presbytery of Chesapeake (of the Southern Assembly), was authorized to be organized by the Presbytery of Rappahannock, October 20th, 1867. Up to this date the members of this organization were enrolled with those of Bethesda, the mother church at Culpeper, C. H., now known as the Church at Culpeper. The Rev. I. I. Royall, of blessed memory, residing in the upper part of Fauquier county, preached for several years as stated supply to the congregation located around Culpeper, C. H., and to the congregation which worshipped at a free church on the Cedar Run, in the county of Culpeper. This was the place of worship for this congregation, now comprising members of Rapidan Church, until, through the efforts of Mr. Royall, a house of worship was built on the north side of Rapidan river, in the county of Orange, and which is still standing. In this edifice the Rapidan Church was organized. The Rev. Mr. Royall preached as stated supply to the congregation for several years, riding from his home in Fauquier, a distance of twenty-five miles. A few years before his death, which occurred in 1856, he made an arrangement, by consent of Presbytery, and of the churches interested, with Rev. A. D. Pollock, D.D., of Warrenton, to preach as stated supply to these congregations. Dr. Pollock continued to preach to this church until his health failed, in the Spring of 1872. He was succeeded as stated supply by the Rev. W. W. Reese, who served in this capacity until the Church at Culpeper called for his entire services. Mr. Reese was succeeded by the Rev. Joseph Washburn, now of Savannah, Ga., and he, by the Rev. I. P. Strider, who is now the pastor. The Rev. E. C. Painter, also served the church, very faithfully and acceptably for about a year. This congregation has changed its house of worship to a new edifice, erected at Mitchell's Station, in the county of Culpeper.

Ray, Rev. Edward Chittenden, son of Edward and Hannah (Chittenden) Ray, was born in the city of Rochester, N. Y., October 12th, 1849. He graduated from Hamilton College in 1870. He entered at once upon the study of divinity in Union Theological Seminary, and subsequently pursued his studies at the Seminary at Rochester, finishing his professional education at Auburn Theological Seminary, where he was graduated in 1873. He was ordained June 19th, 1874, by the Presbytery of Utica, and was installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church in that place. In 1876 he became pastor of the Third Presbyterian Church in Elizabeth, N. J., where he remained until June, 1881, when he accepted a call to the First Presbyterian Church of Hyde Park, Illinois, where he now (1883) resides. He was a Commissioner to the General Assembly, in 1880, from the Presbytery of Elizabeth, and in 1883, from the Presbytery of Chicago; and he is a member of the General Assembly's Committee on Systematic Beneficence.

Mr. Ray is one of the promising young men of the time. He is a ready and eloquent speaker. His preaching is earnest and aggressive, characterized by the force and clearness which convince and the warmth and fervor which persuade. He is very much interested in the young, and has strong, practical ideas in relation to the thorough teaching of the Bible as the great hope of the Church. Perhaps, however, his most notable characteristic, as a minister, is his power to organize and set to work, in the interests of the Church, the people of his congregation. The results attending his labors hitherto have been so marked, that even at the opening of his career, it seems not unwarrantable to predict for him a ministry of unusual ability and success.

Ray, James M., elder First Church, Indianapolis, Ind. Was born in Caldwell, N. J., in 1800. When young he came West. In 1818 he was Deputy Clerk in Lawrenceburg, Ind. Subsequently he held the same office in Comersville. Early in 1821 he came to the spot where Indianapolis stands, and was clerk at the first sale of lots. Elected Clerk of Marion county in 1822, he held this office and that of Recorder till he was made Cashier of the State Bank, retaining that position while the bank existed. In all enterprises for the good of the city and State, Mr. Ray was prominent; in locating the Capitol here, building the State House, securing State Institutions for Deaf and Dumb, Blind and Insane, Female Reformatory, Home for Friendless, in starting first railroad, bank, gas company, cemetery, the Benevolent, Temperance, Female Bible Societies, etc. He helped to organize the first Sabbath school in this community, and for more than twenty years was superintendent of the one connected with the First Presbyterian Church. In that church he was an elder for over fifty years active in effort, wise in counsel, and liberal in its support. His love for the church and Sabbath school never abated. He aimed to make the latter a nursery of the church. "He carried the children and youth in his heart." By wise investments he acquired riches, which he used for his Master's cause and the good of others. The needy and suffering never had a warmer friend. "His full heart kept his full hand open." Friends and strangers were welcome to his home. Reverses came and his wealth disappeared, but he murmured not. Rising superior to his losses he kissed the rod that smote him, for it was in the hand of his Father. Not only was he submissive, but cheerful and even joyous in his trials. The promises of God and presence of Christ were his staff. When, through bodily infirmities, active duties were laid aside, he gave the blessings of loving words and fervent prayers. As the eye grew dim and strength failed his faith increased till his departure, February 23d, 1882.

Raymond, Rev. George Lansing, was born in Chicago, Ill., September 3d, 1839; graduated from Williams College in 1862, and studied theology at Auburn and Princeton seminaries. He was ordained and installed pastor at Darby, Pa., by the Third Presbytery of Philadelphia, April 28th, 1870, and continued in this relation, laboring faithfully, until 1874. He was Professor of Oratory in Williams College, 1874-81; and was elected Professor of Rhetoric in Princeton College, 1881. Prof. Raymond has published "Colony Ballads," "Ideals made Real," and "The Orator's Manual."

Rea, John, D.D., the son of Joseph and Isabel Rea, was born in the village of Tully, Ireland, in 1772, and emigrated to the United States when eighteen years of age. He graduated with honor at Jefferson College, when it was only a small school, kept in a log cabin near Canonsburg, Pa.; studied theology under the direction of Dr. John McMillan, and was licensed by Ohio Presbytery, June, 1803. After some three months' itinerating in the wilderness of Eastern Ohio, among Indian camps, he was appointed to supply the newly organized churches of Beechsprings and Crabapple, both, at that time, on the confines of civilization. He was called to these churches in 1805, and installed their pastor by the Presbytery of Ohio. Soon afterwards he found that Beechsprings needed all his labor; and so untiring and devoted was he that, besides constantly ministering to his own large congregation, he found time to be instrumental in raising up some six or seven separate societies, that went out as colonies from the mother church, and are now self-sustaining and prominent congregations.

Dr. Rea died February 12th, 1855, at Union Vale, Ohio, among the people with whom he first settled, greatly and deservedly beloved and esteemed as a citizen, Christian and faithful preacher of "Christ and him crucified." Whatever else he omitted, he never neglected due preparation for the pulpit. His sermons evinced research, invention and original thought. It might be truly said of him that he was everywhere a living example of a Christian minister; he taught both by precept and daily walk.

Read, Charles Henry, D. D., was born in Redding, Conn., November 12th, 1811. He graduated at Yale College in 1832, and for a time was in business in Troy, N. Y. He studied theology at Princeton Seminary, and was ordained by the Fourth Presbytery of New York, December 9th, 1833. From 1833 to 1849 he was pastor of Pearl Street Church, New York city. From that date he has been pastor of the United (Grace) Church, Richmond, Va. Dr. Read is an affable and agreeable gentleman. He is a vigorous writer, and an instructive and impressive preacher. His long pastorate at Richmond furnishes the best evidence that he has those ministerial elements which are adapted to permanence of position and success of labor. He was a member of the Second General Council of the Presbyterian Alliance which met in Philadelphia in 1880, and read an able paper on "Ruling Elders" before that distinguished body.

Read, Thomas, D. D., was born in March, 1746, in the then province of Maryland, but within the present limits of Chester county, Pa. He was educated at the old Academy of Philadelphia, and after graduating there, in 1761, became a Tutor in the Classical Academy of Newark, to the Presidency of which institution he was subsequently chosen. Licensed to preach in 1768, he was a supply for Drawer's Creek Church, in Delaware, of which, in 1772, he was installed pastor, and in which his labors were marked with manifest tokens of the Divine favor. In 1798 he accepted a call to the Second Presbyterian Church, Del., his pastoral relation to which he resigned in 1817, the church having greatly increased in both numbers and moral influence under his ministry. After this, he preached by request, as often as his health permitted, to the First Presbyterian Church in Wilmington, which had long been without a pastor. He died in great peace, June 14th, 1823.

Dr. Read was greatly respected and beloved in the region in which he lived. In the war of the Revolution he showed himself an earnest, active patriot. Early in 1776, he, and forty or fifty others, his neighbors and parishioners, fitted themselves out, shouldered their muskets, and marched to Philadelphia, where their proffered service would have been gladly accepted, had not the success of the American arms at Trenton and Princeton rendered it unnecessary that they should be enrolled.

Dr. Read, as a preacher, was plain, instructive and impressive, making it his object, evidently, not to gain popular applause, but to win souls to Christ. And his every day deportment was a fine illustration of the truths which he preached; his example and his instructions both pointed in the same direction.

Reaser, Joseph George, D. D., was born in Union county, Pa., November 2d, 1825. He graduated with honor, at Jefferson College, in 1848. He taught for a time in Louisville, Ky., at the same time pursuing his theological studies under the direction of the Rev. Drs. James Wool and W. L. Breckenridge. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Coshocton, October 2d, 1850, and installed pastor of the Church of Canfield, Ohio, June 23d, 1852. In 1853 he was appointed to the Chair of "Hebrew and Oriental Biblical Literature" in the new theological seminary at Danville, Ky., which position he occupied with marked ability for four years. He then became President of Harrodsburg Female College for two years. Removing to Leavenworth, Kansas, he established a school, organized a church, and remained its pastor for sixteen years. From Leavenworth he was called to a Professorship in Highland University, thence to St. Louis, where he is now pastor of the Westminster Church.

Dr. Reaser's life has been one of success, whether in church, school, college, or seminary. He is a genial companion, popular as a citizen, and influential in society and among his brethren. His scholarship is varied and symmetrical, and quite extensive in the direction of classical and English literature. As a preacher, he is Scriptural, solid, instructive and logical. His ready utterance and clear judgment make him a valuable member in Church Courts. He has been for years a very acceptable correspondent of several papers. Some of his publications are: "The Children of the Church," "New Testament View," a tract on Infant Baptism, and a "Reply to Bishop Ryan."

Reason, Use of, in Religion. That it is the right and the duty of all men to exercise their reason in inquiries concerning religion, is a truth so manifest, that it may be presumed there are none who will be disposed to call it in question. Without reason there can be no religion; for, in every step which we take, in examining the evidences of revelation, in interpreting its meaning, or in assenting to its doctrines, the exercise of this faculty is indispensable.

At the same time, it is undeniable, that for any one to insist upon a revelation which his reason could fully master in all its elements, which would not only tell us that such and such things are, but also explain how they are, is making an unwarrantable demand. It is nothing less than to declare no revelation to be necessary at all, for if Reason could follow such a revelation, why might she not have risen herself to the same region to which she has shown herself able to follow, and in such a case, which is clearly possible, of course there would be no necessity at all for the revelation, for all the topics on which it could undertake to give light were previously within Reason's reach.

The first use of reason in matters of religion is to examine the evidences of revelation. For, the more entire the submission which we consider as due to every thing that is revealed, we have the more need to be satisfied that any system which professes to be a divine revelation does really come from God.

After the exercise of reason has established in our minds a firm belief that Christianity is of divine origin, the second use of reason is to learn what are the truths revealed. As these truths are not, in our days communicated to any by immediate inspiration, the knowledge of them is to be acquired only from books transmitted to us with satisfying evidence that they were written above eighteen hundred years ago, in a remote country and foreign language, under the direction of the Spirit of God. In order to attain the meaning of these books we must study the languages in which they were written; and we must study also the manners of the times, and the state of the countries, in which the writers lived; because these are circumstances to which an original author is often alluding, and by which his phraseology is generally affected; we must lay together different passages in which the same word or phrase occurs, because without this labor we cannot obtain its precise signification; and we must mark the difference of style and manner which characterizes different writers, because a right apprehension of their meaning often depends upon attention to this difference. All this supposes the application of grammar, history, geography, chronology, and criticism in matters of religion; that is, it supposes that the reason of man had been previously exercised in pursuing these different branches of knowledge, and that our success in attaining the true sense of Scripture depends upon the diligence with which we avail ourselves of the progress that has been made in them. It is obvious that every Christian is not capable of making this application. But this is no argument against the use of reason, of which we are now speaking. For they who use translations and commentaries rely only upon the reason of others, instead of exercising their own. The several branches of knowledge have been applied in every age by some persons, for the benefit of others; and the progress in sacred criticism which distinguishes the present times is nothing else but the continued application, in elucidating the Scripture, of reason enlightened by every kind of subsidiary knowledge, and very much improved in this kind of exercise by the employment which the ancient classics have given it since the revival of letters.

After the two uses of reason that have been illustrated, a third comes to be mentioned, which may be considered as compounded of both. Reason is of eminent use in repelling the attacks of the adversaries of Christianity. When men of erudition, of philosophical acuteness, and of accomplished taste, direct their talents against our religion, the cause is very much hurt by an unskillful defender. He cannot unravel their sophistry; he does not see the amount and the effect of the concessions which he makes to them; he is bewildered by their quotations, and he is often led by their artifice upon dangerous ground. In all ages of the Church there have been weak defenders of Christianity; and the only triumphs of the enemies of our religion have arisen from their being able to expose the defects of those methods of defending the truth which some of its advocates had unwarily chosen. A mind trained to accurate and philosophical views of the nature and the amount of evidence, enriched with historical knowledge, accustomed to throw out of a subject all that is minute and irrelative, to collect what is of importance within a short compass, and to form the comprehension of a whole, is the mind qualified to contend with the learning, the wit, and the sophistry of infidelity.

Many such minds have appeared in this honorable controversy during the course of this and the last century; and the success has corresponded to the completeness of the furniture with which they engaged in the combat. The Christian doctrine has been vindicated by their masterly exposition from various misrepresentations; the arguments for its divine original have been placed in their true light; and the attempts to confound the miracles and prophecies upon which Christianity rests its claim with the delusions of imposture, have been effectually repelled. Christianity has, in this way, received the most important advantages from the attacks of its enemies; and it is not improbable that its doctrines would never have been so thoroughly cleared from all the corruptions and subtleties which had attached to them in the progress of ages, nor the evidences of its truths have been so accurately understood, nor its peculiar character been so perfectly discriminated, had not the zeal and abilities which have been employed against it called forth in its defence some of the most distinguished masters of reason. They brought into the service of Christianity the same weapons which had been drawn for her destruction, and, wielding them with confidence and skill in a good cause, became the successful champions of the truth.

The fourth use of reason consists in judging of the truths of religion. Everything which is revealed by God comes to his creatures from so high an authority that it may be rested in with perfect assurance as true. Nothing can be received by us as true which is contrary to the dictates of reason, because it is impossible for us to receive at the same time the truth and the falsehood of a proposition. But many things are true which we do not fully comprehend; and many propositions which appear incredible when they are first enunciated, are found, upon examination, such as our understandings can readily admit. These principles embrace the whole of the subject, and they mark out the steps by which reason is to proceed in judging of the truths of religion. We first examine the evidences of revelation. If these satisfy our understandings, we are certain that there can be no contradiction between the doctrines of this true religion and the dictates of right reason. If any such contradiction appear, there must be some mistake; by not making a proper use of our reason in the interpretation of the gospel, we suppose that it contains doctrines which it does not teach; or we give the name of right reason to some narrow prejudices which deeper reflection and more enlarged knowledge will dissipate; or we consider a proposition as implying a contradiction, when, in truth, it is only imperfectly understood. Here, as in every other case, mistakes are to be corrected by measuring back our steps. We must examine closely and impartially the meaning of those passages which appear to contain the doctrine; we must compare them with one another; we must endeavor to derive light from the general phraseology of Scripture and the analogy of faith; and we shall generally be able, in this way, to separate the doctrine from all those adventitious circumstances which give it the appearance of absurdity. If a doctrine which, upon the closest examination, appears unquestionably to be taught in Scripture, still does not approve itself to our understanding, we must consider carefully what it is that prevents us from receiving it. There may be preconceived notions hastily taken up which that doctrine opposes; there may be pride of understanding that does not readily submit to the views which it communicates; or reason may need to be reminded that we must expect to find in religion many things which we are not able to comprehend. One of the most important offices of reason is to recognize her own limits. She never can be moved by any authority to receive as true what she perceives to be absurd. But if she has formed a just estimate of human knowledge, she will not shelter her presumption in rejecting the truths of revelation under the pretence of contradictions that do not really exist; she will readily admit that there may be in a subject some points which she knows, and others of which she is ignorant. She will not allow her ignorance of the latter to shake the evidence of the former, but will yield a firm assent to that which she does understand, without presuming to deny what is beyond her comprehension. And thus, availing herself of all the light which she now has, she will wait in humble hope for the time when a larger measure shall be imparted.

Redemption. This word, occurring in the Old Testament, has frequently reference to the buying back of fields, etc., and a kindred word to that is used in Lev. xxv, 24, 51, 52; Jer. xxxii, 7. A different word is employed for the redemption-money (Numb. iii, 49); and for the "redemption," intended figuratively, of Ps. xlix, 8; cxi, 9; cxxx, 7. The original idea there is the cutting loose, and then delivering, ransoming, or redeeming. In the New Testament, lutrosis or apolutrosis, the Greek words rendered "redemption," signify freeing, a ransom price being paid for it. This ransom price (butron) Christ is said to have given; and it was His life (Matt. xx, 28; Mark x, 45). So we are said to have redemption through Christ's blood; and this redemption is described as being the forgiveness of sins (Eph. i, 7; Col. i, 14). The same idea is elsewhere inculcated, as in Rom. iii, 24, 25, where the redemption is from the guilt of sin by the propitiatory sacrifice of Christ's death; compare I Cor. i, 30; Heb. ix, 12, 15.

Redemption is of no incomplete or temporary character; it is, for those who have it, an entire deliverance from the condemnation of the law, from the guilt of sin, and from the power of death. The very body which returns to its dust shall be raised in immortal glory; the full adoption, for which as yet the faithful have to wait, including "the redemption of the body" (Rom. viii, 23) from corruption and sin to purity and incorruption.

Redstone, Presbytery of, was erected May 16th, 1781, by the Synod of New York and Philadelphia, in compliance with the request of certain missionaries laboring west of the Allegheny mountains. Its first meeting was appointed to be held at Laurel Hill, September 19th, 1781. The circumstances of some of the members, by reason of the incursions of the Indians, rendering it impracticable for them to attend at Laurel Hill, Presbytery met on the day appointed, at Pigeon Creek. Present: Rev. Messrs. John McMillan, James Power, and Thaddeus Dod: Elders, John Neil, Demas Lindsley and Patrick Scott. Absent: Rev. Joseph Smith. Presbytery was opened by Mr. Dod, with a sermon from Job xlii, 56. Mr. McMillan was chosen Moderator, and Mr. Power, Clerk. Within a few years following Rev. Messrs. James Dunlap, John Clark, James Findley and Samuel Barr were received as members, the latter continuing in connection but for a short period. Of the eight ministers named seven were from the Presbytery of New Castle. Mr. Dod was from the Presbytery of New York. The subsequent growth of the Presbytery was chiefly organic. Within twelve years twelve men, educated in the bounds of the Presbytery, were licensed to preach. Some of them were middle-aged; two were ruling elders. The names, in order of licensure, are John Brice, James Hughes, Joseph Patterson, James McGready, John McWherrin, Samuel Porter, Robert Marshall, George Hill, William Swan, David Smith, Thomas Marquis and Boyd Mercer. All these were ordained and found work on the field, except Marshall and McGready, both of whom, particularly the latter, became conspicuous in the great revival of 1800, in Kentucky.

After the division of the Old Synod, in 1788, the Presbytery of Redstone formed part of the Synod of Virginia, until 1802, when the Synod of Pittsburg was erected. In 1791, in compliance with a recommendation of Synod, Presbytery took action favoring "the establishment of an institution of learning," and the year following unanimously agreed that it be located at Canonsburg, under the care of Rev. John McMillan, and that "all young men taken upon the fund for the support of poor and pious youths, shall be educated there." In 1793 Synod, at the request of Presbytery, formed a new Presbytery on the west side of the Monongahela River, to be called the Presbytery of Ohio, and Rev. Messrs. Clark, McMillan, Dod, Patterson, Hughes and Brice were thus set off. In 1830 the size of the Presbytery was again reduced by thirteen of its members being detached to form the Presbytery of Blairsville. At present the Presbytery has 23 ministers, 1 licentiate and 32 churches, with a total membership of 3878.

The special historic interest attaching to this Presbytery arises, not alone from what the Presbytery was in itself, but still more, from its general relations to the Church at large. It was the first Presbytery that was formed west of the mountains. Its erection was a new ecclesiastical departure, an epoch in the history of the Presbyterian Church in the United States, second to none other in importance. It marked the beginning of the Church's occupation of the great valley of the Mississippi. The field actually occupied was, geographically, the key of the great West. It was the section of country extending from the base of the mountains westward, to Fort Pitt and the Forks of Wheeling, constituting the now famous region of southwestern Pennsylvania, with parts of West Virginia adjoining. From this as a radiating point, the forms, and much of the material, of ecclesiastical organization spread westward, initiating that great movement which has since extended over the vast domain included between the Appalachian range and the Pacific Ocean. The time, too, at which this movement was thus begun, added to its importance. It was in the closing year of the Revolution, but a month before the surrender at Yorktown. It followed immediately in the track of the retreating aboriginal tribes. And the men who conducted the movement thus, at its beginning, were eminently fitted for the work. Of the historic Scotch-Irish race, they possessed a rugged strength of character, which matured alike under the hardships and conflict of wilderness life and under the inspiration of their unbending religious faith. The ministers who first composed the Presbytery were all well educated men, most of them graduates of Princeton College. Those trained on the ground received their training according to the same high standard of scholarship. Taken collectively, they were a body of well disciplined, orthodox and devoted ministers. (See McMillan, John, D. D.; Power, James, D. D.; Dod, Rev. Thaddens; Smith, Rev. Joseph; Dunlap, James, D. D.; Marquis, Rev. Thomas; Patterson, Rev. Joseph; McCurdy, Rev. Elisha.)

Of the elders whose names appear on the early records, many were men of note in civil life. Foremost among those who guided and controlled public affairs in that day were the following elders: Hon. James Edgar, of Cross Creek; Hon. John McDowell and Hon. James Allison, of Chartiers; Hugh Scott, Esq., and Patrick McCullough, Esq., of Pigeon Creek; Col. Edward Cook and John Wright, Esq., of Rehoboth; Hon. George Plumer, of Sewickley; Hon. James Finley, of Laurel Hill; Hon. Charles Porter, of Dunlap's Creek; Hon. John Flenniken, of Muddy Creek, and not a few others. A still greater number were men whose godly life, exerting its influence in less public but not less important spheres, wrought blessed results of the most abiding character. Such were Josiah Scott, Thomas Braeken and Col. George Craighead, of Chartiers; James Dinsmore, of Bethel; William Wightman, of Lebanon; William Smiley and Robert Lyle, of Buffalo; Robert McCready, Esq., and Henry Graham, Esq., of Cross Creek; John Stevenson and Patrick Scott, of Pigeon Creek; Ebenezer Finley and Robert Baird, of Dunlap's Creek; James Caldwell, of Sewickley; John Neil and John Griffen, of Mt. Pleasant; John McPherrin, of Three Ridges; John Faris, of Forks of Wheeling; John Boyd and Abram Fulton, of Salem; James Wilson, of Fairfield; Robert Campbell, of Donegal; William Hill, of George's Creek, and many others not less worthy to be remembered. In most of the churches of Western Pennsylvania, and in many churches in the Western States, a large part of the effective membership consists of the descendants of those ministers and elders whose names are found in the early records of the Presbytery. And to this ancestry several hundreds of ministers and a correspondingly greater number of ruling elders trace their lineage.

A history of the Presbytery, under the title of "Old Redstone," making an octavo volume of 450 pages, was published in 1854, by Rev. Joseph Smith, D. D.

In 1878 the minutes of the Presbytery for its first fifty years were published, in an octavo volume, of 424 pages.

In September, 1881, a centennial celebration of the founding of the Presbytery was held at Uniontown, Pa., which, by concerted arrangement, was participated in by the Synod of Pittsburg, embracing, besides Redstone, the Presbyteries of Pittsburg, Washington, Blairsville and West Virginia. It was attended also by delegates from the Presbyteries of Allegheny, Clarion, Erie, Shenango, Mahoning, Stenbenville and Cleveland. A pamphlet containing the addresses delivered on the occasion, with full report of proceedings, was published by the Presbytery.

Reed, Alexander, D. D., son of Hon. Robert R. Reed, M. D., was born at Washington, Pa., September 28th, 1832; graduated at Washington College, 1851, and Western Theological Seminary, 1856; and was ordained and installed pastor of Upper Octorara Church, Chester county, Pa., October, 1857. Here there were very large accessions to the church under his ministry. In December, 1864, he was installed pastor of the Central Church, Philadelphia, where he labored with great fidelity and acceptableness for nine years, beloved by his people and highly esteemed by all who knew him. During his residence in that city he was a Trustee of the General Assembly, one of the Trustees of the Presbyterian House, a member of all the Boards of the Church, and long President of the Board of Publication, holding at the same time the position of Chairman of the Committee of the Relief Fund. June 8th, 1873, Dr. Reed was installed pastor of the South Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn, N. Y., where, after laboring until 1875, his health began to decline, and he resigned the charge. After a year's absence abroad, his health having improved, he accepted a call to the Church in Denver, Col., where death terminated his earnest and useful labors. Dr. Reed was always an active member of the courts of the Church, and several times a delegate to the General Assembly. He was a man of lovely spirit, exemplary Christian character, sound judgment, great sagacity, popular manners, and good scholarship. As a preacher he was earnest and eloquent, at once instructive and practical, alive to the issues of the day, and specially attractive to the young. He was endeared to all the communities in which he labored.

Reed, George Joseph, D. D., was born in Jefferson county, Ind., October 23d, 1822. He completed his collegiate course in Hanover College, Ind., in 1841. After leaving college, he attended the Theological Seminary at New Albany, Ind., for one year, and then went to Princeton Seminary, where he completed his professional studies, in 1847. In 1847 he was licensed to preach the gospel, by the Presbytery of Madison, and ordained by the Presbytery of New Albany, in 1849. For one year he supplied the Church of Connersville, Ind. From 1848 to 1851 he was Principal of the Female Institute at Charlestown, Ind. From there he went to Shelbyville, Ky., as President of the Shelbyville Female College, where he remained until 1863, when he became pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Columbia, Ky., which charge he still retains.

Dr. Reed has filled ably all the positions to which he has been called. He was eminently successful as a teacher, and that he is highly esteemed as a preacher, and loved as a pastor, his long pastorate at Columbia is a sufficient testimonial.

Reed, James A., D. D., is the pastor of the First Presbyterian Church in Springfield, Ill. His early years were spent in Huntingdon, Pa. He graduated at Jefferson College, in 1856, where he maintained a high rank, and at the Western Theological Seminary, in 1859. After preaching six months at Cedar Rapids, Iowa, he was called to the First Presbyterian Church of Wooster, Ohio, where he was ordained and installed, in 1860. That pastorate lasted for eight years, and was fruitful of good works. It was to him, in a large measure, that the location and foundation of Wooster University were due. Broken down with overwork, he resigned this pastoral charge, and went to Minnesota for rest. During the illness and absence of Dr. Gurley, then pastor of the New York Avenue Church, Washington City, D. C., Mr. Reed filled that pulpit in the Winter and Summer of 1868.

In the Fall of 1869 he accepted a call to his present important charge, of which he has since been the faithful, honored and successful pastor, ministering to an intelligent and interesting people. Dr. Reed is an able preacher, a good pastor, and active and earnest in his efforts to do good. He is devoted to the cause of Temperance and prohibitory legislation, and a forcible and fearless advocate of its claims. The importance of such influence at the legislative seat of the great Prairie State can hardly be over-estimated.

Reed, Col. Joseph. was born in Trenton, N. J., August 27th, 1741, and was admitted to the Bar in 1763. After studying in the Middle Temple, London, until 1765, he commenced practice in Trenton, and subsequently removed to Philadelphia. In 1774 he was President of the State Convention. In 1775 he accompanied Washington to Cambridge, as his aid and secretary, and remained with him during the campaign. In 1776 he was an Adjutant-general, and was highly esteemed as an officer. By direction of Washington, he co-operated in the affair at Princeton by attacking the neighboring British posts. In 1777 he was elected a member of the Continental Congress, and at one time acted as President pro tem. He received the offer from British officials, of ten thousand pounds sterling and the best office in the gift of the crown in America, if he could effect the re-union of the two countries. To this offer he replied, that "he was not worth purchasing, but such as he was, the King of Great Britain was not rich enough to do it."

In 1778 Colonel Reed was chosen President of Pennsylvania, and held the office till 1781. As a lawyer his mind was perspicuous, his perceptions quick, his penetration great, his industry unremitting. He was a trustee of the Presbyterian Church, both in Trenton and Philadelphia, and in one of his publications he said of that Church, "When I am convinced of its errors, or ashamed of its character, I may perhaps change it; till then I shall not blush at a connection with a people who, in this great controversy, are not second to any in vigorous exertions and generous contributions, and to whom we are so eminently indebted for our deliverance from the thralldom of Great Britain." Colonel Reed died March 5th, 1785.

Reed, Robert Rentoul, M. D., was third son of Alexander Reed, a prominent merchant and citizen of Washington, Pa. After graduating from Washington College, in 1825, with the highest honor of his class, he pursued the study of medicine and received a professional diploma from the University of Pennsylvania in 1828. He was hindered, by delicate health, from the practice of the healing art, and devoted himself to agriculture. Two of his sons, the late Rev. Alexander Reed, D. D., and Rev. W. B. Reed, became ministers of the Presbyterian Church. Thomas B. Reed, M. D., a prominent physician of Philadelphia, was another son.

Dr. Reed, though of a retiring disposition, was called by his fellow citizens to represent them in the United States Congress, and afterwards in the Legislature of his native State, in both of which positions he was distinguished for integrity, and for the personal influence of a high Christian character. In 1817 he was made an elder of the Presbyterian Church of Washington, an office which he filled with great efficiency until his death, in 1861. He frequently served as a member of Presbytery and Synod, and once as a commissioner to the General Assembly. For twenty-six years also, preceding his death, he was the beloved, active and useful Superintendent of the Sabbath school. His fine intelligence was only surpassed by his ardent piety. Discriminating judgment, tender sympathy, burning zeal, and constant fidelity, were the blended elements of his character, which were habitually laid upon the Master's altar. As a consequence, no man in the Church or the community was more beloved or trusted. He was a devotional student of God's word, a ready writer, of the finest taste, a genial companion, a friend and unpaid physician of the poor, a model Christian gentleman, a devoted husband and father, a praying and working disciple, a helper of others in the way of salvation, a leader of teachers, and a servant of the Good Shepherd in feeding the lambs of the flock. And when, at the age of fifty-eight years, he was called to his reward, his pastor, his brethren in the eldership, the members of the church, the children of the Sabbath school, the poor and the community at large, wept under the sorrow of a great and common bereavement.

Reed, Villeroy D., D.D., was born at Granville, New York, April 27th, 1815. He united with the Presbyterian Church in Lansingburg, New York, at the age of twelve. He graduated at Union College in 1835; studied theology at Auburn and Princeton, and was licensed to preach the gospel, August, 1838. He was pastor of the Church at Stillwater, New York, five years, and of the Church of Lansingburg, fourteen years. In October, 1857, he was elected, by the Synod of Iowa, President of Alexander College, at Dubuque. In 1861 he became pastor of the First Church, Camden, N. J., where he labored with success, and highly esteemed by his congregation, until his resignation, in 1884. Dr. Reed is a preacher of ability, sound and earnest, and is a valuable member of the judicatories of the Church. He was appointed a member of the Old School Assembly's Committee of fifteen on Reunion, in 1866; was Secretary of that Committee, and from the very first labored earnestly for reunion till it was accomplished. For twelve years he was a member of the Board of Education, and for five years its President. He has been President of the Board of Ministerial Relief from its organization, in 1876, and for years previous was Chairman of the Committee on Relief. Dr. Reed has preached without interruption, and only a short vacation occasionally, for nearly forty-five years. He has published nothing but a few funeral and occasional sermons, called for by those who heard them.

Reese, Rev. Oliver, was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, in 1774, and in 1775 was ordained and settled as pastor of Wilton Presbyterian Church, in South Carolina. Among the accounts of the church still extant, is a bill of one Christian Mate, against the trustees, for a dinner furnished for "fifty persons and fifteen boys, at the ordination of the Rev. Oliver Reese." The bill amounted to seventy-seven pounds. It is probable that he was a young man of promise. But his connection with the congregation and his work on earth were alike brief. He died either in the same year or the succeeding one.

Reese, Thomas, D. D., was born in Pennsylvania, in 1742. He removed to North Carolina, with his parents, when quite young; graduated at Princeton College, in 1768; was licensed by Orange Presbytery, in 1773, and was ordained and installed over Salem Church in the same year. During the years 1780 and 1781 all public worship was suspended, by reason of the invasion of the enemy, and Mr. Reese was compelled to abandon the field; but after the peace he pursued his duties with an ardor and diligence rarely excelled. In 1792 he accepted a call to two churches in Pendleton District. Dr. Reese held a conspicuous place among learned and good men. He was an accomplished scholar, an able and earnest preacher, and a successful teacher. He died in 1796.

Reeve, John Bunyan, D. D., was born in Mattituck, Suffolk county, N. Y., October 29th, 1831. In 1853 he was taken under the care of the Third Presbytery of New York as a candidate for the ministry. Here he was brought to the kindly notice of Rev. Asa D. Smith, D. D., and Mr. William E. Dodge, then Dr. Smith's elder, by whom he was aided in the prosecution of his studies for eight years. In June, 1858, he graduated from New York Central College, and in April, 1861, from Union Theological Seminary, New York city. June 4th, 1861, he was installed pastor of the Lombard Street Central Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, Pa., by the Fourth Presbytery of that city. Here he preached continuously, with great acceptance, for ten years and three months, when he resigned his pastorate, September, 1871, to accept a professorship in Howard University, Washington, D. C. He organized the theological department of the University this same year, and occupied the chair of Biblical Theology, meanwhile supplying the pulpit of the Fifteenth Street Presbyterian Church, Washington, D. C., until June, 1875, when he resigned to accept a second call to his old charge, the Lombard Street Central Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, Pa. The following month he removed thither, supplied the church during the Summer, and was installed pastor, September, 1875, where he has labored faithfully and successfully until the present time. By arduous and successful study, Dr. Reeve has won the respect and admiration of scholars, as well as the esteem and regard of his brethren in the ministry. He was Moderator of the Fourth Presbytery of Philadelphia from April to September, 1865, was a commissioner to the General Assembly in the same year; and in the interest of the Home Mission Committee, in the Summer of 1865, he visited East Tennessee, to examine into the nature of the mission field among the freedmen, organizing a Church at Knoxville. He is a fine pulpit orator, his style being easy, pleasant and unassuming, and his sermons highly instructive and impressive. He is one of the best types of the grand possibilities of the Africa-American.

Reeves, Rev. Henry, was born at Bridgeton, N. J., February 5th, 1823. He graduated at New Jersey College, in 1841, and studied theology at Princeton Seminary. He was stated supply at Ellesdick Chapel, New Hamburg, N. Y., 1849, and at Wappinger's Falls, 1849-50. He was ordained by the Presbytery of Newton, November 12th, 1850, and was pastor at Belvidere, N. J., 1850-8; stated supply at Fayetteville, Pa., 1858-61; Principal of Female Seminary, Chambersburg, Pa., 1858-64; Principal of Woodland Seminary, West Philadelphia, 1861-8; editor of Young Folks' News, Philadelphia, 1868-75; editor of Our Monthly, Philadelphia, 1871-5, and stated supply at Gloucester City, N. J., 1869. He is at present Principal of a Female Seminary in Bridgeton, N. J. Mr. Reeves is a good preacher, a vigorous writer, and highly esteemed by his brethren.

Reformation. Usually spoken of the great Reformation in the Church, begun by Luther, in 1517. The sad departure from the standard of holiness which the Romish hierarchy should have placed before them, combined with the indecency and arrogance with which they trampled upon the rights of sovereigns, and upon the property and the comfort of all classes of men, had, for a considerable period, produced a general conviction that a reformation of the Church in its head and members, to use the expression which was then prevalent, was absolutely requisite; and some steps to accomplish this had been actually taken. The celebrated Council of Constance, while, in its efforts to heal the schism which had so long grieved and scandalized the Catholic world, it set aside the rival pontiffs who claimed to be the successors of St. Peter, laid down the important maxim that a General Council was superior to a Pope, and that its decisions can restrain his power; and this doctrine, which might otherwise have appeared to arise out of the extraordinary circumstances under which it was declared, was fully confirmed by the Council of Basil, which met several years after, and which decided the point upon grounds that might at all times be urged. The Popes, indeed, remonstrated against this, but still they were compelled to lower their tone; and they were often reminded, even within the precincts of their own Court, that the period was fast approaching when the fallacy of many of their pretensions would be ascertained and exposed. It had become common, before the election of a new pontiff, to frame certain articles of reformation, which the successful candidate was required to swear that he would carry into effect; and although the oath was uniformly disregarded or violated, the views which led to the imposition of it indicated the existence of a spirit which could not be eradicated, and which might, from events that could not be foreseen, and could not be controlled, acquire a vigor which no exertion of power could resist. Such, under the beneficent arrangement of Providence, was soon actually the case. In the progress of the opposition made to some of the worst abuses of Rome, they who conducted that opposition were guided to the Word of Life; they studied it with avidity and with delight; and they found themselves furnished by it with sufficient armor for the mighty contest in which they were to engage. They discovered in the New Testament what Christianity really was; their representations of it were received with wonder, and read with avidity; the secession from the Church of Rome became much more rapid and much more extensive than it had previously been, and all possibility of reconciliation with that Church was done away. Of this the popes were fully aware; and as the only way of counteracting that which was to them so formidable, they attempted, by various devices, to fetter the press, to prevent the circulation of the Bible, and thus again to plunge the world into that intellectual darkness from which it had been happily delivered. The scheme was impracticable. The "Indices Expurgatorii," in which they pointed out the works that they condemned, and which they declared it to be heresy and pollution to peruse, increased the desire to become acquainted with them; and although some who indulged that curiosity suffered the punishment denounced by the Inquisition against the enemies of papal superstition, there was an immense proportion which even spiritual tyranny could not reach; so that the light which had been kindled daily brightened, till it shone with unclouded lustre through many of the most powerful and the most refined nations of Europe.

It is worthy of careful observation, that the resistance which ultimately proved so successful was first occasioned by practices that had been devised for establishing the monstrous despotism of the popes; that when it commenced, it was directed against what was conceived to be an abuse of power, without the slightest suspicion being entertained that the power itself was unchristian; that the reformers gradually advanced; every additional inquiry to which they were conducted enlarging their views, and bringing them acquainted with fresh proofs of that daring usurpation to which men had long submitted, till at length the foundation upon which the whole system, venerated through ages, rested, was disclosed to them, and perceived to be a foundation of sand. The consequence was, that the supremacy of the Pope was by multitudes abjured; that he was branded as antichrist; that communion with the popish church was avoided as sinful, and that the form of ecclesiastical polity, the essential principle of which was the infallibility of the Bishop of Rome, was forever renounced. The wonderful manner in which this signal revolution, so fraught with blessings to mankind, was accomplished, the various events which mark its history, and the characters and exertions of the men by whose agency it was effected, cannot be too often surveyed, or too deeply fixed in the memory. The whole, even with reference to the illumination of the human mind and the improvement of the social state of the world, is in a high degree interesting; and that interest is unspeakably increased by our discerning the most striking evidence of the gracious interposition of Providence, dissipating the cloud which obscured divine truth, and restoring to mankind that sacred treasure which is sufficient to make all who seriously examine it wise unto salvation. It does not, however, come within the province of this work to give a minute history of the origin and progress of the Reformation, to trace the steps of Zuinglius and of Luther, and to detail the circumstances which advanced or retarded them in the glorious career upon which they had entered. We can only add that they were animated by the noble and disinterested wish to emancipate their fellow-creatures from what they were convinced was the direct and most infatuated spiritual oppression; that they looked to Heaven for support, and that such support they largely received.

Regeneration. A new birth; that work of the Holy Spirit by which we experience a change of heart. It is expressed in Scripture by being born again, John iii, 7; born from above; being quickened, Eph. ii, 1; by Christ being formed in the heart, Gal. iv, 19; by our partaking of the divine nature, 2 Peter i, 4. The efficient cause of regeneration is the divine Spirit. That man is not the author of it, is evident from John i, 12, 13; iii, 4; Eph. ii, 8, 10. The instrumental cause is the word of God, James i, 18; 1 Peter i, 23; 1 Cor. iv, 15. The change in regeneration consists in the recovery of the moral image of God upon the heart; that is to say, so as to love Him supremely and serve Him ultimately as our highest end, and to delight in Him superlatively as our chief good. The sum of the moral law is to love the Lord our God with all our heart, and soul, and strength, and mind. This is the duty of every rational creature; and in order to obey it perfectly, no part of our inward affection or actual service ought to be, at any time, or in the least degree, misapplied. Regeneration consists in the principle being implanted, obtaining the ascendancy, and habitually prevailing over its opposite.

Regeneration is specifically the same in all who are the subjects of it. But, although every regenerated person is a new creature, and possesses all the constituent parts of the new nature, it is not necessary to maintain that, to all, the same measure of grace is communicated. They may differ from each other, as children do at their natural birth, some of whom are much more lively and vigorous than others.

Even at the commencement, God, according to His sovereign pleasure, may give more ample knowledge, stronger faith, and all the other virtues in a maturer state, to this man, than to that. But there is no difference in respect to their state: the same work has been performed in them all, and they are all partakers of "that one Spirit."

The properties of regeneration are these: 1. It is a passive work; and herein it differs from conversion. In regeneration we are passive, and receive from God; in conversion we are active, and turn to Him. 2. It is an effectual or invincible work of God's grace (Eph. iii, 8). 3. It is an instantaneous work, for there can be no medium between life and death, and here it differs from sanctification, which is progressive. 4. It is a complete work and perfect in its kind, a change of the whole man (2 Cor. v, 17). 5. It is a great and important work, both as to its author and effects (Eph. ii, 1, 5). 6. It is an internal work, not consisting in bare outward forms (Ezek. xxxvi, 26, 27). 7. Visible as to its effects (1 John iii, 14). 8. Delightful (1 Pet. i, 8). 9. Necessary (John iii, 3). 10. It is a work of grace, the blessings of which we can never finally lose (John xiii, 1).

"The change effected in the souls of men by regenerating grace," says an able writer, "is the foundation of all their subsequent attainments in religion. I mean, that they are effects or consequences of it, as the growth of a vegetable, the rising of the stem, the formation of the buds and flowers, the opening of the leaves and blossoms, and the concoction of the fruit, are the effects or consequences of the living principle in the seed. Hence an Apostle, having represented true Christians as the circumcision, or the regenerated, proceeds to state, that 'they worship God in the Spirit, and rejoice in Christ Jesus, and have no confidence in the flesh' (Phil. iii, 3). To the performance of certain functions certain powers are necessary; and there are properties belonging to one nature which no man expects to find in another. An animal without wings could not fly, without legs could not walk, without eyes could not see, without intellect could not understand. We never look for the peculiar properties of one species of animals in another; we never look, for example, for speech and reasoning among brutes. All the actions of a living being, and all its improvements, bear a relation to the nature originally given to it by its Maker. These things are obvious, not only to philosophers, but to every person of common sense; yet although just reasoning requires that we should transfer them to religion, men often proceed in a different manner. Religion manifestly implies a different train of sentiments, and feelings, and actions, from those which are brought into operation by the ordinary business of life. Yet many imagine that, because man has understanding, and will, and affections, is capable of managing his worldly affairs, and of performing the duties incumbent upon him as a member of society, he is fully qualified to answer the demands of religion, and requires only to have his attention directed to it, and to be roused to the exercise of his powers. It is taken for granted that religion is one of the original principles of our nature, which it is sufficient to direct and strengthen by discipline. It is supposed that men have a natural capacity or disposition for religion, and may be trained to habits of piety and virtue by external means. Amidst these speculations, the doctrine of human depravity is forgotten or denied, and hence it is not considered that to attempt to reduce religion from our nature as it is, is as absurd as to attempt to elicit the operations of intellect from an irrational animal. Holy actions must proceed from holy principles, and these must be created in the soul, which, since the fall, is barren of all good. Men must be regenerated before they can make progress in religion, or perform a single action which the Searcher of hearts will approve."

Reid, Rev. Alexander McCandless, Ph. D., was born near Independence, Beaver county, Pa., April 20th, 1827. He graduated at Jefferson College in 1849; studied theology in the Western Theological Seminary; was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Steubenville, and shortly afterward was ordained by the same body. For some time he was pastor of a Presbyterian Church in West Virginia, where his labors were greatly blessed. For several years he taught in the Sewickley Academy. In 1856 he became assistant to Dr. Beatty, Principal of Steubenville Female Seminary, and entered upon what has proved to be his life work. Under his excellent government of the Institution it has retained the high character which it acquired under Dr. Beatty's administration, and has had a steady and solid prosperity.

Dr. Reid is a kind, courteous and honest Christian gentleman, a clear thinker, a forcible writer, a tender, attractive and able preacher, and thoroughly evangelical. A number of his sermons and addresses have been published. He received the title of Doctor of Philosophy from Washington and Jefferson College, in 1869. In 1875 he went to Europe as a delegate from the Presbyterian General Assembly to the Pan-Presbyterian Council. In 1879 he was Moderator of the Synod of Cleveland, and is now a Trustee of Washington and Jefferson College.

Reid, Rev. Israel, graduated in the first class sent forth from the College of New Jersey, and, being licensed by New York Presbytery, he placed himself under the care of New Brunswick Presbytery, October 12th, 1748, to answer the supplication from Bound Brook. He was called, December 6th, 1749, and ordained pastor, March 7th, 1750; the first graduate of the college who became a member of Synod. He was encouraged by tokens of good among his people in 1751. New Brunswick asked for one-fourth of his time in April, 1768, and Mills-ton made the same request the next year. He died November 28th, 1793.

Reid, Rev. William M., the son of George and Ann (Hardy) Reid, was born in the city of Charleston, S. C., February 25th, 1798. He was a member of the first class in Columbia Theological Seminary, and was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Harmony, April 3d, 1833. In January, 1834, he began his labors at Mt. Zion Church, Presbytery of Harmony, and in October, 1835, was installed pastor. This relation continued until October, 1873, when, on account of the infirmities of age, it was dissolved. As a preacher, Mr. Reid was earnest and solemn. He was eminently a man of prayer; he was peculiarly gifted in religious conversation; he was utterly wanting in practical knowledge of worldly things. His study is his home. It is a privilege to visit him in it now. You hardly enter it before you find that you are breathing the atmosphere of heaven. "As good as Father Reid," is a common expression throughout the country in which he resides. His sun is now setting, but it is a golden sunset; the shock of corn is fully ripe.

Reid, William Shields, D. D., the second son of his parents, was born in West Nottingham township, Chester county, Pa., April 21st, 1778. He graduated at Princeton, with honor, in 1802. On leaving Princeton, he was an assistant teacher two years in an academy at Georgetown, D. C., at the same time prosecuting his theological studies under Dr. Baleh, which he afterwards continued at Shepherdstown, Va., under Dr. Moses Hoge. After remaining in the latter place for some time, he accepted a Professorship in Hampden-Sidney College. When Dr. Archibald Alexander, who was then President of the college, about two years after accepted a call to Philadelphia, Mr. Reid succeeded him in that office. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Winchester, in the Spring of 1806, and retained his connection with the college some eighteen months afterwards, making in all about five years. He removed to Lynchburg in 1808, opened a school for males, and at the same time labored to build up a Presbyterian church. A church was organized, though he was not installed as its pastor till 1822, and under his able and judicious culture, as well as his generous pecuniary sacrifices, it attained great prosperity. His school, after a while, became a flourishing boarding school for young ladies, and the influence which he exerted in it in forming the characters of wives and mothers, is beyond all estimate. This Institution he was compelled by declining health to abandon, and becoming utterly incapacitated for public labor, in 1818, he resigned his pastoral charge. He died in perfect peace, June 23d, 1853. Dr. Reid was a man of vigorous talents and uncommon energy of character. As a preacher, he was distinguished for the clearness of his views, for a rapid and animated elocution, and for a decided and uncompromising adherence to the doctrines of his own Church. He was remarkable for the grace and dignity of his manners, and his natural benevolence was moulded, by the grace of the gospel, into the most tender and sympathetic disposition. He had the profound veneration and strong affection of the community in which he lived.

Reigart, Rev. Samuel W., son of John Franklin and Caroline (White) Reigart, was born in Lancaster, Pa., July 29th, 1837. He graduated at Franklin and Marshall College in 1859, taking one of the honors of the class. The next year he was elected Principal of the Lancaster High School, which position he filled with ability for five years. In the meanwhile, having read theology under the direction of the Rev. Walter Powell, he was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Donegal, October 4th, 1864. He was ordained and installed over the Church of Sunbury, Pa., October 17th, 1865. Three years later he was called to the Church at Mechanicsburg, Pa., and entered upon his pastoral work there October 25th, 1868. There he still continues, active and useful. This church, which at that time was a young and weak organization, is now one of the strongest in the Presbytery, and is noted for its interest and contributions in behalf of the cause of Foreign Missions. Mr. Reigart is both a good preacher and pastor. He was a member of the General Assembly in 1872. His congregation published an excellent sermon, entitled "Our Work, or The Aim of the Gospel Minister," preached by him on the completion of the tenth year of his pastorate.

Reiley, Rev. John Arnott, was born at Durham, Bucks county, Pa., May 3d, 1816; graduated at Miami University, Ohio, in 1842; studied theology at Princeton Seminary; and was licensed by Newton Presbytery, May 16th, 1844. From February 1st to September 1st, 1845, he supplied the Church at Port Carbon, Pa. November 1st, 1845, he was installed pastor of the churches of Knowlton and Blairstown, N. J. He was released from Knowlton Church April 1st, 1851, and was installed over Blairstown for the whole of his time, May 3d, 1851. His ministry here was a long one and a very successful one. Mr. Reiley was released from this charge November 27th, 1866, and removed to East Feliciana, La. He was never a pastor again, but labored and preached as a volunteer missionary, chiefly among the colored people, at his own expense. He died September 30th, 1878. Mr. Reiley was a very faithful and energetic workman in the Lord's vineyard. His talents were solid rather than brilliant. He was a genial and steadfast friend, an earnest, strong, laborious man, "full of faith and of the Holy Ghost."
